The Maidan is a redeeming feature of Calcutta in the eyes of the Englishman. It contains a splendid drive, which is the fashionable promenade of the city, and so the Maidan might be called the Hyde Park of Calcutta. But it also contains a race-course, tennis courts, etc., and also great grassy spaces, which, however, are at periods brown and unattractive owing to the long dry seasons. Sunset, as seen from the Maidan when one looks westward over the river, is the most beautiful aspect of Calcutta—the haze and fine dust hanging low over the city, with a clear sky above, give wonderful colour effects, and the crowded masts of the shipping silhouetted against these complete a picture really unique.

Corresponding to the political importance of the city, the Royal visit had here a distinctly political and Imperial aspect. There was, of course, the reception by the Viceroy, Lord Minto, and it is interesting to note that His Royal Highness was received by Lord Minto as Governor-General of Canada when the Ophir made the journey round the world. The Tashi Lama—the spiritual and temporal head of Tibet—paid an official visit to Calcutta to meet the Prince, and this is regarded as significant of close and friendly relations between the two Governments. His visit was certainly interesting, for his retinue was mounted on small shaggy Tibetan ponies, and the priests had most strange costumes. He is regarded by the Buddhist as of the greatest sanctity, his progress was accompanied by horn-blowing and the more devoted of the Buddhists reverently kissed his pony's tail. With him was the Tongsa Penlop, one of the leading chiefs of Bhutan, the independent mountain State lying between Tibet and India.

It was intended that from Calcutta the Prince and Princess should make a trip to Darjeeling, the hill station in the Himalayas which is used as a sanatorium, and at which there are several schools for those European children who cannot go to England as very many do. Besides the cool climate, Darjeeling has splendid views of the mountains, and a visit is usually very pleasant. The journey is made by a little railway, looking almost like a toy, especially designed for the hill-climbing, as this station is about 7,000 feet above the sea. It is from these lower slope of the Himalayas that large quantities of tea are produced.

The trip, however, had to be abandoned owing to the exceptionally unfavourable weather, and in its place the Prince and Princess spent a few days in a quiet visit to the Viceroy at his country residence at Barrackpur. This is about ten miles north of Calcutta, and was used as a summer resort in days before the hill stations were thus utilised. The journey from Calcutta to Barrackpur is very interesting, for there are many curious features of Indian life to be observed. For example, there is the interesting if rather unpleasant sight of the Burning Ghat where the dead are cremated, and as one passes by there are usually several funeral pyres sending up their smoke and perhaps reminding one of that horrible practice of Suttee, now abolished, in which the widows met their death on the funeral pyre of their husbands.

There is a certain similarity between Calcutta and Rangoon, to which the Prince proceeded when he left India proper for a visit to Burma. Burma may be said to consist of three kinds of country: mountain ranges running north and south, long river valleys between them, and a low coastal plain. The valleys are drained by the three rivers, the Irawadi, the Sittong, and the Salwin, and the coastal plain is in part formed by the deltas of these rivers. In the delta at the mouths of the Irawadi and Sittong is Rangoon, and is therefore similar to Calcutta in being built on a great mass of mud deposited at the mouth of two important rivers. Consequently there are several characteristics which they have in common. Each is swampy, hot, and unlovely, and each is a port for the fertile and populous valleys behind it.

Their history, too, is similar, for each is of recent growth, and is now a prosperous and still-growing commercial centre. Rangoon, however, is the younger; it was a mere village fifty years ago. It is also the smaller, for it has scarcely a third of the population of Calcutta, and indeed can never hope to rival that city, for it has not such a vast area for a "hinterland" as the capital of India possesses. Their trade is somewhat similar. Each is the outlet of a great rice-producing region, and from Rangoon the produce of the rice-fields (which sometimes give three crops in a year) is sent to India, for the needs of parts of that country are in this respect much greater than the local supplies. Then, too, the forests here give teak also, and cotton is now being cultivated with great hopes of success. From Upper Burma are sent the rubies for which the country has so long been famous; and a newer product is the oil which has now entered into serious competition with that of Russia and America.

Business enterprise seems the dominant note in Rangoon. Even the curious sight of elephants hauling and stacking teak in the timber yards and showing a docility and intelligence which are a constant source of interest to visitors, even this is disappearing before the advance of machinery. And just as this foreign importation is ousting the native elephants, so the traders and workers of many nationalities are ousting the Burman himself. About one-third of the population are Burmese, and as these take an obscure part in the life of the place, it seems to the visitor that the people are scarcely native at all. There are British and Indian soldiers, Indian police, Chinese traders, labourers from Madras and Bengal, Siamese, Cingalese, Annamese, and indeed people from all parts of Southern Asia.

Almost the only feature that is distinctly Burmese is the great Shwe Dagon Pagoda. This, or rather a small part of it, was erected as a shrine for some heirs of Buddha, and has been added to continually and without any definite plan, in order that those who took part in the work might "acquire merit." All round the central building are smaller ones, built with the same object. The central pagoda is as high as St. Paul's Cathedral, the smaller ones about twenty feet high, and all are gilded for the provision of gold leaf for this purpose has been a favourite means of "acquiring merit." For this reason, too, there are hundreds of small alters, images, shrines, and bells surrounding the structure, and the bells are rung by the devout Burman to draw attention to his meritorious deeds.

The difference in religion between the Hindus of India and the Buddhists of Burma is apparent in many ways. In the first place, there is no caste system among the Burmese, and the people are much more upon an equality. There are yellow-robed monks, for example, but these are not drawn from one class, and every boy before entering manhood has to live for a time in a monastery and wear the yellow robe. The monks are vowed to poverty; they beg their food, and cannot own any possessions; they are the educationalists of the country, and the Burmese boys were taught reading and writing and the moral precepts of their religion long before education became universal in our own land.

The Burmese doubtless owe their placid outlook upon life largely to their religion, which inculcates simple virtue aiming at an ultimate end of perfect peace, attained when the individual at last loses his individuality. This ideal, so greatly at variance with our Western admiration of energy and strenuousness, has been fostered by the very easy way in which Nature allows the people to live—their needs in that land are few and easily met. Further, these ideals and habits are now putting them at a great disadvantage when their land is being invaded by peoples of other ideals and more energetic habits.

A kindred feature of the Burmese character is their gaiety and general happiness of disposition. This expresses itself, for example, in their dress, which is very similar for men and women. Both have a coloured skirt and white jacket, and the women have this surmounted by a bright scarf. They all wear the hair long, but the men may do it up with a coloured handkerchief and the women with flowers. Generally speaking, the colours are pleasing, and the dress is distinctly more artistic than that prevailing in India. Altogether life seems brighter in Burma than in India, and the difference is most marked in the treatment of women. Instead of being secluded as so many of their Indian sisters are, the women of Burma take a full share—frequently more than a share—in the life of the country. A traveller passing from one country to the other cannot fail to notice the contrast, and there is no doubt that Burma owes much of its relative happiness to this cause.

The journey up the Irawadi reveals many of the peculiarities of the people, for the national life seems to centre on the great water-ways. The illustration shows the curiously-built houses, raised on piles well above the ground which is frequently inundated by the water coming down in mighty floods from the mountains. The houses consist essentially of a platform lashed to the bamboo or teak piles, with walls of matting. They are always of one storey, even the largest of them, for the people strongly object to any one being above their heads.

When the Prince went up-country he witnessed a series of boat, or rather canoe, races, for the Burmese are very fond of this sport and very skilful in the management of their canoes. The scene was as animated and brilliant as that at Henley, and therefore seemed quite characteristic of the people. The visit to Mandalay recalls the fact that Upper Burma has only been added to the Empire comparatively recently, for it is now just twenty years since the atrocious misgovernment and the wholesale slaughter by King Theebaw led to the entrance of the British and the acquisition of the country. There has been since then a great development of the resources of the land and the extension of railways hundreds of miles up the valleys, and one has to look forward to further great changes in the near future.

The Renown and the Terrible conveyed the Royal party from Calcutta to Rangoon, and later back to India this time to Madras. It is quite possible that the popular idea of Madras is of a low coast with very shallow sea extending so far from the land that such large ships could not approach the landing-place, yet this is not so, for there have been great improvements, and the Renown and Terrible came quite close to the land. The improvements have been very costly, for there is certainly no natural harbour, and the native surf-boats and the small catamarans with the outriggers have impressed this idea firmly on the mind of Europeans. Somehow the rest of India—that is to say, of its European element—looks down on Madras, and the common conception is almost limited to surf breaking on a broad sandy beach with a rather sleepy town behind it.

The town certainly lacks some unpleasant features of places which are flourishing manufacturing and commercial centres, and it is being outstripped by more favourably placed cities, but it is far from insignificant, and has many good features.

Madras was one of the first possessions of the East India Company and in the early days of British settlement was relatively a greater commercial centre than it is now. Clive went out as a clerk in the Company's service to Madras, and it was at Arcot, a little to the south-west, that he defeated the great army of the Nabob of Bengal, and laid the foundation of the British power. The rise of Madras was largely due to the English occupation, but the tide of progress has to some extent passed by and raised Calcutta and Bombay above it. Calcutta with its million people is the great port of North-Eastern India—it is the only possible great port of that part of the country. Bombay with its three-quarters of a million of people is the gateway of India from Europe, Madras with half a million of people is neither a well-marked outlet of a great natural region, nor is it a gateway to one of the world's highways. There are no other ports near it, which share the trade of the south of India, and the development of the railways across the northern part of the country has left Madras as it were, in a backwater.

Yet, for all that, Madras seems cheerful. The city is very spacious. It covers nearly forty square miles, and has great parks and broad avenues. These give an appearance of coolness, quiet, and comfort, and the large European quarter is eminently leafy and suburban; in fact, the white city seems all suburbs.

The natives seemed quite happy when they crowded in unprecedented numbers to witness the Prince's arrival. In this part of India they are of different race entirely from those of the North-West; here are the descendants of those earlier peoples who preceded the Aryans, and the languages here are quite of another type than those heard in the former part of the tour. Bramanism is very strict; the Mohamedan influences do not seem to have weakened its hold upon the people, and consequently the caste system is remarkably strong, and the distinctions between the different castes are stringently observed. The Brahman is regarded with almost divine reverence; he does not mix with the other people, but remains apart as though he fears infection from the common throng.

Yet in spite of this strict adherence to ancient custom and in spite of the apparent contentment of the people, the Madrassite emigrate in large numbers. They go in search of work to all the lands around the Indian Ocean, from the African Coast to the Malay Peninsula, but they are very glad to return to their homeland after a time. This willingness to go to foreign lands for work is an adventurous trait in their character scarcely to be expected.

Pioneer.—The Commissioners have sanctioned the estimate amounting to Rs. 6,400 for the decorations of the harbour between Botatoung and the Sule Pagoda on the occasion of the Royal visit. It has now been arranged that the Prince and Princess of Wales will stop for a few moments at each pandal on their drive from the Sule Pagoda Wharf to Government House. An address of welcome to the Prince and Princess of Wales will be read by Ko Shwe Waing, Municipal Commissioner, one of the oldest and most respected Burmese residents of Rangoon. The casket to enclose the address has now been completed. Messrs. P. Orr and Son have supervised the work, which is from Burmese designs, and has been executed solely by Burmese workmen. Sixteen thousand medals, which have been struck to commemorate the Royal visit to Rangoon, have arrived here. Every child attending the reception will receive one. It has now been arranged that the Prince of Wales will visit the yard of the Bombay Burma Trading Corporation at Duneedaw on Monday morning, the 15th instant. A pandal is being erected in the yard and decorations are in progress.

His Highness the Aga Khan, by way of commemorating the Royal visit to Aligarh College, has presented a donation of Rs. 35,000 to be the nucleus of a fund for establishing a Science School in the College. His Highness in a letter conveying his offer to the Nawab Mohsin-ul-Mulk says that now that the study of Arabic has been efficiently provided for, the most urgent want of the college is a properly equipped and organised Science School; and he urges Mahomedans throughout India to contribute according to their means, so as to erect a memorial which will keep the Royal visit continually and permanently before the minds of the Mahomedan community.

Standard.—It has a great reputation for picturesqueness and artistic effect, which is somewhat beyond its deserts, and is due chiefly to the fact that it is on the regular tourist line, and is taken in his stride by the autumn visitor who "does" India, between Bombay and Calcutta, in a few weeks. But when you compare Jaipur with the other capitals of Rajputana, with Udaipur, by its enchanted lakes, with Jodhpur, with its grand fortress-palace and its crowded, quaint bazaars, with Bikanir, islanded in its desert, Jaipur seems modern, pretentious, artificial, rather vulgar. One is inclined to agree with a great Indian Viceroy who—in his pre-viceroyal days—declared the "rose-red city" to be no more than a rose-red fraud. It is clean, well-planned, well-governed, prosperous, progressive. But it has lost that distinctive, old-world flavour of Eastern medievalism which renders the others so delightful.

In some respects Bikanir is the most interesting of all. Four hundred and fifty years ago, when the Moghuls were pressing hard upon the rulers of Marwar, Bika Singh, the sixth son of the Rao Jodh, the founder of Jodhpur, moved into the heart of the wilderness and founded a new city there. All Rajputana is more or less desert, but Bikanir State is desert almost unadulterated, a waste of waterless sand, with green oases, on which are villages and cultivated fields. From the old palace of Bikanir, builded on a rock, as all these Rajput citadels were, you see, beyond the low houses and flat roofs of the town, the desert extending on all sides, like a sea. And, indeed, it looks like the sea; for in the heat-laze the brown and yellow turns to purple and the effect is that of a level plain of dark water. If you mount a horse and ride in any direction, in ten minutes you are deep in the desert, with nothing about you but drifting sand and a few weakly stunted bushes. It is a fragment of Arabia or Africa transported to India; and the town itself seems Syrian or Egyptian, with its thick walls of earth and sandstone, its low, square, flat-roofed houses, its prevailing tints of brown and orange, its pervading camels. Yet in this trying environment the races of Rajputana are seen at their best. The cleverest and wealthiest of the Marwari merchants issue from the desert-city, and sometimes come back to it. The Rajput physique is perfected by the sun and wind. Many of the women are tall and straight, with clear skins and regular features; and the men of the Bikanir Contingent are as fine a body of long-limbed, clean-built troopers and sepoys as India can produce. There is an excellent gaol, well-managed under English direction, where they make carpets that are sold all over the world; there is a good club, and the Maharaja has lately built a new palace, with electric fans and electric lights and all the latest improvements; but the whole atmosphere of the place is still antique and Oriental.

Jaipur is different. It is two hundred years old, but it is in some respects more modern than most towns in Europe. The Maharaja Jai Singh, who founded it in 1728, was a reformer, a utilitarian, and a man of science. He was a great astronomer, and established an Observatory, which is a very curious place, since it consists of a sandy courtyard in which are enormous instruments, built up of brick and stone. Jai Singh would have been an invaluable chairman of the Improvements Committee in a modern borough council. He had the root of the matter in him, since he knew that urban locomotion demands broad and straight streets. These conditions could not be effectively secured at the old capital of Amber, up among the hills, five miles away, which now lies, with its marble courts and embossed houses, empty, deserted, and exquisite. The Palace at Amber was built in the great age of Rajput architecture. It is full of dignity and stateliness, and though its internal decorations are tinselly and meretricious, it has beautiful ceilings, held up by noble columns, trellised balconies, with chiselled screens of stone work, and a labyrinth of porticos and flat roofs, which give lovely views of the valley and the hills. "O, Progress, what crimes are committed in thy name," one feels inclined to say on surveying the work of the early municipal reformer, who wrote the doom of Amber in order that he might create Jaipur.

Jai Singh did not want his improved, scientific capital to be complicated by valleys and rising ground. He perceived that for a city, laid out on a strictly regular, geometrical pattern, a level site is the best. So he planted the new city on a dead, flat, dusty plain, without a hillock or a depression anywhere. Its ground plan is like that of a modern American town. The main avenues run straight as a line from end to end, a hundred and eleven feet wide, which is more than the width of any thoroughfare in London, except about three. Lesser, but still very wide, streets run parallel to these; others cross them at right angles. There are circular spaces at various points, and in the middle of all is the Palace, covering an enormous area of ground, with its stables, its menageries, and its great oblong, sanded arena, in which the King's animals, his horses, elephants, bears, wild boars, rams, and antelopes exercise and occasionally fight.

It is rather curious to reflect that some fifty years before Jai Singh created his new capital, Sir Christopher Wren drew up a somewhat similar plan (it is now in the library of All Souls College, Oxford) for the rebuilding of London after the Great Fire. Wren could not get the Corporation to accept his design; but Jai Singh had no Lord Mayor and Common Council to consult, and as the King ordered so it was done. He decreed that his city should be all of a deep pink, the colour of the red sandstone, and so it is to this day. Unfortunately, there was not enough of the stone to go round, and most of the buildings are of painted stucco. Moreover, they are very low, and they look ridiculously mean and petty, ranged along the immense sandy roadways. In many cases, upper storeys, with battlemented parapets, have been superimposed, but these only make matters worse; for they are obviously "duffers," mere shells of wall, with no roofs and no rooms behind them. Thus they add to the general air of theatrical unreality, with which the city is invested. It seems a town of pasteboard, a hollow affair of lath and plaster and canvas and paint, made to be looked at, but not to stand, like those imitation streets—"India in London," or "Venice in London"—which are sometimes exhibited for our entertainment. Indeed, when I drove through the town for the first time, and saw it adorned with flags and coloured transparencies of the Prince and Princess of Wales, I could not escape the feeling that the whole city had been run up for the occasion by Mr. Imre Kiralfy, or some other enterprising caterer, and that it would be taken down and packed away for use elsewhere when done with.

The circus-like impression is intensified when you wander about the vast pink palace, with its menagerie of animals. You come upon elephant stables and camel stables, and all kinds of creatures, housed in what look like temporary sheds evidently just preparing to "go on." Within the precincts of the palace itself, in close proximity to the reception rooms, with their new French furniture, their gilding, and chandeliers, and glistening modern glassware, there is a whole village of mud-huts, with half-naked men and women, and wholly naked brown children tumbling about in the sunshine. This mingling of luxury and squalor is very characteristic of India. You find it everywhere. Rags and silk and jewels are always in juxtaposition. Tattered hangers-on loaf about the courtyards of great people, even on the most solemn occasions of state.

At Jaipur these villagers, I believe, are the sweepers and cleaners of the palace, and the attendants on the Maharaja's live-stock which is highly extensive and varied. I went to a sort of gymkhana or exhibition, held in the arena, early one morning, and saw a great many of them. There were haughty cream-coloured and piebald stallions, with sumptuous velvet housings, bulls and buffaloes, pretty little chinkara deer, and spotted antelopes, huge grunting boars, and young pigs, playful as kittens, and rams with threatening voluted horns. All of them were tethered with ropes, and, in the case of the larger beasts, there were half-a-dozen men hanging on to each rope. After being led round the ring, the animals were pitted against each other in pairs. There were quail fights, and deer cock fights, and deer fights, and boar fights, and little pig fights, and ram fights. It was rather a poor show, not without an element of cruelty. Most of the animals had no stomach for the fray, and as for the fat and well-fed boars, they simply looked at one another and turned away, until hustled together by the attendants, when they lost their tempers, and cut and ripped in earnest, inflicting some nasty gashes. The only really spirited contests were between the rams, who charged each other with fury, clashed their armed foreheads together with a shock like a pistol shot, and were pulled away half stunned after each encounter. The Prince and Princess did not attend this exhibition, and the whole proceeding is not regarded with favour by the Government of India, though the privilege of keeping and training fighting beasts for the arena is one which the independent princes are unwilling to surrender. In its present modified and mitigated form it seems hardly worth retaining, and even the tiger and boar fights, and the rhinoceros fights, are said to be very tame performances.

This kind of survival seems particularly out of place in Jaipur, which, in many ways, is quite a modern city. It is well kept, it is well-lighted by gas, and it has hotels for the accommodation of the autumnal visitors abovementioned. It has a school of arts, where they make excellent enamelled metal ware under exceedingly skilled direction; and it has the best museum, with one exception, in all India, and a museum which, in the careful selection and the judicious arrangement of its contents, is a model of what such an institution ought to be. There are a hundred and sixty thousand people in Jaipur, and the place is full of life and business, the commercial centre and entrepôt of all Rajputana and the adjacent parts of India. It has a progressive Maharaja, much interested, as a descendant of Jai Singh, should be, in art, and science, and education; and it seems prosperous enough, even in a famine year. Being a resort of many traders and artisans from various districts, near and remote, it assembles a variegated multitude in its wide avenues. The tourist may leave this bright and animated city with grateful feelings. If the rose pink walls are shoddy the crowd is genuine and delightful hours may be spent in watching its motley streams and mingling with its noisy eddies.

Times.—The Royal week in Calcutta is drawing to an end. The trip to Darjeeling has been abandoned owing to unpropitious climatic conditions. After Convocation to-morrow, when Calcutta University confers an honorary degree on the Prince of Wales, Their Royal Highnesses will go out to Barrackpur and spend a few days in quiet retirement at the Viceroy's country residence before embarking for Burma.

It will have been indeed a full week. Banquets at Government House, where they have been the guests of the Viceroy and Lady Minto; at Belvedere with the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal; at the Fort with the Commander-in-Chief; luncheon parties given by the Chief Justice and the Maharaja of Kuch Behar; races, which appropriately included the Prince of Wales' Cup; fireworks and illuminations, which transformed Calcutta into a city of fairy light; a beautiful native festival on the Maidan, with native songs and native dances; a splendid New Year's Day parade; a Levée with 2,000 presentations; a brilliant garden party yesterday, and to-night a State ball—these by no means constitute a full list of the engagements which Their Royal Highnesses have fulfilled with unfailing graciousness since their arrival in Calcutta just a week ago to-day, winning the hearts of all by the keenness of their interest in everything and by the geniality and kindliness of their manner to every one. They, too, have, I think, every reason to be gratified with their reception. Every day and on every occasion the population of Calcutta, swelled by an enormous influx of visitors from the neighbouring districts, have turned out in their scores of thousands to catch a glimpse of the Prince and Princess and to greet them with every evidence of eager interest and genuine respect.

Nor would it probably have been otherwise, even if the agitation provoked by the so-called partition of Bengal had not already died down before their Royal Highnesses' arrival. The agitation was largely artificial from the outset, as may be gathered from the preponderating share played in it by the juvenile effervescence of students and schoolboys, and over two months' experience of the actual working of the new measure, which is practically nothing more than a change in administrative machinery, has sufficed to belie most of the gloomy prophecies in which its opponents so recklessly indulged, for people have had time to discover for themselves that none of the oppressive consequences which it was to entail has in reality ensued.

Englishman.—Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales proceeded to Barrackpore by special train starting from Sealdah at 5 p.m., yesterday. The departure was private. Their Royal Highnesses were accompanied by Sir Arthur Bigge, Mr. Frank and Lady Eva Dugdale, and Colonel R. Havelock Charles. In the same train Their Excellencies the Viceroy and Lady Minto went to Barrackpore also, accompanied by Lieutenant-Colonel J. R. Dunlop-Smith, Private Secretary, and Major F. L. Adam, Military Secretary and Staff.

The Princess of Wales, accompanied by Lady Minto and Colonel Crooke-Lawless, visited the Presidency General Hospital at 11 o'clock yesterday morning. Her Royal Highness was received by Colonel Macrae, Deputy Inspector-General of Civil Hospitals, and Major Pilgrim, who conducted her round the women's and children's wards. The senior Clewer Sisters were presented to Her Royal Highness whose visit to this hospital was greatly appreciated. Before leaving the Princess presented the hospital with signed portraits of the Prince and herself.

Free Lance.—Quite like ordinary mortals kings and queens and other royalties have to put up with endless little worries, and on no occasion do troubles turn up more frequently than when they are touring. Apropos of the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to India (where, by the way, their Royal Highnesses have become exceedingly popular) the "Darjeeling Chronicle" has collected a few stories of previous Royal visits to the "Shiny." "Loyal admiration," it says, "often becomes embarrassing, and even occasionally startling. Royalty must be ready to act a proper part when the most unlooked-for things occur. What ought a Prince to do when he is presented with a garland of flowers by a beautiful Parsee girl, with thousands of people looking on? The dilemma was rather unexpected.

The King (then Prince of Wales) was present at a great demonstration of native school children at Bombay when the incident occurred. A lovely Parsee maiden, arrayed in pink and white satin, approached him with a garland of flowers and attended by a band of Hindoo girls singing a loyal anthem. The Prince accepted the garland gracefully, bowing, and speaking his thanks. But something seemed wrong, and the little Indian maidens looked sad. Then one presented a garland to the Governor, Sir P. Wodehouse, whom residence in India had schooled in Indian customs. Sir Philip did not take the garland, but bowed his head and permitted the pretty little maiden to put it round his neck. That was the proper thing.

The Prince grasped the situation in a flash. With a bright smile he beckoned the little maiden to him, gave her the garland again, stooped down, and let her put it round his neck, while a great shout of delight went up from the throats of all the thousands of natives round. Royalty on tour has to adapt itself to many local customs which the humble tourist can afford to neglect at his own sweet will. Our present King once astounded some of his foreign subjects by his ability to ride a camel. A camel was the proper animal for the occasion, but no one would have wondered if Royalty had ignored it and kept to horse-back. But the Prince would do the proper thing, and, to the astonishment and delight of the natives, he mounted a camel and rode it. He had taken the trouble to learn the accomplishment in a few secret lessons beforehand. It gained him unbounded admiration and affection."

Graphic.—The Prince and Princess of Wales, after spending Christmas Day at Gwalior, left that night for Lucknow. Perhaps there is no spot in India that recalls so many stirring stories of heroism as Lucknow, and the principal interest in the city to-day is concentrated in the ruins of the Residency and other spots rendered famous in the history of the Mutiny.

Calcutta was reached last Friday. Arriving at the Howrah station, the Prince and Princess embarked immediately on a steamer and proceeded down the river to the Prince's Ghat where they landed amid great enthusiasm. The Corporation presented a loyal address in a silver gilt casket, and asked the Princess to accept a diamond and pearl necklace. The pearls were graduated and were all of different colour, being the result of fifteen years' collection. The Princess put on the necklace amid loud cheers. Their Royal Highnesses afterwards drove to Government House, where a Levée was held in the evening. On the following morning the Prince presented new colours to the 1st Battalion, Royal Leicester Regiment, of which the King is Colonel-in-Chief. In the afternoon Their Royal Highnesses attended the races, when the race for the special Hundred Guinea Cup, presented by the Prince, was run. On New Year's Day there was a brilliant parade of all arms before the Prince and Princess, and in the afternoon the Princess attended a Purdah party given by Lady Fraser at Belvedere.

6TH JANUARY 1906.

Ladies' Field.—The Prince and Princess of Wales made as near an approach to an English celebration of Christmas as was possible at Gwalior, with a little tiger shooting thrown in. The three days at Lucknow were interesting, and Their Royal Highnesses are at present in the thick of their engagements at Calcutta. They will remain in the capital for nearly a week yet. The pearl and diamond necklace presented by the city to the Princess is in some respects the most notable of her many fine jewels. Apart from its associations, the necklace is of great beauty and value. The pearls are flawless specimens, each being of a different colour, and the diamonds, too, are of the rarest tints. Fifteen years have been occupied in collecting the gems, and the Princess has delighted everyone by wearing the gift each time she appears in public. Her Royal Highness, as private letters home assure us, has made an immensely favourable impression everywhere, and the talk is all over her fair complexion and fine stature, her ready smile and unwearying cordiality. The Prince of Wales is liked whenever and wherever he appears in India, but the feeling for the Princess is deeper and even more cordial. She has, in no mere formal sense, won the goodwill of all. The Prince and Princess, as well as Lord and Lady Minto and the Ladies Elliot, were present at Calcutta races on Saturday.

Madras Mail.—Calcutta, 5th January.—The State Ball last night and the special Convocation of the Calcutta University to-day brought the ceremonies in connection with the visit of Their Royal Highnesses to Calcutta to an end. It is growing trite to say that the Ball was more largely attended than any similar function in the history of the City. Still, never have the handsome rooms of Government House presented a gayer and brighter scene, and, although at first dancing was difficult, from supper time it was kept up with the greatest spirit. Their Royal Highnesses and the Viceroy and Lady Minto joined in the State Quadrille and the Prince and Princess found so much attraction in the animation of the throng, that they waited for the Princess to participate in the State Lancers, when Her Royal Highness had Lord Kitchener for partner.

They will remain quietly at Barrackpore until Tuesday, when they descend the river in a launch to Garden Reach and trenship to the S. S. Guide, which will take them to the river mouth, where H. M. S. Renown will be in waiting. She will sail for Rangoon either on Tuesday evening or on Wednesday morning.

In commemoration of the visit the following honours are announced:—Mr. E. Cable, the active merchant and Sheriff of Calcutta at the time of the arrival, and the Maharaj-Kumar Prodyot Kumar Tagore, Secretary to the Calcutta Reception Committee, are created Knights.

Mr. E. V. Gabriel, of the Foreign Office, who has been very largely responsible for the excellent arrangements, receives the C. V. O.

Major Adam, Military Secretary to the Viceroy, who is responsible for much of the entertainments in Calcutta; Mr. Bayley, Second Secretary to the Reception Committee; Mr. Eggar, Secretary to the Calcutta Victoria Memorial, and Mr. Halliday, who was responsible for Police arrangements here, receive the M. V. O.

Madras Mail.—Busy preparations are going on at Government House for the accommodation of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales and their suite. A big camp is being pitched in the compound.

We are asked to notify that gentlemen who do not reply to the invitations that have been issued for the reception at the Harbour before Monday morning next, the 8th instant, will probably not get any tickets, as seats will then be allotted and tickets issued. A number of gentlemen who have been invited have not yet replied.

On Thursday morning, the 25th instant, Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales will pay a visit to the Hospital for Caste and Gosha Women, and the route to be taken will be from the Chepauk gate of Government House Park via the western side of the Chepauk cricket ground.

There was a large assemblage of the members of the Marwari Association at their premises in Harrison Road, Calcutta, on the morning of Sunday last to give effect to their Resolution to offer prayers for the long life and prosperity of the future Emperor and Empress of India now in our midst. The invitation of the Committee to the Marwari public to join the proposed procession met with a hearty response, and many respectable members of the community, besides members of the Marwari Chamber of Commerce, were present. Punctually at the appointed hour, 8 A.M., the procession was formed, which started for the temple of Satyanarainji, attended with music. The ceremony at the temple was an impressive one and rendered more so by the chanting in a sweet clear voice of Vedic hymns by the young Brahmin students of the Sanskrit department of the Shri Vishuddhananda Sarasawat Vidyalaya, who also with their Gurus were invited. Prayers invoking the blessings of God upon the Royal couple were offered by all present and the ceremony came to a close.

The following appeal was issued last week by the Chief Priests at Kalighat near Calcutta:—

It is the duty of all the Indian people to show their heartfelt loyalty. For the long life and prosperity of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, let all the Indians join in the performance of a Panchantga Jajna at the Kalighat Temple on the 1st January 1906. We invite all the gentlemen and ladies of India without distinction of caste, creed and colour, no matter whether they be Europeans, Mahomedans, Hindus, Christians, Marwaris, Chinese, Burmese, Parsees, Jains and Japanese, to come and help us with contribution according to their ability towards the celebration of the Jajna in question. We will thankfully receive anything that may be offered to us by the generous and loyal public for the above holy undertaking. We hope that every person in India will kindly extend his helping hand towards the performance of the said Jajna, calculated to prolong the life and prosperity of the Royal guests.

The appeal was very largely responded to, thousands of Hindus making the journey to the great shrine.

Madras Mail.—The visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to the tomb of Humayun in a motor car is a sufficiently striking juxtaposition of the old and the new, says a Home paper, without the addition of a mistake as to the identity of Humayun himself. "He, of course, was the second Emperor of the Mogul Dynasty, but we observe that in some quarters he is confused with Hanuman, the Monkey God, whose existence is purely mythical, and under whose protection lie the great langurs, or grey apes, seen all over India."

Modern Society.—Before leaving Gwalior the Prince of Wales was accompanied into the jungle by the Maharajah Scindia, and he had some exciting times with the Bengal tiger. On one day His Royal Highness brought down a well-grown tiger cub, and on the next he added to his bag a fine tigress. The pelts of both these spoils of the chase are to be brought home for the adornment of Sandringham.

Up to the present the Prince has found singularly little time to spare for the pleasures of the field, his public engagements having proved to be far more exacting than the entourage expected when they started out from Bombay upon their exploration of Upper India. But some of the most interesting experiences in shikar still remain to be enjoyed; and when the Royal party reaches the southern provinces there will be a good deal of work to put in.

It was a tactful idea on the part of the organisers of the Royal progress to arrange for Yuletide to be spent by the Prince and Princess at Lucknow, with its stirring memories of the Mutiny days. Tuesday was appropriately spent in making a pilgrimage to the pathetic walls which still bear upon their surface the marks of the heroic struggle of Henry Lawrence, and the glorious entry of the relieving column led by Havelock and Campbell. The Princess of Wales laid a wreath upon Havelock's grave, and made eager inquiries of Colonel Bonham, who bears the wounds of that memorable time to this day.

Pioneer.—Sir Walter Lawrence has conveyed to the Maharaja of Darbhanga, as President of the Reception Committee, Their Royal Highnesses' thanks for the entertainment given by the public of Calcutta on the Maidan on Tuesday last; while in another letter to Sir Andrew Fraser, expressing the appreciation of the Prince and Princess of the city's illuminations on Wednesday night, Sir Walter is commanded to say that "Their Royal Highnesses will never forget the affectionate enthusiasm of the citizens of Calcutta, the beauty of the illuminations or the wonderful order of the streets."

Queen.—That the Prince of Wales should visit Darjeeling in the winter, the off season, when it is practically deserted seems perhaps a little curious. Still, very likely His Royal Highness does not wish to lose the opportunity of getting a glimpse of what is, perhaps, the grandest mountain scenery in the whole world—the magnificent Kinchenjunga chain. After all, though the visit to India is primarily undertaken by the Prince for reasons of high policy as the personal representative of King Edward VII, Emperor of India, yet the Prince and Princess are also tourists and sightseers.

No doubt reasons of State underlie to some extent this visit to the Sikkim border. During his short stay the Prince will probably receive the ruler of the feudatory State of Sikkim, the more advisable in view of the friction that arose a few years ago between the then Maharajah and the Indian Government.

Darjeeling is distant some 250 miles by rail from Calcutta, and 340 miles through Sikkim from the once mysterious city of Lhasa. The night mail from Calcutta should be taken, so that the remarkable scenery of the little Himalayan railway from Siliguri (196 miles from Calcutta) should be viewed in daylight.

The variety of the scenery through which the traveller passes in this comparatively short journey from Siliguri to Darjeeling is for India very striking. At first the line runs through a dense jungle of canes and grass, the bamboos some times over 50 feet high, and the jungle grass, with its beautiful feathery tops, 20 or 25 feet. Then, looking back, the view is remarkable.

The vast fertile plain of Bengal lies spread out like a map, its networks of rivers and irrigation canals resembling in the dazzling sunshine silver ribbons on a green carpet.

The railway is certainly picturesque, and the scenery bold and varied, but hardly so awe-inspiring as descriptions would lead one to expect. No doubt when this line was built mountain railways were rare, and the highly coloured descriptions in which travel writers used to revel would provoke a smile among those who have crossed the Andes or even the Rockies and the Selkirks. It is really little more than a toy railway like the well-known Festiniog line in Wales, the gauge being only 2 feet.

It is often compared with the better known Colombo and Kandy Railway; indeed, there is great rivalry between the two lines, which is amusingly illustrated by the nomenclature of the more striking points; for instance, if the Kandy Railway has its Sensation Rock, the Darjeeling line goes one better with its rather absurdly named Agony Point.

The route it follows is for the most part that of the old trunk road to Sikkim and the Tibetan frontier. Bold and costly tunnelling and bridge work and lofty embankments are avoided by a series of loops and zigzags, with reversing stations. In short, the route is like that of one of the great Alpine passes rather than a railway like the St. Gothard or the Simplon. These reversing stations, by which sharp curves are avoided, are features not often seen on more modern mountain railways, though there are several on the Blue Mountains Railway in New South Wales.

Darjeeling lies along the top and sides of a "hog's back" or ridge between two deep valleys, and spread along the hill-sides are a maze of bungalows and hotels, with hospitals, clubs and stores interspersed. Mr. Freshfield epigrammatically hits off the physiognomy of Darjeeling by comparing it to a Malvern spread along the crest of Monte Generoso.

In many respects Darjeeling is the most interesting hill station in India. It is not, like Simla, an artificial sanatorium or climatic summer resort, a hill station and nothing else, but it is an important trading centre as well as frontier town. In short, it possesses an individuality which Simla, Ootacamund and many other summer stations wholly lack.

When Kinchenjunga is visible, as it is occasionally from Tiger Hill, a few miles from Darjeeling, then indeed the fortunate tourist will enjoy one of the most glorious mountain views in the whole world. A series of undulating rounded hills extends for some forty miles, in which white specks which mark Buddhist monasteries are the only indications of human life, and carries the eye to the magnificent and nobly composed group of snowy summits, of which the long crest of Kinchenjunga forms the centre and crown. Kinchenjunga itself, with its two peaks—the second loftiest mountain in the world—has a striking resemblance to Monte Rosa. Mr. Douglas Freshfield considers the nearest European parallel to the view of the snows from Darjeeling is the Alpine panorama from Monte Generoso.

The view is often compared with that of the Himalayas from Simla, but the latter panorama cannot equal in sublimity that from Kinchenjunga. Here we are actually on an outlying spur of the loftiest mountain range in the world, and not cut off from it as at Simla by fifty miles of valley and subsidiary mountain ranges. Then extraordinary is the combination of tropical and Alpine landscape. In sheltered nooks grow tree ferns (equal in height to the finest in New Zealand) and the largest rhododendrons known to botanists; while in the clear atmosphere the everlasting snow and ice fields seem but a few miles off, though they are some forty or fifty miles away even as the crow flies.

The Himalayas have been termed the "Alps of Asia," a reductio ad absurdum in geographical nomenclature which recalls the classic comparison of Mrs. Thrale, the friend of Dr. Johnson, who in one of her letters calls Switzerland "the Derbyshire of Europe." The absurdity of such a geographical parallel is obvious when we remember that the Himalayas are to the Alps what these mountains are to the Welsh hills.

As the views of the snows are the great sight of the place I may be excused for devoting most of the space at my disposal to an attempt to describe this wonderful feature of Darjeeling. But there are no doubt other sights which will attract the traveller, especially when the mountains are obscured in mist. The bazaars, for instance, are particularly interesting and typical. Genuine curiosities from Tibet can occasionally be bought—Buddhist alms bowls and prayer wheels, domestic implements, etc. A visit to the bazaars on Sunday is particularly interesting. On this day they are thronged with natives from all parts of Sikkim and Tibet—Lepchas, Limbus, Bhutias, Pahariis, Tibetans, Nepalese, etc.

Then there is little difficulty raised by the courteous Buddhist priests to strangers visiting any of the innumerable Buddhist temples, shrines, and monasteries scattered about among these upland valleys.

Standard.—The Prince and Princess of Wales have left Calcutta for Barrackpore, to enjoy a few days' rest at the Governor-General's country seat before sailing for Rangoon. Their departure brings to a close that portion of the Royal tour which must be considered the most important, both from a political and social point of view.

His Royal Highness yesterday laid the foundation-stone of the Victoria Memorial Hall, to be erected here by the Princes and peoples, the European and native communities of India, in honour of the first Queen-Empress of Hindustan; and the ceremony may be regarded as the culminating point of the entire journey. This splendid edifice, to be built from the designs of Sir William Emerson, its walls gleaming with white marble from Indian quarries, will be the most conspicuous object on the noble green Maidan, which is one of the glories of Calcutta.

It was, of course, Lord Curzon who conceived the idea of founding, with money subscribed by the Princes and peoples, a magnificent national palace, to perpetuate the memory of British India's first Empress.

Though many difficulties and some friction arose at the outset—the rival claims of Delhi as the site for a national memorial being vigorously urged—the Viceroy's plan appealed to the popular imagination. Within three months the Executive Committee raised £227,000 for the Memorial Hall; and it was not very long before the whole of the large sum required was forthcoming.

The ceremony of laying the foundation-stone was a most striking one. The Prince of Wales made an eloquent and touching speech, and it was listened to with profound attention by all present, among them being many leading natives, to whom the Queen-Empress Victoria has long been a venerated name.

The remaining portion of the Royal tour will enable the Prince of Wales to make the acquaintance of some very interesting parts of the Empire, and to enjoy some pleasant days in sport and the amenities of travel and sight-seeing. He has two other provincial capitals to visit, Rangoon and Madras; and two of the most important native States, Hyderabad and Mysore. But he has now finished his personal survey of those north-western regions which have always been centres of the political power dominating the peninsula.

He has made the acquaintance of the representatives of at least two-thirds of the population of India; and he has seen, moreover, cities famous in ancient and modern history, like Bombay, Delhi, Agra, Lahore and Calcutta.

Looking back at my experiences of the tour so far, there is no question of its usefulness, as an incident of Imperial rule. All classes of our Indian fellow-subjects, who, it must be remembered, have no conception of any government that is not personal, have been delighted to see the Shahzada with their own eyes; and the enthusiasm with which the Prince and Princess of Wales were received everywhere was unmistakable.

This has been conspicuously the case in Calcutta, where all fears in regard to the possible effects of the agitation over the partition of Bengal have, happily, been dispelled by the demeanour and intense loyalty of the demonstrative crowds which collected to greet the Royal visitors.

It is a satisfaction, also, to record that, thanks to the unsparing efforts of the local authorities, to the exertions of Sir Walter Lawrence, and the able staff attached to the Prince, and thanks, above all, to the unflinching good temper and happy tact of the Prince and Princess themselves, everything has gone off smoothly.

So admirably was the tour planned, that it has scarcely ever been found necessary to vary a single item in the long and elaborate programme. I have had opportunities of speaking on the subject to Indian authorities in high position, and they are convinced that the Royal visit has been completely successful. It has already had, they say, a most excellent effect.

Times.—The visits exchanged this week between the Tashi Lama and the Prince of Wales have been incidents of much more than merely picturesque interest. The presence in India at this juncture of the spiritual ruler of Tibet, who is invested with divine attributes in the eyes of the Tibetan people and who was called to his exalted office after the flight of the Dalai Lama from Lhasa, possesses a significance which has already been rightly pointed out in The Times. His acceptance of the invitation officially addressed to him by the Government of India constitutes a remarkable proof of his confidence in British friendship, and such an unprecedented departure from the traditions of Tibetan self-isolation on the part of this august personage cannot fail profoundly to affect the attitude of the Tibetans towards us, though it may not escape criticism and misrepresentation in interested quarters at Lhasa and elsewhere. It is sincerely to be hoped that the British Government will appreciate and reciprocate this courageous proof of the Tashi Lama's good-will, for the development of friendly and peaceful relations between India and Tibet will largely depend upon the results attending this first attempt to substitute direct personal intercourse for the old Tibetan policy of obstinate seclusion.

The Tashi Lama has been the first Tibetan to recognise the religious as well as political importance which the establishment of neighbourly relations with India must possess for the Buddhist people. India is the cradle of Buddhism, and the series of pilgrimages which the Tashi Lama has recently made to the chief historical sister shrines connected with the life and teachings of Buddha must have profoundly impressed a man of his piety and earnest faith. One can imagine the feelings with which he solemnized the mysteries of his region under the spreading branches of the same venerable Bo tree of Buddha Gaya beneath which, according to Buddhist tradition, Gautama himself received enlightenment.

The respectful welcome everywhere extended to the Tashi Lama by the Hindus as well as the small remnants of the Indian Buddhists, and the distinguished reception accorded him by the Government of India, would in any case have brought home to him the tolerance and liberality of British rule. But the presence of the Prince of Wales has given him an exceptional opportunity of realizing the sincerity of British friendliness towards himself and his people. He has evidently appreciated his opportunity for his visit to the Prince at Government House on Tuesday and his reception of His Royal Highness to-day at Hastings House, where he is residing with a large suite and retinue of some 300 followers, were marked by a stateliness of ceremonial hitherto reserved exclusively for his intercourse with the Dalai Lama.

The Tashi Lama returns shortly to Tibet, and unless the Dalai Lama, who is believed to have interrupted his southward journey from Urga and turned towards Peking, where possibly he hopes to regain Chinese support, succeeds in rallying the reactionary parties of Lhasa, there is every reason to hope that the Tashi Lama's visit to India will mark the beginning of a new and happier phase in the relations between India and Tibet.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE PAPERS PUBLISHED IN BENGAL FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 6TH JANUARY 1906.

Basumati.—The Basumati [Calcutta] of the 30th December publishes a poem composed by a Bengali lady, welcoming the Princess of Wales to Bengal. The writer prays Her Royal Highness to look upon Bengalis with kind and sympathetic eyes and remove the cause of the grief which now lies heavy on their desponding hearts.

Swadesh.—The Swadesh [Calcutta] of the 1st January asks every Bengali to lay aside all grievances for the time being and show proper respect and honour to the Royal visitors as it is his duty to do so. May God bless Their Royal Highnesses!

Hindi Bangavasi.—The Hindi Bangavasi [Calcutta] of the 1st January is unable to guess how the Amrita Bazar Patrika has come to know that His Royal Highness has managed to acquaint himself with the present state of things in Bengal. It is said the Prince of Wales expressed a wish to see a native newspaper, and when one was given him he wanted to see more, and in this way became thoroughly aware of the state of the country. Whether the facts stated above be true or not, the Bengalis have hitherto been under the impression that it would not be possible for His Royal Highness to know the whole thing. Who would dare show him the pitiful scene when he is kept engaged in seeing the various pageants.

In quoting a criticism of the Municipal address to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales at Lahore from one of its residents who is said to be suffering from the effects of the present scarcity in the Punjab in which he says that the only beautiful buildings which either belong to the Government or the Anglo-Indian merchants and Municipal Commissioners and are no indications of the prosperity of the general public were shown to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, the same paper says:—

The above remarks of the poverty-stricken resident of Lahore are such as crows of Indians are anxious to make before His Royal Highness. The critic is an educated man, and has therefore given expression to his feelings in the columns of a newspaper, but those who are illiterate and ignorant, silently suffer till they die, but never approach royalty with a tale of their woe and misery. However the Prince is seeing what is being shown to him, also what happens to come before him, and it is hoped all this seeing will not go in vain.

Indian Spectator, 6th January 1906.—Of all the ceremonies in which His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales will have taken part before leaving these shores, that which he will look back upon with the keenest personal satisfaction must naturally be the laying of the foundation stone of the Victoria Memorial Hall at Calcutta. The 'stately, spacious, monumental and grand' edifice which will one day be counted among the architectural wonders of India, even as is the Taj erected by the Moghul, owes its origin to the imagination of the most Asiatic of living British statesmen, Lord Curzon. The Great Queen's Proclamation which is now read in printer's ink, will, we believe, be carved in stone, even as were the edicts of Asoka, and placed in a conspicuous position in the Memorial Hall. Lord Curzon seldom kept secrets, and the world already knows what the building is to contain, who designed it, and even the places from which the marble will be obtained for it. The Trustees have published a list of the various objects of interest and value presented to the Hall, the most interesting of them being the writing table and chair used by Queen Victoria for her daily correspondence at Windsor, presented by His Majesty the King-Emperor. The National Monument will be, as His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales so felicitously expressed it, 'a symbol of the unity and concord which came from her all-embracing love for her people, and an enduring token of the affection which all—Europeans and Indians, princes and peasants—felt for Queen Victoria.'

Akhbar-i-Soudagar.—The correspondent of the Times of India, who has afforded a glimpse into the inner working of the Congress at its last session in Benares, has, in his way, done a service to that body. The dissension which arose at the meeting of the Subjects Committee over the proposal to send a message of hearty greetings to the Prince and Princess of Wales now touring in India has only served to throw into bold relief the general good sense and loyal sentiment of the Congress for which their thanks are due to the two irreconcilables, Messrs. Bal Gangadhar Tilak of Poona and Lala Lajpatrai of the Punjab. Their churlish opposition to what was, after all, a harmless proposal, if it had met with anything like considerable support, would have done great harm to the Congress cause. It would have disgraced and discredited that body and furnished its hostile critics with a ready weapon of attack. The firm attitude taken by the chairman of the Committee against the two dissentients had a salutary effect. They were annihilated; the opposition was nipped in the bud, and the proposition was carried with acclamation.

Indu Prakash.—It is by no means a matter of pleasure that we feel it our duty to correct the gross misrepresentations of fact which so experienced and self-sufficient a journal as the Times of India glibly gave currency to by publishing in its issue of Wednesday last an unnamed correspondent's impressions about the Benares Congress * * * * But Times of India hates the Congress, is angry with Mr. Gokhale for his strong and robust speech, and particularly incensed, we suppose, with the parallel drawn between Lord Curzon and Aurangzeb, and so anything against the Congress must necessarily be welcome in its columns. We have the testimony of gentlemen who, as delegates, were present at the Benares meeting from beginning to end and took active part in the discussion that most of the statements of facts made by the Times of India's correspondent are absolutely false and inherently improbable. No doubt there was opposition to including in the programme a resolution welcoming the Prince and Princess of Wales. But the grounds on which the opposition was based were mainly that the Prince had already been in India and was receiving welcomes everywhere and that the Congress would be going out of its way in giving him a belated welcome. When it became known that the Reception Committee had invited the Prince to grace the Congress with a visit and that His Royal Highness had replied expressing his inability to do so owing to the invitation having come too late, almost all opposition vanished. * * *

* Mr. Tilak actually proposed that the Congress should express regret at the inability of the Prince to accept the Reception Committee's invitation, thereby approving of the step the Committee had taken. The debate came to an end soon enough, and by an overwhelming majority the Subjects Committee decided to include in the programme the resolution of sending a message of welcome to the Prince. There was no scene, no fracas, no harsh words whatsoever. It is absolutely false that Munshi Madhola declared that 'he would order the dissentients out of the hall.' * * * * Moreover, nothing could be more absurd than the story of Munshi Madhola's taking the Commanding Officer to the Subjects Committee meeting. The gentlemen on whose testimony we rely are sure that there was no European present at the Subjects Committee meetings unless indeed he was disguised as a native and smuggled himself in as a delegate and heeded not the President's emphatic request that all not elected to the Subjects Committee should retire. * * * * In regard to the boycott there was absolute unanimity in the Subjects Committee that it should be defended as a perfectly legitimate method of constitutional agitation. The difference was as regards the manner in which approval of the resort to boycott by Bengal in the hour of her trial and despair should be expressed. It was at the suggestion of the Bengalis themselves and their most ardent supporters that the resolution was arrived at to leave the subject of the swadeshi movement to be taken up by the Industrial Conference. Noone proposed that boycott and swadeshi should be identified.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE-OWNED PAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE CENTRAL PROVINCES.

Pramod Sindhu.—The Pramod Sindhu (Amraoti), of December 29th, notices with regret that the representatives of native newspapers with His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales are not treated in the same way as the representatives of Anglo-Indian newspapers. They are disgraced indirectly and no proper arrangements are made for them. The paper quotes from the Tribune an instance of the treatment meted out to the Vernacular Press representatives and expresses a hope that the Government will soon remove their grievances by adopting the suggestions made by the Statesman in this connection.

Desha Sevak.—The Desha Sevak (Nagpur), of December 18th, states that the authorities at Calcutta are making continued efforts to accord to His Highness the Prince of Wales a reception on a grander scale than did Bombay, but it is amusing to note that the authorities make these arrangements at the expense of others. It is not becoming that the Imperial Government should force the people to subscribe towards the reception of the Prince, paying nothing themselves from the public revenues. The action of Government on the one hand in prosecuting students for participating in the Swadeshi movement and uttering the words Bande Mataram, and, on the other, issuing strict but secret orders to their mothers and daughters to assemble to do homage to the Princess, is like gagging a person and dealing him blows. Good justice indeed! The pardah system being very strictly observed by the Hindus and Mussalmans in Bengal they are not at all willing to send their womenfolk to such a pardah party.

SELECTIONS FROM ENGLISH PAPERS OWNED BY NATIVES OF MADRAS.

Andhraprakasika, Madras.—The Andhraprakasika, of the 6th January, observes that the Municipal address of Bombay to Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales was read by the Chairman of the Municipality Sir P. M. Mehta, and that the Chairman of the Corporation of Calcutta being a Government official, the address was read by the Vice-Chairman, Babu Nitambar Mukerji, and suggests that it would be fitting if the address of the Corporation of Madras also could be arranged to be read by the Senior Commissioner, who is a native gentleman of great popularity, instead of by the President, who is a Government servant.

VERNACULAR PAPERS PUBLISHED IN MADRAS. 4TH JANUARY 1906.

Swadesamitran, Madras.—The Swadesamitran, of the 4th January, states that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, sympathizing with the Indian National Congress, acknowledged the receipt of the resolution passed at the recent meeting of that body welcoming Their Royal Highnesses to India, and trusts that he will pay sufficient attention to the other resolutions also passed at the meeting. It further observes:—The Prince should himself go through these resolutions carefully and form a favourable opinion of the aspirations of the Indians.

He should also feel that their attempts to secure political privileges, which they deserve, are not unjust, and that their desire to see that Indians are appointed in Parliament, in the Council of the Secretary of State for India, and in the Executive Councils of the Supreme and the Provincial Governments in India, is consistent with the object of British rule.

SELECTIONS FROM THE NATIVE NEWSPAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE PUNJAB FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 6TH JANUARY 1906.

The following is from the Tribune (Lahore) of the 6th January 1906:—

"His Royal Highness might have had some idea of the chronic misery and wretchedness of the lives of the majority of our masses had he been permitted to witness the squalor and emptiness of our hovels in the villages scattered by the side of the rail or road. But the Royal Special invariably travels by night, between endless rows of silent sentinels with or without torches. And when the day breaks there is the usual succession of gaily decorated station platforms with crowds of gaily dressed people on them. And should there be a likelihood of a line of mean huts impinging on the Royal view during one of the State processions in the day time, the mud walls are so covered with lime-wash, and the roofs of reed and wattle are so disguised under festoons or bunting, that these dens of the poor and the famishing are made to wear quite a picturesque look. Verbum sap."

The Punjab-Foulad (Lahore) of the 21st December 1905 remarks that it is rumoured that the raïses of Calcutta have been warned, on pain of being considered disloyal, to send their females to the Purdah Party to be held at Government House in honour of the Princess. If this is so, no one can have any hesitation in asking who the Government or their officials are that they should interfere in things touching the people's womenfolk. The Editor would advise impetuous and youthful Anglo-Indian officers to regain their sanity, and not to throw a blot on Government's fair fame for nothing. He adds that it is due to such wise public servants that the Government of India is being compared with that of Russia.

The following extracts are taken from an article appearing in the Punjabee (Lahore), of the 6th January 1906, entitled "The Prince in Bengal":—

"Though it was at first thought desirable that as a protest against the outrage offered by Lord Curzon to public feeling in Bengal by the forcible dismemberment of the Province in utter defiance of the express wishes of the people on the subject, the Bengalese should abstain from having either part or lot in the public rejoicings got up in connection with the visit of the Prince of Wales to Calcutta, they thought better of it later, and suffered themselves to be persuaded by their leaders to join in the reception accorded to the Royal couple in Calcutta.

* * * * * If they meant to change their mind at the last moment, they might have spared us their mock heroics and taken things lying down. We do not, of course, blame them for honouring the Prince. Nothing is further from our mind. By all means render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's and unto God the things that are God's. But why did they indulge in all these make-believes and idle threats if they did not mean to be as good as their word?

"We, of course, yield to none in our loyalty to the law and constitution under which we live. We know that at the head of that constitution stands the figure of the King of England.* * * * * His son is welcome, thrice welcome, to India. Though he might have chosen a more opportune time for his visit, he is not a whit less welcome on that account.

* * * * * Bound as we are to honour the Prince, any exuberance of loyalty on our parts is bound to make us, ridiculous in the eyes of our rulers. But the officials are no fools. Whilst they are nothing loath to use our sneaking desire to curry favour with them by engineering a loyal show in connection with the Prince's visit to India, for purposes of their own, they are wide awake enough to know how far that loyalty is to be trusted. That they trust us no further than they can see us and consider all our loyal professions no better than fustian and twaddle is evident enough from their daily practices and customs.* * * * * Why should they brand us with shame and continue to insult us with an Arms Act (that is responsible for much of the depredations caused by wild beasts in this country) if they really believe us to be loyal? Why should they refuse to give us a share in the administration, commissions in the Army, seats in the Executive Councils, and a voice in the administration of public money if they really take us on trust and place implicit reliance on our professions of loyalty.* * * * *

* * * * * The Amrita Bazar Patrika complains that the Prince is hemmed in on all sides with Anglo-Indian officials and officers and no pains are spared to preclude all chance of Indians ever getting at him. Aye, that's the rule. Indians are welcome to throng his line of march and gaze and admire from a distance. They are very useful when seen at long range. Distance always lends enchantment to the view, you know. But don't you presume to come to close quarters with the Prince. Don't you think that the officials would let you gain the ear of the Prince for poisoning the same against them. Not they. They will see you 'blowed' first, with all the good-will in the world.* * * * * No wonder that when the Calcutta Municipality talked in its address of the prosperity that attends British rule, even the Prince looked askance at the matter and said 'if what you say is really true, we may then congratulate ourselves.' A rather big 'if' this considering that a famine is just now brooding over the land. We are glad that the Prince did not swallow the cracker with which the Municipality sought to tickle his palate."

SELECTIONS FROM THE NATIVE NEWSPAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE UNITED PROVINCES.

Advocate.—The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 31st December, 1903, says:—There is a holy trinity working for the good of India at the present moment. The Royal tour has drawn British attention to this country, attention of Their Most Gracious Majesties, Earls and Dukes, Marquises and Lords; the change of Government in England has made the friends of progress there careful readers of Indian affairs; Congress activity—expressed in the deputation lately returned from Great Britain, in the session held in Benares and in the unauthorised though sympathised boycott of British goods in Bengal—has led intelligent and well informed Englishmen at home to ask one another "What's gone wrong in Bengal?" and created disquiet in the minds of textile manufacturers. Thus, all classes of people in Great Britain have their eyes more or less directed towards the greatest dependency of England. What will be the result?

India asks for no favour but fair treatment, treatment by one civilised to another civilised nation—though the two civilisations may and do differ widely in time and underlying principles. What royal favours may be showered upon this hopeless, famine-stricken, poverty smitten land we do not here stop to enquire. It is at best but guess-work and may be anything but what we may set our hearts upon. While Indian loyalty is a clear asset of the British Empire, British concessions stand on very uncertain ground, being qualified by many a restraining clause, if they are not altogether chimerical. We do not want empty goodwill towards us and lip-sympathy with our aspirations, aspirations that are the result of the benevolent policy of British statesmen of the type of Bentinck and Macaulay, Canning and Ripon. Our loyalty is above board and stands in no need of fresh recognition. Our rights and responsibilities have grown clear in our sight. While we are quite alive to, and carry out the latter unstintedly, it has become necessary that the former should be ours. When should we ask for them? Where to look to?

The psychological moment has come. The Liberals have come into power after shaking off the scales of a military imperialism and with a promise to return to the old and strong principles of Bright and Gladstone; they value the liberty and independence of every man, whatever may be his colour.

7TH JANUARY 1906.

Civil and Military Gazette.—This afternoon, according to the original programme, Their Royal Highnesses left Calcutta, but instead of going to Darjeeling they went to the delightful sylvan retreat of the Viceroys at Barrackpur. They were accompanied only by the Viceroy and Lady Minto and a very small staff. They will remain quietly at Barrackpur until Tuesday, when they descend the river in a launch to Garden Reach and tranship to the S.S. Guide, which will take them to the river mouth, where the Renown will be in waiting. She will sail for Rangoon either on Tuesday evening or Wednesday morning.

8TH JANUARY 1906.

Englishman.—The Primate, in his New Year's pastoral letter, says that among the gains of the memorable journey of the Prince and Princess of Wales is an increase in the intelligent interest each stage awakens among the stay-at-home folk in India and Indian problems.

The Royal visit is over, and Calcutta is slowly—very slowly—resuming its work-a-day aspect. The preparations which had been made for Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales were so extensive, and the scenes of the festivities and functions which accompanied it were so largely concentrated on the great maidan, that some time must elapse ere the southern portion of Calcutta is able to resume its normal appearance. As we write, the Royal couple, instead of going on to Darjeeling as had been originally arranged, are staying quietly at Barrack-pore, where they will incidentally obtain an insight into the placid existence which, in the cold weather, at all events, is led by the residents in small outlying stations. The rest and quiet which Their Royal Highnesses are enjoying at Barrackpore will prove invaluable as a change from the crowded events of the past week. We fear that it must be needed. At the same time it is to be hoped that the Prince and Princess will feel repaid for the efforts involved in their frequent public appearances by the pleasure which they have given to all creeds and classes, and the stimulus which the well-known loyalty of the metropolis has received. Of the brilliant success of the visit from a social and spectacular point of view nothing remains to be said. Calcutta excelled itself on every succeeding occasion, and there can be little question, after the gracious acknowledgments which Sir Walter Lawrence has been privileged to write to various public bodies and individuals on behalf of Their Royal Highnesses, that the Prince and Princess have been both touched and pleased. Of very few similar occasions can it be truthfully said that everything passed off without a hitch; but to say this about the arrangements for entertaining our Royal visitors is to understate the facts. The note of enthusiasm and interest which was so strikingly manifest on the day of Their Royal Highnesses' arrival was maintained unimpaired to the end of the visit; and it goes without saying that in Calcutta the remaining portions of the tour will be followed with a still keener and more personal interest than has attached to the first part. On behalf of Calcutta we bid Their Royal Highnesses a respectful and cordial Godspeed.

Pioneer.—The programme arranged for the reception of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales next Saturday in Rangoon was rehearsed to-day, everything going off without a hitch.

Rangoon Gazette.—We understand that a Notification will be issued by a Gazette Extraordinary to-day concerning the arrival of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales at Sule Pagoda wharf. All Government officers not on duty elsewhere being of gazetted or commissioned rank will be expected to be present at the Reception Pandal. But, in order that the Reception Committee may know what amount of space is left for others, it is convenient that all who attend, whether officials or not, should apply to the Secretary to the Reception Committee for tickets.

The casket to be presented to the Prince and Princess of Wales on the occasion of their visit to Rangoon, which has been supplied by Messrs. P. Orr and Sons, is a magnificent specimen of the Burmese silversmith's craft. It is of handsome design mounted on an ebony plinth with finely chased Burmese lions at the corners. The casket, which is oblong in shape, is divided into panels beautifully chased with views of Rangoon and scenes representing Burmese legends, etc., a description of which is given below. It is now on view at Messrs. P. Orr and Son's Show Room, and we would recommend all who are interested in seeing a fine specimen of Burmese silverware to take the opportunity of inspecting it.

The scene on the lid represents a Burmese King and Queen and the Nobles amusing themselves with a pwe at the Palace. Burmese band players and dancing girls appear on the right and left of the scene. The three front panels represent scenes in Rangoon; from left to right respectively:—(1) the Sule Pagoda with the Town Hall; (2) the Royal Lakes with the Shwe Dagon Pagoda in the background; (3) scene on the platform of the Shwe Dagon Pagoda. The three panels at the back and the end panels represent incidents in the early life of Prince Sidhatta, who afterwards became the Gautama Buddha.—(1) The birth of Prince Sidhatta; his mother and attendants are shown under the tree and his father (King Suddhodana) with his nobles in the foreground; (2) the ploughing ceremony by King Suddhodana after the birth of the Prince Sidhatta; (3) Prince Sidhatta showing his skill with the bow before his parents and the Court; (4) Prince Sidhatta leaving his palace, escorted by nats, to become a hpoongyi is attacked by an evil spirit who attempts to thwart his purpose, and is defeated; (5) Prince Sidhatta shaving his head in order to become a hpoongyi, surrounded by nats who will take his hair to heaven and worship it. The figures stationed round the casket are from the story of Rama. Rama with his brother Lakhana and his wife Mah Sita, to whom he has just been married, while returning to their country from the hpoongyi kyaungs where they have been married, are attacked during their journey by Dasagiri, the brother of Gambi, an ogres, who wished to possess himself of Sita; Dasagiri is assisted by Gambi and her two children Dutha and Khaya, but Rama with the help of Lakhana and his two monkey attendants Thujaik and Bali beat them off and compel them to fly for their lives. Rama and his party proceed on their journey without further molestation.

The figures are as follows, proceeding from left to right round the casket:—(1) Lakhana, (2) Sita, (3) Rama, (4) Gambi, (5) Dutha, (6) Khaya, (7) Dasagiri, (8) Rama, (9) Sita, (10) Lakhana, (11) Thujaik, (12) Bali.

A "full dress" rehearsal of the reception next Saturday of the Prince and Princess of Wales, and the procession from Sule Pagoda wharf through the principal streets of the town to Government House.

The entire garrison, were mustered to furnish guards-of-honour and to line the streets, while the procession itself was formed of the carriages to be used next Saturday, and escort and guard of the Mounted Company, Rangoon Volunteer Rifles, and Military Police, and advance and rear guards of mounted British Civil police. By half past seven, about which time His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor arrived from Government House, a representative gathering of those concerned in the reception arrangements had assembled at the entrance to the wharf, including besides His Honour, Sir Harvey Adamson, Mr. F. C. Gates, Chief Secretary, Colonel Lawford, Commanding Rangoon Brigade, Colonel Tracey, Colonel Davies, Mr. Laurie, President of the Municipality, and Mr. McDonnell, Commissioner of Police. The first item in the rehearsal was the reception on the wharf by a guard of 100 men of the 1st Devonshire Regiment. These men are particularly smart and fit-looking, well set up and turned out, and excellently drilled. They were accompanied by band and colours. Next Saturday at the moment of the landing of His Royal Highness a Royal salute will be commenced from the saluting battery by the Cadet Company of the Port Defence Volunteers. The guard at the outside entrance of the wharf consisted on the east of a detachment of Port Defence Volunteers, and on the west of the Burma Railway Volunteers, the first part of the route being lined by the Royal Garrison Artillery. The procession started at about a quarter to eight. The principal carriage, preceded by the Mounted Company R. V. R., about forty strong, and followed by the Military Police, contained the Lieutenant-Governor, Sir Harvey Adamson and Mr. Gates; the succeeding carriage conveying the President of the Municipality and Captain Keogh-Cullen, A. D. C. The procession proceeded at a slow pace until Cantonments were reached. A halt was made at most of the pandals, for the sake of practice both to the carriage horses and to the escort. A long halt was made at the Canal Street pandal and stands erected for the children. A more rapid pace was then maintained until Government House was reached, the whole time taken being about an hour and a quarter. On Government House lawn was posted a guard of Punjabis and the Rangoon Volunteer Rifles. The roads were lined by the Royal Garrison Artillery, Devons, 89th and 91st Punjabis and Volunteers right to Leeds Road. Another rehearsal will be held on Thursday to give additional necessary practice to escort and troops.

Prior to the departure of the Flotilla Company's steamer Japan for Mandalay the Lieutenant-Governor and Lady White visited the ship to see the arrangements that had been made for the accommodation of the Royal visitors. Some details of the changes have already been given in these columns. Briefly stated, the whole of the first class cabins have been taken out and converted into two suites of rooms, that on the port side being for the Princess and on the starboard for the Prince. The rooms have been exquisitely furnished; no labour or expense has been spared; everything has been carefully thought out even to the smallest detail, and altogether it would be hard to conceive more delightful shipboard accommodation than the Royal suites of rooms and the sitting room just forward of them. Not the least attractive feature is the series of charming Burmese pictures, the work of Mrs. Muriel. The after-cabins have been converted into cabins for the Prince's suite and for the Lieutenant-Governor and his suite. It is hoped the ship will be open for public inspection on her arrival back from Mandalay.

The Royal train leaves Mandalay on its return journey on the morning of the 17th, arriving at Prome on the morning of the 20th.

A number of Southern Shan chiefs and their followers arrive in Rangoon to-morrow for the reception of the Prince and Princess of Wales. Mr. B. S. Carey, C.I.E., and Mr. C. E. Browne accompany the chiefs. An extensive camp has been constructed for the Shan visitors between the Prome road and Shanzu village. The chiefs of the Northern States will meet Their Royal Highnesses at Mandalay.

It is probable that the Royal route through Rangoon on Saturday morning will be kept open for some time after the passing of the Royal procession, troops and police remaining in position. If this proposal is carried out, carriages will be permitted to drive along the Royal route in the same direction as the Royal Party.

The detailed traffic regulations for the approaching Royal visit appear in our advertising columns to-day.

The Children's stand, which has now been erected in Canal Street, was tested on Saturday morning, about one thousand children being present. Everything passed off most satisfactorily.

Rear-Admiral Poe leaves Calcutta this morning for Rangoon with H.M.S. Hyacinth.

Times.—The brilliant welcome given to the Prince and Princess of Wales at Calcutta last week forms in some respects the culminating point of their tour. For two months they have gone up and down India, through scenes of novel interest and radiant colour which it requires a strong effort of the imagination to grasp. Our Special Correspondent has vividly described their splendour and conjured up their historic setting; but no interpretation, however subtle, can enable us to enter fully into the feelings of India as she welcomes the son and Heir-Apparent of the King-Emperor. To the native subjects of the Crown the personal manifestations of sovereignty are all-important. For ages they have been accustomed to personal rule. Constitutional sovereignty is unfamiliar to them and in many respects unthinkable; and the British Raj only acquires meaning when embodied in a Viceroy, or, still more, in the actual presence of the closest blood-relative to the wearer of the Crown. From this point of view the Royal tour is an attempt to satisfy the deepest instincts of Indian loyalty. Those instincts, always strong, have been immensely reinforced by the appeal to them made at the great Durbar which Lord Curzon planned and carried out three years ago. Probably there never has been a period when Royal visitors could be more sure of receiving an enthusiastic welcome and leaving a lasting impression behind. To the British community, also, the tour of the Prince and Princess will be not less acceptable. It takes place at the close of the most remarkable Viceroyship of recent times, when untiring and not unsuccessful efforts have been made to improve the administration in all its branches, and to strengthen India without and within. When Lord Curzon handed on the Viceregal power to Lord Minto he could claim with justice that settled lines of policy had now been laid down in every department. In the military sphere reforms of a similarly thoroughgoing kind have been carried through by Lord Kitchener, with the full support of Lord Curzon except in the regrettable controversy which led to the latter's resignation. What is now wanted, above all, is a respite from recrimination and loyal co-operation between civil and military authorities in an attempt to work the new system. The basis for future action is provided by the compromise on which the home Government decided last summer, as amended by those alterations which Lord Curzon pressed for, and with which Lord Kitchener expressed his concurrence. If, after due trial, this is found not to work satisfactorily, further modifications may have to be made, one way or the other. In the meantime the presence of the Prince and Princess of Wales may serve to remind all parties of those higher claims of allegiance which transcend controversy.

Only half the time allotted to the tour has yet been spent, but the variety of regions already visited by the Royal travellers is such as to give stay-at-home Englishmen a liberal education in geography and politics. The material progress made by India since the King was there in 1875 has immensely extended the scope of the visit. Burma, the next stage of Their Royal Highnesses' journey, is perhaps the most striking of these extensions; but the railway has already carried them to places which were either unvisited thirty years ago or had to be reached by slower means. Indore, where the Prince held a durbar of the Central India chiefs; Udaipur, where he was entertained by the head of the Solar House, the most historic line of Rajputs; Bikaner, the little Rajput State cut off from its fellows by great spaces of yellow desert; and Gwalior, the scene of the Maharaja Sindhia's splendid hospitality, were all inaccessible by rail before. Peshawar, too, the northernmost point of the journey, lay far outside the railway communications of 1875. Those who have followed the course of the Prince's movements will admit that he has made good use of his fuller opportunities. To English readers probably the most interesting part of the journey performed up to now is that which has lain among the feudatory Native States. Each one visited has its special significance and attractions, which no summary phrases can attempt to convey. But whether it be among the Rajput Princes, whose loyalty to our rule has always been so conspicuous, or in the city of that young Maharratta ruler the Maharaja Sindhia—perhaps the most striking personality among the heads of the Native States—the Royal visitors have found everywhere the signs of a most gratifying devotion to the British Crown. The policy which Lord Dufferin so wisely initiated by his foundation of the Imperial Service Corps, and which Lord Curzon has developed further by allowing them to serve outside India and by instituting the Imperial Cadet Corps, has already given visible proof of the increased sense of duty and patriotic enthusiasm which it has fostered in the native chiefs of India. Their capitals are not the only places where the Prince of Wales has had evidence of the remarkable influence of British rule. He has visited the stern borderland and driven through the Khaibar Pass, across the strip of "Independent Territory," where we police a tract of primitive barbarism with a tribal militia only distinguishable by their uniform from the tribesmen themselves. In all the tour there can have been no more remarkable contact between East and West than the greeting given to the Prince at Ali Masjid by ten Afridi headmen, who testified their fealty by bringing simple offerings in kind. By the side of incidents like these, visits to great centres of government and commerce like Calcutta and Bombay, or even to cities of historic memory such as Delhi and Lucknow, may seem comparatively uneventful. Yet they form one of the most important aspects of the tour, and the keen interest in their surroundings shown everywhere by the Prince and Princess cannot fail to be fruitful of good results. At Bombay the Prince laid the foundation-stone of the new docks, which are destined to make an already admirable harbour into what will probably be the finest of Asiatic ports. The salient feature of the Calcutta visit has been the opening of the Victoria Memorial Hall, a building which both in its stately beauty and in the varied monuments of Indian history that it will contain, should be altogether worthy of the venerated name that it commemorates.

There has been one other incident of the Prince's stay at Calcutta so striking and unusual as to demand special notice. That is the presence of the Tashi Lama of Tibet, and the exchange of visits between him and the Heir-Apparent to the British Crown. Nothing, it is safe to say, could have been more undreamed of a few years ago than the appearance in Calcutta on such an occasion of the spiritual ruler of the Tibetans. Up to the despatch of the Younghusband Mission the Tibetan hierarchy was in the habit of returning Viceregal letters unopened, and of inciting its subjects to violate the frontier. Its attitude towards the Mission as they drew towards Lhasa showed the boundless depths of pride and ignorance which then prompted Tibetan isolation. The Tashi Lama's visit is evidence of the change that has been wrought since. The old walls of jealous exclusiveness have been broken down, and there is promise of a new era of friendliness between India and the strange country which lies beyond it. The significance of the Tashi Lama's step is, as our Special Correspondent has pointed out, both religious and political. As one of the mysterious "re-incarnations" of Lamaistic Buddhism, the visitor commands a spiritual prestige inferior to none in his own form of faith. His journey to the Buddhist shrines of India must have produced no little impression. It will be enhanced by the political supremacy which he has possessed since the deposition of the Dalai Lama. The new ruler of Tibet has certainly no reason to be dissatisfied with the greeting which he has received from the Prince of Wales and the Indian authorities. It is for the British Government now not to lose sight of his remarkable initiative, and to ensure by every means in its power the maintenance of those friendly relations so fortunately begun. The Tashi Lama has departed from the custom of his people and placed himself in our hands. We must not let him feel that the condition of Tibet can ever be a matter of indifference to the Imperial Government.

Times of India.—Although Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, with the Viceroy and Lady Minto, are only at Barrackpur, the pleasant sylvan retreat of the Governor-General, they are as completely severed from Calcutta as if the original programme for a visit to Darjeeling had been adhered to. The Calcutta festivities closed on Friday, and the Prince and Princess are in absolute retirement, enjoying a most necessary rest until Tuesday when they embark for Burma as the first stage on another long round of State ceremonies. The decorations are being removed, the sooty traces of the illuminations cleansed, and Calcutta is returning to its normal life, busily discussing in the brief intervals snatched from the all-absorbing question of the future Military Organisation such local topics as the Incubating Improvement Scheme. Since the final decision was taken, the wisdom of abandoning the projected visit to Darjeeling is fully recognised. It is not only that the weather is so unsettled that grave doubts existed as to whether their Royal Highnesses would see anything more of the mountains than a sea of moist unpleasant mist, but the strain of a long fatiguing railway journey, coupled with violent climatic changes, was not one to be lightly faced at this period of the tour.

In Calcutta was written the last page of volume one of the tour. The second volume will open in the Silken East and carry Their Royal Highnesses through the fascinating cities of Southern India to the Imperial Watch Tower at Quetta terminating in the port of promise—Karachi,—on March 19th. It is not yet time to turn the leaves of the volume and glean its lessons except to say that nothing has marred the triumph of the progress. Everywhere the Prince and Princess have found warm hearts and loyal enthusiasm. Everywhere they have left a deeper affection for the Royal House and an even more firmly-rooted attachment to the Imperial Throne. Nowhere was this more marked than in the Capitals of the great feudatories,—in Indore, the rendezvous of the Central India Chiefs, at Udaipur, Jaipur and Bikanir, at Lahore, where the Punjab Chieftains gathered, and at Jammu and at Gwalior. In some cases their Royal Highnesses were renewing acquaintances pleasantly inaugurated in England; in others they met for the first time Rulers who have a great stake in the governance of India. But whilst in all they were welcomed with a pomp and magnificence which expressed the joy of receiving the feelings of the Chiefs must not be measured by these outward signs alone, splendid though they were. What made the Maharaja of Jaipur reverently lay his sword at the feet of the Prince and Princess and throw open the Palace gates, so that the Royal carriage might drive through the almost sacred inner courtyard to the foot of the Durbar dais? What made Scindia descend from his State seat personally to present his Sirdars? It was the burning desire to pay to the Emperor's son the greatest honour that could be drawn from the codes of the East. The same spirit flashed in the significant words of the Tashi Lama of Shigatse—the most sacred figure in Buddhism—when he received the Prince at Hastings House: "I have come from a distant country, over mountains, rivers and snowy passes to meet your Royal Highness, and I would gladly have travelled ten times the distance for the honour of such an interview."

But in the rich pages of this volume no leaves have given greater pleasure than the entire worthiness of the last chapter writ in Calcutta. Nothing is gained by burking plain facts, and certainly the Calcutta visit was regarded with a certain measure of dubiety. Public feeling, violently agitated by the Partition of Bengal, formed into an altogether unusual exacerbation of demonstration. There was not, and there could not be, any confidence that the hot-headed men who fanned disturbance would refrain from carrying politics directly into the welcome of Their Royal Highnesses, or that they would not find abettors in the feather-brained students who have been making themselves so ridiculous. From the moment that Their Royal Highnesses arrived at Howrah until they left for Barrackpur no countenance whatsoever was given to these doubts. Many causes contributed to this result. The sentence is written with every appreciation of the great work of a great Viceroy, but the departure of Lord Curzon, whom the Bengalis regarded as the head and front of this offending, drew the sting of faction. Then the leaders of the Anti-Partition Movement may have come to realise that the patience of the Government, which had not flagged so far, was not absolutely inexhaustible. But these were minor factors. The dominating influence was the growing appreciation of the circumstance that the Prince and Princess are above party and administrative acts, and that they are of a Royal House whose love for India and regard for her welfare is not surpassed by even the most patriotic Bengali.

"Prince, you have made us all one," was the frank exclamation of a well-known Parsi when presented to His Royal Highness in Bombay. It is scarcely an exaggeration to apply that remark to Calcutta, for if there were any abstentions from those who welcomed the Royal visitors their absence was not remarked. Each State ceremony was the occasion of a great demonstration of popular interest. The people came in from the surrounding villages in their tens of thousands, and wherever the Prince and Princess were to be seen there the townspeople were gathered together. Nor did interest wane as the visit drew to a close, for on the last ceremony of all when the Prince drove through the dull streets which lead from Government House to the University, the throng was dense and continuous. One did not detect the joyous note which rung so loudly in Bombay and some of the northern cities, more particularly in Delhi and Amritsar. Those who know say that the Bengali is not built this way, and if he were, the action of the native police when out of sight of their British Officers would act as a corrective. But no matter where one mingled with the onlookers he found a genuine concern in the presence of their Royal Highnesses and a keen anxiety to know their features so as to be able to carry away a mental picture of the King-Emperor's eldest son and his Consort. Whatever the occasion, even so fascinating a one to the Oriental mind as the "Carnival of Light," it was always the Prince and Princess whom the people had come to observe.

Their Royal Highnesses' visit to Calcutta was punctuated with well-organised and brilliant pageants. The decorations in their simplicity and taste were handsomer than any yet seen with the single exception of Amritsar. Illumination Night was a "Feast of Light." Moving through these scenes the Prince and Princess came into contact with every phase of the City's activities, whilst the overpoweringly European atmosphere of their surroundings was tempered by the presence of the Tashi Lama, the Tongsa Penlop and the Raja of Sikkim on all State occasions. But the event which will dwell longest in recollection and which was indeed the crowning point of the progress was the laying of the foundation-stone of the noble Memorial to the late Queen-Empress. On every hand the evidence accumulates which points to the virility and grip of the chain which binds India to the Royal House. The first link was forged by the gracious Proclamation which will be blazoned on the walls of the Victoria Hall, and every year fresh sectors were wrought as the knowledge of her sympathy and goodness and love penetrated the hearts of her Eastern subjects, whom she never saw. That chain was inherited by her son, and, as far as one can read the signs of the times, will pass strengthened to her grandson. In every phase of the simple reverent ceremony the force of this personal influence and dynastic connection was driven home, and it found its most adequate expression in the active association of Queen Victoria's grandson with India's outward expression of love and loyalty to her memory. Through this association the Victoria Hall will do more even than proclaim "the glory of an unequalled epoch and the beauty of a spotless name." It will be an outward and visible sign that, though Kings and Queens must pass in their appointed time, the principles for which Queen Victoria stood did not die with her. They were bequeathed to her successors with the sceptre she swayed for India's good.

Western Morning News.—Calcutta, the second city in the Empire, is in a state of breathless expectation and anxious preparation for the epoch-making ceremonies and functions that begin to-morrow week. While you at home are exercising your frivolous minds over such curious questions as Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's intentions in sending two pronounced Little Englanders to the India-Office, or what Mr. Lambert knows about the Admiralty, or whether pigs have wings, here in Calcutta our main preoccupation is a consuming fear lest the Prince and Princess should think that any other place in the Empire is a patch on the City of Palaces. Calcutta is determined that for this occasion at least she is not only the metropolis of India, but also the city where everything is done, in accordance with the traditions of the gorgeous East, on a magnificent scale that cannot be approached elsewhere.

It must be admitted, however, that Calcutta's appearance when in the agonies of preparation for the Royal visit is one of great dishevelment—like a maid in curl-papers. All along our glorious main roads thousands of Venetian masts are being put into the holes dug to receive them, and the roadways are up in a thousand places. All our huge buildings—and Calcutta with its recent buildings on a large scale is now more than ever a City of Palaces—are covered with bamboo scaffolding up to a prodigious height, for the purpose of affixing the illuminations for the night of January 3rd. Then the innumerable grand stands for the various outdoor functions are all more or less in the builder's hands and overrun by coolies. And in the course of the whirling eight days of the Royal visit, from the public reception on arrival, at 4 p.m. on Friday, December 29th, to the departure for Darjiling on Friday evening, January 5th, there is hardly a day that has not at least one great outdoor function—of course, always excepting Sunday, which, in accordance with the Prince's own excellent orders on the question of Sunday observance, will be spent quietly at the Viceroy's garden-house at Barrackpore, after the morning service at the Cathedral at 10.30.

The public reception of the Royal party on arrival will be, as usual, at the well-known landing-place on the Hooghly known as Prinsep's Ghat, which is closely adjacent to the riverside road called the Strand, where all Calcutta drives every evening between five and seven—to "eat the air," as the natives call it. There they are building two immense grand stands facing each other. The tickets for these stands have already been distributed, and the most elaborate arrangements have been taken for ensuring the comfort of all their spectators, as well as for that of the officials who will take an active part in the ceremony of reception. Levée dress will be worn by all officials, and by all spectators who are entitled to wear uniform, so that the parterres will show very brilliant masses of colouring; and after the presentation of certain addresses a State procession will be formed, to march from this spot along the Strand, and between the famous Fort William, the Eden Public Gardens, and the ground of the Calcutta Cricket Club, to Government House. And after a "small dinner" the Prince will proceed to hold a levée—and the applications already sent in to attend that levée show that it will be the largest on record.

New Year's Day is "Empress Day" in India. And in the morning we have the "Proclamation Parade" to commemorate the Proclamation of the Empire on January 1st, 1877; and in the evening there is the State banquet at Government House; while in the afternoon the Princess will attend a "Purdah party" at the official residence of the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, which is at Belvedere, in the suburb known as Alipore.

The "Purdah party"—a party of ladies whose rank and high caste makes them "Purdahnashin," always secluded behind the purdah or curtain from masculine view—will be exceedingly interesting as differentiating the present Royal visit from that of His Majesty the King when Prince of Wales just thirty years ago. The Princess will see and converse with, through interpreters of the feminine sex, many Maharanis and other great ladies who have never before been outside their zenanas, and whose faces have never been looked upon by masculine eyes except those of their husbands, fathers, and elder brothers. A good many of these "Purdahnashin" ladies have of late years received some education, often from English governesses; but some still pass their lives in the old-fashioned way, playing with toys with their attendant waiting-maids, and occasionally being bedecked with vast stores of priceless jewels on joyful State occasions.

In strong contrast with this "Purdah party" on Monday will be the State luncheon with the Maharaja of Kuch Behar on Tuesday. For the Maharani of Kuch Behar, who is well known in England, was the daughter of the late Babu Kishub Chunder Sen, the great Bengali reformer who founded the Brahma Samaj sect of Theists, and whose followers have adjured the superstitions of the "Purdah." The ladies of the Brahma Samaj are generally well educated and live much like ladies in England; and Her Highness the Maharani of Kuch Behar is a most popular and highly-accomplished lady. The luncheon at the Maharaja's house is to be followed by a public reception on the "Maidan," which is the vast public park of Calcutta; and in the evening the Viceroy and Lady Minto give a reception at Government House to meet Their Royal Highnesses.

Of all the busy days in Calcutta, Wednesday, January 3rd, is, perhaps, the most crowded with functions, for there is a luncheon party given by the Chief Justice of Bengal and Lady Maclean, then a garden party at Government House, then a dinner in the fort with the Commander-in-Chief, Lord Kitchener; and after this dinner a drive through the streets to see the illuminations. But the next day, Thursday, January 4th, will run it close—for in the morning there is the great ceremony of laying the foundation-stone of the Victoria Memorial Hall on the Maidan, nearly on the site of the old Calcutta Jail, there is a State dinner at Government House, and the State ball in the evening. And Friday, January 5th, is even more crowded, for in the afternoon there is the Convocation of the University of Calcutta, dinner at Government House, followed by another State ball, and then, late at night, the departure for Darjiling

And as all these functions are interspersed for the Prince with State visits from and to innumerable native chiefs, which are hardly less ceremonious in their nature than public functions, it will be seen that our Prince and Princess have their work cut out for them during their stay in Calcutta. As many of your readers will know, there are few more fatiguing days than those which are filled by a long round of public ceremonies; and I have no doubt that Their Royal Highnesses will be very thankful indeed for the small rest that will be given them at Darjiling, followed by the longer rest on board the Renown in their voyage to Rangoon. For this week their rests, such as they are, will have to be taken in the railway; and though the Royal special train has been very elaborately contrived to be as comfortable as it can be made, still at best the rest to be obtained in that way can hardly be altogether satisfactory.

The Englishman, which is the leading daily newspaper of the metropolis of India, publishes every day many columns of graphic writing from their "Special" with the Royal party. And this week they have been in the very heart of historic India—at Amritsar, at Agra, and Fatehpur Sikri, and at Gwalior. With the scenes that are described, and the historic associations connected with them—from the earliest times of Aryan India, through the Pathan and Mughul periods of Muhammadan rule, and the comparatively modern days of the Sikhs and the Mahrattas—many of us are familiar. But the presence of the Prince and Princess gives a new interest to these old associations. And it has been well observed by the Englishman and some of the other local journals that the speeches of the Prince of Wales, in reply to the many addresses of welcome—national, religious, municipal, and feudatory—that have been presented to the Royal visitors, have shown a most remarkable faculty for saying, in the most graceful and gracious way, just the right thing, at the right place, to the right people. This is a faculty which the Prince inherits from his Royal father and grandmother. His famous "Wake up!" speech in London, after the conclusion of the colonial tour, showed that he possesses, to a most valuable degree, the power of arresting the attention and arousing the interest of his hearers, and indeed of the world at large; and while it may be assumed that he has the best of "coaching" for facts and allusions, it is just this faculty of impressiveness, of driving home those facts and allusions, and aptly utilising them, that makes such coaching valuable—and of that faculty, like the poetic afflatus, it may be said, Nascitur, non fit, it is obviously the Prince's own. His speech to the Sikhs at their capital, Amritsar, demonstrated this faculty in its best form—it showed that the son of their Emperor was not forgetful of the bravery and the chivalrous loyalty of the Sikh warriors that stood us in such good stead in the dark days of the Mutiny. Equally telling and equally appropriate were the speeches, always short, but always impressive, that were delivered to the Mughuls at Agra, and to the Mahrattas at Gwalior. The great Maharaja of Gwalior, whose dynastic name is Sindhia—each Maharaja during his reign is, in succession, "Sindhia"—is not the highest in rank of our feudatories, but his House has always retained its martial traditions; and nothing could be more gratifying to the Prince than to observe the keen and intense loyalty to His Majesty the King-Emperor that was so strongly and spontaneously manifested by Sindhia and his people during the Royal visit to Gwalior.—(By SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE, K.C.I.E.)

9TH JANUARY 1906.

Civil and Military Gazette.—The constant meddling with uniform in the British Army is irritating both to the officer and the soldier; and the story of the Brodriek cap alone has pointed a moral as regards recruiting which the higher authorities are not likely to disregard. Almost as objectionable as that ugly cap, says the Pioneer, is the khaki helmet which is now so much in evidence. It was introduced as a matter of economy, so that one head-dress might serve the British soldier on all occasions. It is worn on service and equally on full-dress parades; and on the latter it completely spoils the smart uniforms of the men in every branch.

During the Royal tour in India everyone, from the Prince of Wales to the least martial civilian spectator, has noticed the incongruous effect produced by rows of khaki helmets over the scarlet or blue or rifle-green lines of the rank-and-file. In only one instance have the Regulations been disregarded. In Bombay the 10th Hussars, acting as escort to the Royal party, wore white helmets; and the effect was noticeable at once. In Calcutta the 15th Hussars, perfectly turned out, have the khaki pattern; and the Infantry, at the Proclamation Parade on New Year's Day, were similarly disfigured.

The "universal" helmet may be serviceable and economical, but if full-dress is to be maintained it should certainly not be worn on parade. It is stated that its shape prevents the old white cover being fitted to it: but this is not everything, and, as it is, the helmet does not keep the shape in which it is originally moulded. It gets dirty also, and the men lose pride in their personal appearance in consequence. The Prince of Wales would be doing the Army a service if any representations that he may make on his return should have the result of restoring the once effective full-dress of the British soldier.

Englishman.—The Viceroy will visit the Imperial Cadet Corps Camp this morning.

H.M.S. Renown, which is to convey the Royal Party to Rangoon, arrived at Saugor Island early yesterday morning. The Perseus and the Hyacinth both left Calcutta yesterday.

His Excellency the Viceroy returned from Barrackpore yesterday afternoon. His Excellency will go on board the Guide to bid good-bye to Their Royal Highnesses at Prinsep's Ghat this morning at about 9-30.

The Bengal Polo Tournament came to a conclusion yesterday afternoon, when Golconda beat the 15th Hussars by three goals and two subsidiaries to two goals and two subsidiaries.

Indian Daily News.—The Amrita Bazar Patrika writes:—The Maharaja of Durbhanga's gift reminds us of the purse of Rs. 10,000 which the present King-Emperor, as Prince of Wales, paid to the Corporation of Bombay in 1875, for the benefit of its people. The inappropriateness of the act was at once felt; for, firstly, the Prince was a guest, and a guest, according to the notions of the Indians, takes and not gives; secondly, if a gift was determined upon, it should have been of a nature worthy of the donor, the future Sovereign of India. We are glad that no such step has been taken by the present Prince of Wales. And yet, we must say, it would have been a graceful act if the people were made to feel the benefit of the Royal prerogative in the shape of some political privileges. It is quite true that the Prince of Wales is a non-political character; and he cannot interfere with the administration of the country. All the same the Government might have done something in honour of the Heir to the British throne which might have been taken as a political gift from His Royal Highness worthy of his august position.

The Amrita Bazar Patrika writes:—An incident connected with the Special Convocation, held on Friday last, has such a grim humour about it that it should not be allowed to pass unnoticed. His Royal Highness did not visit what is called the "native" quarter during his stay in Calcutta, and naturally enough this is the subject of talk in Indian circles. Various are the surmises to account for this circumstance. One is the authorities would not permit him to do so, lest his idea about the prosperous condition of Calcutta received a rude shock. Another is they were apprehensive of the student community; for, who knows, they might have uttered "Bande Mataram" and given an alarm to the Prince. The latter surmise, however, came to be discredited, when it was announced that stalls were to be erected in the enclosure facing the Senate Hall for the accommodation of students, so that they might have an excellent view of His Royal Highness. People wondered how and under what beneficial influence did the authorities all of a sudden feel such a paternal feeling for the students. In the meantime, the construction of the stalls went on briskly and it was almost complete on the morning previous to the Convocation day. Late in the evening, however, a curious spectacle was witnessed in the College Square. A number of coolies were employed in demolishing the stalls and they were being whipped to work hard, harder and hardest! Why was the result of so much money and labour spent so ruthlessly destroyed? The general impression is, "Bande Mataram" is at the bottom of the mischief!

Madras Mail.—By a happy thought and with the alert and gracious consent of Their Royal Highnesses, the donations to Capital's Toy Fund received from the Prince and Princess and their Staff are to be devoted to supplying the Tibetan followers of His Holiness the Tashi Lama with toys to take back with them to their children in Tibet; and these toys will be accompanied with a plentiful supply of the portraits of the Prince and Princess of Wales. This, says our contemporary, is a diplomatic stroke of loving kindness which will penetrate further than the hearts of the parents and the children who receive them.

Mr. Sidney Low, a Special Correspondent with Their Royal Highnesses, refers thus to the Bombay festivities:—"I heard only one adverse criticism, and it is characteristic enough to be reproduced. One of the ablest members of the non-official community, a man of thirty years' Indian residence, said that the natives would have wished only one thing to have been done differently. They were a little surprised to find the Prince landing and driving through the town in the ordinary white Indian uniform and helmet which every Englishman wears in the sunny hours of the day, which is worn by private soldiers and shop-assistants, and is sometimes used even by Eurasian clerks. I had the same testimony from natives themselves. They expected to see the heir to the Empire blazing in scarlet and adorned with stars and orders. The full gala array of a Field Marshal, with cocked hat and plumes, would have been appreciated. And my informants thought that it would have given additional lustre to the procession in native eyes if all the Rajas and Feudatory Chiefs, in their silks and jewels, had driven behind the Royal carriage. As it was, the Body Guard and the Hussars were no more than the populace see every time the Governor performs some State function, rather less than they can witness when the Viceroy comes into the city in State."

Madras Mail.—Dr. Nadirshaw Sukhia gives notice that at the next monthly meeting of the Bombay Municipal Corporation he will move:—That the attention of the President be specially invited to certain statements made in the subjoined Bombay letter, published in the Bengali, dated the 29th November 1905, as to the correspondence and telegrams and the telephonic messages that passed between the President and the Government of Bombay, and the conversation held on the 8th November, 1905, by the Chief Secretary to Government with the President on the subject of the question of procedure regarding the invitations to the President and the Municipal Commissioner to receive Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales on their arrival in Bombay and he be requested to inform the Corporation as to the correctness of the said statements.

The following is the letter in the Bengali to which reference is made:—

Royalty has come and gone. Its visit was enthusiastically heralded, excellently carried out, and most successfully concluded. Prior to the arrival of the Prince and Princess, the Political Secretary in charge of the programme had conceived some fantastic notions of popular reception of Royalty. He was so enamoured of them that, in his unbounded egoism, it never occurred to him that what may be right and proper, from his own personal point of view, may be the very opposite, from the point of view of the people. He was in such passionate love with the special arrangements he had elaborated, after the consumption of the midnight-oil for many a long and weary week, for the reception of Their Royal Highnesses at the Apollo Bunder on their landing, that he completely gave the go-by to the Corporation which, as representing the citizens, had resolved to give the guests a cordial and right loyal welcome. An official of officials, and, moreover, intensely inculcated with the virus of bureaucratic infallibility, this omnipotent and omniscient Political Secretary deemed so high an entity as the President of the Corporation of the First Municipal City in India a negligible personage. "The First Citizen of Bombay" found no place in his arrangements for the reception of Royalty at the Bunder. That citizen had every right to be invited in his treacherous capacity of President, Additional Member of the Legislative Council, and a Knight Commander of "The Eminent Order" of the Indian Empire. The Political Secretary's version was that the shamiana had been so constructed and arranged that only the official hierarchy—all told and select, numbering about 120—should greet the Prince and Princess as they landed on the shores of India. The reception by the public should be on a magnificent scale, but all the same, it should be outside the sacrosanct precincts of the shamiana, which was to be held religiously sacred to his White Brahminical order alone, and the much-heckored Maharajas and Rajas, Princes and Potentates, Chiefs and Sardars, et hoc omne genus. It never occurred to the Grand Master of Ceremonies that the programme which he had so long been elaborating and with which he was in such ardent love, should be seen by any other person. But this overweening conceit was soon and signally punched. The President of the Corporation felt that this was an insult to the Bombay Citizens. He immediately called an informal meeting of themselves and laid the whole affair before them for consideration. Of course, the Corporation was awfully incensed. It gave full powers to the President to take immediate steps to right the great wrong, and here it may be useful to note that even without consulting the Corporation the President had, on October 18th, addressed the Political Secretary on the way in which he had arranged the Corporation should receive the Prince and the Princess. It was owing to the cavalier treatment given to the letter which impelled the President to take drastic steps. The self-respect of the whole City was at stake. The reply, tardily given by the Political Secretary, was a mere acknowledgment of the letter, but unaccompanied by any word of explanation. This was the height of official insolence and a virtual ignorance of the Corporation as a body not to be counted in the matter! So on 6th November the informal meeting gave a mandate to the President to address the Secretary again and make him fully acquainted with the feelings and sentiments of the entire City, as voiced by the members. Till the morning of the 8th, no reply had been forthcoming. Meanwhile, the excitement in the City was something phenomenal. The many leading men of the different castes and communities instinctively felt the insult. They openly proclaimed their intention to put down the decoration, haul down the bunting, shut up all preparations for lighting, and so on. Public indignation rose to the highest pitch. There was real sound and fury in the air. The popular electricity was on the point of bursting into a huge conflagration and Heaven only knows what might have been the fate of this precious Political Secretary and his Government. It was in the midst of this ferment and excitement that the President called on Wednesday, the 8th November (which will be a memorable one in the annals of Bombay), another informal meeting at 4 p.m., to take further thought and action. The Corporation was determined almost unanimously to refuse presenting the address. Some had openly avowed their intention to maintain the self-respect of the City by absenting themselves. The constitutional aspect was also freely discussed. The Corporation would meet the next day at the Bunder. Formally any member could move that this meeting "be adjourned" and there was a firm majority to adjourn it there and then. The effect of this Resolution would have been to make the President powerless. He could not act. He could not present the Address. Imagine the consequence to the Government of Bombay. Imagine this deplorable contretemps at the very moment of the Royal landing. Methinks it would have completed the circle of official insolence and abuse of power and authority of Lord Curzon's disastrous Viceroyalty. But it was lucky that there were some farsighted citizens who scented the would-be consequences. Somehow, the Governor was apprised of the dangerous quandary into which the precious Political Secretary had well-nigh brought the Government. Another high official also was alarmed and took care to apprise His Excellency of the state of feeling in the town. To the eternal credit and good sense of these two high personages, be it said, the storm was lulled. The Political Secretary on the morning of 8th was commanded to hold an interview with the President and see that everything was harmoniously arranged so as not to permit even the smallest of small hitches to take place at the reception. The popular sentiment should not only be conciliated but respected. It was the people who were going to greet the son and daughter of their beloved Sovereign, not the Civil and the Military Service. Hence, the President was the first person, as representing the City, who ought to be invited. Indeed, that personage had, of his own motion, long before claimed his privilege to be invited and demanded the card of invitation. This was the situation at about 1 p.m. when the President received an urgent telegram from the blundering Secretary that he wished to see him. Three hours had only been left before the second informal meeting was to hold its deliberations. Each moment was of supreme importance. It was to seal the fate or otherwise of the Bombay Government. The excitement in the town grew apace. Each one was inquiring of another "What will happen?" "Will the President be invited?" "Will everything go smooth?" and so on. At last the interview took place, lasting 45 minutes, in which the Secretary was made thoroughly alive to the serious consequences of carrying out his programme as his fertile but unstatesmanlike brain had already conceived. He was requested to communicate the ultimate message to the Governor. It was arranged that before 4 p.m. either "Aye" or "No" should be wired or telephoned to the President. A little before that hour the Municipal Secretary received the telephone "Aye." The Corporation assembled and there was unprecedented eagerness on the part of the members to learn the upshot. The President informally allayed their anxiety by letting them know what had happened. The informal meeting was then held. The President announced that things had ended happily as the whole City had wished. He read extracts from the reply of the Secretary written out before the interview had taken place. It was a most belated explanation which the public have refused to accept. It was a pure after-thought to say the Political Secretary had devised the absurd arrangement rather to exalt than debase the Corporation. Wonderful man that the exaltation should have been so contrived as to set up the back of a whole City!!! The President received the invitation to the shamiana which was his right. It was also arranged that the Municipal Commissioner and the Sheriff should receive theirs, and the procedure to be adopted for the presentation of the address was also finally and satisfactorily arranged. Thus did the citizens triumph over official insolence and overweening conceit. They made him exceedingly alive to the fact—so patent to all save himself—that the reception was by the people and not by the official hierarchy. All is well that ends well! And so we may drop the curtain over this extraordinary episode. Its silliness was the talk of the town. Officials themselves were amused and astonished that a Political Secretary could so mismanage things as to put a town of ten lakhs of people into a state of the most unprecedented ferment.

Rangoon Gazette.—The Renown, with the Prince and Princess of Wales on board, and the accompanying cruisers, Terrible, Fox, and Perseus, are expected to arrive below Hastings before sundown on Friday evening. The Hyacinth is due on Thursday. We shall thus have an excellent little squadron in port, comprising one battleship, one first-class cruiser, one second-class cruiser and two third-class cruisers.

An advertisement to-day announces that the Flotilla Co. will, if sufficient inducement offers, despatch launches daily to make a circuit of the two more important men-of-war in port. The Renown is one of the smaller battleships selected for this tour on account of her splendid sea-going qualities and her handiness; she is one of the smaller battleships, being only 12,350 tons, has a speed of eighteen knots, was completed at Pembroke in 1897 and refitted in 1903. The Terrible is a first-class cruiser of 14,200 tons, completed in 1898 by Thomson of Glasgow and refitted at Clydebank; she has a speed of 22.4 knots. She and her sister-ship the Powerful are universally regarded as two of the finest vessels of this class afloat.

We have been asked to make it generally known that with the exception of the hill on which the two pavilions stand and the enclosure allotted to the Boat Club, the whole of Dalhousie Park will be open to the public on Monday night when the Royal Lakes will be illuminated. Carriages will not be allowed inside the gates, but for the convenience of those who are going to the pavilion enclosure a road from the gates to the pavilion will be lighted and covered with carpet. The large bridge will be closed to traffic.

We have been asked to bring to the notice of the residents at Halpin Road that doubt exists whether they should decorate their houses, and it is suggested by the Reception Committee that it would be suitable if all houses on the route of Their Royal Highnesses were decorated to some extent. Nothing elaborate need be undertaken.

The Lieutenant-Governor will inspect the Royal train at Kemmendine at 6 p.m. on Thursday.

As at present arranged the Royal train will leave Phayre St. for Mandalay about 11 p.m. on Monday, the special train with correspondents and others leaving about an hour earlier. Captain Kincaid and Mr. Huddleston will accompany the Royal train. Another train with passengers, baggage, etc., leaves Rangoon an hour after the Royal train.

The Local Government has sanctioned an expenditure of Rs. 14,000 on decorations of Government buildings on the occasion of the approaching Royal visit.

The representatives of home newspapers coming to Burma this week are as follows: Mr. V. Chirol, The Times; Mr. H. F. Prevost Battersby, the Morning Post; Mr. P. Landon, the Daily Telegraph; Mr. W. Maxwell, the Daily Mail; Mr. Watson, Reuter's Agency; Mr. Jacomb-Hood, the Graphic; Mr. Begg, the Illustrated London News. Two representatives of Indian papers, Mr. Gorman and Mr. Sen, also come to Burma.

As the press representatives must arrive in Madras before the Royal party they will be compelled to leave for Madras on Friday morning, the 19th instant, and will consequently be unable to join in the trip down the river. The Flotilla steamer Moguing had been reserved for their use.

Mr. Sarkies, Managing Proprietor of the Strand Hotel, writes:—"Would you kindly allow this letter a small space in your paper to correct a wrong impression that owing to the forthcoming Royal visit accommodation in Rangoon is not procurable and that for such accommodation as is available the charge ranges from Rs. 50 to Rs. 100 a day per head? This is altogether wrong. Rooms in the Strand Hotel and annexe are available from Rs. 7 to Rs. 12 per head for day inclusive of all meals."

A special order by Lieutenant-Colonel R. S. Menzies, A. D. C., Commanding Rangoon Port Defence Volunteers, dated Rangoon, 6th January, is as follows: The Corps will parade as strong as possible on Saturday, the 13th January 1906, to attend the Public Reception of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. It is hoped that every member of the Corps will be present. Fall in at head-quarters at 7-15 A.M. sharp. Dress:—Naval Divisions, White uniform, straw hats and black boots. Artillery Companies and Electrical Engineering Co., Khaki uniform, helmets and black boots. N.B.:—No gaiters or putties to be worn. The following officers are detailed for duty with the guard-of-honour: Captain J. H. Brabazon, in Command, Sub-Lieutenant G. R. Neilson, Lieutenant C. T. Graham. The Royal salute of 31 guns will be fired by the St. Paul's School Naval Cadets, under Lieutenant P. A. Churchward, from the Soalay Pagoda Wharf.

10TH JANUARY 1906.

Civil and Military Gazette.—Among the many entertaining functions that the Calcutta public have witnessed during the Royal visit by no means the least have been some of the matches in the Bengal polo tournament. The organizers of this function have every reason to be gratified not only by the response made by teams from remote parts of India, but also by the excellent games that have been played and witnessed by Royalty, the Viceregal party, and all Calcutta society. The Calcutta Polo Club have laid the public under a debt of gratitude for catering for them so handsomely.

The final game in the tournament was played off this afternoon in the presence of the largest gathering that has yet assembled on the polo ground. The Viceroy, Lady Minto and daughters came in from Barrackpore by special train to witness the game. Among other personages present were Lord Kitchener, Sir Andrew and Lady Fraser, the Maharaja of Cooh Behar (who is now quite restored to health) and the several young Chiefs of the Cadet Corps. The splendid game played between the Royal Dragoons and the Goleonda team and won by the narrowest margin in the last minute of the game, had whetted public appetite for another sensational game in the one set down for to-day between the 15th Hussars and the Goleondas for the final, and no one can deny that it was sensational from first to last, and every move on the ground was watched with the keenest interest. The teams were constituted as follows:—15th King's Hussars—Captain Courage, Honourable J. Bingham, Captain Barrett and Captain Livingstone Learmouth, back. Goleonda Gymkhana—Mr. Hamid Yar Jung, Captain Shah Mirza Beg, Captain Osman Yar-ud-Dowla and Mr. Kadir Beg, back. The umpires were Colonel DeLisle and Captain Ashburner.

The Hussars were public favourites, but it became evident after the first two chukkers, in which the Hussars practically held Goleonda, that they could not do more. The Hussars' ponies all round suffered in comparison to those of their adversaries. The early scoring by Goleonda was got by good luck, but in subsequent periods they circumvented their adversaries by real clever play, and, despite the efforts of Learmouth in defence and Barrett's fine demonstrations in attack, the Goleondas not only averted more than one imminent score but retaliated by attacking the Hussars' flags, and maintained their supremacy in the game to the very last. In a very close game, the issue was in the air till the last chukker, when it wanted but three minutes for play, all through which the Hussars were on their defence, and at the final call of time Goleonda won by 3 goals, 2 subsidiaries to 2 goals, 2 subsidiaries.

At the conclusion of the game Lord Minto presented a handsome trophy to the winners in a few complimentary words and with the usual cheers one of the finest polo tournaments witnessed in India was brought to a conclusion.

Englishman.—Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales have not taken their full staff to Burma. Lady Shretesbury is a guest at Government House, and Lord Shaftesbury has gone on a shooting trip. Lord and Lady Crichton have proceeded to Alwar, and the Hon'ble Derek and Mrs. Keppel are going to Kuch Behar. Captain the Hon'ble W. Cadogan has temporarily rejoined the 10th Hussars. Captains Makins, Hill and Ashburner have also left the Royal party for a short time.

Englishman.—The following correspondence has been sent us for publication:—

16, Taltollah, Calcutta, the 5th January, 1906.

To Sir Walter Lawrence, K.C.I.E., etc.

Sir,—I am directed by the Committee of the Mohamedan Literary Society of Calcutta, which comprises Members of the Mohamedan Community from various parts of India to request the favour of your kindly laying before Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales a message of most cordial, sincere and loyal welcome on their visit to the Metropolis of the British Empire in India.

The feeling of unfeigned joy and pleasure of Mahomedans at this gracious advent of Their Royal Highnesses in their midst is intensified by the recollection of the fact that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales is also accompanied by his august Consort, and they rejoice that they are enabled to enjoy the privileges of doing homage not only to the Heir to the Throne, but also to that august Princess whom they all revere and adore as their future Queen and Empress.

More than a century and a half have not elapsed since India first saw the beginnings of British supremacy, and all these long and momentous years have become associated with a succession of brilliant achievements which stand unparalleled in the history of the world. While the triumphs of war of these early British heroes on many a hard-fought field have proved to the world the sterling qualities of British valour and manhood, history records with admiration the nobler victories of a race of British statesmen whose single-minded devotion to duty, sense of justice and wise conciliation have cemented the many creeds and castes of India into a loyal and contented nation. The India that is presented to the gaze of Their Royal Highnesses to-day is a unique Empire enshrined in the hearts of millions of people, an Empire broadbased on the will of a happy and contented nation, and upheld no more by force of arms than by sentiments of gratitude and loyalty inspired by deeds of beneficence and justice tempered with mercy.

The triumphal progress of Their Royal Highnesses for the past month and a half has evoked sincere and loyal enthusiasm in the minds of His Majesty's Indian subjects, and everywhere Their Royal Highnesses must have received abundant proofs of that devoted loyalty, and fervent attachment to the throne on the part of the people which is at once the admiration and envy of all other nations in the civilized world.

Thirty years ago, when His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales's august father our gracious King-Emperor, made his historic tour through India, the Mohamedan Literary Society approached His Majesty with a humble address of welcome in which a reference was made to a "reanimated sense of personal fealty" to the Royal Family, which had dawned over all classes of people. It is with sincere pleasure that the Committee can now respectfully assure Their Royal Highnesses that this ever-growing sense of "personal fealty" is at the present moment rendering Their Royal Highnesses, as our future King and Queen, the centre of a world of devotion and allegiance which is becoming intensified day by day.

However poor and inadequate the expression, the Committee respectfully beg Their Royal Highnesses to be graciously pleased to accept this humble tribute of sincere and lasting homage from the Mohamedan Community of Bengal, and they earnestly implore the Almighty Disposer of Events to shower untold blessings on Their Royal Highnesses and their illustrious family.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your most obedient servant, (Sd) A. F. M. Abdur Rahman, Honorary Secretary, Mohamedan Literary Society of Calcutta.

Prince of Wales's Camp, India, 8th January, 1906.

Dear Sir,—I am directed by the Prince of Wales to forward you the enclosed reply to the letter written by you to Sir Walter Lawrence in the name of the Mohamedan Literary Society of Calcutta,—I am, dear Sir, yours very faithfully, Sd. Arthur Bigge.

A. F. M. Abdur Rahman, Esq., Honorary Secretary, Mohamedan Literary Society of Calcutta. 16, Toltollah, Calcutta.

"The Princess of Wales and I are greatly touched by the kind words of your letter of the 5th instant to Sir Walter Lawrence, and we sincerely thank the members of the Mohamedan Literary Society of Calcutta for the hearty welcome to the Metropolis of the British Empire in India to which it gives expression.

"As you truly say, we have been received everywhere throughout our interesting journey with sincere and affectionate enthusiasm, and have received unbounded proofs of devoted loyalty to the Crown. And it is especially gratifying to hear from the Mohamedan Literary Society of Calcutta that the 'reanimated sense of personal fealty' to our family, which the Society thirty years ago assured my dear father had dawned over all classes is now so amply extended to us.

"To receive from such an important community an expression of grateful appreciation of British Rule over an Empire broadbased on the will of a happy and contented people, and a general recognition of that unity of races which it has accomplished, is an assurance which we shall always value. It will inspire an ever-recurring and refreshing thought, and serve to knit our hearts still more closely to the peoples of India in days to come when thousands of miles separate us from this great Continent."

Calcutta, 8th January, 1906.

Globe.—Just twenty years after the annexation of Upper Burmah, the British Heir-Apparent includes that fine province in his Eastern itinerary. It goes without saying that he and his popular Consort are assured of a splendid reception both there and in Lower Burmah. There has never been any question about Burmese loyalty in either since King Theebaw was sent into exile for intriguing to overthrow British rule. For a year or two the robber bands, whose plunder he shared, gave us some trouble, but the other inhabitants gradually came to recognise that British control was infinitely preferable to that of organised brigandage. From that date both provinces have continuously advanced in material prosperity, their united revenues almost invariably yielding a substantial surplus. Even the Shans inhabiting the semi-civilized tract abutting on the Chinese frontier so highly appreciate the change of rule that they may be depended on to give the Royal travellers a most enthusiastic welcome should they extend their journey so far. The main question of interest to these clansmen as to the rest of Burmah is the possibility of opening out profitable trade with Western China. So far as authentic information has been obtained, that of Yunnan appears to have been greatly exaggerated, but the fifty millions of Chinese in wealthy Szechuan are said to long for a shorter and more direct commercial road to Europe than the existing long détour via the Yangtse. The Prince of Wales will, we may make sure, quietly inform his intelligent mind on the principal issues involved in this controversy, and may be he will have another "wake up" message to deliver on his return home in a couple of months.

Indian Daily News.—Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales left Barrackpore by the Viceregal launch Maud yesterday morning for Calcutta en route to Rangoon. The departure was private, the placid little station manifesting not the slightest interest in the event, and the only indication of there being anything out of the common was the presence of a few policemen towards the river side at the ghat beyond Government House. The historical old Park was also closed to visitors, and with the exception of a few policemen and a lady and gentleman who approached as near the old landing place as they possibly could, the grounds were quite deserted.

At the new landing stage were the launches Maud, Blanche, Lily and Mary with the police boat Peel. At 8-30 Their Royal Highnesses boarded the Maud, which left the pontoon preceded by the Blanche, the police boat Peel acting as pilot. The little Viceregal launch gracefully skirted along the foreshore of the Park, and in five minutes had rounded the bend and was lost to view.

The departure of Their Royal Highnesses this morning was private. The R.I.M.S. Guide was moored midstream, opposite Prinsep's Ghat, and the Prince and Princess, accompanied by Lady Minto and staff, arrived from Barrackpore at about 10-15 A.M., on the R.I.M.S. Maud. At this time His Excellency the Viceroy, accompanied by Lieutenant-Colonel Dunlop-Smith and Captain Fielding, went to meet Their Royal Highnesses on board the launch Balasore. After farewells had been exchanged, Their Excellencies returned, accompanied by their staff, to Prinsep's Ghat in the R. I. M. S. Maud and drove off to Government House, while the Guide steamed off. There was no crowd at Prinsep's Ghat.

The passage down the river by R. I. M. S. Guide occupied 6 hours 45 minutes from Prinsep's Ghat, the times at the various stations being—

Budge-Budge	11-40 A.M.
Achipur	12-7 P.M.
Hoogly Point	1-35 P.M.
Diamond Harbour	1-58 P.M.
Mud Point	3-15 P.M.
Saugor Island	4-15 P.M.

At the Island H. M. S. Fox and Renown had been at anchor throughout the day.

Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales took H. M. S. Renown at Saugar last evening. The party accompanying them included—Lady Eva Dugdale, Sir W. Lawrence, Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Arthur Bigge, Major-General Stuart Beaton, Military Secretary, Commander Godfrey-Faussett, R.N., Commander Sir Charles Cust, Bart., R.N., Mr. Frank Dugdale, Captain Viscount Crichton, Lieutenant-Colonel R. RANGOON, January 9th.—This afternoon the sky became overcast with rain-charged clouds, which threaten to mar the effects of the city's decorations, now rapidly approaching completion, in honour of the Royal visit.

Pioneer.—CALCUTTA, 8th January.—The 15th Husars, who have formed the principal part of the escort to the Prince and Princess, are giving a military display on the racecourse on Tuesday and Wednesday afternoons.

Admiral Poe, in a letter to the Lieutenant-Governor, expresses on behalf of the Royal Navy his best thanks for the hospitality and entertainment accorded to all officers and men during their visit to Calcutta. The Renown sent 350 men to the Proclamation Parade. They were carried free by the Railway and were placed in a special camp on the Maidan.

Twenty telegraph signallers will shortly arrive from India in order to cope with the large amount of extra telegraphic work in connection with the Royal visit in Burma, and they will accompany Their Royal Highnesses in a special train to Mandalay next week. Special precautionary measures are being taken by the Government district officials and railway department to safeguard the railway line for the passage of trains conveying Their Royal Highnesses over the Burma Railways. Government district officers are arranging for headmen of villages along the railway line to patrol both sides of the line outside the fences with torch lights, and at various bridges two men are to be stationed on each side of a bridge with torches. The railway department issued orders for permanent and assistant permanent-way inspectors to trolly over their respective lengths six hours previous to the time that the Royal train will pass over them. Gangmen will patrol the line singly with torches, one man being told off to each telegraph post. All railway stations at night will be lit up with extra lights, and every man of the station staff will remain on duty until the Royal train has passed.

Rangoon Gazette.—On the route from Sule Pagoda Wharf to Government House taken by Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales on Saturday there will be fourteen pandals and one arch. The following official description has been supplied to us:—

1. Burmese Pandal.—This pandal is in the form of a pythath. The pythath is a structural ornament to the roofs of buildings specially erected for the reception of royalty and other persons of great dignity. This one is entirely Burmese in structure and according to Burmese taste. It consists of a main pythath called Nama-Soung and eight smaller ones surrounding it. Of the smaller ones, four of those at the corners are called the Nan-Yan-Soung, two on either side the Yoon-Soung, and the two at the entrance and exit the Somohe.

2. Indian Mahomedan Pandal.—This has been erected by the Indian Mahomedans of Rangoon and represents a mosque.

3. At the junction of Phayre Street and the Strand Road is an arch erected by the residents of Phayre Street.

4. A pandal in Phayre Street has been erected by the Madras Hindus of Rangoon. The towers of both gateways represent the golden temple of Madura, and upon them are symbols of the gods and goddesses of the Hindu Pantheon and various scenes in ancient Hindu life. The interior represents in miniature the beauty of Indian architecture.

5. The fifth pandal has been erected by the Hindu community other than the Madras Hindus, and represents a Southern Indian structure.

6. The sixth pandal has been erected by the Persian community of Rangoon and represents a castle.

7. The seventh pandal has been erected by the Suratee Bara Bazaar Company. The front consists of Moorish arches surmounted by appropriate loyal decorations. The interior of this pandal, which is 200 feet long, is fitted to hold 1,200 of the leading members of the Suratee community.

8. The next pandal has been erected by the Khoja community and is of purely Mahomedan design.

9. This pandal has been erected by the Chittagonian community of Rangoon and represents a Mahomedan house in Chittagong.

10. In Latter Street the first Chinese pandal has been erected by the Fokien or "long-coat" Chinese community of Rangoon. The structure represents a royal entrance, or a halting gate for Chinese royalty. When travelling from one city to another Emperors and Princes make use of such gates as halting places, and this pandal is an exact representation of one of these royal gates.

11. The next pandal in Latter Street has been erected by the Canton or "short-coat" community of Chinese. It has been designed after the famous Hone Kow arch where the two Emperors Hoan Kow Tsaw and Chaw Hong Yee met. There are two dragons at the entrance which are Chinese emblems of royalty. Under the arches of the southern entrances there are five sets of marionettes:—

No. 1. In a Chinese Court a juggler performing. No. 2 is the aged ex-Minister of State, Kyang Kyn Kongu, engaged in fishing, while the Emperor is personally trying to induce him to accept a fresh term of office in the State. No. 3 presents a competition in mystic art between the head Priest of the Golden Temple and the white snake which has transformed itself into a beautiful girl. The inundation of the golden temple is also depicted. No. 4 shows a woodman, a cultivator and a fisherman each of whom is following his own vocation. No. 5 shows an attempted burglary at a house, the burglar being disturbed by a night watchman. All the materials for this pandal were imported from Canton.

12. In Canal Street in the centre of the platforms occupied by school children of Rangoon is a pandal erected by the school children which represents, as usual in these cases, a pythat, such as was used by Burmese Kings in the building of their palaces. It consists of six halls surmounted by a spire of graduated roofs.

13. In Godwin Road is the pandal erected by the Rangoon College. This pandal is also in the form of a pythat such as was used at the royal palace in Mandalay.

14. In Leeds Road, near the entrance to Government House, is a pandal erected by the Karen community, which simply represents the front of a house.

The following are the orders of the Lieutenant-General Commanding Burma Division regarding the wearing of dress during the visit of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales to Rangoon:—(1) Arrival—review order (white). (2) Victoria Park—review order (white). Dinner and reception—mess order (cloth). (4) Church service at Cathedral—undress—white helmet, neither medals nor plumes should be worn, but spike and ribbons only. (5) Garden party—(undress).

[White forage cap (see last paragraph) of (4)].

(6) Illuminations—mess' order (cloth).

We are requested to state that morning dress will be worn at the garden Party at Government House on the 15th January. Burmese gentlemen will wear white fillets unless they cut the hair close, in which case they may wear gaung-boungs. Indian gentlemen who do not wear European morning dress will wear chaga, aba or jutba and chapkan, chilta, saya or kaba with trousers and their distinctive national head-dress.

A slight diversion is to be made from the route for the Royal procession from the wharf to Government House. The procession, instead of going straight up Godwin Road, will cross on to the racecourse opposite Camproad, drive in front of the stand and issue on Godwin Road again at the junction of Newlyn Road.

It has been arranged that the Royal train from Prome, arriving in Rangoon on the 21st instant, will be diverted on to the Latter Street line at Kemendine and be brought alongside Barr Street Jetty, at 6 a.m., where Their Royal Highnesses will go on board a launch and leave immediately for the Renown. The arrival and departure will both be private.

The Irrawaddy Flotilla Company's launch Togo will convey the Royal party from the Renown on Saturday morning to the Sule Pagoda wharf, and will act as tender to the Renown during the stay of the squadron in port.

11TH JANUARY 1906.

Birmingham Daily Post.—The preparations for the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Burma, which will be reached by H. M. S. Renown this week, are on a very complete scale. Their Royal Highnesses will enjoy the experience of traversing a province to which a native kingdom has been added since the visit of King Edward to Peninsular India. The old Burmese aristocracy fell to pieces on the deportation of the ex-King Thebaw and his suite twenty years ago, and there remains no princely palace in the occupation of a Burmese noble to serve as the guest-house of the Royal tourists in the manner represented by Bikanir, Jammu, or Gwalior. Rangoon has been in British occupation so long that no ancient palace remains, and the chief historic buildings to be visited are the Golden Pagoda and one or two Buddhist monasteries. The characteristic charm of Burma will be displayed at Mandalay, where Their Royal Highnesses will hold a reception in one of the disused throne rooms of Thebaw's Palace. This still contains, side by side with the native carvings about the lion throne, the London-made carvings which frame the huge mirrors that were sent out for the decorations of the palace a year or two before the downfall of the monarchy. These gilded frames are not unlike some that may be seen in the Royal residences in London itself, and are a curious illustration of the solidarity of the regnal principle in matters of externals.

Englishman.—We are informed that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, before leaving Calcutta, sent Rs. 1,500 to the Bishop, as a gift to the charities connected with the Cathedral.

Sir Walter Lawrence K.C.I.E., Chief of the Staff of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, has been enrolled as an Honorary Member of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce under the provisions of article 21 of the Articles of Association of the Chamber.

Sir,—The Prince and Princess of Wales have now left us after what I am sure will be to Their Royal Highnesses and to us a visit of pleasant memories, but as far as I am aware no proposal has yet been put forward to commemorate these good times. Their Royal Highnesses landed at Prinsep's Ghat and then drove along the Ellenborough Course and down the Red Road to Government House, thereby making a close acquaintance with one of the wonders of the East—the glorious Calcutta Maidan, and I am sure it is the hope of every one of us that the young Prince Edward of Wales will at some future date come and visit us and see the same sights that his father has. The proposal that I respectfully beg to offer for the consideration of your readers is that Government should be moved to convert the road across the Maidan down which Their Royal Highnesses drove into a permanent road for the use of the Calcutta public. It would be a road of pleasure as well of utility. The Red Road and Strand Road both run north and south, and during the hot weather one has to drive with the breeze at one time or another of one's evening drive, but with a road running east and west, the breeze would always be at the side. In order to get to Prinsep's Ghat from the Chauringhi quarter a long detour either via Hastings or via the Eden Gardens, has now to be made. I would venture to suggest that if Government can see their way to constructing this road that it be constructed something on the lines of the Red Road—perfectly open on all sides and so open to every breeze that blows, and in my humble opinion I think it would be more frequented than the Red Road.

Mr. F. L. Halliday, Officiating Commissioner of Police, has published the following circular:—His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales graciously and expressly personally directed me to convey to the Police Force of Calcutta and to all officers and men who assisted the Calcutta Police Force in maintaining order and regulating traffic during Their Royal Highnesses' visit to Calcutta, his appreciation of the very hard work that had fallen on them and the manner in which they had done their duty. I have also received the following letter from Sir Walter Lawrence:—Dear Mr. Halliday,—I am directed by the Prince of Wales to repeat to you in writing what His Royal Highness has, on more than one occasion, intimated to you personally—his keen appreciation of the excellent work done by the Police of Calcutta. Nothing in any part of the Empire could have been more efficiently or more unobtrusively organized than the arrangements for keeping the streets during the visit of Their Royal Highnesses.—Yours truly, WALTER LAWRENCE.

It will, I am sure, afford the entire force the greatest pleasure to learn that the performance of their duties has given satisfaction to Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales during their visit to Calcutta. His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor has also been pleased to convey his thanks to the force. His Honour has remarked:—"I trust that you will also convey my thanks to the officers and men who have served under you. The fact that the enormous crowds who have attended the various functions at which Their Royal Highnesses have been present have been so orderly, is a fact which gives me the greatest pleasure, as indicating the loyalty of the people and their desire to manifest that loyalty to our Royal guests. But the mere regulation of such crowds is in itself a very serious task to impose upon the Police. You and your officers and men have risen to the occasion in a highly creditable manner. The Police of all ranks have as a rule shown tact and patience; and their work has been done quietly and unostentatiously, but none the less effectively. I desire to express my hearty thanks to you and to the whole force."

Madras Mail.—At a well attended meeting (Madras) of the Sub-Committee for School children, held on Tuesday at the Corporation Office, with Mr. A. A. Hall in the Chair, definite arrangements were made for the accommodation of the children on the occasion of the State Entry of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales on the morning of the 24th instant. No children under the age of 9 can be admitted to the stands, but others will be provided with seats in tiers on each side of the Mount Road from the Wallajah Bridge to the Munro statue. The stands will be divided into blocks, each block being indicated by a number plainly inscribed on a cloth background. Tickets bearing corresponding numbers will be sent to heads of Schools, who will bring them to the ground with the name and locality of their Schools plainly inscribed thereon. Each child will be furnished with a medal in memory of the occasion, and after all have been shown to the places assigned to them they will be marched in convenient detachments to tents to receive a supply of dainties. They will then rest in the shade until shortly before the arrival of the Royal Party, when they will once more take up their places on the stands, and as the cortege passes they will give three hearty cheers. It has been found impracticable to arrange for the united singing of National airs, no Massed Bands being available for the purpose. Each School will be expected to bring a suitable complement of teachers and the marshalling of the children will be under the direction of a small Sub-Committee of gentlemen experienced in scholastic work. Up to date some 11,600 children's names have been entered for accommodation on the stands, but that there is ample room for some thousands more, and every precaution will be taken to provide for the safety and comfort of the young sight-seers. The place selected for the children will give them as good a view of the Royal procession as any along the entire route.

Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales will arrive at Sule Pagoda Wharf by launch from H. M. S. Renown at 8.30 A. M. on Saturday, the 13th January 1906. A salute of 31 guns will be fired by the Port Defence Volunteer Battery as the launch reaches the wharf, and a guard-of-honour of British Infantry will be in attendance. His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of Burma will proceed on board the launch to receive Their Royal Highnesses. On shore Their Royal Highnesses will be received by the official and non-official community of Rangoon and Lower Burma, who will be invited to be present in such numbers as the limited space available will permit, and by the Shan and Karenni Chiefs present in Rangoon. The Foreign Consuls at Rangoon will also be invited. At the wharf the Lieutenant-Governor, with His Royal Highness's permission, will introduce His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief of His Majesty's Naval Forces in the Eastern Seas, the Chief Judge of the Chief Court of Lower Burma, the Lieutenant-General Commanding the Burma Division, the Right Rev. the Bishop of Rangoon, the three Puisne Judges of the Chief Court of Lower Burma, the Financial Commissioner, the Members of the Legislative Council (except the Hon'ble Maung Ba Tu, who will be in Mandalay) including the Commissioner of the Pegu Division and the Chief Secretary to Government, the Secretaries to Government, the Sawbwas of Kengtung and Yawnghwe, the President of the Rangoon Municipality, and the Chairman of the Rangoon Port Commissioners. The Lieutenant-General will similarly introduce the Officer Commanding the Rangoon Brigade, and His Royal Highness will inspect the guard-of-honour.

Their Royal Highnesses will then proceed to the Reception Pandal. On behalf of the members of the Reception Committee, representing all races and classes in Rangoon, an address will then be read by the Hon'ble U. Shwe Waing, A. T. M. After the Prince of Wales has graciously replied to the address, the Lieutenant-Governor, with His Royal Highness's permission, will present nineteen representative members of the Reception Committee.

Their Royal Highnesses will then be conducted to their carriages by the Lieutenant-Governor and, after His Royal Highness has inspected the guards-of-honour of the Rangoon Port Defence and the Burma Railway Volunteers drawn up at the entrance, will proceed to Government House. Their Royal Highnesses will be accompanied by a detachment of the Mounted Company of the Rangoon Volunteer Rifles and by the Lieutenant-Governor's Military Police escort, and will proceed via Strand Road, Playro Street, Merchant Street, Strand Road, Latter Street, Canal Street, Godwin Road, Halpin Road and Leeds Road. The route will be under the orders of the Officer Commanding the Rangoon Brigade and by Civil and Military Police. The 89th Punjab Infantry will be drawn up at Government House, where Their Royal Highnesses will be received by the Lieutenant-Governor and Lady White. A salute of 31 guns from the Pagoda fort will be fired on the arrival of Their Royal Highnesses at Government House. Full dress will be worn. Gentlemen not entitled to appear in uniform will wear morning dress.

At 4.45 p. m., on Saturday, the 13th January, Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales will open the Victoria Memorial Park at Rangoon. The ceremony will be attended by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor with his Staff, by His Excellency the Naval Commander-in-Chief with his Staff, by the Hon'ble the Chief Judge, and the Puisne Judges of the Chief Court, by the Lieutenant-General Commanding Burma with his Staff, by the Right Rev. the Bishop of Rangoon, by the Financial Commissioner, by the members of the Burma Legislative Council, by the Commissioners of Divisions present in Rangoon, by the Secretaries and other principal officers of the Government of Burma, by the Colonel Commanding the Rangoon Brigade, and other principal Military Officers. The representatives of the Shan and Karenni Chiefs will attend. The Foreign Consuls at Rangoon will be invited to be present.

Invitations will also be sent by the Administrators of the Park to all subscribers present in Rangoon so far as space will permit. Tickets will be issued to those invited and none but ticket holders will be admitted to the Zoological Gardens. About half of those invited will receive a second ticket admitting them to the space in front of the pandal. The general public will be admitted to the Park outside the Zoological and Horticultural Gardens. The entrances to the Zoological Gardens will be closed at 4 p. m. by which hour all invited are requested to be in position. The Shan and Karenni Chiefs will be met at the Cemetery road gate by officers deputed for the purpose.

His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor will leave Government House at 4-15 p. m. with his personal staff and such of Their Royal Highnesses' Staff as are not required to accompany them. Their carriages will drive into the Park and His Honour will be met at the pandal by the President of the Rangoon Municipal Committee.

Their Royal Highnesses will leave Government House at 4-30 p. m. escorted by the Lieutenant-Governor's Military Police bodyguard and will proceed by Leeds Road, Halpin Road, Godwin Road, Stewart Road, Voyle Road, Simpson Road, Signal Pagoda Road, and Cemetery Road to the south-west gate of the Victoria Memorial Park. Having entered through the south-west gate and driven round the east side of the oval pond, Their Royal Highnesses' carriage will halt near the pandal in the open space by the east entrance of the Zoological Gardens and Their Royal Highnesses will be met by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor with his personal Staff and with the Chief Secretary to Government and by the Administrators. There will be a Guard-of-Honour of the Devonshire Regiment.

After the inspection of the Guard-of-Honour by His Royal Highness the Prince, a procession will be formed in the following order: The Chief Secretary to Government and the Lieutenant-Governor's personal Staff, the Staffs of Their Royal Highnesses, the Administrators, His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, Their Royal Highnesses. After Their Royal Highnesses have taken their seats on the dais, the Chairman of the Administrators, with the Prince of Wales' permission, will address Their Royal Highnesses on behalf of the Administrators, requesting them to declare the Park open. His Royal Highness will graciously reply and declare the Park open. At the conclusion of the speech Their Royal Highnesses will be conducted by the Administrators through the Zoological Gardens. In the course of their progress Their Royal Highnesses will stop at a pandal erected by Burmese ladies under the leadership of Mrs. Hla Oung.

Their Royal Highnesses will leave the Zoological Gardens by the south-eastern gate and having entered their carriages will drive round the oval pond and leave the Victoria Park by the North gate. His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor will leave five minutes after Their Royal Highnesses with his Staff and such of Their Royal Highnesses' Staff as have not accompanied Their Royal Highnesses. Other carriages may not proceed along Lake Road towards Pagoda Hill until Their Royal Highnesses have passed the foot of Pagoda Hill. Full dress will be worn. Gentlemen not entitled to wear uniform will appear in morning dress.

All the available tickets for admission to the opening of the Zoological Gardens have been issued. Those who have received tickets are requested to be in the gardens early where they will find seats provided all over the gardens. It is particularly requested that visitors will not move about during the inspection of the Gardens by Their Royal Highnesses. The gentlemen who have received special passes for the Reception enclosure will please pass into the enclosure, as soon after arriving as possible. No seats are provided in the enclosure and it has therefore been thought best to exclude ladies therefrom. It is particularly requested that all visitors will refrain from interfering with any of the animals, as with such a large concourse of people as is expected, any undue excitement should be avoided.

We have been asked to explain as there is some reason to believe that a misunderstanding exists as to admission to the Victoria Park on the occasion of its being opened on the 15th, that the Park is open to all desirous of being present, so long as they are on foot. It is only for the Zoological Gardens that tickets are required.

The Cathedral doors will be opened at 10-15 a. m. on Sunday. And it is hoped that all who attend the service will be in their places by 10-45. After 10-50 no carriages will be admitted to the compound till after the Royal cortège has passed. The service will be the Order for Morning Prayer with Sermon by the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of the Diocese. Papers, with psalms for the day, the words of the Anthem and the hymns, will be distributed in the church. The collection will be for the fund for completing the Queen Victoria Memorial Tower. All available seats have now been allotted and no further applications for tickets can be entertained. Tickets must be shown at the doors.

Rangoon Gazette.—At the Government House no pains have been spared in putting everything in ship-shape order. Their Royal Highnesses will see the museum in the Palace of the old Burmese Kings. There are not many statues, but the few there are of ex-Ministers and Generals are representative. The Palace spire is in course of erection. The general directions of the Archaeological Department are that the Palace building should be preserved, and in order to do this the Public Works Department have this year taken down the pythat over the Lion Throne with a view to replacing all rotten and broken timber. The work is in progress and will go on till the re-erection of the pythat is completed, which it is hoped will be done in March or April next. The work is on an elaborate scale and the Prince and Princess will no doubt find it of interest to inspect it. In the compound of Government House preparations are being made for the housing of the staff accompanying Their Royal Highnesses to this historic city.

Rangoon Gazette.—The day of days is at hand, and Rangoon which had been eagerly awaiting the event will have the opportunity of welcoming Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales. Since the memorable day on which the Royal visitors landed in Bombay, their progress through India has been marked by unqualified success. The Prince has passed through great cities, with intellectual and commercial activity in evidence on all sides; he has been in old-world capitals reminiscent of the Arabian Nights, where he has been the recipient of a catholic hospitality worthy of the traditions of his princely hosts. He has seen stately palaces, noble temples and mosques and the architectural glories that have made India a synonym for beauty and splendour. He has come into daily association with distinguished officials whose duty is to rule the country according to those principles of justice and righteousness which have made England the greatest among the nations and the British Constitution the pride of every British subject. He has met and conversed with non-officials, European and Indian, whose attainments and public spirit and services have been of the utmost value to the Government and the country. He has been greeted by vast and picturesque crowds whose instinctive orderliness has always been a surprise to the newcomer in India. Everywhere he has been received with genuine loyalty, cordiality and good feeling. And everywhere the Prince has deported himself with modesty and kingly tact. In the course of his brief utterances—models of what they should be—His Royal Highness has confessed that he has been deeply touched by the spontaneity of the feeling with which he has been welcomed by the Indian peoples. He is a shrewd observer and his tour through the Indian Empire will doubtless have brought to him lessons of much value. The superficial critic might look upon a Royal visit as more or less of a pleasure tour. To the thoughtful man the political significance of it is too great to be overlooked. For one thing it deepens loyalty and welds together disjointed members of the body politic. The Prince's tour in Australia and Canada was doubtless pleasant and profitable, but there he was among his own countrymen. Here are numerous races speaking numerous languages. Here are millions who believed in the power of the King to do them good. Here are millions whose hopes are to be encouraged, whose hearts are to be touched, whose prejudices are to be tolerated, and whose wants are to be supplied. The Prince stands for the idea of Sovereignty ingrained in the Eastern mind. "Viceroys may come and go, but the Sovereign remains," very aptly observed The Times the other day. And amid all the sectional squabble and differences of Indian politics, the personal respect and affection for the Throne remains unaltered.

To the Burman, the youngest and in some respect the most interesting member of the Indian family, the visit of Their Royal Highnesses has almost a sacred aspect. It is not so long since he had a king of his own, and he has always held even the most tyrannical and barbarous kings in special reverence. The Burmese have been quick to appreciate the changes introduced by the new régime and in some remote fashion connect them with the Sovereign beyond the seas. And that Sovereign's son and the Princess of Wales are coming among them, and will they not rejoice? They say their eyes will be made glad by the sight of the Royal faces and they will speak in after years to their children's children of how the King's son crossed many waters to see them, how he went about the land and left behind him the most kindly memories. We are sure that Burma's welcome to Their Royal Highnesses will prove a happy experience both to the Royal visitors and to the people.

12TH JANUARY 1906.

Civil and Military Gazette.—Madras for the rest of the month will be the scene of a large military camp in connection with the Prince of Wales's visit. The Fort glais is already occupied by half a squadron of Gordon's Horse. A second half-squadron will come down from Bangalore immediately and will remain in camp till February 12th. Lieutenant-General Sir Charles Egerton and staff will occupy a camp by the fort glais from the 22nd instant, and the 6th Battery, R. F. A., will come in from St. Thomas's Mount and camp in Madras during the days of the Prince's visit.

Englishman.—The following address was forwarded to the Prince of Wales by the Royal Army Temperance Association:—
To His Royal Highness George Fredrick Ernest Albert, Prince of Wales.

May it please Your Royal Highness—The Council and Members of the Royal Army Temperance Association in India desire to convey to Your Royal Highness the cordial expression of their loyalty to the King-Emperor, and their earnest hope that the visit of Your Royal Highness to the country in which they are serving their King may be fraught with pleasure to yourself and Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, and with lasting benefit to His Majesty's subjects.

The Royal Army Temperance Association was founded in India in 1862. It has gradually increased in numbers and influence, and at the present time nearly 24,000 members are enrolled. The Association ventures to claim that it has contributed, in no small degree, not only to the health and good conduct of the Army, but to that uniform and praiseworthy standard of temperance which characterises the whole British Force in India.

The Association has received the sympathy and active support of successive Commander-in-Chief, and of the Army and Regimental authorities.

It is however evident that an organization which exists for the purposes which the Royal Army Temperance Association have ever had in view cannot expect to attain to a realization of its aims without the loyal assistance of those ranks of the Army for whose welfare its labours are primarily undertaken. The present flourishing condition of the Association is not only a proof of the earnestness and cordiality with which it has been welcomed by successive generations of non-commissioned officers and men who have enrolled themselves as members or have held office under the Association, but affords ever-increasing evidence of the steady growth of those virtues of self-denial, which it has been the constant aim of the Association to foster in the British Army.

The work originally commenced in India has been extended to England and the Colonies, where the membership is annually showing a gratifying increase.

The title of "Royal" which was granted by His Majesty the King-Emperor, and, more recently the patronage which His Majesty has graciously bestowed upon the Association, are honours which are deeply appreciated by the members whose desire it is at all times to uphold the name of the British Army in India in a manner worthy of its glorious traditions in the past.

The Council and Members of the Association avail themselves of the opportunity of the visit of Your Royal Highness to India to ask Your Royal Highness graciously to express to His Majesty their humble appreciation of his personal interest in their work, and their sense of the signal honours which he has conferred upon his Association—

The following is the Prince's reply:—

Lord Kitchener and Members of the Army Temperance Association in India—

I heartily thank you for your address, which I have received and for the sentiments of loyalty to the King-Emperor and the kind wishes for the Princess of Wales and myself to which it gives expression. In communicating its contents to His Majesty, your Patron, I will not fail to call attention to the gradual but steady increase in the work of the Association since its foundation in India more than forty years ago.

As the Address truly says, the King is personally interested in the Association. And I know that he will rejoice to learn that, while it continues to enjoy the sympathy and active support of Your Excellency, as it did of your predecessors and of the Army and Regimental authorities, the non-commissioned officers and men who enrol themselves as members are doing their best to carry out and promote the principles of self-denial which are inculcated by the Association. It is by giving practical effect to these principles that the Association justly claims to have contributed in no small degree not only to the health and good conduct of the Army, but to the uniform standard of temperance which to-day characterises the British Army in India. Such benign influences not only raise the whole moral tone of the army but through them the individual soldier gains in self-respect, becomes a better citizen, and establishes for himself a position to gain the esteem and confidence of the employers of labour.

It is my earnest hope that the ranks of this admirable organization may be more and more reinforced, and its good influence extended to every part of the Empire where the King's uniform is worn.

Indian Daily News.—We publish, in our correspondence columns, a letter from Colonel W. E. Peyton, Commanding the XV King's Hussars, giving the balance sheet of the recent military display by his regiment on the Calcutta race-course. The total receipts from sale of tickets amounted to Rs. 3,312 and after paying expenses, prizes, etc., Colonel Peyton has been able to set apart Rs. 300 for the Muttra Family Hospital, and to hand over to His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal Rs. 1,500 in aid of the local charities. The generosity of the XV Hussars will not be forgotten by Calcutta, and the only regret on all sides is that the city has not had any opportunity of giving the regiment some tangible expression of her gratitude. If, however, the friendship and goodwill of a community count for aught, then indeed, is the scale weighed down with a full measure of them. We take this opportunity of bidding the regiment farewell and of wishing them all good luck!

With reference to the above paragraph concerning the XV Hussars Military display, the following press communiqué has been issued:—"The Lieutenant-Governor has received from Colonel W. E. Peyton, D.S.O., Commanding the XV Hussars, the sum of Rs. 1,500 for distribution among local charities, which amount represents the surplus proceeds of the Military display given by the regiment on the 9th and 10th instant. His Honour has accordingly distributed sums of Rs. 500 to each of the following charities:—"Calcutta Branch Soldiers' and Sailors' Family Association; the Seamen's Mission (Clyde Row); and the School for Poor Children and Orphans, in connection with the Dent Mission."

It was a kind and graceful act of His Royal Highness to send for Mr. Cable, and tapping him on the shoulder with his sword to say "Rise Sir Ernest," and the compliment has been much appreciated by the mercantile community.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—It is gratifying to note that though the Royal visit to Lucknow is so successfully over, it has left blissful marks behind. Hundreds of poor, who would have otherwise passed a very miserable cold weather, are now warmly praying for their Prince and Princess' long life and prosperity. We join the Rev. Mr. Oldham in thanking all those who have subscribed to this fund, and we are all the more indebted to such English gentlemen as one who subscribed more than Rs. 1,200, whose name, though to remain in the dark in this world, will glitter with double lustre in the next. Also Messrs. Ross Scott, Saunders Butler, Hose and others the greater portion of whose subscription has come to the Indian poor. Our grateful thanks are also due to His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor and Mr. Tyler, Private Secretary, who took great interest in the movement and were so good, as becomes kind-hearted persons, to attend the place of distribution of charities, which not only popularised the movement but encouraged and satisfied the poor. To distribute blankets and cash to deserving pardah nashin women was the most important and difficult task and we are very grateful to Nawab Mirza Mehdi Husain Khan Aga Abus Sahib who rendered the task an easy one.

Thanking all once again, not forgetting you, Mr. Editor, who helped us in every possible way, and Messrs. Hamid Ali Khan and Mirza Habib Husain whose valuable co-operation has had a very great share in the success of the entire scheme.

SYED MAHOMED JAWAD,
PUNDIT SHAM NARAIN.

Daily Telegraph.—A cordial letter of appreciation of the services of the Calcutta Police during the Royal visit has been written to the Commissioner of Police here by Sir Walter Lawrence on behalf of His Royal Highness, and silver Victorian Medals have been presented to Superintendent Haultain and Inspector Hanson, while Inspector Benode Kumar Gupta has received a special medal. The Prince has presented Rs. 1,500 to the Cathedral charities here.

Madras Mail.—On the occasion of the recent visit of the Prince and Princess to Jammu, Mr. Burroughs, the State Bandmaster, was accorded the honour of a private audience with His Royal Highness, who desired to know on what system native musicians were trained, and was considerably surprised to know that natives learnt music in the same way as Europeans. The Prince, who takes the greatest interest in music, spoke in the highest terms of the playing of some of the Native Bands he had heard. His Royal Highness presented Mr. Burroughs with a handsome souvenir in token of his appreciation of the music afforded by the State Band. A Sunday programme was played quite privately for His Highness and the Maharajah. The State Band is composed entirely of Dogras, and, with one exception, no outsiders are enlisted.

We have received a detailed synopsis of the arrangements on shore on the occasion of the arrival of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales. These are the same, with slight modifications, as the preliminary programmes already published. It gives detailed instructions, however, regarding admission to the Pavilion and seating arrangements, etc. We presume that copies of this synopsis will be supplied to all ticket-holders attending the Reception.

There will be a rehearsal of the Royal procession on the morning of the 20th instant.

Besides the Maharajah of Travancore and the Rajah of Cochin (the latter of whom arrives on the 13th instant and not the 18th), the following among others will arrive in Madras before the end of next week in connection with the Royal visit:—The Rajah of Venkatagiri, the Maharajah of Bobbili, the Rajahs of Kalahasti and Karvetnagar, the Maharajah of Jeypore and the Rajah of Vizianagaram. The Zemindar of Udayarpolliem has already arrived in Madras.

His Highness the Rajah of Cochin pays a visit to His Excellency the Governor on the 15th instant, the visit being returned by His Excellency the same evening. His Highness the Maharajah of Travancore visits His Excellency on the 22nd instant, the return visit by the Governor being made the same evening.

Mr. Hugo V. Pedersen, the Danish artist, already well-known in India, is engaged in getting together materials for a big picture which he has been commissioned to paint, of the ceremony of the laying of the foundation-stone of the Victoria Memorial Hall. Mr. Pedersen is also painting a large picture of the Royal Procession on the night of the illuminations. The artist is shortly going back to Copenhagen to work on these pictures, and expects that it will take him nearly two years to complete them.

Rangoon Gazette.—We understand that when Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales come into the pandal from the Sule Pagoda Wharf, all present should rise and remain standing until Their Royal Highnesses have seated themselves. All present will rise whenever Their Royal Highnesses rise.

The rehearsal of the Royal procession held on Saturday morning of last week revealed several points in which the arrangements were susceptible of improvement. By that time, in any case, preparations were not sufficiently advanced for the rehearsal to be made a real test; and it was decided to hold another rehearsal yesterday. On the men falling in it was announced that the procession would take place one hour later than had been arranged. The Lieutenant-Governor, with Staff, Lady White, and the Government House party arrived about half-past eight. There was a full attendance of the Reception Committee and all others responsible for the details of the reception. The military arrangements, including the reception on the wharf by a guard-of-honour of 100 men of the Devons and the lining of the streets, were the same as on Saturday. His Honour with Sir Harvey Adamson, the Chairman of the Municipality, the Chairman of the Port Commissioners and other officials spent about an hour on Sule Pagoda Wharf. A very thorough rehearsal of the proceedings that will be observed on Saturday took place. One of the Lieutenant-Governor's staff was deputed to represent the august visitor, and for that purpose proceeded on to, and disembarked from, the launch Togo that was lying at the pontoon. Sir Harvey Adamson's and U. Shwe Waing's addresses were delivered and all the other procedure was carried through. Discussion of the scheme of the pandal was also held. The procession started at half-past nine, consisting of the principal carriage and other carriages, the Mounted Company, R.V.R., escort under Captain MacDonald, Military Police, men of the Lieutenant-Governor's body-guard, and British Civil Police under Mr. McDonnell, Commissioner of Police, who headed the procession. A considerably shorter time was taken over the route than on Saturday. Short stops were made at the pandals. A large number of spectators had assembled in the streets, and a number also in the pandals. The children's stands in Canal Street were completely filled by fourteen thousands of brightly dressed children. The sight that met the procession here as it turned out of Latter Street was a striking and beautiful one in the extreme, and will probably impress the Royal visitors with as much pleasure as that inspired by any other incident of their tour in India. The behaviour of the children was admirable, the band of the 91st Punjabis was stationed in Godwin Road just turning out of Canal Street, and played the national anthem as the principal carriage approached. The procession, proceeding in front of the Race Stand, then along Godwin Road, and Leeds Road, was received by a guard-of-honour of the 80th Punjabis at Government House, and disbanded immediately on arrival there. The Lieutenant-Governor expressed to Captain MacDonald his satisfaction at the performance of the escort work.

The Shan camp which has been arranged on Prome Road for the visitors from the Southern Shan States, was inspected by the Lieutenant-Governor on Wednesday evening, when Lady White and a large party from Government House and a number of officials and non-officials went to the camp and were introduced to the Shan notables by Mr. B. S. Carey, C.I.E., and Mr. C. E. Brown, the officers who have come here in charge of the arrangements. In all, the Shans who have come to Rangoon for the Royal visit number about five hundred. There are eleven chiefs, of whom ten had arrived on Wednesday, Sawlawi, the Sawbwa of Gantarawadi, having been delayed on his journey and not coming in till later. The ten chiefs present were the Sawbwa of Kengtung, who has had to undertake a journey of forty days from his capital, the Sawbwa of Yawnglwe, the Sawbwa of Lawksak, the Sawbwa of Laikha, the Sawbwa of Mong Pawn, the Myosa of Samka, the Myosa of Loilong, the Myosa of Kyebogyi and the Myosa of Pwehla. They are all accompanied by their wives and families. Two of the lady visitors are the half-sisters of the Sawbwa of Kengtung. One, Sao Nang Wen Tip, is the wife of the ruler of the Chinese State of Kenglung, and as a foreign Princess she takes precedence over the others. Her journey to Rangoon has occupied her for more than fifty days. She is well-known throughout Burma, the Shan States, Siam and Southern China as an extremely able business woman and her commercial transactions would do no discredit in variety and extent to an important European firm. Her sister Sao Nang Tip Htila, the only lady who rode in the great elephant procession at the Delhi Durbar, is also well-known as very shrewd and capable in business; she at present is ruling the State of Kengkham, until her son, Sao Hak, the Myosa, a promising lad now at the Chiefs' School at Taunggyi, comes of age. Sao Nang Tip Htila, it will be remembered, lost all her jewels in the Hooghly when on her way to Delhi, but those who met her shortly afterwards at the Shan Durbar Camp tell how lightly she treated the matter in comparison with the fact that, as she said, "she had shaken hands with the King's brother," i.e., the Duke of Connaught, the memory of whose kindness, graciousness and cordiality is treasured by the Shans.

Each Chief has with him an official of his State, a number of umbrella-bearers and followers, all interesting as illustrating the diversity of races inhabiting the Southern States. Besides these, some sixty-eight men and women from the little-known races in remoter districts have come down. Ten or a dozen Yanglam have come from beyond Mone with their band, the instruments fashioned out of green bamboo and very pleasant to hear. A few Yangwan Kuns have come from Laikha, they and the Yanglam speaking a language which is neither Shan, Karen nor Taungthu. The Yanglam women have round the waists of their dark blue skirts coils of bamboo and their legs gartered below the knee with similar coils. There are Kaws and Mubsoz from far off Kengtung and a number of Was (not the Wild variety). The Karens are well represented. Ten or more Red Karens are here with their red garments, the rising sun tattooed between their shoulders, their ropes of beads and other massive necklaces and their numerous garters of rattan. There are a few Bres from the hills of Kyebogyi and Bawlake, and four Padaung women, the latter wearing each a huge neckband of brass, suggesting, at least in the present extreme heat of Rangoon, the maximum of discomfort. There are quite a number of Zerjein Karens from Lwelong State, a dying race due to the rigid limitations of marriage to near relations only, amongst these visitors being representatives from Banyin, Banyok, Lwelong, Bawpan and Bampa, all wearing solid brass ornaments bead-necklaces, and in the case of the men, boar's tusks, the various sub-tribes apparently being distinguishable by the angle at which the tusks are arranged around the neck; the women wearing most elaborate head-dresses around to silver band. Besides these the better known tribes, the Taungthus and the Taungyos, are represented the former widely-dispersed over Indo China and the Taungyos fairly numerous throughout the Southern Myelat. From this brief sketch it will be seen that Mr. Carey has succeeded in bringing to Rangoon a very representative collection of the races under his charge. The European visitors on Wednesday were delighted with the entertainment got up for their benefit. The vast majority of them had never had the opportunity of seeing anything of these races and it was a revelation to them to meet, on the one hand, chiefs and their relatives, perfect hosts and hostesses, clad in most rich and tasteful costumes, and, on the other, wild men and women many of whom had never seen a white face before undertaking their present journey. At the Garden Party on Monday the Padaungs, the Yanglam and all the other wild tribes will be present.

All carriages arriving at the Race Stand must, after depositing their fare, take up a position on the Church Maidan east, or opposite the Police Station. After the procession, all proceeding to town must go via Stewart Road. All ticket-holders must be in their seats by 8 A.M. to-morrow. Tickets must be shown at the gate and will be collected at their respective blocks. On the maidan opposite the stand there will be Zat pws and Anyein pws, nautes, merry-go-rounds and greasy poles and other side shows. The whole of the maidan will be thrown open to the general public, free of charge, except the stands and enclosures which will be by tickets. Pws will begin early to-morrow. The procession can be seen from the maidan when passing in front of the stands.

Everything is now practically complete at Dalhousie Park for the illuminations and nothing has been left undone to secure for Monday night the honour of being the popular fête of the Royal visit. It is estimated that from 150,000 to 200,000 people will be present, but judging from the large numbers of persons who are daily flocking into Rangoon, that estimate will, we think, be very largely exceeded.

The Chief Collector of Customs has very kindly placed the verandahs and terrace of the Customs house at the disposal of the subordinates of the Customs service and their friends to view the Royal procession.

H.M.S. Hyacinth was signalled from Elephant Point at 1.30 p.m. yesterday. She rounded to at the Hastings, having come up on the flood tide, at 4.25. As she approached the Hastings she was passed by the Port Trust twin-screw launch Ahlon and acknowledged her salute, and shortly after by the B.I.S.N. Cos. Zaida, both on their way down the river. She proceeded, after receiving the Harbour-Master, to her moorings nearly opposite Barr Street, which she reached shortly before half-past five, acknowledging the salutes of all the merchant shipping. The Hyacinth, Pox, and Perseus will be at moorings in line down from opposite Sule Pagoda Wharf. The Terrible, which will be one of the longest vessels that has visited the port, will lie below the Renown below the Hastings.

The Hsipaw Sawbwa has arrived in Mandalay to meet the Prince and Princess of Wales. The Amatchoke of South Hsenwi and the chief of Mainglun have also come. Mr. D. G. Robertson is in charge till the arrival of Mr. B. S. Carey from Rangoon.

The Intha oarsmen from Inle Lake, Yawnghe State, have arrive for the Regatta. They number 100 in all and bring with them four boats, two racing boats with crews of thirty men each, in which they will try conclusions with picked Burmese crews, and two barges, one with a gorgeous pythat over it and the other fashioned in the shape of the sacred "hintha." It will be interesting to observe whether the Burmese boats propelled by the short Burmese paddle will be able to hold their own against the powerful Inthas and their leg-propelled oars.

A Mandalay correspondent writes on Wednesday: Yesterday morning the troops in garrison paraded to rehearse the lining of the streets and other duties connected with the arrival of the Prince and Princess of Wales. There was a large crowd of spectators. A goodly number of volunteers who wished to take part in the guard-of-honour, attended the Volunteer Hall yesterday morning for practice. The police arrangements will be on an elaborate scale. Mr. Roberts, Assistant Superintendent, Myingyan, and Mr. Murray, Assistant Superintendent, Maymyo, have been detailed for duty here under the orders of Colonel Peile. Some temporary structures are being erected in the vacant ground in the neighbourhood of the Court house, for the accommodation of the Shan Sawbwaws and their retinue. Some twenty or more telegraph signallers are coming from India to help in coping with the extra telegraphic work during the Royal visit. To make matters easier for the military signallers, the Sub-Assistant Superintendent of Telegraphs has arranged to have tents pitched for them in the compound of the local Telegraph Office. The press representatives are to reside at Salween House, and the Telegraph authorities have arranged to open a telegraph office in the compound of his establishment. There will be no over-crowding at the reception pandal, admission to which will be by ticket. There will be some 600 seats available for the non-official public. Accommodation for the school children is provided behind the Victoria Memorial Church. The snipe shooting round Singaing is reserved for His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and party. Gentlemen are requested to abstain from shooting in that neighbourhood up to January 20th.

Times of India.—Two separate herds of wild elephants are being encircled in the Mysore forests in view of the Royal visit. It was determined to drive the smaller herd of the two into the stockade by way of rehearsing the larger drive fixed for February 1st. The Maharaja of Mysore and a large party motored out to the kheddahs for this purpose and a most successful drive was the result. The operation lasted from about 9 A.M. to 4 P.M., and it took the Kuruba coolies, who are a jungle tribe of the locality, all they knew of their pandemonium of noises to move the herd along to the point of entering the stockade. Once the herd broke back on them badly, but they mostly kept their ground and urged the terrified pack forward again. The leading tuskers finally dashed into the stockade gate all unwary of the concealed trap and then the rest pushed in after him pell-mell, like a flock of sheep through a gap in a hedge.

The herd, among which were a few calves scarcely four feet high, almost completely filled the stockade. After some little time the trained elephants from Dacca, or kumkis as they are known, entered the stockade and hobbled the wild ones with Manila ropes and hawsers and took them out one by one, amidst the uproarious trumpetings of the cows and calves, to water at the adjacent stream preparatory to lashing them to great teak stumps till they are subdued by sugarcane and thirst. In the larger drive, a unique treat is in store for Their Royal Highnesses, for this is a class of sport offered to them nowhere else in their Imperial tour.

The silver casket which is to be presented to Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales by the Municipality in the name of the citizens of Bangalore, is now nearing completion at the hands of Messrs. Barton, Son & Co. In design it is box-shaped. The obverse which is double-panelled, shows views of the new public buildings adjoining the Mayo Hall, and a charming view of the Ulsoor Lake. Between the panels the Prince of Wales' feathers are set in relief. At either end there are chased types of Indian temples, palms and elephants. The reverse is a single panel showing types of the British and Indian Army taken from a special photograph, the work being of the embossed order. The casket is fourteen inches by ten and a-half in height and the lid is of a chased scroll design, surmounted by His Royal Highness's crest. The casket stands on a floral base into which the Municipal crest is worked and this again rests on an ebonised plinth which is to bear the inscription.

13TH JANUARY 1906.

Civil and Military Gazette.—H.M.S. Hyacinth with Rear-Admiral Pox arrived in the harbour last evening and, after acknowledging salutes of all the merchant shipping, took up her position not far from the Sule Pagoda Wharf, where the Royal reception takes place to-morrow morning.

Indian Daily News.—The Renown with the Prince and Princess of Wales aboard, anchors below Hastings Bar at sunset this evening, and Their Royal Highnesses land at Rangoon to-morrow morning.

Here we strike ground entirely new to most of those who accompany the Prince and Princess on the grand tour throughout the Indian Empire. To the visit to Burma we have been looking forward with the most pleasurable anticipations, and we have had a most enjoyable preparation for what is expected to be a deeply interesting and memorable experience. The voyage hither from Calcutta has been one of the most delightful. The Jelunga dropped slowly down the Hooghly on Tuesday, giving us in her decks crowded with Burmese and orange-robed Buddhist priests and monks, our first glimpse of the colours of Further India. A Shan Princess and her attendants cast a radiance of rich yellow and silver silks about them and gave the required touch of distinction to a cruise in such waters, and at such a time. As the Jelunga left her moorings in the morning the Indian Marine Ship Guide, newly painted white, and bright with flowers, passed to take Their Royal Highnesses aboard at Budge Budge. She was followed by the Fraser conveying members of the Royal suite. In the afternoon, when Diamond Harbour was reached, the Renown attended by the Perseus, was found waiting for the Guide, the men streaming up astern of the British India boats. The two war-ships were dressed in rainbow fashion, and farther away lay the Terrible.

The voyage has been without any other incident, and we have sailed on through summer seas shadowed only by the clouds of the early morning, quickly dissipated by the fresh breeze which blows. The sun sets and the moon rises in full orb splendour, and we sail on until at last we enter the fresh water, fringed by green and golden lands. Straight out of the haze ahead shimmers the gold of the Shwe Dagon, and as the sun rises higher and the ship reduces the distance, the neck of the great pagoda flashes as though encircled by a collar of diamonds glittering, magnificent while it lasts, and is gone as the angle of view changes, but the gigantic mass of gold shaped like a handbell remains to astound the more as its proportions are more clearly seen. This is the outstanding feature of the view which will greet the Prince and Princess as they enter Rangoon to-morrow morning. To Their Royal Highnesses the voyage across the Bay of Bengal must have been not only a delightful experience but of the greatest benefit after the fatigues of the tour which is now half-completed. The new scenes now to be revealed to them will be viewed with the greater interest and appreciation because of the break in the succession of varied impressions that the voyage from Calcutta to Rangoon has afforded. To Burma, the Royal visit has the historic significance that the visit of the King-Emperor to India had thirty years ago. It is exactly twenty years since Upper Burma was annexed. The proclamation announcing the fact was published on January 1st, 1886, and the country is now for the first time visited by the Heir-Apparent to the Imperial Throne of Great Britain. It is not without interest to observe that almost twenty years have elapsed between the mutiny and the tour of the King-Emperor as Prince of Wales in India. Since Upper Burma was annexed the country has made great advances, but it is yet only in the beginning of its development, its great natural resources, and the great wealth and trade which lie beyond its Chinese border, waiting to be conducted along their natural channels, still require to be tapped. Something is now being done in pushing forward schemes for more railways in Burma, and though Lord Curzon pronounced against the project for carrying forward the railway from Bhamo to Yunnan, the hope that this idea will one day be realised has not been abandoned. For the first time since King Theebaw was exiled to Ratnagiri, the Burmese have now the privilege of erecting the seven-roofed arches of Royal pagodas for the reception of an Imperial personage. Since 1885 these seven-roofed triumphal arches have been put up to welcome Viceroy, Lord Dufferin having been the first to be honoured in this way. There has been some anxiety lest rain should come and spoil the decorations which have been erected, but as one writes, the prospect of rain has disappeared and the weather is hot.

Rangoon is hung with garlands, but the dominant features of the decorations for to-morrow's Royal arrival are the pandals and arches which adorn the route of the procession. There are fifteen of them, and the Rangoon crowd of laughing Burmese, Chinese and staid Indians is in the streets to-night admiring the gorgeous structures typical in design of the varied styles of Eastern architecture which have sprung up across the roads. The first of the pandals is a great typical Burmese pythat, covered with gold paper, pierced in the Burmese filigree or lace pattern, the central spire being designed in characteristic Burmese taste, with its succession of curly eaved roofs, surrounded by eight smaller towers. The pandals are hung with fine painting of Burmese subjects, depicted in the manner of a clever Japanese or Chinese artist. Close by this golden structure is a fine representation of a mosque in the best style of Moslem architecture erected by the Mahomedans of the city. The Madrassi Hindus are represented by a large shamiana, the gateways of which are a scenic reproduction of the Golden temple of Madura, covered with pictures of the deities of the Hindu pantheon and with representations of Vedic story. Another Hindu pandal represents a Southern India structure also covered with figures. The Persian community of Rangoon has erected a castellated structure showing a clock tower. And a fine set of Moorish arches is the contributions of the Surati Bara Bazar Company, the shamiana having space for twelve hundred of the Surati community. The Khojas are represented by a pandal of Mahomedan design and the Chittagong Mussalmans resident in Rangoon have erected a reproduction of a court in the Alcazar of Seville, a bit of Moorish architecture, which has for near neighbour a touch of the extreme Orient. This is a Chinese pandal of elaborate design, the work of the Popien or long coat Chinese. After the Burmese, the Chinese is the most striking piece of the whole decoration. It represents a Royal entrance or halting gate, such as royalty made use of as a halting-place by the Chinese Emperors and Princes when on their travels. It is covered with by Chinese devices of strange animals and birds figured in coloured papers and mica panels with the willow pattern in relief vary the design of the front and other panels reproduce Chinese buildings in mass. The whole face of the pandal makes up a design of three towers, the centre one having a clock painted upon it with the Royal arms over all, the Lion and the Unicorn being creatures of stuffed and painted buckram. Another Chinese pandal, less ornate than the first, has been erected by the Cantonese or short-coated community. It is designed after the Hone Kow arch, where the Emperor's Hoan Kow Tsaw and Oaw Hong Kee had an historic meeting. The Royal Dragons guard the entrance and beneath the arches miniature theatres are hung with five sets of working marionettes representing historical and other scenes.

Madras Mail.—It was meet that, on their last day in Bengal, Their Royal Highnesses should be brought into this intimate contact with the mighty river which carries the life-blood of the Province. For Mother Gunga with her principal outlet, the Hughli, is one of those waterways like the Elbe, the Rhine and the Yang-tse-kiang, destined by Nature to be the theatre of a crowded population and an ever-increasing trade. And the Prince and Princess were able to view it in all its aspects. The pleasant sylvan riverine scenery of Barrackpore, which is fast being eaten away by the industrial development of Calcutta; the mills and factories which blacken the air with their foul emanations but bring gold by the crore to Bengal and reduce each year, in larger measure, the dependence of her people on the soil; Garden Reach, where the wealthy Society of the metropolis takes the air of evenings; the humming docks and jetties always crying out for more room; the panting steamers sweeping down with the tide, bearing the spoils of her world-wide trade, and the Sunderbunds of malarious repute—all these characteristics of the Hughli passed slowly in review before the Prince and Princess and, with his sailor's eye for maritime details, His Royal Highness was the keenest of observers.

Why does not some genius tell the tale of the Hughli as Mark Twain wrote of the Mississippi in "The Mississippi Pilot," of its everchanging channels and shifting sandbanks, of its bars and shoals, which, as in the case of the "James and Mary", mean no more than three minutes of life to the vessel meeting its embrace and butting against the terrific force of the tide; of the Survey Staff, which watches the moving waterway as intently as ever astronomer studied the heavens, and of the Pilot Service which yields to its chief members the salary of a Commissioner of a Division—a Survey and Pilotage, so thorough and so exact, that Calcutta is as free from accidents as any port of its size in the world? Now the bars and shoals are to be tackled more scientifically, and a new dredge, sucking up a thousand tons of sand in the hour is to prove what can be accomplished in the permanent improvement of the Channel. Why does not some one write also of its romantic history and of the men who came up with Job Charnock, when, casting his eyes over the dreary mud flats, he marked the down as the site of the future Capital of India? It needed a prophetic soul.

to discern the potentialities of a metropolis in that reeking plain.

The voyage to Burma was through a leaden, lifeless sea, and under a dull, grey sky. It was made, indeed, in weather conditions which seemed to foreshadow an early change if not a storm. The pleasant coolness of Calcutta was soon left behind. Stickier and yet more sticky it grew, until, when the Renown anchored below the Hastings Shoal last night, the atmosphere must have reminded Their Royal Highnesses of those steamy days in Bombay which welcomed them to India.

From the anchorage, the Shwe Dagon Pagoda flamed against the horizon, its heavily plated tree and bulbous pinnacle glistening like a lesser yellow sun. But when, on landing early this morning, Their Royal Highnesses lost sight of the Pagoda, they must have wondered if they were really in Burma or even in the East. For, laid out on the American chessboard plan, Rangoon has many of the characteristics of the Western township. Each good building alternates with hovels. Although a city of infinite promise it is one of the most featureless and unprepossessing of achievements.

This is Burma without the Burmans. The soldiers are British or Indian and the Police, Sikhs. The coolies come from Madras or Calcutta and the street hawkers are Bengalis, Musalmans or Chinese. The driver, who rattles you to the hotel in a matchbox on wheels drawn by a fat, hails from the North-East and you are received by a Goanese butler and shown to your room by a Madrassi bearer. If you would shop, you must drive over roads made and cleansed by Indian labour to English, Italian, Hindoo or Chinese stores. If you would do business, there are British and German Banks and Houses, Madras Chetties and Chinese money-lenders. At the station, a Eurasian Superintendent bids Indian coolies entrain your luggage and Uryah servants will minister to you at the stopping places. There is room for everyone except the Burman, and he is the scarcest commodity in Rangoon. Go to the Shwe Dagon Pagoda, and there you find him engaged in cheerful worships clad in spotless white and pink, and scores of dainty maidens too, kneeling in the outer row and holding their offerings of flowers and tapers in graceful devotion. But even the Shwe Dagon Pagoda is swept by Indian bhangis and painted by Indian labour, whilst the twang of the hawker vending iced lemonade is unmistakably Bengal.

The more southern of the two large coasting cargo sheds, south of the old iron screw pier, in the Harbour premises, is just now full of preparations for the reception of Their Royal Highnesses. From the centre of the shed, seawards, projects the Port Trust's new export jetty, a pier about 100 yards long and 12 wide. This has all been roofed over with a lofty pandal roof, which, however, still lacks its final decoration and is more or less in the skeleton stage. At the sea end of the jetty will be erected a flagstaff to carry the identical Royal Standard which, just 30 years ago, waved over His Most Gracious Majesty King Edward, then Prince of Wales. The old flag has been unearthed by the Port officials, properly identified, and is again to be pressed into duty. At the south side of the jetty, about one-third of the way in from the end of it, is a substantial gangway and stairs, at which the Royal launch will land the Prince and Princess.

Between the base of the jetty and the cargo shed is an enormous pandal of ample height and proportion, and at the inner end of this is a dais, 3 feet high, approached by a broad flight of steps, on which the Royal party and Their Excellencies will stand during the presentation of its Address by the City of Madras. This dais is approached from the pier by a wide pathway, flanking which on both sides is seating—borrowed from the Senate House—for 1,000 or 1,200 people. About two-thirds of the invitations for seats in this pandal are being issued by the Chief Secretary to Government, to Ruling Chiefs, Zemindars, and officials for the most part, with their friends and families. The remaining one-third of the invitations, chiefly for merchants and non-officials, are being issued by the Chairman of the Port Trust. The former class of invitees are, we believe, being asked to return any tickets they do not propose to utilise, so that some of those necessarily excluded at first for want of room may be admitted. The latter class of invitees have been asked by reply postcard to say before the 14th whether or not they propose to avail themselves of the seats provisionally allotted to them, and have been told that failure to reply will be accepted as a reply in the negative, as there are many more applicants than can be given places.

Tickets are white, red, or blue. White tickets are issued to those who will take part in the Royal Procession as well as to those officially present, such as the Corporation of Madras and the Port Trustees. Red tickets are for seats grouped north of the central aisle, and blue tickets for those grouped south of the central aisle of the pavilion or pandal. With each group of tickets there is being issued a "detailed synopsis of arrangements" with places, showing inter alia the arrangement and numbering of seats. The seats are in four blocks, numbered I to IV, and in each of these are 14 rows of seats marked A to N, each row containing 18 to 20 seats, all numbered.

As the exact hour of the landing of the Royal party cannot be easily known for certain long in advance, the Port Trust proposes to allot space on which refreshment contractors, e.g., M. D. Angelis, might perhaps find it worth their while to have tables with suitable morning refreshments, tea, coffee scones, etc., on payment of cash. Indeed, in so large and varied a crowd indiscriminate signing of "chits" would probably not suit the caterers. While waiting for their carriages visitors will be able to stand beneath the shade of the shed along a front of about 60 yards, which ought to allow of ten or twelve carriages being brought up simultaneously. If only the Police can induce coachmen to call out the names of their masters, there ought not to be overmuch delay in getting away.

The chief praise for the arrangements of the pandal, etc., as so far made, must be allotted to Commander Baugh, R.I.M., the Deputy Port Conservator, to whom they have been made over by the Chairman of the Port Trust. Everything promises to pass off exceedingly well on the day of the Royal landing. Very elaborate and detailed arrangements have had to be made to ensure the prompt landing and despatch to Government House of the luggage of the Royal party—in itself a heavy item—so that it may not clash with the Procession.

The following are details of dress to be worn by Military Officers during the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales to Madras:—At the public arrival, on the 24th instant, at 8-30 A.M., Review order white; laying the foundation stone of the Victoria Technical Institute, undress white; State Banquet, 8 P.M., full dress, cloth; Lèvee, 9-45 P.M., full dress, cloth; at the Reception, 26th January, 9-45 P.M., Mess dress, cloth; at the Garden Party, 27th January, 5 P.M., undress, white (without swords).

Mr. O. R. Jones, the Commissioner of Police, Madras, has issued an elaborate set of rules for the guidance of the Madras City Police during the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales. The rules cover every function in which Their Royal Highnesses take part from the 24th to the 28th instant.

Pioneer.—The final rehearsal of the Royal procession was held to-day, and the decorations in the streets leading along the route to Government House being complete, all Rangoon is ready to welcome the Prince and Princess in a manner worthy of the occasion.

The Shan camp which has been arranged in Rangoon for visitors from the Southern Shan States was inspected by the Lieutenant-Governor in the evening when Lady White and a large party from Government House and a number of officials and non-officials went to the camp and were introduced to the Shan notables by Messrs. B. S. Carey, C.I.E., and C. E. Brown, the officers who have come in charge of this very representative collection of races. In all, the Shans who have come to Rangoon for the Royal visit number about five hundred. Among the Chiefs present are the Sawbwa of Kengtung, who has had to undertake a journey of forty days from his capital, the Sawbwa of Yawnghwe, the Sawbwa of Lawksak, the Sawbwa of Laikha, the Sawbwa of Mong Pawn, the Myosa of Samka, the Myosa of Loilong, the Myosa of Kyebogyi and the Myosa of Pwehla. They are all accompanied by their wives and families. One Sao Nang Wen Tip is the wife of the ruler of the Chinese State of Kengtung and as a foreign Princess she takes precedence over the others. Her journey to Rangoon has occupied her for more than fifty days. She is well known throughout Burma, the Shan States, Siam and Southern China, as an extremely able business woman and her commercial transactions would do no discredit in variety and extent to an important European firm. Her sister Sao Nang Tip Htila, the only lady who rode in the great elephant procession at the Delhi Durbar, is also well known as very shrewd and capable business woman. She at present is ruling the State of Kengkham until her son Sao Hak, the Myosa, a promising lad, now at the Chiefs' School at Taunggyi, comes of age. Sao Nang Tip Htila lost all her jewels in the Hooghly when on her way to Delhi, but those who met her shortly afterwards at the Shan Durbar can tell how lightly she treated the matter, for, as she said, she had shaken hands with the King's brother, i.e., the Duke of Connaught, the memory of whose kindness, graciousness and cordiality is treasured by the Shans. Each Chief has with him an official of his State, a number of umbrella-bearers and followers, all interesting as illustrating the diversity of races inhabiting the Southern States.

Besides these some sixty-eight men and women from little known races in the remoter districts have come down. There are Yanglars, speaking a language which is not Shan, Karenni, nor Taungthu; Kaws and Muhsos from far off Kengtung; and the Karens are also well represented. Ten or more red Karens are here with their red garments and rising sun tattooed between their shoulders, their ropes of beads and other massive necklaces and their numerous garters of rattan. There are quite a number of Ze Jein Karens from Lwelong State, a race that is dying out owing to their rigid limitation of marriage to near relations only.

The European visitors were delighted with the little entertainment got up for their benefit. The vast majority of them had never heard nor seen anything of these races and it was a revelation to them to meet on the one hand Chiefs and their relatives, perfect hosts and hostesses, clad in most rich and tasteful costumes, and on the other wild men and women, many of whom had never seen a white face before undertaking their present journey.

At the Garden-party on Monday next the Padaungs, the Yanglans and all the other wild tribes will be present.

A large party of Shans, about eighty in number, arrive to-morrow from Calcutta. They are all from the Yawnghwe State and have been on a visit to Gaya, where the dome over the image of the Buddha has been gilded at the expense of the Sawbwa of Yawnghwe.

Pioneer.—The Prince of Wales—as befits the Chairman of the London Hospitals Committee, has shown himself much interested in medical work in India and more particularly in Calcutta. The Princess, who visited the Dufferin and European General Hospitals there, was able to report upon all she had seen; and to supplement the knowledge thus gained the Prince himself went to the Medical College Hospital. His visit was made in the most informal way, and was quite unannounced beforehand; but as he stayed an hour in the institution, the news of his arrival spread and he was cheered by a big crowd and a gathering of medical students when he took his departure. This unpretentious way of showing his desire to see the working of a big hospital evidently appealed to the people, and they hastened to prove their appreciation of it. His Royal Highness was pleased to announce to Colonel Lukis, the Medical Officer in charge, that he had decided to allot Rs. 90,000, out of the lakh placed at his disposal by the Maharaja of Darbhanga, to the institution. He remarked that it was not merely a hospital but the great clinical school of Calcutta, and hence his special desire to devote the bulk of the Darbhanga donation to it. The Maharaja had intimated that half of the sum could go to the London hospitals, if the Prince so wished, but his Royal Highness did not for a moment entertain the idea of diverting any of the money from Calcutta. The Medical College Hospital needs all the financial help that can be given to it just now, and this windfall has come at a most opportune time. The Bengal Government are acknowledging its claims upon the public purse; and we hope that other Bengali magnates will follow the good example set by the Maharaja of Darbhanga. Several of them can well afford to do so, and their action would add yet further pleasant memories to the Royal visit.

Queen.—IN THE SILKEN EAST (RANGOON).

Hail, Mother. Do they call me rich in trade?
Little care I, but hear the shorn priest drive,
And watch my silk-clad lovers, man by maid,
Laugh 'neath my Shwe Dagon.—KIRLING.

Rangoon lies at the mouth of the river of the same name, which bears the same relation to the Irrawaddy that the Hooghly does to the Ganges. This river is here about a third of a mile broad and enters the open sea some twenty-five miles below Rangoon. Rangoon as a great seaport ranks in the Indian Empire next to Bombay and Calcutta, and is one of the most prosperous and rising cities in the East.

The observant tourist will probably be struck with its "hybrid aspect of prosperity, in which jingling trawlers contrast with the motley hues of Oriental bazaars," to quote Mr. Hope Moncreiff. But, after all, the same thing might be said of Bombay, Singapore, or even, to come nearer home, of Cairo or Algiers.

Modernity and cosmopolitanism, indeed, seem the prevalent notes in this great port; the architecture of the public buildings, the streets, the shops, have little Burmese about them. Indeed, the principal street is not inappropriately named Moghul-street, for it is certainly more Indian than Burmese. The recent buildings are no doubt big and imposing, but to the artist they constitute a jarring note in the physiognomy of the city, and its new cathedral and new Town Hall are veritable eyesores.

For any Oriental atmosphere yet left we must go to the Surati Bazaar. In its dim and winding alleys, fringed with stalls and booths, we are reminded of Damascus or Tunis.

The great sight is the famous Shwe Dagon, popularly known as the Golden Pagoda, which is the one dominant feature in the landscape. Its central tapering tower, nearly 370 feet high, with its glittering umbrella roof and spire, is a landmark for many miles round Rangoon. It stands on an artificial plateau (now a British fort), and is surrounded by a group of subsidiary chapels and shrines, in one of which is a much venerated bell, weighing some forty tons, under which a dozen persons would find shelter. It is said to be the third largest bell in the world.

This bell has a curious history. After the second Burmese war the British troops wished to transport it to India as a trophy; but it sank to the bottom of the Rangoon river, and they were unable to raise it. Some years afterwards the Burmese asked permission to recover it, if possible; their request was readily granted, as the feat was thought impossible. However, they succeeded in extricating it, and carried it in triumph to the Temple in the Shwe Dagon, where it now hangs.

The Golden Pagoda itself has no interior. Like the Egyptian pyramids, it is a solid monument raised over a shrine. The formation of the tower, which resembles an elongated cone, or perhaps an elongated bell, is intended to symbolise various forms of Buddhist ritual. There is, for instance, the bell, the begging bowl, the twisted turban, the umbrella (emblem of royalty), etc. The vane is literally coated with the most valuable precious stones; there is a record of 3,664 rubies, 541 emeralds, and 433 diamonds.

A superficial tour round this great congeries of temples and shrines can no doubt be managed in a day, but to appreciate the great Buddhist cathedral and its wonderful precinct many days must be devoted. Indeed, the author of The Silken East considers that many weeks would not exhaust this wonderful spot.

The two colossal gryphon-like monsters which guard the southern entrance, half lion and half man, with the grinning lips which suggest a pantomime mask, show their Assyrian ancestry. They are obviously derived from the winged human-headed lions of Nineveh. Murray quotes a quaint legend which has been handed down to the Burmese, recalling the ancient myth of Ramulus. A certain king's son was abandoned in the forest and suckled by a lioness. When the prince grew up, he escaped from his foster-mother by swimming the Irrawaddy, and this ingratitude broke her heart. In remembrance of her maternal love, lions' figures are placed at the foot of all Pagoda steps in Burma. The truculente expression of the monsters is presumably not meant to represent a mother's yearning love, but such is the legend.

Even the shortest description of this wonderful pagoda and its supplementary chapels and shrines would exceed the space at my disposal, and, indeed, several days would not exhaust the innumerable architectural features of Shwe Dagon. But every visitor would visit the eastern entrance, with its remarkable pagodas, as well as the southern, the main approach.

Then, besides, the features are constantly changing "a description of the pagoda as it was ten years ago would be incomplete to-day. This is due as much to the ephemeral nature of the wooden buildings as to the progressive character of Burmese art."

New shrines or temples (tazoungs) are continually being built by devout Burmans. Some of the more recent ones are as remarkable for the beauty of the elaborate wood carving as for the excessive ornamentation and rich colouring; there are two chapels in glass mosaic which are certainly unique. Some are coated from basement to "ti" with gold leaf, and the effect in brilliant sunshine is indescribable. Compared with these ornate and gorgeous shrines the cathedrals and churches of Moscow are dignified and restrained.

The extraordinary character of the temple architecture is quite unlike anything that we have seen in India proper, where in the enormous variety of styles it would seem difficult to exclude anything bearing some resemblance to the seven-storied pagoda type. Mr. Fergusson, indeed, considers that in Assyria, not India, we find the nearest architectural similarity, this Babylonian influence having, perhaps, reached Burma by Central Asia and Thibet, for no traces are seen in India, though it has been suggested that similar temples did exist in the great cities of Hindustan, but, being only in brick and plaster, have perished. However, this is a problem for experts.

The Shwe Dagon pagoda is considered one of the great world shrines, and is, indeed, the only pagoda which actually contains genuine relics of Gautama and the three Buddhas who preceded him. It is, in short, not a temple, but a reliquary. Buddhists claim as early a date as 588 B.C. for the building of this shrine. Rangoon itself is comparatively modern, but its site was chosen by its founder, King Alompra, in 1755, for the commercial capital and port of Burma, on account of the proximity of the sacred Shwe Dagon.

Not far from the Shwe Dagon are the great reservoirs known as the Royal Lakes.

Perhaps no city in India has more beautiful public gardens than Rangoon. The Royal Lakes and Dalhousie Park make a magnificent pleasure ground. Here we shall see what we have been a stranger to in India—beautiful stretches of velvet turf as fine as in Oxford College gardens, while the wealth of luxuriant foliage, pagoda trees, acacias, laburnums, padouks, etc., make an exquisite framework to the expanse of greenery and the shining sheets of water.

To most tourists the next important sight after the Golden Pagoda are the "elephant coolies" at work in Messrs. McGregor's timber yards at Ahlone, and certainly this is a unique spectacle. The great beasts work as hard and as continuously as coolies at hauling, piling, and stacking the huge teak logs. The elephants work together in pairs. Each kneeling down, they insert their trunks underneath, then lift a log—sometimes weighing a couple of tons—to its place on the stack. Then one elephant walks to the end of the stack and pushes the log forward till it lies even with the other logs. The intelligence these animals show is extraordinary, and still more the neatness with which they stack the logs perfectly level. Indeed, one can almost believe the story familiar to every globetrotter, of the "foreman elephant" who invariably used to shut one eye as he glanced down the log to see that it lay exactly square and level in the stack!

Rangoon Gazette.—To-day their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales enter on a new stage in Their great journey, a stage which, we hope, will be not less interesting and enjoyable than those which have been passed. More than four years ago, by the desire of her late Majesty Queen Victoria, the Prince and Princess made their historic tour in Great Britain, a journey, to quote His Royal Highness's own words, "unique in its character, rich in the experience gained and in the memories of warm and affectionate greeting from the many races of His Majesty's subjects in his great dominions beyond the seas"; a tour which "profoundly touched and gratified" both the Prince and Princess "by the loyal affection and enthusiasm which invariably characterised the welcome extended" to Their Royal Highnesses throughout their long and memorable journey.

The present visit to India has been a natural complement to the tour of the Colonies, and when Their Royal Highnesses leave Karachi two months hence we trust that their impressions and their memories of India will be no less happy than those of Australia, New Zealand and Canada. Nothing but the keenest sense of duty could have induced them to undertake this tour, with its long absence from home and children, the fatigues and discomforts of trying journeys by land and sea in climates varying from Arctic cold to torrid heat. Work well done is its own reward, but Their Royal Highnesses will also reap a bountiful harvest in being brought more closely into contact with the peoples of India, in strengthening the bonds of Empire, in increasing, though that is no easy task, the love and veneration in which the Royal Family are held throughout India, by every race, caste and creed.

To-day the Royal tour in Burma begins and it needs no very intimate knowledge of the province to prophesy with absolute confidence that nowhere in the vast region that we call India will Their Royal Highnesses meet with a more cordial loyal welcome than in Burma. This section of the tour is of necessity brief, but in their week's stay amongst us our Royal visitors will make the acquaintance of cosmopolitan Rangoon, where the Burmese number scarcely one-third of the population; of Mandalay, which is almost purely Burmese still; of the great river, which is the life of Burma; and, generally, of the Burma of the plains. Representatives from many of the border States (the Sawbwa of Kengtung, for example, whose territory marches with that of China and of France, and who has had a journey of forty days to Rangoon) will illustrate phases of life and rule far different from those in Burma proper. And thus, during their stay the Royal visitors will meet subjects of the King-Emperor who have come from almost every quarter of the province eager to show their loyalty and to assist in making the Royal visit a thoroughly happy one.

What a stirring time you will have by the time that this reaches you! The Prince and Princess of Wales will be your guests and we all know what a right royal reception you will give them. Your Royal visitors will appreciate to the utmost your exertions to entertain them. They are in the best of health and vigour. They have enjoyed to the full their Indian tour so far, and have made themselves beloved and admired everywhere. With you they will have a new experience, one of the pleasures which King Edward missed. They may not see all the gold and trappings with which they have been sated in the loyal tributary States of India, and you can show them but few very ancient monuments or buildings. But you will show them a happy, prosperous and loyal Province, the largest in the Indian Empire, making up for its lack of individual millionaires by its millions of natives above the reach of grinding poverty, dwelling in good decent houses, well clothed, loyal and content under British rule, free from oppression, cheerful in liberty such as never under the native regime they experienced. They will see Rangoon your capital, barely half a century old, risen from a village just emerging from the mud of the Irrawaddy delta, the third seaport of British India, and they will see also how much greater might be the expansion of Burma if the predominant partner were not so jealous of it, and so unwisely repressive of our development. But they will perhaps be told that Lord Curzon has gone, and that Lord Minto reigns in his stead.

In Mandalay Their Royal Highnesses will see the mushroom capital and gingerbread Palace of the Alaungpaya dynasty, and will reflect on the downfall of Thebaw and his cruel consort. Quem Deus vult perdere, prius dementat. I need not say with what intense interest we exiles will watch the progress of Their Royal Highnesses in Burma.

His Majesty's ships Renown, Fox, Perseus and Terrible passed Elephant Point at 3-15 P.M. yesterday and arrived below the Hastings before 5 o'clock, the Fox and Perseus coming into harbour.

We are requested to state that carriages cannot follow the route of the Royal procession beyond the junction of Latter Street and Dalhousie Street. The upper part of Latter Street and the portion of Canal Street which lies between Godwin Road and China Street will be closed to traffic as soon as the Royal procession has passed in order that the school children may start homewards as soon as possible.

We understand that the order about umbrellas for the school children in the School pandal has been misunderstood. Children of all races may be provided with umbrellas, but will have to put them down when the Royal procession passes and for some little time beforehand. It is obvious, of course, that every child cannot put up an umbrella as there would be no room, but the managers will make arrangements for the children to share.

On Thursday night the Lieutenant-Governor drove to Dalhousie Park to inspect the "karaweik poun" on which Their Royal Highnesses will journey across the Lake. Shortly after ten the barge set out on her journey towed by seven Burmese crews, singing their boat-songs. As the barge passed the floating lotus flowers, these opened and a beautifully attired dancing girl appeared in each, to the strains of the band placed out of sight below the huge flowers. Sections of the park had been experimentally lighted, and these, though only a very minute portion of the scheme for Monday, showed that the improvements made in the system of lighting will ensure complete success. It may be confidently stated that Rangoon has never before seen such a magnificent sight as that which will greet Their Royal Highnesses on Monday evening. The karaweik poun proceeded to the marble steps and here the Lieutenant-Governor landed and inspected the arrangements made for the reception of the Royal visitors.

We are informed that a firework display may take place from three of His Majesty's vessels accompanying Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales during the squadron's stay, but the night has not been settled. The fireworks would consist of 11 displays:—First display, 60 rockets fired singly from the quarter-deck. Second display, 10 five and a half inch shells, variously coloured, will be fired from mortars from each vessel. Third display, 90 coloured rockets from each ship in flights as follows: Three flights each of fifteen coloured rockets, from each ship red, white and blue, making a total of 45 from each ship to be fired from the fore-castle. Three similar sets of rockets will be fired from each ship from the quarter-deck. The vessels from which the rockets will be fired are the Hyacinth, Fox and Perseus. Fourth display, fifty Roman candles from the Hyacinth and 25 each from the Fox and Perseus will be burnt, men being stationed so as to intermingle the resultant colours all round the upper deck. Fifth display will be a repetition of the second display. Sixth display, ten Imperial batteries from the Hyacinth and five each from the other two ships will be fired. Seventh display, ten repeating shells from the Hyacinth and five each from the other two ships will be fired. Eighth display, special rocket display. The following special rockets will be discharged by each ship in the order named starting with the Hyacinth:—1 Hyacinth 10 wheatsheafs; 2 Fox 10 peacocks' plumes; 3 Perseus 10 electric meteors; 4 Hyacinth 20 floating trails. Ninth display will be a repetition of the fourth display and 25 Roman candles will be burnt on each ship. Tenth display, 60 rockets will be fired independently. Eleventh display, 10 whistling rockets will be fired from the Hyacinth followed by set pieces of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales and the Star of India on board the Hyacinth.

Last evening the finishing touches were being given to the decorations and pandals erected for the reception of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales in Rangoon. It may be said at once that never has anything so extensive been attempted and never before has there been such general co-operation as on this occasion. Hitherto every community has looked after its own arrangements, and this to a large extent has been the rule on this occasion, but in Playre Street and on Strand Road the labours of the Reception Committee have been lightened, on the one hand, by the work of the Port authorities and Government officers, and, on the other, by the houseowners in Playre Street who combined to make one elaborate decorative scheme for their quarter. Below we give detailed descriptions of the decorations along the line of route. As for the pandals a few remarks may be made here. The Burthese have been rightly given the place of honour and in their beautiful archway on Strand Road they will be the first—on the conclusion of the reception on the wharf—to welcome the Royal visitors to Burma. From the list of communities who have constructed archways, two will be missed, the Chetties, apparently through some misunderstanding amongst themselves, and the Marwaris, who since the death of Bhagwan Das have declined in numbers and importance in Rangoon. On the other hand, the Khojas and the Chittagonian Mahomedans have come forward to testify to their growing numbers and importance in Burma.

Although the river front from the Hastings, where the Renown will take up her moorings, does not lend itself to decoration in the way that the streets do, still opportunities are afforded which have not been neglected. The Port Trust authorities have taken in hand the ornamentation of all their wharves and jetties, beginning from below at their workshops at Botataung, thence up the river by the Maulmain jetty, Brookling Street wharf, Sparks and Lewis Street jetties, Phayre Street wharf, and Barr Street jetty. On all, flagstaves and flags, with lines of streamers between them, have been erected. This form of decoration is practically the only one suitable considering that the launch Togo which brings the Prince and Princess up from the Renown is some distance off the bank, and the effect of many draperies in the finer details of decoration would be lost. Besides the properties of the Port Trust, there are private premises on the river front which have taken equal pains to appear as gay as possible on the passage of the Royal party. The Burma Oil Company's Rangoon depot makes a very good show of bunting, and a large number of high posts have been erected and utilised to the best advantage. The Bombay-Burma Trading Corporation's yard and the Railway jetty too have shared in the general ornamentation and altogether the three and a half miles, which is approximately the distance from the Renown's station to Sule Pagoda wharf, will form no unworthy avenue to the port and city of Rangoon. As Sule Pagoda wharf is approached the decorations of the streets come into the display to be seen from the river, two of the most effective buildings to be seen from there being the public offices, described below, and the offices of the Port Trust. The latter, recently repainted in a most artistic scheme of slate blue, white and cream, is one of the most pleasing buildings in Rangoon. However gaily decorated the various portions of the river bank may be, it will still remain that the most striking features of the river approach will be the great river itself, the busy aspect of the portions of the city that run down to its brink, the shipping in gala dressing, and the sight in the distance of the Shwe Dagon Pagoda glittering in the morning sun. The Dalla side is so far distant from the channel of approach that little could be attempted in the way of its ornamentation.

Where the Prince and Princess will land on Burmese shores, Sule Pagoda wharf, is a fitting place for such a ceremony—the regular site of an important function of the city's life. It was here that the other day we welcomed the first arrival of the splendid vessel the Herefordshire, the latest and finest addition to the fleet of the Bibby line, that has done so much to foster the prosperity and popularity of Rangoon and Burma. It is almost a pity that the reconstruction of this 1,500-foot long wharf, now in hand, had not been completed for this great occasion. But the old wharf will not know itself this morning. The arrangements and decorations here are not in the hands of the Port Trust, but have been taken in hand by the town and reception authorities. A pontoon has been attached to the wharf for convenience in landing, painted white and railed. It is attached to the wharf by a new iron-work bridge painted green. From the edge of the wharf to the shore proper and the entrance to the pandal a covered way, protected by bamboo matting, has been erected. The rough surface has been laid with sand, and that again carpeted, giving a smooth and soft passage. The pandal consists of the covered open space of the wharf sheds lying between the enclosed corrugated iron sheds to west and east. It has naturally assumed a very different aspect from its workaday one. The space, some forty-five yards square, has been hung at the sides and ceiled with white cloth, the ceiling being panelled by coloured cords. The pillars, six down each side of the middle, are draped in purple. Between them near the ceiling and down the length of each are cords of green foliage with small bunches of flowers in yellow and red, looking very pretty. On each side of the pandal are low stands in eleven tiers, seated with comfortable chairs. Well over a thousand people ought to be comfortably accommodated here. In the centre is the dais of reception, only a few inches high, so that all may see what goes on. A large number of large foliage plants in timber plant-tubs are skilfully disposed. The high passage leading from the pandal to the street is draped in the same way as the pandal itself with the addition of scarlet cloth hangings.

Almost facing the entrance to the Sule Pagoda wharf is the stand erected by Messrs. Mason, Trevillion and Hunt. This will command an excellent view of the Royal procession, being one of the best positions on the line of route. The stand is erected immediately in front of the Police Court buildings which form as splendid background of coats-of-arms, flags, coloured cloths and festoons of flowers. Over these buildings, as well as every other public office in the line of route, floats the Royal Standard. At the top in large gilt letters festooned with flowers are "G. M." (initials of Their Royal Highnesses) and "All Burma Welcomes You." The Customs House, too, presents a most effective appearance. After passing the Indian Mahomedan pandal is a white palisade on which portraits of Their Majesties the King and Queen and their Royal Highnesses are placed. The entire palisade is festooned with white and red roses. All the decorations in Strand Road, Phayre Street and Merchant Street consist of the best materials available and have been carried out in a most skilful manner.

Yesterday the Burmese archway was in a less advanced stage of construction than any other in Rangoon, the delay being due to an erratic contractor. Yesterday, however, work was being pushed on with vigour and the archway will be completed in good time. Like most things the Burmese undertake the pandal is most tasteful. It is a large archway about sixty feet long, capable of seating some five hundred persons, and is in the orthodox Burmese fashion, with numerous pythats, gold being the predominating colour, while red, pale blue and dark blue also play a part. The solid teak posts supporting the roof have been covered with red cloth and on this is superimposed elaborate gilding. The roof is of white material, figured in gold. The west front, the entrance, has most elaborate gilt work set out with blue, while on the east front the same design is carried out without the blue, the general effect of the archway being extremely graceful, while the colours are, as usual, most harmonious.

The Indian Mahomedan pandal through which the Royal visitors pass after leaving the Burmese archway represents a mosque. It is a pretty structure, the prevailing colour being yellow picked out with red. The dome and the minarets stand out boldly, but the pandal would certainly have looked better had it been made entirely white. In the interior on the walls are hand-painted landscape and other scenes. The pandal is capable of seating about 300 persons. The principal movers are Munshi Murad Bux and Munshi Kadir Bux.

Among the most beautiful of the decorative arrangement in Strand Road is the floral pavilion at the junction of that road and Phayre Street erected under the supervision of Mr

Wickham. It is crowned by a cone-shaped basket of flowers, from which hang coloured curtains bordered with white, red and yellow roses. At the four corners are flags. The sides of the pavilion bear appropriate mottoes in flowers. The design is chaste, and at the same time the artistic blending of the roses and grasses produces a rich effect. Further on, not on the line of route, the Bombay-Burma offices are tastefully decorated and the Strand Hotel is also ablaze with bunting.

The pandal in Phayre Street erected by the Hindu community of Madras is a thoroughly representative one. The towers on both the gateways resemble those of the Golden Temple of Madura and upon them have been painted figures of Hindu gods and goddesses and scenes from Vedic literature. Those familiar with Hindu mythology will find much to admire in the skilful manner in which the painters have done their work. The interior has been arranged as a Kutcheri mandabam, or a palace hall, and the decorations and furnishings consisting of art muslins, tinsels, and coloured cloths with long golden stripes show much taste. The ceiling is very fine, the floral work and the gilding making an excellent combination. The pandal has seating accommodation for 500 persons, and its erection has been supervised by Rai Bahadur Maduray Pillay.

The effect produced by the decorations through the whole length of that part of Phayre Street through which Their Royal Highnesses pass is most striking. The overhead lines of pennants and streamers, flanked by Venetian masts gay with bunting, swallow-tail banners and burgees, make a brave show. The entire range of the public and private offices in this street has been most handsomely decorated, the carrying out of the scheme reflecting much credit on Messrs. Mason, Trevillion and Hunt. Among these buildings the most notable are the offices of the Port Trust (as already mentioned), the National Bank, the Irrawaddy Flotilla Co., the Chartered Bank, the Arracan Co., Mohr Bros., and Thos. Cook and Son.

Merchant Street, right up to the Small Cause Court buildings and beyond, presents a gala appearance. Among the best decorated houses are Messrs. Harriman and Co.'s establishment, Messrs. Oppenheimer's offices, the Hongkong Bank, the Chief Court, the Small Cause Court, the Government Press, Messrs. Narperink Smith's office, the Netherlands Bank, and the Bank of Burma. Messrs. Steel Bros.' new premises have been decorated most elaborately and with fine effect.

The pandal at the junction of Merchant Street and Sule Pagoda Road has been erected by the Hindus of Southern India under the personal superintendence of Mr. Rangaswamy Moodeliar, the well-known broker. The design is simple and elegant. Over the gateways are representations of Hindu temples guarded by goddesses. The interior decorations are bright with gay-coloured cloths and gilt and silver paper. The pandal has accommodation for 400 persons.

The loyalty of the various Mahomedan communities in town, as evinced by decorations for the occasion, is especially conspicuous, for some of the wealthiest merchants belong to this class. In addition to the mosque of the Indian Mahomedans generally, next to the Burmese archway on Strand Road, four pandals have been erected on Merchant Street, between Moghul and Latter Streets. The first of these is the Persian pandal, which is designed to represent a castle. It is gratifying to note that in all recent rejoicings of this nature this community has invariably taken a prominent part. The greatest charm perhaps about their castle is its simplicity in design and decorations; a pleasing contrast to some of the others. The leaders of the community who have taken a prominent part in this welcome are Aga Mahmood, Aga Ally Akbar, and Haji Sayyid Raza.

The next pandal, the seventh on the line of route of the procession, is one of the most elaborate and largest erected this year, as well befits the wealthy Suratee Bara Bazaar Company who are responsible for it. The entrance is flanked by a couple of Moorish arches, surmounted by large pictures on the right of the Japan and on the left by that of the Renown. On either side of the roadway over which festoons of garlands hang in all directions, within the pandal, is a broad raised platform, 200 feet long, with chairs to accommodate 1,200 members of the Suratee community and their friends. One of the most interesting features of the pandal is the series of large pictures above the pillars lining both sides of the roadway. These are the handiwork of Burmese artists, some twenty-five of whom were engaged on the task for nearly two months. They cannot claim to be the best specimens of art, but in the short time at the workmen's disposal they certainly have succeeded in producing some good work. The scenes depicted are very varied, ranging from incidents in mythology and religion to battlefields and sieges. Among the wars represented are the Turco-Greek, the Chino-Japanese and the Russo-Japanese struggles. In the middle of the left gallery is the picture of the Coronation of King Edward; while other views include landscapes, motor-ing and cycling, and mountaineering in volcanic regions. The mythological subjects treated of are mainly Hindu in character. As a sample of purely Burmese work these paintings are sure to attract attention. Moola Abdul Rahimi is the Chairman of the Committee appointed by the community to arrange for the welcome given to Their Royal Highnesses.

About a hundred paces from this, near Edward Street, is the pandal of the Khoja community. The followers of His Highness the Aga Khan have contented themselves with a simple design, purely Mahomedan in character, representing a mosque. Over the archways are words of welcome, and chains of coloured paper are hung in the pandal. The principal movers are Rahimji Bhoy Hirji and Mahomed Bhoy Cooverji.

The last structure in Merchant Street is that of the Mahomedan Chittagonians near Latter Street. This has been designed to represent a court in the Alcazar of Seville, with its balconies and rooms opening on them, all painted by Dada Ally of the Parsee Theatre under the direction of Mr. Kato. The ceiling is very well done, but there is a monotony in the painting of the doors and windows and their drapery. Above each door after the manner of the real court, is a picture, and here prominent men of Burma, past and present, find a place. Among those whose portraits are hung up are our two recent Lieutenant-Governors. The leaders of this community are Munshi Ahsan Alli, Munshi Mahomed Kala Meah and Abdul Kadir.

As usual the Chinese community are second to none in the lavishness of the street decorations. Latter Street is purely Chinese and there are two archways erected. After the heavy red and gold decorations along Merchant Street these graceful and artistic pandals are a relief. The first arch, situated at the corner of Latter Street and Strand Road, is that of the Fokkien Chinese. The front of the structure represents a royal entrance, and in the centre a rendezvous for princes returning from their travels. The lower portion represents a Chinese drawing-room magnificently decorated. The British heat-of-arms is conspicuous in front with an inscription of welcome. The outer posts are encircled by dragons and there are numerous pictorial designs of fine workmanship. The archway entailed considerable labour, as for three months men have been at work on the design. Up to Wednesday there was merely the bare structure to be seen, but within the last 48 hours everything has appeared like magic work.

The next pandal in the Street is that erected by the Canton Chinese community. The design, as already described in these columns, is after the famous Hone Kow arch where the two Emperors Hoan Kow Tsaw and Chow Hong Yee met. Two Chinese dragons adorn the entrance of the pandal. Five sets of marionettes are to be seen under the arches of the southern entrance. A Chinese court juggler is seen performing. Then comes an aged ex-Minister of State fishing while the Emperor is endeavouring to induce him to accept a fresh term of office in the State. The inundation of the golden temple is also depicted. Next follows a competition in mystic art between the head priest of the golden temple and the white snake which has transformed itself into a beautiful girl. The other two sets depict the vocations followed by a fisherman, woodman, and cultivator, respectively. All the materials were brought specially from China for this archway. There are also Chinese dragons on the upper portion of the structure.

From Latter Street to Godwin Road, fifteen hundred feet, there have been erected on both sides of the road spacious galleries for the school children of Rangoon, of whom some fourteen thousand will be accommodated, with their teachers and school managers. Half-way up the line is a little pandal over which stands a handsome pythat in red and gold. Inside this are two raised platforms. On the south will be seated a hundred little Burmese girls and on the north a number of hpoongyis with their yellow-robed pupils. Here bouquets will be presented to the Prince and Princess by a Burmese boy and girl from a Vernacular school. The arrangements at the rehearsal on Thursday worked admirably, every school marching to its allotted place with the precision of well-drilled troops. Everything has been carefully thought out and put into execution by Mr. Potter and his band of willing assistants. It may be confidently anticipated that nothing in to-day's reception will compare in beauty and in suggestiveness with this enormous assemblage of brightly-clad, happy children of every race and class in Rangoon. The Burmese children, of course, largely predominate, but Chinese, Europeans, Madrassis, Bengalis, Upper Indians and others are all strongly represented.

The College pandal on Godwin Road is of the same design as the Children's pandal. There are raised seats for the boys and College Staff and over the centre is a very handsome pythat, in the rigidly correct Burmese colours for a Royal reception, namely, silver, gold and pale blue.

Sphere.—The Prince of Wales is to-day visiting one of the most picturesque countries in the whole world. It is a beautiful land inhabited by a silken-clad people who have possessed a knack of happy living. The country and people were recently most interestingly described by Mr. V. C. Scott O'Connor in two volumes entitled The Silken East. Burma, he says, occupies a remote corner of south-eastern Asia. Hidden away there in the folds of mountains which reach down like the fingers of a hand from the heights of Asia to the sea, it has had leisure to develop a character and personality of its own. Its best friends in this sense have been these mountains which have protected it, on the one hand from the aggression of Indian invaders, on the other, from the enormous absorbing power of China. * * * * * The sea has opened the floodgates of invasion, and under the political supremacy of England, the economic competition of inferior and cheaper races from India, and of the superior Chinese now crowding up from the Straits, the Burmese personality runs in some peril of extinction. There is no longer a court to form the heart of any national feeling, there is no longer, it would seem, any motive in keeping the race supreme in its own country, and there is lacking in the people that sternness which might alone in the absence of such fostering influences help to maintain their idiosyncrasy intact.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE PAPERS PUBLISHED IN BENGAL FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 13TH JANUARY 1906.

Hilavadi.—The Hilavadi [Calcutta] of the 5th January objects to that passage in the Calcutta Municipal address to the Prince and Princess of Wales in which it was said that their Royal Highnesses would find in Calcutta "abundant indications of the prosperity which everywhere accompanies British rule," and in reply to which His Royal Highness said: "If, as you say, the prosperity which blesses this place is common to all India, we may congratulate ourselves on the results of the bond between the Mother-country and India." How, asks the writer, did the City Fathers ascertain that under British rule every part of India had prospered like Calcutta? Have not great cities like Delhi and Agra been reduced to insignificant places under British rule? It is only those places which have been made seats of Government by the English that have prospered under British rule, and it is natural that such should be the case. It is a perversion of truth and the worst form of flattery to say that because Calcutta has, in every way, prospered under British rule, every other part of India has also done so.

Sanjivani.—The Sanjivani [Calcutta] of the 4th January writes:—The Prince is a very clever personage. His keen intelligence has seen through all the webs spun by the officials. With the object of keeping His Royal Highness ignorant of the condition of the Indians, orders were issued to keep newspapers, like the Amrita Bazar Patrika, the Bengalee and the Statesman out of his sight. But under the Prince's own orders, papers edited by the natives are being sent in for his perusal. His Royal Highness has thus come to know of the partition agitation, the boycott and Sir Bampfylde Fuller's illegalities. His Royal Highness is a humane Prince who cannot tolerate any difference between the English and the Indians.

During his sojourn in Bombay, His Royal Highness summoned Sir Pherozshah Mehta to an interview with him. We have learned that the Prince inquired of him, "What is meant by the partition of Bengal? Why are the Bengalis so dissatisfied with it? Why have they resolved to boycott British manufactures?" Sir Pherozshah gave to the Prince satisfactory replies to these questions. It has been made quite clear to His Royal Highness that the boycott of British manufactures is a reply to the official indifference to the protests of the Bengalis against the partition.

Sri Sri Vishnu Priya-o-Ananda Bazar Patrika [Calcutta] of the 4th January writes as follows under the heading "Speaking of untruth in addresses":—

The Hindus are ever a loyal people. Rebellion against the Sovereign is a purely European idea which has no place in the Hindu code of morality. In Europe the relation between the Sovereign and his subjects is not intimate. Hence rebellion of the subjects is a daily occurrence on that continent. The Indian people, however, consider it sinful to rise up against their Sovereign. Nay, the religious codes of the Indian ascribe divinity itself to the Sovereign. To have a sight of royalty is also considered an act of religious merit by the Hindu Sastras. We have all been enthusiastic in according a fitting reception to the Prince of Wales, for who is there who does not wish to show proper respect, courtesy and loyalty to the heir-apparent to the throne? But Government has been throwing obstacles even in the way of the residents of Calcutta getting a view of the Prince with safety. All the festivities in honour of the Prince are being held in the European quarter of the town, with which the native residents are not much in touch. The cost of these festivities are being paid by these humble natives; but it is the Prince's own countrymen who are enjoying the pleasure of participating in them. We have no objection to this, particularly as the people of Bengal are unable just now to join in any festivities and have only wiped their tears in order to discharge the duty of receiving the Prince though with a lacerated heart. Neglect of duty in consequence of grief or sorrow is not what a morally superior people should permit themselves to be guilty of. It speaks volumes for the strength of our character that certain worthless and irresponsible officials have, in spite of various efforts, failed to shake our loyalty.

The conduct of a certain official has astonished and astounded us. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has come, and it is desirable for him to know our real feelings, and to some extent the real condition of the country. It is essential for him to know the real condition of the people over whom he will, at some future time, be called upon to rule as Sovereign. But the officials and the hypocritical sycophants appear to have made up their minds not to let His Royal Highness know it. We are extremely happy at the Prince's visit, and it is our duty to give him a fitting reception according to our circumstances. The addresses, however, which have been presented to His Royal Highness contain a number of falsehoods. Everywhere the tune is the same—"We are the happiest people on the face of the earth; our happiness is unequalled by that of any other people," as if we did not suffer from illness and sorrow, as if we had no wants and grievances, as if we did not suffer from miscarriage of justice. The Bombay and Calcutta addresses state that the country is getting richer, that the tide of prosperity is sweeping over it, that a feeling of equality reigns all over the land, and that the country enjoys its full share of happiness and prosperity. Is all this true? People who drew up the addresses knew full well that poverty was grinding the whole country and was incessantly causing famines there, that distinction was being constantly made between peoples of different colours in the administration of justice and in the filling up of Government posts, and that distinctions were being made even between Hindus and Musalmans, and that the majority of the population did not get two full meals a day. Yet Lord Curzon's countrymen, as they are, they dishonoured truth and drew up these addresses. Did not the writers' hands tremble when they drew up the addresses containing these falsehoods? And did not the men who read the addresses find their voices choked when uttering these falsehoods? If not, then it must be understood that truth has almost disappeared from amongst mankind. But the Prince is an intelligent, educated, and impartial man. And it will be idle to suppose that he is completely ignorant of the condition of the country. It will be folly to suppose that His Royal Highness, our future Emperor, does not know that India had at a time of famine to accept pecuniary help from America and Japan, and that eighty or ninety per cent. of the people of India are poor—a fact well known even to the mass of the English people. Why then do the sycophants reveal their real character by telling untruths in such addresses?

Sandhya [Calcutta] of the 5th January blames the people of Bengal for having taken such interest in the festivities which were held in Calcutta during the Royal visit, in spite of the oppressions and indignities which they have suffered and are still suffering at the hands of feringis in connection with the swadeshi movement. The writer also complains that the police ill-treated the people who flocked to witness the amusements.

Bangarasi [Calcutta] of the 6th January says:—

The Prince has come and stayed in Calcutta for some days, but neither His Royal Highness nor the natives of the country have had any opportunity of knowing each other. When His Royal Highness's father came to Calcutta, a meeting was arranged between him and a number of native gentlemen in Belgachia, but no such arrangement has been made on the present occasion, so that His Royal Highness will not acquire even that small amount of knowledge regarding Bengal and its people which His Royal father derived from an hour's interview with a few leading Bengalis. The Prince's tour programme has been evidently arranged on the principle of avoiding the vitiated atmosphere of native habitations. The pious desire on the part of most Hindus to see the Prince remains unfulfilled, while those people who went to see him on the maiden or some such place in the southern quarter of the town received great ill-treatment at the hands of policemen. His Royal Highness's speech at Agra shows that he loves the Indians. It is, therefore, a matter of great regret that he has not found an opportunity of knowing their griefs and grievances. What has he seen in Calcutta? He has seen the Calcutta Municipality presenting His Royal Consort with a valuable ornament; he has seen bejewelled and gorgeously dressed human *Plutus*es moving on earth; he has seen the grandeur of the Imperial Cadet Corps, the beauty of the Government House and the stately appearance of white men's mansions; he has seen a grand illumination and a gorgeous display of fireworks. But has he seen the humble cottage of the poor, or the skeleton appearance of the hungry and famished? He has heard words of adulation spoken to him in addresses, but has he heard the touching tale of the manifold misery of even a single poor soul? His Royal Consort has seen a few rich ladies decked with gold and jewels, but has he seen even a single woman who has neither food nor clothing? India contains crores of half-starved men and women, but have Their Royal Highnesses seen even one of them? But how will they see all this? Who will show the sight of misery to them?

Hindi Bangarasi.—Commenting upon the Royal visit to Calcutta, the Hindi Bangarasi [Calcutta] of the 8th January gives a history of Royal processions in former times, showing how on such occasions gold and silver were profusely distributed to the poor, and regrets that the poor of Calcutta were not fed or paid anything during the visit of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. The custom of distributing money to the poor not only prevailed in the times of even the titular Moghul Princes, but obtain in certain Native States even up to this day. The poor of Calcutta therefore naturally expected that they would not be forgotten on the present occasion.

In connection with His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales' visit to Calcutta the same paper writes:—There are Hindus, Mahomedan, Sikh, Parsee, Christian, and Jain inhabitants in Calcutta, but how many leaders of these communities were able to meet His Royal Highness and lay their grievances before him? The granting of an audience was out of the question, as the authorities had so arranged things that His Royal Highness did not even pass through those quarters which are occupied by the men of the above nationalities. Although the people of Bengal were grieved at the partition, they did not fail to express their joy at the Royal visit, but since the Hindus were not even allowed to approach His Royal Highness, giving expression to their sentiment was quite out of the question.

Sandhya [Calcutta] of the 9th January writes:—The Prince has come and the Prince has gone, and we remain where we were before. There were fireworks, illuminations, bands and parades, but for ourselves it all amounted to an experience of the thrust of the policeman's baton. There were no gifts or feeding of the poor; it all ended in exhibitions of authority by the police and by the subordinate European officials. It is of course a matter of rejoicing that the Prince returns safe to England; that his brief sojourn in India has been without any mishap; but such puppet exhibitions of royalty do not arouse our enthusiasm. With Europeans, Royal personages are like dolls—moved by springs, worked by machine. In European countries, royalty is a thing invested with great semblance of power, but in reality without any authority to personally guide the administration of the country. When Royal personages have to sit like dummy-figures at home, what can they be expected to do abroad in India? In this country the feringhi hakims and the red-faced paravallas are persons possessing greater authority than Royalty. One cannot even conceive that there is any king with higher authority than theirs. Who is not king over us? Any man whose skin is a little fair, who wears European costume and who speaks a foreign tongue is king over us. It was not for nothing that the Bengali poet once wrote that we worship as Emperors all Europeans—be they sailors or missionaries. Mr. Cattel, of Madaripur, the jute merchant of Serajung, Sir Bampfylde Fuller, Sir Andrew Fraser, all are kings over us: so are Messrs. Lyon and Carlyle. We in fact constitute a sort of unclaimed property, over whom everybody claims and exercises authority. In Noakhali we see Abdul Karim our king, in Madaripur we see the Inspector of Schools and the Director of Public Instruction our kings, for they are issuing all sorts of mandates at will over the school students and teachers in these places. So also Mr. Jack for a time exercised royal sway at Barisal. And as for Sir Bampfylde Fuller, of Eastern Bengal, he is a sort of king of kings. Has he anybody over him? At the railway stations, anybody with a fair skin is a king over us. He is privileged to talk big, to call anybody he comes across a damned soor (pig), because he knows how to use his stick. Those who went to see the Prince say that their sinful eyes were not permitted to see who the Prince was and who the Viceroy. It seemed as if those red-faced police sergeants and those paravallas with red turbans on who were chasing the Bengalis like so many cats and dogs were really the royal personages. Of course we are told that King Edward, the son of Queen Victoria, is our ruler; but in practice we see that from the low caste half-breed of the slums of Calcutta to the hakims in the mufassal, all are our rulers. The King's servants, the King's own countrymen are the living rulers with whom we actually come in contact. That is why on the occasion of the visit of the King's heir, all the rejoicings and feastings were monopolised by the Europeans, while the native of the soil only performed certain menial offices and suffered a considerable amount of police harassment.

Daily Hitavadi [Calcutta] of the 9th January writes:—We cannot say what the Prince has learnt from his week's sojourn in Calcutta. Judging from the manner in which he saw us and we him, we can confidently assert that His Royal Highness has not been able to form any correct idea of the people of India. From the way in which he saw the people of India, he might as well be in England itself as in India. European officials surrounded his person to such an extent that, turn his eyes in whichever direction he might, he could see them and them alone. His eyes could not, so to speak, penetrate through the bodies of these European officials and fall on the bodies of the dark-skinned natives. The feeble voice of the Indians was lost in the hubbub of receptions and addresses. The officials did their best to hide from the Prince the real condition of the country, and presented to his gaze only the scenes of joy and plenty. His Royal Highness was not permitted to go to those parts of the country which are now in the grip of famine, but our future Emperor should become aware that India, the fabled land of gems, has now been converted into a desert.

At Calcutta the Prince witnessed fireworks, illuminations, and races and military parades. His visit to the city ended with these events only. He left the city satisfied with the good arrangements made by the local police during his stay. But he did not receive any information at all as to the treatment which his 30 million subjects were receiving at the hands of his officials. Has His Royal Highness been told that thousands of people who came from the interior to the city to get a sight of his Royal person, had to return home in disappointment after having been mercilessly harassed by the town police?

His Royal Highness has, during this visit of his, seen the Kutab, the Taj and all the sights of India. To that extent the visit has been useful. But he has not seen the people of India yet. His tour has therefore been instructive only partially. He has seen the kingdom but not the people. He has seen the lights, but not the shadows.

Sandhya.—In connection with the late pardah party at Belvedere, the Sandhya [Calcutta] of the 6th January dwells on the characteristic European stiffness and formality of manner in welcoming guests which is evidenced by the procedure adopted at this party of seating each guest on a specially ticketed chair, and on the incongruity, according to Indian standards, of a personage of the position of Her Royal Highness distributing as, she actually did, only silver medals to her guests.

Hindi Rangavasi.—The Hindi Bangavasi [Calcutta], dated 8th January, in commenting upon the Princess of Wales' pardah party, says:—The pardah party given in honour of Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales is an accomplished fact. Excluding the maidservants and women companions of the ladies, there were nearly 25 ladies present, who had to leave their shoes at the entrance to the Durbar Hall. It is said that the Hindu and the Muhammadan ladies were very highly pleased at meeting Her Royal Highness, whose courteous manners were highly admired.

All the native papers of Orissa speak in sympathetic terms of the tour of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales through India, and wish them a safe and happy journey back to their native land.

Utkaldipika.—Referring to the donation of Rs. 1,500 to the temple of the Sikhs at Amritsar and of an equal sum to the Juma Musjid of the Muhammadans at Delhi by the Prince of Wales, the same paper joins with the Hindu Patriot of Calcutta in the latter's remark that a similar donation to the Hindu temple at Puri would have been a gracious act on the part of the Prince. The writer regrets that the Prince was not induced to pay a visit to the Hindu temples at Bhuvaneswar and Puri in Orissa.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE PAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE BOMBAY PRESIDENCY FOR THE WEEK ENDING 13TH JANUARY 1906.

Kesari 9TH JANUARY 1906.—From Gwalior the Prince of Wales went to Lucknow and Calcutta. At the last named city there were a number of festivities and imposing functions held in his honour, and these included a levee, a State procession, a ball, illuminations, etc. For the pardah party held by the Princess of Wales 50 ladies had received invitations, but it is not known how many actually attended. It is said, however, that most of those who were present have thrown away the pardah long ago and were thus not pardah nashin ladies at all. One of the ladies rendered homage to the Princess in the orthodox style, while the latter distributed silver medals to all the ladies that attended. While the Princess was thus worshipped by the ladies, the Prince received a similar tribute from the leading gentlemen of Calcutta on the maidan. The work of holding golden umbrellas and waving golden chowries over the Prince was entrusted to Nawabs and Maharajas, and after the pūja ceremony was over, a number of devil dances were gone through by Tibetans and Bhutanese. Some of the Bengal leaders who solemnly pledged themselves to pass the year of the partition of their province in mourning took an active part in the dramatic display of loyalty on the maidan. [Elsewhere the paper writes:—If anyone wishes to see how the image of the goddess of loyalty is disfigured by some pseudo-loyalists, let him read a few typical sentences contained in the addresses of welcome presented to the Prince of Wales by the Municipal Corporations of Calcutta and Bombay. In the Bombay address we find it stated that the policy of British rule in India was based on equality, and that British administrators made no distinctions of race or creed, but extended equal facilities of advancement to all. The loyalists of Calcutta tell us that prosperity follows the British flag, and that a thousand symbols of this prosperity are visible in the city of Calcutta. If there had really been an inseparable association between prosperity and the British flag, why should India have been liable to frequently recurring famines? Why should crores of people be required to pass their days in a condition of semi-starvation? Why should the entire subject population be despondent, feeble and discontented? Our Bombay friends assure us that our British rulers do not make any distinctions in governing us. If this had been true, the Congress would never have come into existence at all. Our late Queen-Empress has no doubt given us a solemn pledge that we would be governed on the principle of equality, but it is the duty of her sons and heirs to enforce its fulfilment in practice. Let alone equality, the Indians are not even treated with ordinary courtesy, but are humbled, mortified and insulted at every step. Why, at Calcutta itself the elite of the native community were asked to be in their seats at Prinsep's ghat to receive the Prince and were scorched in the sun as there was absolutely no shelter overhead.

Kathiava Times, 8TH JANUARY 1906.—“A very good example of the feelings of respect and trust with which the natives of India look up to the Heir-Apparent to the British Empire, and of the hopes they entertain about the redress of their grievances at his hands, is furnished by a petition submitted to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales by prominent inhabitants of Kathiawar and Cutch regarding the newly imposed heavy Customs duty of 5 per cent. levied on all exports from Kathiawar and Cutch to British Indian territory . . . The petition is not the first of its kind. Ever since Lord Curzon took it into his Imperial head to inaugurate this harassing scheme, petition after petition has been submitted to the Government of India as well as to the Bombay Government by the merchants and artisans of Kathiawar and Cutch, but as yet nothing has been done to mitigate the sufferings of the people. The present petition very truly remarks that as the poor artisans of Kathiawar and Cutch earn their living by selling most of their articles beyond Viramgaum, they have been reduced to a state of starvation by the levy of the new Customs duty, and that many of them are obliged to leave the provinces of their birth . . . Let us take the industry of Cutch silverware, and let us see how far it has suffered. Cutch silverware is now produced at many places in British India, but the best workmanship can yet never be had outside Cutch. This being the case, when the new duty was imposed the local firms strongly protested, but in vain. They import silver from British India, and after having manufactured it send it back to British territory, but their trade which formerly went on briskly has now suffered a decline. Is this the way in which the ex-Viceroy took pride in having helped Native States? We earnestly hope that the present appeal to His Royal Highness will not go in vain, and that it will also receive favourable consideration from Lord Minto's government, as by the abolition of the present system Government will in no way suffer a loss, while on the other hand, a serious hindrance to the commerce and industries of the Native States on this side will have been removed.”

Sind Gazette, 5th January; Phaniz.—“We are informed that petitions have been submitted by the residents of Sukkur to the Manager of the North-Western Railway and to the President of the Railway Board, Calcutta, praying for the abolition of the tolls now levied on men and animals for the passage of the Lansdowne Bridge over the Indus at Sukkur in commemoration of the visit of the Prince of Wales to Sind from the date on which His Royal Highness passes over the Bridge. We sympathise very heartily with the prayer contained in the petition, and believe that if the request is acceded to, a great boon would be conferred on the people, for which they will be sincerely grateful. The Lansdowne Bridge has now been in existence over fifteen years, having been opened by Lord Reay in March 1889, and it seems to us that the time has come when all tolls thereon might well be abolished. Even to the well-to-do a toll is a source of worry and irritation out of all proportion to the actual money tribute involved, and to the poor it must often be the cause of great vexation and inconvenience. The decision that the new Curzon Bridge, to be opened at Allahabad, is to be free of all tolls forms a precedent for the granting of a similar concession on the Lansdowne Bridge, and no more fitting occasion could be found than that of the visit of Their Royal Highnesses to this Province. We earnestly commend the proposal to the favourable consideration of the authorities.” [The Phaniz, dated 10th January, writes in a similar strain.] Mahratta, 7th JANUARY 1906.—We are treated by a correspondent of the Bombay Times in its issue of Wednesday last to some delicious news about the alleged opposition by Messrs. Tilak and Lajapatrai to the proposition of sending a message of welcome to the Royal visitors to India at a meeting of the Subjects Committee of the Congress. The news is likely to be regarded by some as all the more delicious because it is supposed to be confidential. We have, however, no hesitation in saying that the news is prima facie false. The Subjects Committee's deliberations are confidential, and as a rule no stranger, much less a Reporter of the press, is allowed to be present at its proceedings. On the other hand, if this correspondent of the Times was himself a member of the Subjects Committee, then surely the gross breach of etiquette committed by him in divulging what he saw or heard there must convince the reader-world of his malice towards Messrs. Tilak and Lajapatrai and incline them to accept what he says with caution. There is one piece of evidence which betrays the utterly unreliable character of whatever this correspondent has said. For, he says in his letter that Munshi Madhav Lal, a Pleader (?) of Benares, had taken the Officer Commanding in that part of the country, who had expressed a desire to see the Congress, to a meeting of the Subjects Committee and there felt outraged by the unmannerly observations of the opponents of the proposition referred to above. Now, Mr. Madhav Lal is not a pleader, the Subjects Committee is not the Congress and no one made any unmannerly observations on anything. How can we suppose that the Chairman of the Reception Committee would make such a fool of himself as to actually bring a high European Military Officer to a meeting of the Subjects Committee? But even supposing that to be possible, the rest of the Subjects Committee at any rate could not conceivably be so stupid or idiotic as to allow the presence of a stranger and a European amongst them, especially when a contested proposition about welcoming the Royal visitors was before the meeting! In short the whole account is an apparent tissue of falsehoods, and nothing but the malice of the Times could have induced it to insert in its columns a report like this. We have already shown how improbable it is that a correspondent of the Times or a high Military Officer should be present at a Subjects Committee meeting. And if we may suppose that they acted as spies, then there is an end of the matter for spies may tell anything and spies are never believed but hanged.”

SELECTION FROM ENGLISH PAPERS OWNED BY NATIVES OF MADRAS AND FROM VERNACULAR PAPERS PUBLISHED IN MADRAS, FOR THE WEEK ENDING 13th JANUARY 1906.

Svadesamitran, (Madras).—The Svadesamitran of the 12th January state that the proposal of Mr. Morrison, late Principal of the Muhammadan College at Aligarh, that the Viceroy of India should be a member of the British Royal family, and that there should be a Governor-General subordinate to him for conducting the administration of the country, is not likely to benefit India, so long as there is no Parliament here composed of Indians to criticize freely the actions of this Government as in England. In the opinion of this paper, before a member belonging to the Royal family is appointed as the Parliament

Viceroy of India, the people of this country should be granted political privileges, i. e., they should have a Parliament of their own and should be able to criticize the actions of the Governor-General.

Andhraprakasika, MADRAS.—The Andhraprakasika of the 10th January says that the poor people in England ventilate their grievances through the columns of newspapers and obtain redress, but that it is not the case here in India. There is no way whereby the ryots could represent their circumstances to the authorities. So His Majesty the King-Emperor should himself take their condition into his consideration. The paper therefore earnestly prays that Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales will help the people by representing to His Majesty their hard condition, so that those statesmen who are sent out here to rule the country may be instructed to try to ameliorate the distressed condition of the people. Stating that there are many good things which England can do for India, it hopes that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales will do the needful getting himself well acquainted with the condition of the people.

The following is from the Arya Messenger (Lahore) of the 9th January 1906:—

"The Maharaja of Darbhanga made a munificent offer of one lakh of rupees to the Prince of Wales as a memento of his visit to the Indian metropolis. The Prince who was pleased to accept it, donated Rs. 90,000 to the local Medical College and the rest to the Lady Dufferin Hospital. In our opinion, though the equipment of a Medical College fulfils a real want of the public, the endowment of a technical institution with the same would have been still better. Had the Maharaja been better advised, he would have either founded a technical institution bearing the name of His Royal Highness, or endowed the Prince of Wales' Technical scholarships to Indian students to enable them to complete their education in foreign countries. In this way, we think, the memento would have better served the real interests of the Indian people."

The Paisa Akhbar (Lahore) of the 12th January 1906 publishes a communication from Maulvi Abu Said Muhammad Husain, Editor of the Ishayat-us-Sunah, who takes the Paisa Akhbar, the Watan, the Siraj-ul-Akhbar, &c., to task for finding fault with the Prince of Wales for having gone into the Jumma Mosque, Delhi, without putting on shoe-coverings. The Prophet, he adds, has ordered that Musalmans can go into mosques and say their prayers with clean shoes on. This being so, they should not imitate the example of Hindus and Sikhs, who are forbidden to take shoes into their places of worship. The writer concludes by promising to revert to the subject at some future time and quote extracts from the Quran and the Traditions in support of his contention.

Mohini.—The Mohini (Kanauij) of the 9th January, says that though the Prince of Wales has now been in India for two months, he can hardly have learnt anything about the real condition of the people, his time having chiefly been taken up by the Government officials, Maharajas, Rajas, Nawabs, and well-to-do titled, native gentry, who are the last men to give His Royal Highness an insight into the true state of things in the country. The true condition of the Indians is not what the Prince might infer from the pompous displays of wealth and riches he has witnessed wherever he has gone. The great majority of the people have been reduced to great straits owing to the ever-recurring visitations of famine, and a multitude of taxes; so that if the Prince happens to carry back to England an impression of India's prosperity on account of his not being allowed to know anything of the inner life and misery of the people, it will indeed be a great misfortune of India. If His Royal Highness desires to gather a correct knowledge of the people, that might be useful to him in future, he would do well to read some of the leading native papers, and graciously accord interviews to those promoters of the Indian National Congress who have been devoting their lives in order to ameliorate the condition of their fellow countrymen, and keep the Government well informed of their actual wants and grievances. The editor in conclusion prays His Royal Highness to get India relieved of the burden of some of the taxes in commemoration of his visit to this country.

Indian People.—The Indian People (Allahabad) of the 11th January, says:—It seems a real pity that Allahabad has been left out of the programme of the Royal tour in India, for during the Kumbh Mela the site of the confluence of the Ganges and the Jumna will present a spectacle which cannot only not be seen anywhere in India, but nowhere else in the world. The Kumbh comes round only once in twelve years, and it is nowhere so impressive a sight as at Allahabad. At Hardwar, for instance, the pilgrims and the sanyasis are scattered over a wide area, and one has to wander over the whole camp to form an idea of the number of people assembled. The way to the Brahma Kunda, where the pilgrims bathe, is through a single street lined with high houses on both sides. At Allahabad the scene is quite different. Standing on the high riverside of the Ganges, or inside the fort one can command a bird's eye view of the entire wonderful panorama—the groups of the huts with their distinctive flags floating over them, the wonderful groups of sadhus assemble in front of them, and the moving masses of humanity coming and going at all hours. Nothing would had been easier than to arrange that the Prince of Wales should witness the great bathing ceremony from either the riverside or the fort. It would have left an indelible impression upon his mind and would have been alone worth a visit to India. Being in the country, it is to be greatly regretted that His Royal Highness should miss witnessing one of the most wonderful sights that can be seen anywhere in the world.

Etawah, 6TH JANUARY 1906.—A second exodus of fugitives from Gwalior is occurring: the labourers left some time ago when scarcity was first established, and now the Thakurs and petty zamindars are coming across. They allege that they have had to leave because an attempt is being made to collect revenue, which they cannot pay because their fields are bare. They also allege that the revenue was originally either remitted or suspended but that, owing to the great expense to which the Maharaja was put by the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, he has decided that he cannot afford to remit any revenue.

15TH JANUARY 1906.

Daily Mail.—Gwalior, December 26th.—At Gwalior—where the Prince and Princess of Wales spent Christmas—were three men whose family history is an unwritten romance. They are descendants of military adventurers, who through five generations have served the Maratha House of Sindia. Sir Michael Filose—the portly and dignified greybeard who sat at table with the Franciscan monk—is Chief Secretary or Prime Minister to the Maharaja. Educated in England he returned to Gwalior and Architect and engineer to the State, head of the Education Department and Chief Justice. These three positions he held at one time until the death of the late prince sent him to govern the rich province of Malwa.

When the present ruler attained his majority Sir Michael came back to Gwalior as Prime Minister, and his son, Captain Joseph Filose, was installed in his place. Sir Lawrence Filose—the spare, alert veteran—is Sir Michael's brother and aide-de-camp to His Highness. His son, Major Sir Clement Filose, who speaks with an Irish accent and is married to an Irishwoman, is also of the Maharaja's suite.

The origin of the family is obscure. Tradition says that its founder was a muleteer named Jean Baptiste, who arrived in Calcutta toward the close of the eighteenth century. The family version is that Jean Baptiste was the son of Michael Filose—an Italian who found himself in India in 1770, and with the patronage of a French adventurer called La Fontaine secured employment under the Nawab of Oudh. Jean Baptiste Filose was adopted by M. La Fontaine. This may be a fable. It cannot be disputed, however, that the founder of the family was one of those daring European adventurers who made war for the native princes and lived Homeric lives in the early days of the eighteenth century. I imagine he must have been this same Jean Baptiste, for about him has been woven the family legend. La Fontaine took the boy to Calcutta, where he was taught French and Italian, and made substantial progress in Persian and Arabic. At Delhi he received instruction in the science of war. Though only twelve years old his confidence was unbounded. When the Emperor ordered M. La Fontaine to send an army against the Nawab of Saharanpur, Jean Baptiste offered to lead the expedition, and in support of his claim quoted the Persian couplet:

While the sword is in the sheath its temper is unknown.

The pearl of price is unvalued till hung in the ear.

No Frenchman could resist such an appeal. After reflecting long on the boy's ability and great promise, La Fontaine unbuckled his sword and girded it on the boy with the words, "Go forth, my son. Take this as your commission, and win or die."

To avoid mishap, Monsieur sent with his sword two regiments of infantry, four guns, and a body of cavalry. With these Jean Baptiste put to flight Bhumbi Khan and his army of Pathans, captured the fortress of Saharanpur, and remained in possession for three months. At the end of that time his soldiers demanded their pay, and threatened to seize their young commander as a pledge. But Jean Baptiste got wind of the plot, mounted a swift horse, and, evading pursuit, rode back to Delhi, where he was "joyfully received by his adopted father." The Emperor of Delhi made him a captain on the spot, and gave him a regiment. Very creditable this for a boy of twelve! If in your unromantic mind lurks any doubt about the authenticity of this history, it may be removed when I add that M. La Fontaine immediately packed this budding Napoleon off to school again, and married him to the daughter of Major Adam Peacock.

Matrimony released Jean Baptiste from the pedagogue, and made him a colonel at the age of seventeen. But his real adventures began when he took service with the House of Sindia, the slipper-bearer, who wrung a kingdom from the Moslems and camped upon it till his title was undisputed. Colonel Jean Baptiste Filose—to give him the family style and title—was fortunate in his choice of a master. Sindia was the representative of a captain of reavers, who annexed all the territory he could lay hands on, and was occupied in extending his boundaries at the expense of his neighbours. The Mogul Empire was tottering to its fall. The Rajputs, famed for prowess in the field, were divided among themselves, and there was none to resist the forays of the Maratha horse-men, who swept with fire and sword through the length and breadth of India.

Happy in his comrades, Jean Baptiste Filose was not less happy in the hour of his appearance on the troubled stage. The chief of the Maratha House of Sindia had died, and there was a dispute about his successor. The principle of personal government is acknowledged among the tribes of India, but a certain license is permitted in its application. Where everything depends on the vigour and competence of the ruler, the sanction of heredity is subject to conditions. Poison and the knife serve the same end as the elective principle, and a long reign is usually a strong reign. It appears to be the habit of the House of Sindia to have no direct heir—the present Maharaja is the first direct successor, and he has no child.

When Colonel Jean Baptiste Filose took service there arose the customary quarrel, for the Maharaja Madhoo Rao Sindia died without naming his heir—being a prudent man, and having no desire to sleep with his fathers before the appointed time. The favourite, however, was Doular Rao, son of one of his nephews. But the 'widow had another, successor in view, and Nana Fadnavis—Minister to the Peshwa, who had usurped the power of their masters and from Prime Ministers had become Monarchs—also had designs. Jean Baptiste Filose saw his chance, and took it with prompt courage. Secretly, and with despatch, he installed Doular Rao on the throne, and obtained for him the khillat of recognition by the Peshwa. But the path of the kingmaker is hard, and one service demands another. Nana Fadnavis had attempted to bribe the Italian with a present of two lakhs of rupees. Colonel Filose very properly informed his master, who doubtless showed his gratitude in some equally substantial form. But in order to avoid the possibility of miscarriage the new Maharaja persuaded the colonel to invite Nana Fadnavis to an interview. Trusting to the honour of a European soldier, the Minister of the Peshwa came, and was promptly clapped into prison. Disgusted at this treachery, Jean Baptiste Filose threw up his commission, and the Maharaja appointed Fidele Filose to his father's place.

The career of "Jean Baptiste" was not ended. He went to Delhi, where his adopted father made over to him all his offices and estates, and secured for him the hereditary post of Lord High Treasurer. But this gilded ease did not suite the active temperament of the adventurer and he was soon in the field again "collecting revenue" from reluctant chiefs. His success as tax commissioner roused the jealousy of the French General Perron, who had succeeded the famous De Boigne as commander-in-chief of Sindia's forces. Perron had no wish to have another European poaching on his preserves, and put Jean Baptiste under arrest. After ten months' confinement in Delhi he was released, and appointed commandant of the city by order of the Maharaja, who was now master of Hindustan. But the Maratha raiders had reached their zenith, and Lord Lake came upon the scene only just in time to save the Rajputs from extinction. Jean Baptiste owed no allegiance to the British and continued to serve his master, even venturing to punish chiefs who had taken sides with the British. Again he was the victim of his own success. Holkar accused him of complicity with the British and of his want to seize the person of the raja. Arrested, once more he was released, and sent to collect revenue after the manner of the Maratha raiders.

Passing from conquest to conquest, the fame of Jean Baptiste spread throughout Central India until the British appeared on the banks of the Chambal and the redoubtable adventurer withdrew to Gwalior, where, in the wars of his descendant, "he presented his nuzzar before the Great Sovereign of the Universe."—(WILLIAM MAXWELL.)

Indian Daily News.—During the Royal visit to Calcutta

the Hackney Carriage Department provided carriages for Their Royal Highnesses' staff, and the Military Secretary has written a congratulatory letter to the Chairman of the Corporation, thanking him for the excellent arrangements and the good condition of the gharries.

Morning Post.—One sometimes wants a word to express what is sight-seeing where there is nothing to see. There are places of pilgrimage, for instance, where not a monument of their great moments remains, and where it is thought and not sight that must do the seeing. At Delhi, for example, where, from the Prince of Wales downward, we all went sight-seeing, there is more really to feel than to see, for while not one of its buildings can stand for the best of its type, or age, or style in India, two memories remain to it which cannot be matched elsewhere.

One of these clings to the Ridge where through four torrid months, with a country flaming into revolt and disaster happening everywhere around us, we fought against overwhelming odds for the ownership of India—the Campagna, over the miles and miles of the ruin-strewn sands to the south of Delhi, where once stood cities more wonderful than any India knows to-day, cities that were sacked, burned and that grew again, fort and temple and palace, with new names and new rulers and new religions, but always with an undying pomp and splendour and pride of Empire, under Afghan or Persian, Hindu or Mughal. Nowhere in the world do the past and present lie so close together and yet so unrelated and unconcerned. The faithful still team forth on certain fête days in their thousands, trudging the miles on foot or piled on ekkas, to the tomb of Humayun or the shrine of Nizam-ud-din, and the traveller when less time-harried than usual, sets apart a day or hires a motor for the journey to Kutab Minar.

But these things, though part of dead Delhi, are not the parts by which the impress of her greatness and desolation comes. It is the wreckage strewn over these fifty square miles of plain, wreckage rarely worth a visit, the sinking domes of mosques, the ruinous Ram Yantras and gnomons of the astronomers, the piles of palace walls, the pavilions fallen in palace gardens, the broken fountains, the shattered aqueducts, the silted tanks; the earth laden everywhere with the masonry of bared foundations and of crumbling walls, over which the blown sand settles and the lean goats search for food—these, and not the few perfect monuments that remain, are what speak as one drives for hour after hour through the waste of them of the vain dreams of men, and of their splendid, ineffectual struggle with relentless destiny.

If one cannot feel these things among the ghosts of Delhi has made the Ridge of Delhi a bye-word for heroic determination, have suffered somewhat by the lapse of time. True there is a monument, planted in red Gothic unsightliness on the crest of the long hill, telling of our losses in those desperate months, but against this, should any find it an assistance, must be set the growth of the trees which now hide the walls not only from the Ridge, but from the nearest of the breaching batteries. From the Ridge, indeed, very little of the city is to be seen; the uppermost outline of the fort beside the blue Jumna, the marble domes and towers of the Jama Masjid alone emerging of the eastern part of it above the sea of green. Yet something remains to the Ridge, a strange, pervasive spirit of palace, some essence of that undaunted valour which, repulsed, fever-stricken, and surrounded, would not hear of defeat. That remains among the bare broken rocks whether it be unknown effluence wrung from human passions which haunts like an odour the places where it has been spent, or merely the sympathetic intuition that great deeds may evoke; yet in India crowded as it is with brave adventure, there is no spot, not even the Residency at Lucknow, which the sense of struggle seems so vividly to pervade. For those sensitive to these pulsations of the past there lies near Agra another chance of feeling them. Twenty miles and more off the road to anywhere, Fatehpur Sikri escapes the more cursory of the sight-seers' attentions, yet he would not be far wrong who should esteem it one of the wonders of the East.

Is there anywhere a city built at a great monarch's whim which was scarcely lived in before it was deserted, and which still stands untenanted save by the jackal and squirrel, with its grandeur and beauty scarcely touched by time's unrestrained erosion of over three hundred years? The great Akbar built it, the man whose kingly qualities surpassed those even of Genghiz Khan and Muhammad of Ghazni; great as a soldier, as a philosopher, as an administrator, as a legislator, and as a man. Blessed with an heir when he had ceased to hope for one he turned his back on Agra, and here on this mountain of leopards decreed a capital as a tribute to the saint who had promised him the son. Though its walls were six miles in circuit, and its great buildings are carved and painted and inlaid, it took but seventeen years in building, and for only the last three or four of these was it the home of Akbar's Court. Then suddenly he left it; none knows why. The reasons given are mere guesses; lack of water, unhealthy surroundings, a caprice of the saint, but nothing is certain save that here he built a royal city, with pleasure houses for his queens, halls of debate for his pundits, courts of justice for his people, and then abandoned it to the wild beasts and to the bats. There is proof still in the stones of Fatehpur Sikri of the religious breadth of Akbar's mind, for here, Muhammadan though he was, Jain, Zoroastrian, Jew, Jesuit, and Hindu was each permitted his place of worship, and from a study of their several teachings was evolved that "Divine faith" of the Emperor which, too wise and calm for the needs of man, only endured so long as its first high priest was living. But of greater interest than temple or palace there is in the great red courtyard of the Mosque the tomb of the saint Shaikh Salim Chishti, built in lattice work of white marble, like an ivory casket, the size of a house; and the majestic Baland Darwaza, the Gate of Victory, insolent, unforgettable, a gateway, a mere gateway, close on two hundred feet high, set on the verge of the hill, the steps of its sandstone terraces sloping steeply down towards the plain. From immediately beneath you can get scarcely a glimpse of it, it is set up above you so high in heaven, but as you go out across the dusty levels, mile beyond mile, by unseen villages and with new horizons, the splendid arrogance of that great arch, upraised still within sight of you, ten, twenty, thirty miles away is revealed. For when the temples and the palaces sink out of sight and the very hill on which it stands is lowered to the horizon, you realise that for no building of man's hands was it designed as a porch, this Gate of Victory, since no habitation can be imagined which it would not overwhelm. It was not to a city that it was designed to give entrance, but to a soul, to that victorious spirit which founded on the small State his father left him the Empire of the Mughals.

Morning Post.—This boundless outlook, this vast gateway to nowhere, was the most perfect expression of the man which he could find; who with all his wisdom, learning, and wide experience was conscious of achieving nothing but a point of view, a place of fancy to the Beyond; who, having built a city to amuse his fancy, wrote on this the last and greatest work of it: "Said Jesus, on whom be peace." "The world pass over it, but build no house there. He who hopes for an hour may hope for eternity; the world is but an hour, spend it in devotion; the rest is nothing."

From the top of the Baland Darwaza, far away, low down on the horizon like a floating pearl, can be seen the white dome of a building which is the very opposite of Akbar's porch, its beauty, its strangeness, and its sex. Akbar's grandson built it, not to himself but to his wife, not as a gate of victory, but as a shrine of love, and just as the intention is very commendable, so is the temple more fair; yet from the haughty estrangement of the great gateway to the tender traceries of Mumtaz Mahal's tomb a space of decline is measured in the story of the Mughals, a decline from arrogant hardness and masterful ambition to pomp, magnificence, and love. It needs no imagination to discern the femininity of that white tomb at Agra. The strange thing is that one feels not only that its inspiration was a woman, but that it was just one sort of woman, and a sort of woman that one does not know. The charm is there, exquisite, incontestable, but its fascination is exotic, unfamiliar; one sees, marvels, admires, but one does not understand. Yet one understands enough to differ, and especially from those who find the charm of the Taj assisted by the light of sunset and of the moon. So to think is to miss its most magical quality, its coolness. Though made all of white marble it takes the fiercest sun upon its face without the least glow of heat or lustre. The brighter the glare the deeper the blue shadows in which it veils itself, for its walls are made of hollows in which shadows can hide, so that, despite its exposure it breathes of reticence, of something which the eye of day can only send into closer hiding. It is these vaulted walls that make it seem so exclusively feminine, the portrait of a woman who has always something which she did not show, as well as one of whom light could only make more lovely. And these shadows are not the black gloom that settles under Gothic arches, but, falling on the white marble curves, they are all pure colour, the mingling of clear purple and unfathomable blue. At standing square as it does, proudly symmetrical, it is from these shadows that it steals the variety which it seems to scorn, so that without full sunlight those subtle differences are lost to its four faces, which makes its effect as portraiture more feminine still. For the white front on which the sun falls is silent, distant, demure, with scarcely more of shadow than would dim an eyelid. But in the walls on either side of it, where the marble hollows are half full of blue air, there seems to lurk some tenderer, more familiar trait; while from the further face, where all is shrouded whiteness, the symbol-woman seems to smile at you: grave, still, and silent, but understanding. And that is perhaps the strongest part of one's impression, the sense of being deductively at a disadvantage, as though what recognition, what comprehension there was came not from oneself but from the shrine. It may be that this air of knowing but another of the architect's fine devices for adding still further to the femininity of his effect, part of the mystery woven of the whiteness and the shadows and the precious stones which gives it such intriguing opportunities for surprise. One would like to know if it was by design that the inner dome acquired its astounding resonance.

As one passes through the doorway out of the sunshine one is in darkness as black as a vault, nothing visible before one but the ghostly vagueness of the marble trellis that surrounds the tombs. Yet the gloom changes as the eye grows used to it to a soft clearness which seems as lucent as the outer air, and in which can perfectly be seen every shade of jasper, jade, topaz, and turquoise, malachite, lapis lazuli, and cornelian, coral, onyx, and amethyst, with which the marble is so consummately inlaid. While the eye can grow familiar with the design and colour the ear can make nothing of the reverberations that roll like the roar of the sea about the domed roof. Every sound made, not only in the central chamber but in the encircling but quite excluded corridor about it, is caught up and multiplied and over-toned by the roof, so that only when the shrine has been empty for some seconds it is completely silent. Then if a single note is sounded the strangeness of the echo may be heard, for not till the note has almost died away does the decepted repetition come from the dome, with over-tones as clear as though they had been played on the pipes of an organ, each as it is sounded being echoed and over-toned in turn, the vibrations blending in harmonies ever more chromatic and interwoven, and growing higher and softer and fainter till the ear can hold them no more.

Pioneer.—It was a happy thought on the part of Rai Sarat Chundra Das Bahadur, writes the Statesman, to organise, in connection with the Buddhist Text and Research Society, a repetition, at the Dalhousie Institute, of the Tibetan dancing which was exhibited before the Prince of Wales. An agreeable feature of the proceedings was the offering of congratulations to Professor Satis Chandra Vidyabhusan on his appointment to the dignity of Mahamahopadhyaya. These preliminaries over, the Tibetans, who had descended from their mountains to take part in the native entertainment arranged for the Prince and Princess of Wales, came upon the scene. When they appeared before Their Royal Highnesses their performance was limited to a few minutes and it was hard to discover any spiritual meaning in their maimed rites. Yesterday they were not stinted for time, and many were curious to see what impression would be given by their unabridged ceremonies. By way of announcing the entrance of the performers, Tibetan musicians played an overture in which long horns uttered a prolonged groan, while timbrels clapsed and the drum resounded to the blows of a sickle-shaped drumstick. While the music was in progress the Black-hat Lama Exorcists danced wildly in order to rouse the spirits from slumber. In response to the evocation the spirit of the stag pivoted into the arena set apart for dancing. He was a fearsome object, his "get up" for the part consisting of a mask shaped like the head of a horse, to which white antlers were attached. The evolutions which he executed were varied and spirited. He danced, whirled round, and sank to the floor for all the world like an equine ballet dancer. The lion spirit and spirits of other beasts followed, but were content with less attitudinising. This terrific group was followed by the geni of the snowy mountains, and finally the Buddhist ghosts emerged from their cemeteries and were quickly joined by the Brahman clown. Both the ghost, garbed, to resemble skeletons, and the clowns taught the same lessons—life's unrealities and hollow mockeries. The performance concluded with the Grand Lama's dance, which seemed to have no special moral. The immediate inference with the rites suggested was that different nations derive their spiritual nutriment in different ways. Symbolical dancing, in which the Tibetan mind can read the riddles of life and death, left the Western spectator amused, but unmoved by the moral stimulus. We take our diversions in various ways. To the Tibetan the antics of the clowns were, apparently, exquisitely funny, and even the impassive musicians could not refrain from delighted smiles, whereas the Western man and woman failed to detect the humour. Probably the late Dan Leno would not have tickled the Tibetans. During evening the South Entally Philharmonic Association rendered several selections of quaint music with such excellent effect as to provoke the question whether some arrangement could not be made to enable the Calcutta public to hear this band in the Eden Gardens or elsewhere. It is wholly unimperial not to give a hearing to a novel, but agreeable, portion of the music of the Empire.

Rangoon Gazette.—The visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Upper Burma, and their presence, as representing the Royal family of England and specially the reigning Sovereign, in Mandalay, the last capital of the Burmese Kingdom, are events of no ordinary importance.

As the Royal train steams into Mandalay on the 16th and the Prince receives a loyal welcome from all communities collected to do him honour he will doubtless find it hard to realise that it is only twenty short years since Upper Burma was under Burmese rule, and that Mandalay was the capital of the Burmese King. Of the story of the annexation of the country as the direct result of the folly of the last King and his advisers, enough has been written, and, though no doubt many Burmans still affect to believe that the British expedition came to Mandalay merely to make a treaty, and surreptitiously removed the King, the true facts are by now matters of history and well known to all who care to know them.

In Mandalay the Prince of Wales will find himself among a loyal and contented people, bent only on enjoying the Royal visit as a Burman well knows how; and, as he gazes on the holiday crowds in their gay silk dresses, backed by the Moat and wall of the old Burmese Royal City, he may gain some insight into the true character of the merry Burman and perhaps also divine something of the causes that led to the fall of their kingdom. In Mandalay the Prince will see, side by side with traces of its former splendour, many of the conveniences of modern life, of which, twenty years ago, there was no thought or sign. He will arrive in a luxuriously appointed train, and immediately on leaving the reception pandal will cross the rails of the perhaps unromantic but convenient electric tramway which has been lately added to the stock of modern improvements in Mandalay, and will drive by wide and good roads to Government House.

Much of the old-time Mandalay has no doubt perished in fires, but out of the ashes has arisen, Phoenix-like, a town which while retaining much of the charm and romance of its earlier days, has added thereto many practical advantages which have now become inseparable from its everyday existence. No longer are the streets either left wholly unmetalled, or paved (if such it can be called) with large boulders thrown promiscuously about. No longer are pigs and dogs the official scavengers of the town, nor are the streets left to drain themselves on the simple principle that water will eventually find its own level, if you only give it time. The mere mention of the earlier state of things, which have now almost faded from the memory of its inhabitants, shows what material progress Mandalay has made.

It is true they are only details, but, even so, they are symptomatic of other and deeper changes that have come over not only Mandalay, but the whole of Upper Burma. They stand for law, order, and progress, as against disorder, repression, corruption, and greed. We take it now as a matter of course that a man may by honest means amass as much money as he is able to, and spend it, if he has a mind to, in building a sumptuous house, and surrounding himself with such comforts as he cares to. Yet it was not always so, and one of the most crucial differences between former days and to-day in Mandalay is to be found in the fact that under Burmese rule, the possession of wealth was a sure signal for the attacks of predatory officials, with the result that a man who was making money either spent it in gaining merit in the next world to save being robbed of it in this, or took the risk of secreting it and feigning poverty.

The Prince of Wales will visit what now remains of the Mandalay-Palace and it is certainly a pity from one point of view that the central spire and Lion Throne should just now be dismantled. With Burmans tradition and convention die hard, and though it is not a bad way of smoothing over the past to ignore it altogether, it is just possible to overdo it. When Viceregal Durbars have been held in Mandalay, the scene has always been laid in the Queen's Audience Hall in the Western Palace. We ignore, perhaps correctly, the fact that the Western Palace was the women's apartments which Burman tradition regards as very inferior, and that a Burmese King would as soon think of holding an audience there as of swimming round the Moat; but we perhaps forget that by our persistent refusal to hold any official ceremony in the Eastern Hall, or to use the Lion Throne, there is accumulating in the minds of the simple Burmans a feeling of certainty that we do not because we dare not. According to Burmese tradition, the ascent of the Lion Throne by any aspirant to kingly power is absolutely essential while anyone who, without title, ascends the Throne and proclaims himself King will assuredly go mad or fall into other evil fortune. When Viceroys have visited Mandalay the reason for not using the traditional audience hall of Burmese monarchs has been that part of it was appropriated for use as a church, but even that did not prevent Lord Curzon, who knew the Eastern mind intimately, from remonstrating at being given the Western Palace for a Durbar. Now, however, the church (which, of course, was not a consecrated building) no longer occupies part of the Eastern Palace, and the Heir-Apparent,—the Lord of the Eastern House in Burmese thought—is coming to Mandalay. What then happens? The central spire and Lion Throne are dismantled and so perforce cannot be used, even if we had a mind to use them.

But if Mandalay has changed and progressed since the annexation, how much more is this true of the country as a whole. Nothing can express this change more clearly than the fact that a dacoit has now become practically as extinct as the Dodo. There is no organised gang in existence anywhere in the country, where only some fifteen or sixteen years ago no district was without several gangs. The country simply swarmed with armed ruffians, and neither life nor property was safe. Not only have they been swept from the country side, but now even tales of dacoit exploits have the air of mediæval romance, and seem to belong to another place and age. With the disappearance of this cowardly "patriot," and the persistent administration of the laws, Upper Burma has become as peaceful as Piccadilly, and safer. From the time when, in 1886, it was converted from a native anarchy into a British province it has slowly but surely progressed in the path of peace and prosperity. In 1897 it was created, together with Lower Burma, into a Lieutenant-Governorship by Royal Proclamation, and now another landmark has been added to it and the final seal of approval been placed upon the administration of the country by its inclusion in the tour of the Heir-Apparent to the English Throne and His Royal Consort. The Royal train from Rangoon is due to arrive in Mandalay at 4-30 p.m. on Tuesday. The Middlesex Regiment, with band and colours, and the Upper Burma Volunteer Rifles will supply guards-of-honour at the Railway Station. The officers receiving Their Royal Highnesses will be Mr. G. W. Shaw, the Hon'ble Maung Ba Tu, Mr. D. H. R. Twomey, General Plowden, Major W. Strickland and Major Townsend. In the Station yard the Municipal Commissioners will present an address of welcome, which will be read by Maung Tha Nyo, A. T. M., Honorary Secretary of the Reception Committee. After His Royal Highness's reply, a procession will be formed, Colonel Peile, Inspector-General of Police, leading the way, the route followed being 78th Road, South Moat Road, West Moat Road, South-West Gate, the Mall and Chief Commissioner's Road to Government House where the Lieutenant-Governor will receive Their Royal Highnesses. At Government House there will be a guard-of-honour of the 90th Punjabis.

On Wednesday the Arakan Pagoda, the Zegyo bazaar and the Palace will be visited; in the afternoon there will be a garden party and boat races, amongst the crews being Inthas, whose method of rowing was described in these columns on Saturday: in the evening there will be pwes at the place. After visiting the pwes Their Royal Highnesses will drive to the river side and embark on the Japan for Prome.

The Japan will leave at 5-30 a.m. on Thursday arriving alongside Pakokku at 1-50 p.m., and anchoring off Salemyo at 6-30 p.m. At Paunglin, which will be reached on Friday morning, there will be a duck shoot, nine guns taking part. The Japan will anchor above Minhla on Friday and arrive at Promé on Saturday afternoon, the Royal train leaving at 10-10 p.m. and arriving at Barr Street jetty about 6-30 a.m. on Saturday.

Rangoon Gazette, 12th January.—The occasional firing of minute guns advises one of the coming into Mandalay of the Shan Sawbwas and other chieftains from their respective states to be present at Mandalay for the reception of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales. Several of these chiefs have a large number of followers, and Mandalay is pretty lively. Some of the followers have come into town with drums and musical instruments, and pwees got up either by them or for them appear to be affording no small entertainment in some quarters of Mandalay. During the cold weather it is not an uncommon thing to see Shans, Karens, Chins, Panthays and others pouring into Mandalay. They generally bring in goods and take others in exchange. In case of there being no alternative they sell their wares and buy what they want. They generally bring in bees' wax, honey, bones, Shan bags, amber, jade, rubies and other precious stones, even ponies and larger articles, while they take away with them blankets, beads, glassware, crockery, cutlery, medicines and such articles, which are of great use to them, but cannot be had in their country. Now there are more than the ordinary numbers which pay the usual annual visit to be seen in Mandalay, a large portion of them being followers of Sawbwas. It is a gay sight to watch these people clad in different costumes according to their racial distinctions flocking at the Zegyo or visitings shops. With very unpretending appearance they visit Messrs. Rowe and Co.'s or Whiteaway, Laidlaw's, but pay well and buy expensive articles in the shape of rugs, etc.

The silver casket prepared by the Burmese silversmith Saya Kye for presentation to Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, is now ready, and is on view at Messrs. Rowe and Co.'s shop to-day, and to-morrow it will be placed at Messrs. Whiteaway, Laidlaw and Co.'s establishment for the public to see it. The casket, which is made of pure silver, stands about 16 inches from the ground and is of an oblong shape; its whole length is about 30 inches and breadth 24 inches. Four leopards guard it on four sides at the terminal of its length and breadth. It is a two-step casket with pierced work and other intricacies of carved ware. The top surface of the second step is richly engraved. In the centre is an image of Buddha. The receptacle in which the address is to be placed is in the form of a roller with a good deal of carving and pierced work about it. In the centre on smooth surface plate are the words "Presented to Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, 1906." This roller-shaped receptacle is supported on the shoulders of two beeloes with drawn daggers in each hand. Around the base of the first circular steps are fourteen dials of embossed work each showing some legend or part of a legend in Burmese tradition. These figures are of the virgin whiteness of the metal without polish, and therefore show to advantage in contrast with the parts of the metal which have been burnished. Around the second circular step of the casket are also fourteen more such dials of smaller size, seven on each side of the two peacocks at either end of the breadth of the casket. The casket is a good specimen of Burmese handiwork.

A Mandalay correspondent writes:—The address to be presented to Their Royal Highnesses by the President and members of the Mandalay Municipality is printed in gold letters on white satin. On the borders are hand-painted illustrations of scenes in Mandalay. The top of the main front contains a view of the Palace facing Government House. At the righthand top corner is a view of the South Moat, and on the left corner is the West Moat with an illustration lower down of the Assembly Room of the Ministers in the time of the Burmese Kings. At the foot of the address on the right side is a peacock, and on the left is a garden scene representing the prosperity of the country. The road by which the Royal party will drive from the Railway Station to Government House is lined by posts decorated with flags. Opposite the Fort Gate on West Moat Road at the junction of C. Road and West Moat Road is the pandal erected by the Municipality which will command a fine view when the Royal party drive out from the Fort on their way to the Arakan Pagoda. At the end of Merchant Street there are three pandals close together. On the road to the Arakan Pagoda, there is the pandal of the Fokien Chinese. The waters of the Moat on the western part of North Moat Gate are being cleared, and the boats are in readiness for the regatta. In connection with the police arrangements, besides Messrs. Roberts and Murray, three other Assistant Superintendents, namely, Messrs. Lucas, Campbell, and Macfarlane, are told off for duty here. Messrs. Gadsden and Lloyd are the additional District Superintendents of Police.

Times.—RANGOON, January 14th.—The brilliancy, picturesqueness, and spontaneous enthusiasm of the reception of the Prince and Princess of Wales by Rangoon have shown that Burma is ready and able to challenge comparison with any of the older provinces of the Indian Empire.

Rangoon, or Ran-kun, being interpreted, means "the end of war"—a name which might well stand as synonymous with the advent of British rule throughout the length and breadth of our Indian Empire, but which is perhaps nowhere more fully justified than in the great seaport of Burma by the security and prosperity which the par Britannica has at last conferred upon its people.

Little more than a century has elapsed since a British factory was for the first time established at Rangoon and a British Resident was appointed to the Court of the Kings of Burma. Though the maritime regions, now known as Lower Burma, together with Assam, which was also originally a Burmese province, passed successively into our possession after the wars of 1824 and 1852, it is only 20 years ago, on January 1st, 1886, that Upper Burma was formally annexed to the British Empire and, as the penalty of Theebaw's atrocious misgovernment, the old Burmese kingdom ceased to exist. Yet to-day Rangoon already stands high amongst the cities of the Indian Empire, with a population of nearly a quarter of a million, where 50 years ago there were barely 20,000 souls, and a trade inferior only to that of Calcutta and Bombay. The greater part of its wonderful growth dates from the extension of British rule to the upper valley of the Irawaddy. Its docks and wharves and shipyards minister to a seaborne trade which, having almost exactly doubled during the preceding five years, represented according to the latest available returns (for the year 1904) a value of over £17,000,000 and a steam tonnage of 1,500,000 tons. More than a third of the whole export and import trade of Burma passes through Rangoon. The abundant surplus production of the vast ricefields of Lower Burma, whose fertile soil in some cases yields as many as three and even four crops in the year, goes to feed the teeming millions of India proper. The oil-wells of Upper Burma already compete largely with Russian and American petroleum in the Indian markets. In the great timber yards and sawmills, prosaic machinery is fast superseding the trained elephants whose handling of the giant logs floated down from the virgin teak forests of the Burmese highlands used to be one of the sights of Rangoon. The cultivation of cotton is already full of promise. The finest rubies in the world come from the famous ruby mines of Togok, and the Shan States are beginning to produce sapphires.

Of all this wealth Rangoon takes its toll as the chief commercial and industrial clearing-house of Burma. Long lines of rice-mills and saw-mills and timber depôts do not add to the picturesqueness of Rangoon, but they are tokens of a prosperity which is more agreeably manifest in its public buildings and in its spacious streets and busy bazaars, and, above all, in the beautiful gardens and parks studded with lakes which surround the European cantonments, themselves embosomed in the evergreen luxuriance of the stateliest tropical vegetation. But though Rangoon chiefly owes its prosperity to the incorporation of Burma with the Indian Empire and to the civil and military administration with which the Government of India has endowed it, this is not an Indian city any more than Burma, except for administrative purposes, is part of India.

In this modern city where Europeans and Burmese, Hindus, and Chinese jostle one another in a kaleidoscopic confusion of types and races, where the Burmese population has in fact been completely outnumbered by immigrants from Southern India and Bengal, where the ubiquitous Chinaman asserts his superiority as a trader scarcely less irresistibly than the European his superiority as a ruler of men, where each nationality has imported its own pursuits, its own amusements, and even its own style of architecture, where the crowded street-cars are already in process of electrification, and where Western civilization seems to constitute the only common denominator of all these incongruous fractions of mankind, as distant feature and colour and costume as in habits and traditions and ideals, it is difficult at first sight to tell which is the really preponderating element. But there is one monument essentially Burmese that still dominates Rangoon, that still embodies the soul of a nation. Raised on a solitary mound, partly natural and partly artificial, which has been shaped into two rectangular terraces rising clean-cut one above the other, the Shwe Dagon pagoda, like a huge golden bell tapering away into a shaft of gold, soars up into the blue sky to a height of some 370 ft., or nearly as high as St. Paul's—the holiest and noblest shrine of a creed which still commands the allegiance of a larger proportion of the human race than any other, and, according to Buddhist traditions, the most ancient of all its shrine. For its foundations were laid, they assert, even before Gautama was born, on a site sacred throughout the ages, to receive the relics of the three Buddhas who preceded his manifestation. In its present shape it is known to have existed for the last three and half centuries, and not only from all parts of Burma, but from China and Japan as well as from Siam and Ceylon, it is the goal of countless pilgrims who come to lay their offerings at the threshold of its holy of holies. Come whatever changes may, the Shwe Dagon will still for centuries be the one great landmark of the Burmese delta, the one supreme expression of the genius of the Burmese people.

Beautiful as is the life-story of the founder of Buddhism, admirable as is the Buddhist gospel of infinite pity and self-renunciation, a cheerless pessimism would seem to be logically the dominant note of a religion which teaches that existence is and can be naught but suffering, and that the highest form of moral endeavour is slowly to climb through successive existences the painful ladder of selfishness until the sense of individual existence is completely extinguished and lost for ever in the perfect peace of non-existence. Yet it cannot necessarily be so, for Buddhism counts amongst its votaries the two peoples of the East whose whole being tingles with the joyousness of life, the Burmese and the Japanese. Cast in a softer mould, the Burmese may not possess the sterner qualities which temper the Japanese joie de vivre, but they have in an almost higher degree than the Japanese that sunshiny disposition, that naive and almost childlike power of enjoyment, which so long prevented superficial observers from taking Japan seriously. It is this which, even more than the widest distinctions of race, of language, and of creed, marks at first sight the difference between India and Burma—India, the land of hoary antiquity which even in its most gorgeous aspects is apt always to wear a look of unutterable weariness and sadness, as if weighed down under the accumulated burden of countless ages, and Burma, the land of perennial youthfulness where life seems to be a perpetual festival of sunshine and colour and smiling gladness.

What is the secret of this difference? Some maintain, and probably with truth, that it lies very largely in the position assigned to woman in the social structure of the two countries respectively. In India woman has been for ages eliminated as far as possible from every outward manifestation of social life. Behind the purdah and in the recesses of the zenana the Indian woman is condemned to live and move and have her being from her cradle to her grave. A power within the walls of her own house, and in certain stations of life and under quite exceptional conditions a power even in the government of the State, she is a power ever veiled and unseen. We at home are so accustomed to the all-pervading influence of the ewig weibliche in our midst that we hardly realize its gracious significance until we come to an Eastern country where it has been banished from the open; and even in an Eastern country there are so many other things almost equally strange to us that we are apt to miss the full import of this particular phenomenon until we pass into another Eastern country, equally full of unwonted sights and wonders, but where we find ourselves once more restored to the benign presence of the "eternal feminine." And for feminine grace and charm, alertness of mind and sweetness of temper, the Burmese woman holds a remarkably high place. That she is an essentially womanly woman can be gathered at once from her dainty gait, her ready tongue, her rippling laugh, and the exquisite sense of colour and finished neatness shown in every detail of her dress. But she is much more than a mere butterfly to gladden the eye. She is not only a wise and thrifty housewife, but she often develops singular aptitude for business. Nowhere in India, except amongst the Parsees and the Christian communities of Cochin in Southern India, is the standard of female literacy so high as in Burma, and this is doubtless entirely due to the absence of all prejudices in favour of the seclusion of women. The Burmese woman is, in fact, everywhere en evidence; in the market place, in shops and counting-houses, in the Buddhist temple and in her own home, in every social and religious function of Burmese life, modest and self-possessed, mindful alike of the privileges and of the responsibilities of her sex.

So startling is the contrast in this respect with India that the Burmese woman is apt to make one overlook the Burmese man. Yet the absence in Burma of that rigid system of caste which exercises so benumbing an influence upon Indian society is almost as noteworthy as the absence of the restrictions which have cramped the activities of the women of India. Merry and easy going, the Burmese man is perhaps, if anything, a spoilt child of nature, which has lavished its fruits upon him in return for a minimum of toil. As a handicraftsman he exhibits both imagination and execution, whether in the carving of wood and of ivory, or in the working of gold and silver, or in the weaving of delicate silk tissues. As a husbandman he is not unskilful, though very conservative in his ways, and content for the most part to rely on the unaided munificence of his favoured soil. But he possesses neither the methodical intelligence of the European, nor the muscular endurance of the Tamil, nor the plodding tenacity of the Chinaman. He revels in bright clothes and long-drawn holidays. He loves to smile and to be smiled upon, and to bask in the warm sunshine of life, whilst his yellow-robed priests, in return for the offerings he never grudges them, "make merit" for him in the world or worlds to come.

Like Japan, Burma might well be called the paradise of children, and the children gathered together to the number of over 15,000 along the processional route were certainly the most striking and beautiful feature yesterday of the reception by Rangoon. There were boys and girls of all ages and of every community—Chinese and Hindus, Parsees and Mahomedans, Indians, Eurasians, and Europeans, as well as Burmese; but the Burmese were first in numbers and easily first in daintiness of appearance. Arrayed in all their bravery of delicate coloured silks and muslins, the little Burmese girls especially, grouped on their tiers of seats, looked for all the world like clusters of variegated flowers. Under one elaborate pandal, or Burmese pavilion, red and gold, arching the route, were gathered together some 200 little maidens belonging to the principal Burmese families, wearing costly dresses, many of them overlaid with jewels which used to be worn at the Court of the Burman Kings, while opposite them, as a picturesque foil, sat rows of pupils and novices from Buddhist monasteries in the plain yellow robes common to the whole religious world of Buddhism. Every young Burman is expected to devote one year to pious studies and meditation in a Buddhist monastery.

Their Royal Highnesses appeared greatly to appreciate the children's display, and the Royal carriage halted several times to receive their offerings of flowers. Indeed, throughout the whole route, which from the wharf where they landed from the launch Togo—both the Renown and the Terrible drawing too much water to come up the river—passed under a succession of triumphal arches, each erected by a different community to Government House, where the Prince and Princess are the guests of the Lieutenant-Governor, Sir Herbert White, and Lady White, the scene was one of genuine popular rejoicing rather than of official pomp or military display. This was also a characteristic feature of the ceremony yesterday afternoon, when the Prince opened the Victoria Memorial Park, and of this afternoon, when Their Royal Highnesses visited quite privately the Shwé Dagon pagoda.

Englishman.—MADRAS, January 15th.—His Highness the Maharaja of Travancore, who was expected to arrive in Madras on the 22nd instant, in connection with the Royal visit, is suffering from an attack of chicken-pox. It is feared that he may not be able to pay the intended visit to Madras.

Indian Daily News.—RANGOON, January 14th.—This morning the Prince and Princess paid a visit to the timber yards of the Bombay and Burmah Trading Corporation, where they saw elephants working timber. They were received by Mr. Lacey, the Local Manager of the Company. This afternoon a garden party will be held at Government House at which a number of Shan and Karenni Chiefs and ladies will be present along with representatives of the frontier wild tribes and the Burman and Indian communities. After dinner to-night, Their Royal Highnesses will see the illumination of the Royal Lake and Dalhousie Park, and cross the lake in a decorated Karawick to the Boat Club shamiana where the prize for the best illuminated boat will be given. They leave afterwards for Mandalay arriving there at 4-30 p.m. to-morrow, stopping at Shwemyo, Kume Road, and Thazi, where officials will be presented.

The garden party at Government House this afternoon was made remarkably interesting by the presence of the Shan and Karenni Chiefs and Princesses and their attendants, and the representatives of various tribes of Karens. The ornaments of these latter were strikingly barbaric, beads and brass being used in profusion, the Pyro women having brass tubing coiled round their legs and large brass hoops round their necks; the women of another tribe had towering head-dresses circled by ropes of beads, while another set were distinguished by head-dresses of coloured cords. In contrast to these costumes were the rich plush and silk of the Shan Chiefs' attendants, many of whom carried gold and silver bowls, while others held gold and yellow and white silk umbrellas. All these interesting people were gathered in a space behind Government House decorated with Burmese tapestries. When the Prince and Princess appeared here the Shan attendants held white silk umbrellas over their heads, while the Sawbwas and Wyozas were presented, and Their Royal Highnesses walked round the square of the frontier tribal people.

Thereafter groups of the tribes performed strange dances. A company wearing black trousers and white jackets and turbans, and women in sombre dress relieved by scarlet scarves went through a sort of quadrille to a chant accompanied by bamboo wind instruments and split bamboos which rattled together; a set of Padaung men and women, the latter wearing great coils of brass round their necks, next gave a remarkably quaint exhibition. They closed hands closely, forming a semi-circle, and swaying backwards and forwards and bending at the knees in precisely the manner of inebriated persons, slowly circled round to a low dismal despairing chant. It was an extraordinary performance not without a strong comic effect to the on-lookers, though the singers seemed to be afflicted with tragic melancholy.

To-night the illumination of the Royal Lake and the Dalhousie Park were very beautiful. The Princess handed to the Coroner a prize presented by the Boat Club for the best decorated boat, and thereafter Their Royal Highnesses drove to the station, leaving for Mandalay at 11.

The Royal special and the supplementary special train will leave Howrah for Madras on Saturday next. The party travelling by the trains will include the Earl and Countess of Shaftesbury, Lord Crichton, the Hon'ble Derek Keppel, Captain the Hon'ble W. Cadogan, Captains Makins, Hill and Ashburner, and Maharaja Sir Pertab Singh of Idar.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The illustrated papers have now turned their attention to Lucknow in connexion with the travels of the Prince and Princess of Wales, and many pictures are given of the places of interest and renown in your fair city. The "Special correspondents," too, are having their say respecting the Oudh capital, and there have been the usual descriptive articles in several of the morning papers. Of course, in each case, the Residency is dealt with as the chief "lion" of Lucknow, and the famous inscription on the tomb of Henry Lawrence is quoted. The Times "special," misled no doubt by an error in Mr. Forrest's "Cities of India," speaks of the inscription as "Here lies Henry Lawrence, who tried to do his duty. God have mercy on his soul." In this connexion it may be mentioned that the Standard suggests some celebration of the centenary of the birth of Lawrence on June 23 next. Writing on Monday, it recalled the fact that when the King, then Prince of Wales, visited Lucknow, Sir Joseph Fayer, one of the survivors of the defence, pointed out the chief places of interest in the city. It appears from the telegrams that the Royal visitors of Tuesday had a similar advantage, as they were under the ciceroneage of Colonel Bonham, who was a young artillery officer at the time of the siege and was wounded. Mr. Chirol speaks of the grouping of all the survivors of the siege who could be brought together as constituting "a strangely interesting and pathetic gathering." "The Residency," he justly observes, "is a matchless monument of the heroic dead—men, women and children, more than 2,000 in number, who sleep there their last sleep, and a national shrine to which no son of an English King, visiting his Indian dominions, could omit a pious pilgrimage." Altogether, the visit of the Prince and Princess to Lucknow is reported to readers at home to have been highly satisfactory.

Madras Mail.—BANGALORE, 14th January.—Preparations for the Royal visit are progressing, and I note that in Cubbon Park tiers of seats are being arranged for the accommodation of spectators in the stands at the unveiling of the Victoria statue. This is an improvement upon what was thought to be possible at first, and no one could possibly have taken more pains in a very difficult matter than the First Assistant Resident has done.

The Royal Visit Fund has now reached a total of Rs. 3,810.

A programme has been issued giving all the details of the various functions in which Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales will take part during their visit to Bangalore. Their Royal Highnesses arrive at the City Station at 8-30 A.M. on Monday, the 5th February, and the various functions in which they will take part are as follows, in chronological order:—Unveiling the statue of Her late Majesty Queen Victoria, the Banquet and Reception at the Residency, the presentation of Colours to the Carabiniers and the inspection of the Station Hospital, the Garden Party at the Residency. Their Royal Highnesses leave Hyderabad from the Bangalore City Railway Station at 10-30 A.M. on Wednesday, the 7th February.

Rangoon Gazette.—The following is a note on the tribes in the Southern Shan States, of which representatives have come to Rangoon.

The Karens:—Family, Indo-Chinese; sub-family, Siamese-Chinese; group Karen; sub-groups, fifteen in number—Sgau, Pwo, Mopgha, Taungthu, Karenni or Red Karen, Bre, Mano, Sawngtung, Padaung Zayein, Banyang Zayein, Kawn Sawng, Yintale, Sinhaw Mepauk, Yimbaw, and White Karen. The Karen tongue in its various forms is spoken more or less along the whole eastern frontier of Lower Burma from Mergui to Toun-goo, in portions of the delta of the Irrawaddy, in the south-west corner of the Shan States and in the five feudatory States of Karenni. The total of the Karen-speaking population on the 1st March 1901 was 711,408. The Karens are divided into three main tribes, the Sgau, the Pwo, and the Bghai, and the three principal dialects follow this division. Roughly speaking the Sgau and Pwo dialects are confined to Lower Burma, while the Bghai is the speech of the Northern most tribes whose habitat is Karenni and the Southern Shan States. The feudatory States of Karenni are five in number comprising an area of 4,830 square miles and containing a population of 45,795 (1901), of which one-half is Red Karen. Representatives of the following groups have been brought to Rangoon on the occasion of Their Royal Highnesses' visit:—Red Karen, Yintale, Bre, Padaung, Bampa, Bawhan, Banyok, and Taungthus.

The Karenni (or Red Karen). The term "Red Karen" is due to the fact that the men wear breeches reaching to just below the knee. A sleeveless dark coloured coat or red and white striped cotton blanket is also sometimes worn. Some sort of handkerchief is generally twisted round the hair which is tied in a knot on the top of the head. Small metal pear-shaped earrings are also worn, the material depending upon the wealth of the person. The women wear a short skirt reaching to the knee. Usually it is dark coloured, but sometimes it is red. A broad piece of black cloth passes over the back across the right shoulder and is then draped over the bosom and confined at the waist by a white girdle tied in front. Round the waist and neck are ropes of barbaric beads and a profusion of these also decorate the leg just above the calf which also is encircled by innumerable garters of black cord or rattan; round the neck in addition to beads the more well-to-do women hang pieces of silver. Silver ear-rings are also worn, many of huge size. A piece of black cloth is thrown jauntily over the head, sometimes with red tassels. The Red Karen nearly always goes abroad armed with a dah and gun and is practically never seen without a spear. They are, with very few exceptions, spirit worshippers and they sacrifice to appease the wrath of the spirits. The animals usually sacrificed are pigs, dogs, bullocks and buffaloes: fowls are also commonly used for this purpose. The Red Karen does nothing of the slightest importance without first consulting fowls' bones. He consults them to know where he should pitch his village or his house, whether he should undertake a journey, whether he should marry a certain girl, and, if so, on what day, when he should sow and where; in fact he does nothing without authority from fowl bones. Every event of importance is celebrated by a great consumption of fowls, pigs, and much drinking of liquor. Children are generally betrothed at the age of five or six: with the dead are buried clothes, arms and farm tools and also gold and silver. A wealthy Red Karen prepares his coffin long beforehand. In some cases they are handsomely decorated inside with mirrors and pieces of coloured glass. The Karanni, as a rule, do not tattoo anything on their bodies with the exception of a representation of the rising sun in red on the small of their backs. Formerly every Red Karen was thus tattooed, but the custom is falling into disuse.

Zayein or Sawng-taung Karens are to be found in the States of Loilong and Mongpai. When they are about fourteen years old all boys are made to live in a building called a haw just outside the village and live there till their marriage. Marriages are only permitted between near relatives and then only when the union is approved by the elders. The parents of the young man make the selection and send three brass leg rings in the name of their son. The girl signifies consent or rejection by wearing or sending back the rings. If she consents the parents of both make a great feast; the nats are propitiated; and eating and drinking are carried on for three successive days. Elopements or marriages with other races are rare and the offending persons are forbidden ever to enter their native village. Polygamy is not permitted, nor divorce. When a person dies, all the relatives assemble for a feast in the presence of the corpse. When this is over the dead body is put in a coffin and a live cock is tied to one of the big toes. Articles habitually used by the deceased with a small quantity of rice, nuts, sweets and liquor are also put into the coffin and buried. The funeral takes place in the early morning and the relatives standing round the grave join in a chant, saying: "Go, go, and when you meet your ancestors give them these presents and tell them we are all well." The Zayeins are spirit worshippers, but are being gradually converted to Buddhism.

Banpa Karens:—A sept of Zayein, so called from the Banpa village, the headquarters of the Zayeins. The villagers are Buddhists and can intermarry with three other villages. The women wear a short white smock turned up with black round necks, arms, sides and down the back and front, round the bottom is a pink border three inches wide. This blouse or smock, occasionally ornamented with shells, reaches half-way between the hips and knees. Below it is worn a short skirt white with black red and black border. Many ornaments are worn and the head-dress is very elaborate and striking.

Banyang or Banyok Karens also belong to the Zayein group. They are only found in the village of Banyin in the Loilong State and in Karathi, a village in the Yamethin district. There is no giving and taking in marriage as with other races, and it is only when a high official like a Taungsa visits the village that there are any marriages at all. He orders a couple to be married and married they are, just as a man may be sworn of the peace. The men are said to be very averse to marriage and have occasionally to be taken by force to the bride's house. There is nothing against widows remarrying and divorces are not permitted. It is not surprising to hear that the clan is gradually dying out. There is no ceremony or feast in connection with a death or birth. The corpse is wrapped up in a mat and the villagers draw lots as to who is to carry the body out of the village and bury it. The men are much given to hunting and are very fond of their trained dogs. Once a year special offerings are made to the three guardian spirits on behalf of these dogs. It is a very solemn ceremony and women and strangers are excluded. The Banyang do not use gold or silver or precious stones. The men wear a short jacket with shells sewn all round the body, back and front. The women's dress is something like the Banpa dress. Men and women wear necklaces of strings of beads, brass toques and brass armlets with coils of brass rings on the legs. At the age of 14 or 15 black cotton string is tied tightly round the forehead.

The Bre.—This tribe of Karens is called Bro or Manu-manaw by the Burmese, Pramano by the Red Karens and Laku by themselves. Their country covers an area of 600 square miles and forms a portion of the territories of the Karen Chieftains of Bawlake and Kyebogyi and of the Shan Chief of Mongpai. They live at altitudes between 3,000 and 6,000 feet and are a very timid people. The southern Bre women wear a long blue gaberdine with a blue petticoat striped horizontally with pale red. No brass ornaments are worn and no head-dress, but enormous ear plugs are fixed in the lobes of the ear which is much distorted. The Northern women wear a white and pink striped gaberdine with a narrow pink border and under this a short deep blue and red petticoat. Brass tubing is coiled round the leg from the ankle to the knee and from above the knee to half way up the thigh. Large brass hoops are worn round the neck and ear plugs in the ears. There is no head-dress; the hair, which is very unkempt, is tied in a knot at the back of the head. It is an easy matter to single out the married from the unmarried man. The bachelor wears stone necklaces which have been handed down from father to son for generations, and he ornaments his neck, ears and the cotton round the calf of his leg with large rings of brass. The Northern Bre in addition to all this wears a band round his head studded with mother-of-pearl shirt buttons or small red and green beads as a setting to the wings of green beetles. But when the man marries all this finery goes to his wife. The Bre of both sexes during childhood stain their teeth black, using for the purpose the leaf of a tree mixed with lime juice. The Bre are spirit worshippers and number 4,000 persons.

The Padaung or Kekawngdu.—The Padaungs are found in the Karenni States of Kyebogyi and Bawlake and in the Shan States of Mongpai. Their country is an area of 150 square miles. The dress of the women is most peculiar. They wear a neck band of brass rod, which varies from five to twenty-five coils according to the age of the woman. The rod is about one-third of an inch in diameter and the object is to lengthen the neck as much as possible, this being a mark of beauty. The girl begins to wear them as early as possible and fresh coils are added as she grows. The head-dress is a coloured scarf twisted into the hair and the coat is a long woven blouse with a V neck and short arms. The skirt is a short striped blue and red garment reaching to the knees. They are spirit worshippers and they number rather less than 10,000 persons.

The Lisaw, Lahu (Muhso), Akha belong to the Lisaw subgroup of the Burmese group of the Tibeto-Burman sub-family. The Lisaws are scattered through the country on high ranges; the Lahu and Akka are found in the Kengtung State.

Akha (Shan Kaw or Hka-Kaw).—The largest and most widely distributed of the Kengtung hill tribes. Three divisions are recognised—the Pu Li, the Na Li, and the Tao Sa Mi. They worship the spirits of their ancestors, as well as the spirits of the hills, rivers, etc. Pigs and fowls are offered as sacrifices. The chief spirit is known as Mi Hsa. At every village there are large gateways, generally two, called La Kawng, which are said to be put up to show the boundary of the village. Spirits seeing these structures recognise the village limits, and, if properly propitiated, will stay outside. Polygamy is recognised. One rupee is paid to the parents of a girl when she is sought in marriage. The husband gives a feast to the whole village and spends as much money on it as he can afford. Divorce is easy and is obtained by making a money payment to the woman. The children are always kept by the husband. The dead are buried and it is customary to place clothes with the body, but not money.

The Kaw.—They grow nearly all the cotton produced in the Kengtung State. They are a heavily built, dusky race with lower jaw abnormally developed. Outwardly they resemble Chinese in many ways and show clear signs of Chinese influence. The men's dress is practically that of the Shan or the Chinaman, coats and trousers dark blue or black, turbans occasionally red. The dress of the women consists of a short coat which stops a long way short of the next garment, a sort of kilt, which reaches from the waist half-way down to the knee. The head-dress varies with the clans and with most is rather striking. The simplest form is that of two circlets of bamboo covered with dark blue cotton stuff and ornamented with studs, bosses, seeds, spangles or beetles.

The Palaung, Wa, Tai Loi, Rieng (Yang Lam, Yang Sek, Yang Wan Hkun) belong to the Wa-Palaung group of the Mon-Annam sub-family of the Indo-Chinese family. The Palaung are found scattered about on the tops of the highest ranges in the country. The Wa are found in a block of country in the Northern Shan States and China border. The Tai Loi are found in Kengtung and across the Chinese border and the Rieng villages are found amongst Shan villages on the rolling hill country which stretches from the Mongnai State to Hsenwi.

Wa.—They inhabit hills in the north and north-west of the Kengtung State and like the Wa further north appear to belong to the same race as the Palaung or Rumi. They are spirit worshippers. The men generally wear a loin cloth and go bare-headed, but in many villages the Shan trousers and turban have been adopted. Polygamy is permissible but is not much practised. At a marriage a feast is given to the whole village and presents made by the bridegroom to his wife's parents. He may live with and work for his wife's family, or he may set up house for himself at once. Divorce is unusual, but a man can get it by paying a small sum of money to the woman. The dead are always buried. The great spirit sacrifice of the year is held just before the fields are sown. Fowls, pigs or any other animals may be sacrificed. The Wa held all the valley lands of Kengtung before they were driven out by the Hkon and Lu. The clans, of which there are said to be five, are distinguished by the waist-cloth, which is striped or chequered in various patterns or in different colours.

Tai Loi (Hill Shan) is the general name given by the Shans to a Wa people who have adopted Buddhism, and with it to a certain extent Shan dress and manners. They inhabit the higher hills between Hsip Hsawng Panna and the Kengtung central valley, and are the most advanced of the Kengtung Hill peoples. Several families live in one house. Their marriage customs are the same as those of the Hkon. They bury their dead except hpoongyis (monks) and very old men, whose bodies are burnt. They sacrifice and make offerings to spirits.

Palaungs are found scattered through the Shan States, but are most numerous in the Kodaung tract of the Ruby Mines district and the tea-growing State of Tawngpeng. They are held to be a respectable, law-abiding community, live at high elevations, usually in barracks containing several families. Their language has been placed in the Mon-Annam family. The men wear trousers of the Chinese pattern, jackets and coloured or plain turbans. The women wear a dark blue cutaway jacket with a stripe or red broad cloth round the neck and down each side. They wear a long red and blue striped shirt with coils of ornamented cane hoops round the waist. Leggings are also worn and ear and wrist ornaments. The head-dress consists of a dark blue turban with parti-coloured ends and long strings of bends and seeds (Job's tears) ending off with long pieces of coloured tape or string. Unmarried women who can afford it wear a silver hoop round the neck. They breed pigs and poultry and grow Indian corn, rice (where possible), tea, cigar wrappers and opium (where allowed). All are Buddhists, but very superstitious. They attend bazaars and pagoda festivals and mix freely with the other races.

Yang Wan Kun.—So called by the Shans from the Wan Kun circle of the Laihka State, which is the stronghold of the tribe. They are also to be found in parts of the Mong Nai State and are of the same stock as the Yang Lam and of Wa or Palaung origin. They are followers of the Buddhist religion and like the other hill races propitiate the nats (spirits) with offerings. They are very timid and are not at all disposed to answer questions. The women wear a petticoat and bodice of dark blue homespun. The bodice is elaborately embroidered and ornamented with beads. Round the waist they have coils of thin bamboo or cane varnished with wood-oil like those of the Palaung and Kachin women. Similar rings garter the legs below the knee. The Yang Wan Kun take their amusements stolidly. A line of men one or two of whom play the pipes, place themselves opposite to an equal number of women. Both sing softly, but the dancing consists of the least possible motion of the feet and bodies.

Yang Lam.—They are found throughout the whole strath or stretch of undulating plain between Mong Nai and South Hsenwi. Their language shows them to be of the same stock as the Yang Hsek and Yang Wan Kun and to be remotely connected with the Wa and Palaung. Mixed villages of Shan and Yang Lam are frequent, the outward distinction being in the dress of the women, who wear a closed skirt, belted round the waist and reaching nearly to the ankles. It is made of dark blue homespun and a jacket of the same colour and material completes the dress. The effect is sombre, but the dress is modest and becoming. Bamboo instruments are played and the music produced though very monotonous is not unpleasant. The Rieng population is 3,094. The people are Buddhists but also worship nats or at all events propitiate them with offerings.

"Karaweik" is the name of a fabulous bird; "hpoung"—a barge, and "daw" means Royal. Karaweik hpoung-daw means the Royal "Karaweik" barge. This bird is supposed to be specially noted for the sweetness of its voice. No birds known to the Buddhist world are possessed of the excellent qualities of this bird. As the King is considered the Lord of land, so is this bird the lord of birds. From this the Burmese deduce that a barge having the form of this bird is the only one suited for the use of Royalty. The Karaweik hpoung-daw is therefore, meant for the King's use only. The one used last night by Their Royal Highnesses at the Royal Lakes is constructed similarly to those formerly used in Mandalay by the Kings of Burma. The barge is towed by six Burmese racing boats (called loughlay) in two lines of three each. Each boat carries 8 to 10 men. There is another boat in the centre, between the two lines of boats, which carries 18 men, including the crew and musicians. When the barge has been put into motion the musicians perform their part by following the songs sung by the crews (or hpoung dawtha).

The following songs (composed by Saya Ba) were sung by the boatmen towing the Royal barge in which Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales were conveyed across the Royal Lakes:

Timed according to ordinary strokes.
—Our King-Emperor who is of the lineage of world Emperors (Mandat) and who, on the Lustrous Throne of England, was crowned; Our King-Emperor who, from the middle of his Golden Palace, sheds lustre and spreads glory all over India, like the resplendent Sun over the Universe; Our King-Emperor under whose beneficent Power, which comes from the Solar Orb, a hundred Kings take protection; Our King-Emperor who enjoys His Imperial pleasures in the Golden Palace in London and, with especially distinguished intellectual powers, rules over a kingdom whose inhabitants are like the "Nimmanarati" gods, delighting in self-created pleasures; for the long-life extending over a hundred years of our Sovereign's Heir-Apparent and of His Royal Consort, the Princess of Wales, who is like a wreath of the much-prized "Tazin" (orchid) flowers on a bed of roses, we always and for ever pray; the Illustrious Royal Couple comes from out of the Palace of flowers to distant seas, on board the Renown surrounded on all sides by the blue expanse of waves after waves, for the Royal Tour throughout the Indian Empire, escorted by Guards of Honour and amidst echoes of the Royal Salute from the Artillery; Oh! what a natural longing there would be at heart for the Imperial Father and Royal Mother.

2nd Song. Timed according to rapid strokes.—The world famed Crown-Prince and His Royal Consort the Princess of Princesses tour together accompanied by troops and by a large number of men-of-war on high seas. Oh! what a magnificent sight it would be! India surrounded by the blue waters of sea and a network of high hills rising to the azure vault above, and with its magnificent forests and rivers, is indeed a delightful country; the Royal Visitors have arrived in India with splendour and glory like that of the golden Lotus or of the waxing silvery moon.

3rd Song. Timed according to slow strokes.—That Burma, by the Imperial power and glory of Your Highness will long flourish, we hope; We hope also that the Empire will become more and more famous in the world's history of the future, when Your Highness will rule over it; In the Indian Empire the golden Rangoon is a famous city inhabited by different nationalities and varied races of mankind; We hope, too, that the multitudinous inhabitants of this important Province will thrive and flourish even like the golden Lotus of the "Kondala" Lake in water; fervently we of Burma pray for the longevity and prosperity of Your Highness and of the Chief of Princesses.

4th Song. "Yegin" Tune sung by the River Patrols.—The Heir-Apparent who spreads Glory over land and water and His Royal Consort, the Crown Princess who shines like the Lunar Orb, have, from out of the Gorgeous Palace, come to Burma and it is high time for the people to be happy and cheerful; the people of this Province, King's numerous subjects, earnestly and fervently pray for the centenary rule of Your Highness.

In the evening the Royal Lakes and Dalhousie Park were illuminated in honour of the visit of Their Royal Highnesses. The Prince and Princess arrived in Dalhousie Park at 9-30 p.m., having driven past the Boat Club and round by the Switchback road. In the Park they were received by Sir Harvey and Lady Adamson and Mr. and Mrs. Hartnoll, and the album of views, prepared under the direction of the Reception Committee, was presented to the Princess by Lady Adamson. Shortly afterwards the Royal party embarked on the karaweik poung, accompanied by their suite, the Lieutenant-Governor and Staff, Lady White and Miss White, Sir Harvey and Lady Adamson, Mr. and Mrs. Hartnoll, Mr. J. Short, Mr. J. Wilson, U Po Tsee and U Paw Tun, and were rowed across the lakes, disembarking at the Boat Club enclosure, where the Royal visitors were received by Mr. and Mrs. Laurie.

The original idea of the illuminations, we hear, was Sir Walter Lawrence's, who thought it would be a pleasant feature of Rangoon's welcome if a scheme like that accomplished in Dalhousie Park during Lord Curzon's visit could be carried out. The Reception Committee did the best thing they could under the circumstances by entrusting the whole arrangements to Mr. Short, the Municipal Secretary, whose genius in planning and skill and energy in carrying to happy performance are well known to the present generation, as to past generations, of Rangoon folk. Rangoon owes a deep debt of gratitude to Mr. Short for the success of his labours, which were apparent to all, in spite of the effects of a heavy shower which fell during the evening and destroyed whole sections of the work so carefully built up. Nevertheless, more than sufficient remained to make the scene one of remarkable beauty. Dalhousie Park and the Royal Lakes in normal times make up a picture of woodland and water that could hardly be surpassed for quiet beauty; but last night with the lake encircled by myriads of lights, its expanse covered with numbers of daintily illuminated boats, the picture was one that can never fade from the memory. The houses in the vicinity had all joined in the project and were tastefully illuminated, many of them lavishly and beautifully. Nor did Mr. Short's efforts cease at the Lakes, and the continuous toil for the past four months that has been entailed by that portion of the scheme, but the route to the station was also beautifully illuminated by him—the Victoria Memorial Park, the Agricultural Gardens, the Victoria Avenue, Belmont compound, the Flotilla Company's chummary compound, the Railway over-bridge, Montgomery Street, and the outside of the Railway Station up to the Station building itself. Fortunately the rain spared most of these and the effect was very grand. The whole scene of beauty might fairly be described as the triumph of one man's skill in carrying out the mandate of the Rangoon public to leave nothing undone in expressing the loyal wish of every inhabitant of Rangoon that Their Royal Highnesses might carry away with them some happy memories of Rangoon and its people.

The Royal visit to Rangoon closed last night when Their Royal Highnesses left privately shortly after eleven o'clock, the two other special trains having preceded them at 10 P.M. and 10-35 P.M., respectively. The station had been very prettily decorated for the occasion and never looked better.

This morning a Royal salute will be fired from the Pagoda platform, marking the end of an ever-memorable visit. To-day early tea will be served at Thawatti and breakfast at Shwemyo at 9-20. At Shwemyo the inhabitants have erected a pavilion and arrangements have been made by Mr. Rigg, Deputy Commissioner, for the reception of Their Royal Highnesses. Lunch will be served at Kume road in a similar pavilion, Mr. Todd-Naylor and Mr. Gaitskell being present to receive the visitors. Mandalay will be reached at 4-30 P.M.

In order to give every one an opportunity of seeing the fireworks which could not be availed of last night owing to the fete at the Dalhousie Park, the display fixed for last night from on board the three men-of-war in harbour has been put off till to-night.

The ladies of the Methodist School are giving a social at the school premises, Lewis Street, to-morrow at 8 P.M., to which men from the Hyacinth, Perscus, and For have been invited.

17TH JANUARY 1906.

Bystander.—If for no other reason, the visit of the Heir to the Throne and his Consort would be remarkable, because of the reception which was given them by the native ladies of Calcutta to the Princess the other day. The mysteries of the Zenana are jealously guarded on the Calcutta side, where the Hindoo has not imbibed the liberal views of the West in the matter of domestic life to the same extent as his countryman on the Bombay side. In Bengal, the native lady is very jealously guarded from the vulgar eye of outsiders, and, in fact, never unveils except in the presence of her husband. A public meeting of ladies is therefore something of the most revolutionary nature, and the husbands of Bengal, in allowing their loyalty to over-ride their prejudices, may unconsciously have given the first impetus to the comparative freedom of the family, which, if it comes about, will not be at all a deplorable state of affairs.

Englishman.—Rangoon arranged to speed her royal guests with the most beautiful illuminations ever seen on the graceful lakes. As soon as the sun sank below the horizon the trees burst into huge rose red blossoms and were lit by myriads of gigantic fire-flies. The fringe of the mire was ringed with soft white lights and the rustic bridges were etched with fire. Each dinghy punt and canoe glowed with soft colours and was ready to join in the procession of flaming barges. Then an utterly unexpected storm broke over the lake and marred everything. In a few moments the Chinese lanterns were dabs of parti-coloured pulp and half the little butties were extinguished. Heroic efforts were made to repair the mischief and with a certain measure of success, but much was beyond immediate remedy. The lanterns were irretrievably ruined and as the Burman will not climb trees after dark their inky blackness was unrelieved.

But although marred the water carnival was still most picturesque and the central feature was little affected. Soon after their arrival the Prince and Princess embarked on the Karawell state barge which was crowned with a triple pagoda roof prowed with giant grotesques and splashed with light. In this they were towed gently across the lake by Burmans in their narrow canoes. And as they towed the native musicians in the central boat raised the strange haunting melody of the Burmese boat song. The lead came from a shrill-toned oboe accompanied by the gentle beat of gongs and cymbals and bamboo clappers, and the refrain was taken up in perfect time by the strong voices of the rowers mellowed by distance. In the van a lithesome Burman postured in the strange national dance and the cadence of the song rolled over the unruffled lake. Then around the Royal barge clustered tiny canoes each bearing a huge coloured lotus. As Their Royal Highnesses approached the leaves fell apart and revealed a dainty little Burmese maiden who joined in dance and song. The charm and originality of the spectacle heightened the regret that it was robbed of its full effect by the most untoward rain. It was a relief to pass from the steamy heat of Rangoon into the pleasant dryness of Upper Burma and into the well timbered upland scenery the line runs through as soon as it emerges from the deltaic districts.

It was pleasant also to find at Mandalay and on the road thither the joyous Burman in his pink and white dress, his head bound with a narrow fillet predominating. But even in placid Mandalay Their Royal Highnesses were surrounded by evidences of the troublous days when the gentle Burman with his dah and his gas pipe gun made the newly annexed kingdom an inferno for his conquerors and his compatriots alike. The escort was composed of long-legged Sikhs on such tats of Pegu ponies that their spurred heels almost touched the ground, representatives of the military police recruited in Upper India to beat out the decoity which became almost universal after the deposition of Thibaw, a detachment of sturdy Kachins, flat-faced Mongolians in khaki and scarlet with their dahs stuck in gaily bordered belts. They stupefied the traditional British policy of taming the wild tribes by making soldiers of them. And all along the route stood to arms the men of every branch of the force that terrified Thibaw into surrender and brought a country twice as large as France within the British Empire.

At the station there was the usual Municipal address to which His Royal Highness in reply said:—

"Gentlemen, it is a great pleasure to the Princess of Wales and myself to visit Mandalay and to see the picturesque and interesting head-quarters of Upper Burma. I thank you heartily for the cordial welcome which you have given to us and I am confident that your kind efforts to make our stay in Mandalay agreeable will be crowned with success. I wish that I could have stayed longer with you, for in some ways Upper Burma possesses a peculiar interest, in that it is the latest addition to the British Empire. If I may judge from what I have heard and from what Penlop of Bhutan would visit Calcutta, the fact was represented as indicative of a change from bad to good in the relations between the Indian Government and that of Bhutan. That was hardly correct, for from 1865 to 1904 the relations had been simply negative on the part of Bhutan, whilst the Indian Government was always willing, but unable to render them more positive. When, after the war of 1864-65, the Assam Dwar was added as an annexation to the already annexed Bengal Dwar, a small subsidy was paid annually to Bhutan as compensation for the loss of a great part of its former revenue. For forty years the Bhutanees wrapped themselves in a cloak of seclusion, confining their relations with the British to the receipt of the annual subsidy. No European could penetrate into their country, and what little information was procured about it came mainly, as in the case of Tibet, from the adventurous Indian surveyors. Even the exact form of Government seems to have been very hazily apprehended, for, though something was heard of the Deb Raja and the Dharm Raja the Tongsa Penlop, whom Sir F. Younghusband describes as the "principal man" in Bhutan, does not figure in accounts of the country previous to the Tibet mission, except as the Governor of the Eastern province. To him and to the Tibet expedition is due the new move towards more positive relations on the part of Bhutan with the Indian Government. The Tongsa Penlop is evidently very far above the rest of his country-men—in shrewdness at any rate, a quality which enabled him to see and avail himself of the good cards which he held owing to the position of the piece of Bhutan territory stretching across the best route leading from India to the point of the tongue of Tibetan land which projects south in the Chumbi Valley. Sir F. Younghusband, treating this potentate with great tact and diplomacy, was able to obtain from him the right to drive a road through Bhutan to the Chumbi Valley, and also, at a price, of course, invaluable assistance in the matter of transport. Moreover, the Tongsa Penlop, himself the highest religious authority of a form of Buddhism, was persona grata at Lhasa, and played a very important part in the negotiations between the British mission and the authorities at the Tibetan capital. His good services were rewarded with a K.C.I.E., for his investiture with which Mr. Claude White was sent last year, with other European officers, to Punakha, the capital of Bhutan. The Tongsa Penlop again gave evidence of his active friendship for the British by allowing the complimentary mission to travel through parts of the country hitherto unseen by Europeans. The last evidence of his friendly attitude is furnished by his visit, at the invitation of the Indian Government, to Calcutta. He is described as a person with a considerable sense of humour, quite alive to the desirability of accepting the exalted and sacred position assigned to him by his country-men, whilst laughing in his sleeve at their simplicity. His shrewdness enabled him to see the real weakness of his Tibetan friends, and to do much by laughing them out of their unbounded conceit and belief in the invincibility of their wretched army.

A still more interesting visitor from beyond the northern frontier was the Tashi Lama, the priest who succeeded to the spiritual functions and dignities of the Dalai Lama when the latter was deposed and started on his long journey to Urga. The Chinese Government in August 1904, decreed that the Dalai Lama should be reduced to the station of a private individual by temporary deprivation of his dignity, to which the Tashi Lama should succeed, as well as to all his spiritual functions. It was understood that the degradation of the Dalai would become permanent if he remained contumacious; but no doubt the word "temporary" was inserted with a view to future possibilities of restoration of the Chinese face. With the accession of the Tashi Lama a divorce was effected between the spiritual and the temporal powers, the latter devolving on a priestly Council of Regency at Lhasa. With the general administration of the country the Tashi Lama has no concern. Since he still continues to reside at the great monastery at Shigatse, 150 miles as the crow flies from Lhasa, it is clear that even if he wished he could exercise little direct control over affairs at the capital. His influence in Tibet depends on his own personal reputation for sanctity and clean living. The latter virtue is not always a necessary accompaniment of the spiritual authority of the chief Lama, for when precedents were sought for the action of China in deposing the Dalai Lama it was found that the sixth holder of that office had been removed on the ground of licentious living. Our Special Correspondent's telegram published in The Times of January 6th and the leading article of the 8th, leave little to be said as to the political and religious significance of the Tashi Lama's visit to India. It is true, as the telegram says, that there are only "small remnants of the Indian Buddhists"; but the remark applies only to India proper, where they number less than 230,000. The Indian Empire in its eastern section—Burma—includes over nine millions of Buddhists, a great and important population to whom the visit cannot fail to be significant.

Of the personality of the Tashi Lama we shall no doubt presently have many descriptions. Previously to his arrival in India, there was but a very small handful of Europeans who had ever met him. They were Captain O'Connor and the members of the small exploring and surveying party which, in the end of 1904, made an adventurous and successful journey from Gyantse, via Shigatse and the southern border of Tibet, to the sources of the Indus and the Brahmaputra, and thence back to India. At Shigatse they were received by the Tashi Lama, and the record of their first impressions of him cannot fail to remain of interest, whatever may be written later. Major C. H. D. Ryder, the head of the surveying party, lecturing before the Royal Geographical Society, thus stated his impressions:—

The Tashi Lama himself is an interesting personality; sixth holder of the office, his face is one that would not pass unnoticed anywhere, still less in Tibet. He has clear cut-features, high cheek bones, and a pale complexion; his quiet dignified manner made a lasting impression on us. His age is only about 23, and he seemed generally beloved and revered. During the whole of our visit a slight and pleasant smile never left his face.

That will, perhaps, remain the best description of the real man, uninfluenced by contact with the outer world.

18TH JANUARY 1906.

Daily Telegraph.—There are towns whose very names are interesting. Wholly apart from their history, the mere syllables of their titles arrest attention, and one is more willing to hear idle matters concerning them than reports of interest about other less-favoured cities. It is easy, without taking thought, to suggest a round dozen of such places. One may see by the first that it is no question of the beauty or wealth or importance of the town, for Byzantium has an interest to which Constantinople can lay no claim. Others are Ravenna, Santa Cruz and Samarkand, Irkutsk, La Guayra and Bamborough, Rouen perhaps, certainly Cadiz, Lhasa, and Carcassonne. Of this company is Mandalay. Long before it was wedded to a popular song the sound of Mandalay's name promised great things of Oriental mystery, barbarism, and colour. Fifty years ago stray messengers from the Court of Burma had already been despatched so far as London, and their accounts of King Mindon's magnificence were supported by the tales of the rare travellers who had ventured so far inland. There is a tale of one of these envoys who returned to Burma from a visit to London. The King asked him whether the Europeans had any such fine architecture as Mandalay could boast. The envoy, sorely perplexed how to give such a truthful answer as would not offend his master, replied, "Your Universal Majesty must remember that these barbarians who inhabit the uttermost parts of Your Majesty's planet live in so painful and chilly a climate that I did not see even one teak tree in their land such as Burma produces in millions for the great buildings of Mandalay."

The style and title of the Kings of Burma runs in a manner which even the Shah of Persia would deem vain-glorious, and it is all a part and parcel of this arrogance of place that the central spire of the palace, that which canopies the Lion Throne itself, is to this day popularly called the "Centre of the Universe" in Mandalay. The argument is easy to follow. That which is the centre of the palace, and therefore of Mandalay—for the present bazaars near the railway station are of British construction—must needs also be the centre also of Burma, the earth, and the celestial satellites also, which plainly revolved all night round the seat of the King of the Burmese. The throne itself is a handsome gilt projection from the inner palace wall into the throne room. It is raised several feet from the floor, and can be entered only from the back—a little extra touch of dramatic effect, that one is confident would have been adopted by Napoleon had he ever heard of it. Its name is derived from some score of small golden lions, which originally occupied the courses of empty niches of the pedestal. The British capture of the city and palace is responsible for their absence, and, as not one of them has ever been since recovered, the probability is that the figures were actually made of solid gold, which the looters preferred, for obvious reasons, to melt down as soon as possible.

The palace of Mandalay lies centrally within the four square walls of the fort. To the east was the King's residence, to the west that of the Queen and the harem generally. Until the last year or two the apartments in which these favourites lived were used as the guest house, and I well remember staying in one of them some time ago. It was a detached house, to the only floor of which one climbed by a wide ladder, and inside it was decorated throughout with the mirror-mosaic which to this day is the most characteristic ornament of Burmese art. The dining-room of the English club had been a reception-hall, and the exquisite screens in gold and looking-glass quarrels of white and green were still there in perfect preservation. The writing-room of the club was the Lily Throne Room—the lilies also are gone—and up through the central passage, between the writing tables and newspaper racks and one revolving case of the encyclopædia, the little silk-clad Burmese used to come to press their foreheads down on the base of the throne while their thin jackets rippled under the breeze of the club punkahs overhead. But all this is changed and the palace is no longer put to such useful indignities.

Outside, to the south, are the King's gardens. To the north are the Queen's, and these are worth a visit. In the middle is a large rectangular pool, fringed with high palms and reflecting the blaze of many coloured flowers. It is a quiet spot, and only one object there suggests anything but tranquil and idyllic peace. This is a slightly-raised dyke, fifty yards long, which runs away from the north-east corner of the pool. It looks like a filled-in trench and so it is. But King Thebaw lost his kingdom when, in 1878, he filled it in, for under this rough heaping of bricks rubble and earth he had buried alive every other soul of the Royal dynasty who could have made trouble during his reign. It is a hideous story, and was not made the pleasanter by the assurance that some of the wretches lived—visibly lived, by the movements of the dyke—for two whole days. We were then in possession of Southern Burma, and perhaps an excuse only was needed to put an end to the continual pourparlers which were exchanged between Thebaw and the French. We could not allow Upper Burma to fall into the hands of any other European Power, and, as we were more or less responsible for its good government and fidelity to its obligations, we marched in a year later almost without a shot, and Thebaw is to-day enjoying a change which can hardly be called one of greater freedom and less responsibility on the coast of the Bombay Presidency.

Such is the significance of these shaded gardens, and as one leaves them to cross the wide open spaces of burnt-up grass which have taken the place of the old, dangerous, and unhealthy native city, one is little disposed to quarrel with an annexation which has placed under our government a little people which, without exception, at the moment welcomed and ever since have congratulated themselves upon this transference of their allegiance. Outside the fort there is much to see. The exquisite delicacy of the Queen's golden monastery, the squat magnificence of Chow-tor-yar-jee-paya—this is not the way it is spelled—the Arakan pagoda, with its villainous libel in great brass and gilt of Gautama's placid face, the subject of a hundred legends, the thousand pagodas—there are only 525 as a matter of accuracy—the Mingun mass of split brickwork—the biggest in the world after the Abhayagiriya pile, in Ceylon—and the adjacent bell, which gives the deepest note of any bell in the world—there is much to see. Yet you will go back to the fort and sit contentedly beside the palace walls watching the sharp, clear pinnacle of the centre of the universe against the amethyst of the northern sky, and listening to the silence, which the distant sound of a trotting ox-wagon, a mere speck on the road, seems to make more oppressive. Not a leaf of the breadfruit palms or of the clambering mallows at their feet is stirred. It seems impossible that this can have been the scene of such foul barbarities and bloodthirsty superstitions. A grey squirrel jerks out from under a forgotten cactus clump and flounces back, the domino wings of a hoopoe flutter, a streak of luminous blue betrays a kingfisher who has been motionless on a stump, watching with eagerness the tiny rings in the water below. Yet the foundations of the great central gates of the more than mile-long fort walls are laid upon human skeletons, and the foul atrocities of Thebaw are still faintly echoed in the fireside stories of the old men. Perhaps it was only another of those cases wherein, to misquote in all reverence a well-known proverb, our opportunity came with the utter extremity of another race. To-day, at least, the Burmese are happy; happier perhaps, as a whole, than any other race in the world, and it would do many a pessimist good to see Monsieur, Madame et Bébé—the latter a collective term out here—go for their sunset jaunt in search of fresh air and gossip along the wide streets of Mandalay. After all, it is difficult to be sad when one is wearing white silk and a tight pink turban, and one's wife and children are dazzling in lemon yellow, Venetian red, and olive green. Besides, there is always the family ring with the big, bad cabochon ruby from Mogok, which will tide over a month or two of hard times in a country which, as King Bodawpaya once neatly said, was so much the favourite of heaven that the very waters of the river added many square miles of new territory every year. It would be a good thing if there was some such happy land within easier reach of our hypochondriacs in England.

Englishman.—To-day will be spent by Their Royal Highnesses in visiting characteristic scenes of Burmese life. This morning they drive to the bazaar and thence to the Arrakan Pagoda, afterwards going over the Palace. This afternoon there will be Burmese boat races on the moat and this evening a Pwé. The Prince and Princess embark on the river steamer after dinner and commence the voyage down the Irrawaddy to-morrow. The arrival at Madras will be at half past four instead of in the morning.

A half a century ago and before he ascended the throne King Mindoon dreamed two impressive dreams. He saw a large city dying at the foot of Mandalay Hill a few miles to the north-east of the Avan capital Amarapura. Again he dreamt that he was riding a white elephant which took him to the base of Mandalay Hill where he dismounted. There two women Ba and Ma led him to the summit where a man offered him a handful of scented grass and told him his elephants and horses would always thrive if fed on the grass that grow about the Hill. When Mindoon ascended the throne he took unto wife two Princesses each of whom was born on a Thursday, and in accordance with Burmese custom received names beginning with Ba and Ma. This coincidence inspired Mindoon with the desire to found a new capital on the level plain stretching to the south-west from Mandalay Hill. The Royal astrologers assented, and Schwemyoday, the royal golden city, or Yandabon, the cluster of gems, which we know as Mandalay, rose at the kingly call. Its foundations were laid in blood under Mindoon's successor. It was the scene of the repeated orgies of murder until quarter of a century after its foundation Mandalay passed under British rule.

Mandalay, as Their Royal Highnesses observed on a long drive, this morning is like no other city in Asia. The walls sheltered behind a broad moat imposing in their external appearance would be useless against artillery fire and are quite destitute of flanking towers. As they were raised in the two thousand and four hundredth year after the death of Gaudama, they were made to measure in all 2400 T. A., each one of the four sides of the perfect square being a little over a mile and a third in length. Within, a second enclosure walled off the palace proper, round which clustered the appurtenances of the degenerate Arakan court for the later monarchs dared not venture forth for fear that they should never return, a court so arrogant in its imbecile pride that for years the British resident was not received in audience because he refused to kow tow. In some respects the palace buildings with their tin roofs and glass balustrades reveal the full decadence of Burmese art. In others they are still not without a certain barbaric splendour and tastes. The lofty columns of red lacquered and gilded teak, the lavishly scrolled doorways, possess a certain dignity and splendour and the gold coated walls and roofs though faded in the ebbing light a charm too. The roughly constructed woodwork of the palace is rapidly decaying, and were it not for the systematic restoration now in progress in a few years there would be little left.

From the palace the royal route lay through the city passing the Zegyo bazaar. The old native city of Mandalay straggled southwards towards Amarapura and westwards to the Irrawaddy. All the houses were of bamboos with mat walling for convenience in burning out if the populace became fractious. Indeed, one of the principal reasons which induced Mindoon to allow a civil settlement apart from the question of trade was that its presence served as an excuse to raise on the river's bank a lofty dyke which should also protect the palace in the event of the British shelling it from the Irrawaddy. After the annexation the populace were transferred to blocks laid out south and west of the city. This is how it came about that Mandalay is a place of wide streets with ugly names and no slum quarter. Much more recently the destruction of the bazaar by fire provided an opportunity for rebuilding it on the most approved modern lines. It is now well designed, substantially constructed and well arranged, but it is not of the East. Not all the smiling Burmese stall-keepers, Hindus, Mahomedans and Chinese, nor even the stench of the half putrid fish which is the Burmans' savoury, can invest it with an Oriental atmosphere. And when you see the innumerable Western atrocities exposed for sale you admire still more the Burman's taste in dress.

The Arakan Pagoda, whither Their Royal Highnesses drove from the town, is distinguished by the circumstance that it is a building in the ordinary sense of the term, and not a solid pile, of brick work such as is usually found in Burma. It enshrines the famous Mahamuni brass statue of Gaudama, the national image of Arakan, in a central hall surrounded by a wide arcade and crowned by many storied roofs. Tradition says that it was cast by King Chandrasuriya and is an object of adoration to pilgrims from all Buddhist lands, and many wars were waged against Arakan for the main purpose of possessing it. It was carried off by Bodow Pago on the conquest of Arakan in 1784 and brought in pieces across the hills. Then the native artisans were unequal to the task of restoring the severed portions, until Buddha taking compassion on them rolled the figure in his embrace and the joints were no more visible. The sceptic cannot question the miracle for the brass is so plastered with gold leaf that the cracks are indiscernible.

Now the figure, which ranks only after the Shew Dagon Pagoda as an object of Buddhist veneration and is said to have been cast from life, is brilliantly lighted by electricity. Does it sound an act of incredible vandalism? And yet the result is good. Formerly the gloom of the shrine, aggravated rather than relieved by a few smoky candles, rendered the outline of the statue scarcely perceptible. Now the concealed lamps throw the figure into the strongest relief, the girt shining like pure metal, and the serene face which alone is free from gold leaf gazes benevolently upon the worshipping circle. But more curious than this is the strong Italian influence in the design of the interior of the Pagoda. The massive pillars and round arches, lacquered a deep red to the base and then lavishly gilded supporting a gilded roof, little suggest the common forms of Burmese architecture. They are far more reminiscent of St. Marks at Venice.

There is nothing the Burman loves better than a water fête. Ordinarily a regular lotus eater where physical exertion is concerned, he will train hard for a canoe race and paddle to the last gasp. A successful crew is sure of no less popular acclaim than the winners of the varsity race. Well, there was a splendid carnival on the south moat this afternoon when all Mandalay kept high holiday. From one o'clock till dusk heats between long canoes each manned by over thirty rowers were contested, and a notable feature was the presence of two Inthas from beyond Fort Stedman who rowed with the leg as well as the arm. The Prince and Princess also moved up and down the moat in a decorated barge, and Her Royal Highness presented a bag of rupees to the winners and the runners up. But the fête and the page which closed the Mandalay programme merit fuller notice than can be given them at this late hour and which must be withheld until to-morrow. Their Royal Highnesses embarked on the Irrawaddy Flotilla Company's steamer Japan and start down the river to-morrow.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—It is many a long year since Calcutta has been as gay as it was during the earlier days of this year of grace 1906. It has been well termed a "Royal Season" that Calcutta is just now emerging from, and to those who were privileged to witness the successive pageants during the Royal Visit the season of 1905 will have pleasant memories, though to many who arrived during those exciting days it will arouse thoughts of a different nature! Who can forget the sight at the Howrah railway station—most inconveniently placed station in the world—on the night that Calcutta was illuminated in honor of her Royal Visitors! Hundreds of passengers had arrived, some from Lucknow, others from different parts in the North, and as the bridge was closed to traffic and the entrance to the Strand was blocked by the crowd, the platform at Howrah was a "dumping-ground" for hundreds of tired passengers. There was a "how-di-do"! and no refreshment room, while on the other side of the water scores of boarding-houses were anxious for patronage.

Nothing, perhaps, in India could have excelled the illuminations, and who can forget the Howrah bridge embroidered with lights, and the illuminations of the ships on the Hooghly. The tradesmen of Calcutta made a Royal Show, and all up Old Court House Street, Government Place and Chowringhee—the shopland of Calcutta—the illuminations would have taken a lot to beat.

Perhaps, however, if the Prince remembered, he will have still cherished delightful reminiscences of those beautiful illuminations in Kandy about six years before, where every mountain scintillated with the thousands of lights, anything to equal which he could hardly have seen since.

Not the least interesting of the events during this season was the visit of the Tashi Lama and his hundred odd attendants, who have been 'doing the town' like schoolboys on a holiday. These were about, here, there and everywhere, one moment examining some of the latest things in guns at Manton's, at another doing the Great Eastern, Calcutta's leading hotel seeming to have a special attraction for these men, who had never seen a hotel before. Who knows, in these days of rapid progress—but that a monk (no pun meant), or a manning may not establish before long a hotel in the land of the Monks themselves. The Calcutta season is now rapidly dying out, and very soon the people who now crowd the Hotels will soon be packing and away to the hills, and the Royal Season will be but a memory.

Madras Mail.—The Prince and Princess of Wales have presented their portraits to the Calcutta Municipality as a memento of their visit to Calcutta.

Madras Mail.—His Highness the Maharaja of Mysore has instructed his Government to issue orders that Rs. 2,000 should be placed at the disposal of the Reception Committee for the purpose of feeding destitute persons of all classes.

Some little time ago reference was made in these Notes to a distinguished Native Officer of the 2nd (Q. O.) Sappers and Miners, and a brief sketch was then given of his honourable career. This officer—Honorary Captain Devasabayam Pillay—repeatedly saw service in Afghanistan, the Upper Chin Hills and China. He was more than once mentioned in despatches, and he will now crown the many honours he has gained by being amongst those Native Officers to be presented to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales.

The Resident's Office,

Pioneer.—The following honours have been conferred in connection with the Royal visit to Rangoon:—Mr. M. Lawrie, Municipal President, has been made a member of the fourth class of the Victorian Order, and Mr. J. Short, Municipal Secretary, member of the fifth class of the same order.

Rangoon Gazette.—The Prince and Princess of Wales have now entered upon the second stage of their sojourn in Burma, namely, their visit to Mandalay. Their Royal Highnesses could not expect to be entertained here with the variety of spectacles they witnessed in Rangoon, but in the short time placed at their disposal they visit the chief places of interest.

The railway journey from Rangoon must have impressed Their Royal Highnesses favourably. The scheme which had been adopted for the route through the hours of darkness worked admirably. As far as Pyinmana lights were placed on both sides of the line within a few yards of each other, each tended by a Burman. These rows of silent figures just visible by the light of their glimmering lamps for mile after mile and hour after hour through the night convinced one more than the crowds in the cities that the Royal visit was considered by the Burmese as an event of national importance. At each station, the station staff was drawn to attention, and at the principal ones military and police guards stationed. All the stations at which stops were made were brightly and in most cases tastefully illuminated, such as Pegu, Pyuntaza and Toungoo. When day dawned the scenes through which the line passed were no less impressive. In none of Their Royal Highnesses's railway journeys throughout India have the people of the country turned out in such large numbers to see the train pass. Every station, every village, practically every field had its gaily dressed occupants, men, women and children. The natural scenery on the route though not possessing the grandeur of some portions of the Indian routes are destitute of the barren stretches that are far more characteristic of the railway journeys in the Peninsula. Even the central plains have no air of desolation. Backed by long unbroken lines of hills on which rested this morning banks of white cloud and with their sea of short but bright vegetation, these reminded one of the central highlands of Scotland, an impression heightened when the rich lands of Kyaukse were reached and the scrub gives place to cultivated ground and fine timber. Breakfast was served at Shwemyo which was gaily decorated, and here Mr. Rigg was introduced. One of the stops of the Royal train was at Kume Road where luncheon was served. The place was a triumph in the way of railway station decoration. Of the four pandals erected the Royal one was in gold and green, lavishly ornamented but in the best possible taste, the entrance guarded by dragons with female figures on the pillars and within flowers and fruit-bearing orange trees in silver Burmese bowls. The rest of the station was converted into a veritable pleasure ground with shrubs and flowers. The work was undertaken on the initiative of the Burmese themselves under Maung Kyin Yon, Extra Assistant Commissioner. Here Mr. Todd-Naylor and Mr. Gaitskell were introduced to Their Royal Highnesses.

The arrangements for the reception at Mandalay had been admirably planned. Their Royal Highnesses had simply to step from the Railway carriage across the platform into a pandal on the platform. The Lieutenant-Governor introduced Mr. Shaw, Judicial Commissioner, the Honourable Maung Ba Tu, Legislative Council, Mr. Twomey, Commissioner, Mandalay Division, General Plowden, Major Strickland, Deputy Commissioner on special duty, Major Townsend, Deputy Commissioner, Mandalay. Guards of honour from the Middlesex, Regiment and Upper Burma Volunteers were present.

After the usual formalities, Their Royal Highnesses proceeded to the pandal where the principal residents of Mandalay were assembled. Nothing could be said which would be too much in praise of the beauty and the design of the pandal. Rangoon was rather handicapped in this matter by disadvantages which did not obtain in Mandalay. You have already described the pandal. The arrangements of colours, chiefly white with broad stripes of blue and white, was excellent. The centre, but for the paths, was natural grass with plots of shrubbery, and this with the great height of the pandal gave a pleasing impression of coolness. The larger part of the space was filled by Burmese, the bright tints of whose garments rendered harmonious by the strong light of the Mandalay skies completed a picture that evidently struck the Princess with the greatest pleasure. Her bearing was animated throughout and reflected the satisfaction which both she and the Prince displayed at the cordiality of their welcome.

The address of welcome was read by Maung Tha Nyo, A. T. M., Municipal Commissioner and Secretary to the Reception Committee.

After His Royal Highness had replied the Municipal Commissioners were presented by Major Townsend.

The drive through the streets to Government House naturally could not compare in magnificence with that at Rangoon, but large numbers of people had assembled to do honour to the Royal visitors. The school children's pandal was at the beginning of the route, and the youngsters raised a very creditable cheer as the Royal carriage passed. Most of the pandals erected in Mandalay are on the route to be taken to-morrow to the Zegyo and the Arakan shrine, where Their Royal Highnesses have a fairly busy day, embarking in the evening on the Japan. There was a small dinner party at Government House to-night.

This morning the Prince and Princess left Government House at half-past ten and drove to the splendid new Zegyo buildings by way of C. Road, Merchant Street and B. Road. A short visit was made to the block in which stuffs and the finer articles were sold, Their Royal Highnesses being shown round by Major Strickland. Thereafter the party, which included the members of the suite, drove to the Arakan Pagoda. Here, too, only a short stay was made. Their Royal Highnesses were received by the Trustees and Major Townsend. Then a long drive back was taken by a different route to the Palace where were assembled the Commissioner of Mandalay and a number of European and native gentlemen. After inspection of various buildings Their Royal Highnesses returned to Government House. The weather was cool and the sky overcast till midday.

The morning broke at Mandalay with cold almost bitter and a mist hanging over both the outskirts and the centre of the town. Yesterday had been clear and fairly hot. To-day until eleven one was glad to keep in motion and the Burmese wore cloaks of fur or heavy stuffs. Rain threatened about nine and seemed to be falling to the north-west of the town.

In the course of their drive this morning Their Royal Highnesses fulfilled three of the engagements provisionally made for them out of the five or six arranged for the whole stay at Mandalay. They visited three of the typical centres of Mandalay life, past or present, beginning with the great new Zegyo, the finest bazaar in Burma and perhaps in the East, and the centre of great native trade, and ending with the now deserted Palace of the Burmese Kings. The route followed in the course of the drive was a long one, for Mandalay is a city of magnificent distances, and while the Zegyo is near the centre of the business town the Palace is nearly at the opposite end of it. From the Arakan Pagoda, the decorations on the route were much more ambitious than on the route of the procession on the day of arrival. A graceful Burmese pythat, resembling that which was erected on Strand Road in Rangoon, stood at the point where Their Royal Highnesses entered the town from the Fort on C. Road, and in the other business streets, firms and houses had attempted ornamentation on various scales of lavishness. Among the most conspicuous premises were those of Messrs. Crioukansky and Marshall, Messrs. Whiteaway, Laidlaw and Co., Messrs. Misquith and Co., the Baptist Mission Press and Messrs. Vertannes and Co., in C. Road; Messrs. Rowe and Co., in Merchant Street, and the Standard Oil Company in B. Road. Of the pandals the most effective were the Moghul and Persian ones in Merchant Street, Aga Mahommed Jawad Shirazee and Moola Ahmed being the principal movers. The Mahomedan community's pandal also deserves notice. In the Chetty pandal a native band played. Other pandals were Bhagvandas' pandal near the Zegyo, the Fokien Chinese with an inscription of welcome in Payagyi Road, where also the premises of Paripatt Thathanahita Society were prettily ornamented, and on the way back the Chinese arch and the pandal of the Yunnan Chinese which were filled with dainty Burmese children. It seems strange that this sleepy hollow of Mandalay should have been before Rangoon both in its market accommodation and means of street transit. Both the Electric Tramways and the Zegyo are models of their kind, though overhead wires and speedy cars seem almost out of place in roads containing none but easy-going, smiling, insouciant Burmese, thinking of anything but business, and looking most of them on a Royal visit but as an additional item in the day's amusement. At the Zegyo the Prince and Princess were conducted by Major Strickland.

The drive from here to the Arakan Pagoda is in one straight line. These lengthy streets scatter the population so much that Their Royal Highnesses drive for most of the morning. It resembles more a drive in the country or outskirts of a large city than in the streets of a town of so many inhabitants. The Pagoda was reached at twenty-five minutes past eleven. As the Zegyo represented the centre of the trading life of the city, so did the Pagoda the centre of religion. There is here nothing like the Shwe Dagon to impress one with its sheer size, but apart from the history which makes it an object of veneration for Buddhists, there is that in it which appeals to the infidel European as well the Buddhist. The shrine and its approaches are in a symmetrical design, and the huge image which it contains, even to eye which is trained to Western methods of sculpture, is beautiful. The electric lighting introduced in the sanctuary is by no means out of keeping with its surroundings. When the Royal visitors arrived the sun had shone out brightly and lit the colonnades with the chequered lights, without which no scene of Burmese architecture is complete. They were received by the Deputy Commissioner of Mandalay and the Pagoda Trustees.

Lastly, Their Royal Highnesses visited the Palace. This was, perhaps, the most interesting portion of the visit to Mandalay, despite the attractions of the garden party in the afternoon. Nothing in Burma conveys, more to one's sense the gulf that separates Burma of to-day from the Upper Burma of twenty years ago. It is the same as in the time of Thibaw. Lord Curzon's care for monuments of former rulers in India has banished Government officers from it, so that standing in its deserted audience chambers there is nothing to separate the visitor from the picture it presented under the Burmese Kings. More than any Indian Palace, it is barbaric almost unintelligible, nothing Western corresponds to it. Splendid teak pillars support and add to the colouring and ornamentation. It is said and written frequently that King Thibaw's Palace is a gingerbread or tin-plated palace; this is to misinterpret it. Tin looking glass and plaster in Europe mean shoddy; but they do not do so here. They must be seen in situ with the sun shining outside and the eye imaging the prostrate figures and bright costumes inside to realise that they are natural and becoming in Mandalay Fort. The very emptiness of the Palace and its newness are impressive. It was the scene of cruelty and decadence. These have been arrested by the power of which its visitor to-day is the direct heir. The Palace stands a speaking monument of the white man's burden. The Upper Burma Club are fortunate in having secured the western chambers for their residence, for it is in an ideal spot. It was unfortunate that the "Centre of the Universe" should have been temporarily displaced while the Prince and Princess were here. Its reconstruction is taking place on a very thorough scale, but we can hardly expect the Prince to be here again. The Commissioner of Mandalay received Their Royal Highnesses at the Palace to-day along with Major Strickland, Mr. Oliver, Superintending Engineer, Mr. Bacon, Executive Engineer, the Shwedail Atwinwun and Maung Sa Ba. Throughout the drive Their Royal Highnesses were accompanied by an escort of Mounted Military Police.

A garden party was held at Government House this afternoon when the principal officials and non-officials, residents of Mandalay and the outlying districts, were present, including the Sabwas of Northern Shan States and Palaung, and the Kachin Chiefs. Their Royal Highnesses were towed on the North Moat by Burmese crews. Large crowds gathered on the north side of the Moat to witness the proceedings in the evening. Their Royal Highnesses witnessed a pwe in the Palace ground. There after they proceeded to the Japan which starts down the river at day-light.

Rangoon Gazette.—We have received the following for publication: From Sir Walter Lawrence, His Royal Highness's Chief of Staff, to His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, dated the 16th January.—Among the many beautiful sights which Their Royal Highnesses have enjoyed in Rangoon none has given them greater pleasure than the gathering of the School children on the line of Saturday's procession. The Prince and Princess of Wales are very glad to hear that the children all reached home safely, and they desire me to convey their thanks and appreciation to those who devised and managed this most successful spectacle.

Times.—Mandalay has been no less demonstrative than Rangoon in the warmth of the welcome given to the Royal visitors. In fact the whole journey from Lower into Upper Burma was a triumphal progress, the entire countryside having apparently turned out with torches and lanterns by night to illuminate the Royal route over more than 100 miles, and with flags and banners by day to salute the passage of the Royal train, while at every halting place large crowds in their gayest holiday attire gathered round the stations, where dainty Burmese pavilions had been erected for refreshments. Prosperity and contentment clearly reign throughout the country and are reflected in every face—a striking contrast to the gloomy forebodings and denunciations which the annexation of Upper Burma provoked less than 20 years ago among the anti-imperialists at home.

Mandalay is in point of time even more modern than Rangoon, but it has grown prematurely old. It sprang up like Fatehpur Sikri, in obedience to a Royal freak, and its brief glory as a seat of regal power departed with its Royal masters. It was the capital of the Burman kingdom for just five and twenty years. The good King Mindon set up his Court there in 1860, and not only built palaces and temples, but enriched the surrounding plain with a valuable system of canals. The bad King Thebaw succeeded him in 1878, and by his barbarous misgovernment at home and his persistent bad faith towards his British neighbours brought about within seven years his own downfall and that of his ancient kingdom.

In the olden days Burma, like most Asiatic States adjoining China, recognized in some more or less shadowy form the overlordship of the Son of Heaven, and up to the last the Kings of Burma used to send periodical missions bearing tribute to Peking. Mandalay itself shows striking evidence of Chinese influence. The great walled enclosure which was once the Royal City, with a broad moat surrounding the four sides of the square, each one mile and a quarter long, and its 12 gates and 42 watch towers and its spacious courtyards and pavilions, and its outer and inner halls of audience—all leading up to the Lion Throne under the seven-storeyed spire sheathed in gold which was "the Centre of the Universe"—bears an unmistakable family likeness to the Forbidden City of Peking, where from its moated girdle of pink walls every ceremonial avenue converges towards the Dragon Throne. Not only the whole hieratic conception but the style of architecture is largely Chinese, and the painted ceilings and lacquered columns and curved roofs are as "celestial" as the mixture of splendour and tawdriness which pervades the whole palace. The Royal City is now shorn of its former barbaric magnificence and a large part is given over to barracks and public offices, but it will be at any rate be preserved from reverting to the jungle which is rapidly swallowing up, only a few miles away, its neighbour and predecessor, Amarapura, forsaken less than 50 years ago by the founder of Mandalay.

But what the Royal City has lost Mandalay outside its precincts has gained, and more. Along its splendid avenues every Burmese house nestles under luxuriant foliage, while few Eastern bazaars present such striking and brilliant pictures as those of Mandalay, where buyers and sellers vie with each other in the rainbow tints of their garments, and the wares exhibited for sale are as varied as the types presented by the different groups of purchasers, dainty little Burmese ladies bent on shopping, each attended by a maid, and townsmen attired in scarcely less gay silks and muslins, Hindus from over the sea, from Bengal and Madras, impassive Chinamen from beyond Bhamo, and Chins and Kachins and Shans, gaping tribesmen from the border highlands, and beyond the bazaars, beyond the long lines of streets laid out in rectangular symmetry, golden domes and spires gleam amongst the palm trees.

Mandalay has lost the crown of Royalty, but she still wears her halo of sanctity far more ancient and more enduring. There is the Kathodaw with its 450 pagodas, all precisely alike in shape and size, each of them built over a tablet bearing a transcription of the Buddhist commandments, repeating the sacred formula in avenues of stone, as a French writer has remarked, with the same monotonous insistency and the same belief in the mere potency of iteration which emphasize the responses of a litany. There is the Queen's Golden Monastery, a marvel of fretted woodwork, built of teak, but carved into a thousand fantastic shapes from the coiled serpents upon which it rests to the weird horned monsters which crown the curved crest of its superposed roofs, and the whole structure clothed within and without in heavy gilding, softened down by the process of time to the subdued tone of old gold lacquer. There is the golden dome of the famous Arrakan Pagoda, scarcely less holy than the Shwe Dagon at Rangoon, with its great brass image of Gautama, seated in the attitude of compassionate meditation, which was miraculously brought over from Akyab some 120 years ago, and is actually as old as the Master himself, since, according to the legend, he helped to set it up with his own living hands. Around these and many other fanes of scarcely less renown there hangs about, in Burma as elsewhere, the usual army of beggars that haunt all holy places, trading on their deformities and sores as noisily and as shamelessly as the vendors of relics and sacred images traffic with the most venerable emblems of their faith, whilst the daily stream of worshippers flows in and out through the colonnaded galleries to the innermost shrine, heavy with the fumes of incense and of countless waxen tapers, where oblivious of the cold metaphysical negations of their creed, they pour forth at the feet of the Compassionate One all the hopes and fears and the prayers and yearnings common in some form or other to the whole human race in all ages and in every clime.

The Prince and Princess devoted the whole morning to sight-seeing, and even the garden party this afternoon was hardly an official function, for the chief features were native boat races on the palace moat, which again afforded the people of Mandalay, gathering in their bright, cheerful crowds, an opportunity to greet the Royal visitors. To-night their Royal Highnesses start back for Rangoon by river in a steamer specially fitted out by the Irrawaddy Flotilla Company. Both the Prince and Princess must regret that their time is only too short in this beautiful and smiling land.

United India and Native States.—The address delivered by Mr. Gokhale as President of the Benares Congress is indeed a trumpet-call for true and earnest men of India to put forth fresh energies and work for the material and moral advancement of their countrymen. Mr. Gokhale, endowed with the practical intellect of the Mahratta and also with the zeal and patriotism characteristic of his race, approaches the problem of efficient Government of this country with a mind stored with facts and with a zeal tempered by scholarship. Mr. Gokhale is no perfrigid orator carried away by the passion of the moment. He is no visionary with pet Utopias of his own.

It is but proper that he should begin his address with a most loyal and dutiful welcome to Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales on the occasion of this their first visit to India. Loyalty to the Throne is consistent with desire for liberty. Mr. Gokhale desires that loyalty should be broadbased upon people's will. He would appeal to the famous Proclamation of 1858, the palladium of India's constitutional rule, the source of India's political aspirations.

19TH JANUARY 1906.

Civil and Military Gazette.—* * * Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales has been graciously pleased to accept a copy of his work "The Imperial City" from Mr. Frederick Barr, M.A., of Simla.

Daily Telegraph.—Burma sends her scouts far afield. Long before Cape Negrais comes in sight the dull, opaque green of the sea betrays alluvial land, and a bath on board ship in the Gulf of Martaban is impossible, so heavily charged with mud is the water of the sea-arm. So one is prepared for the long flat delta of the Irrawaddy, backed in the far distance by the violet combings of the southward-trending ranges. Up against the turbid yellow flood the steamer ploughs for half a morning, eternally doubling and redoubling upon its course. Now far to the starboard, now almost on the port beam, now straight ahead, is a little white flame like that of an oil lamp. It is the only object in the landscape, and one is told three hours before Rangoon is reached that it is the Shwé Dagón. By that time the tiny jet of white fire has resolved itself into a golden peak, rising over 500ft. above the river level, and once seen the great Buddhist temple dominates Rangoon and everything in it; until you go you can have eyes for nothing else.

Upon a roughly cornered platform of rock 170 ft. high rises the Shwé Dagón pagoda. It is simplicity itself in shape. A vast hand-bell of gold, 300ft. in height, rises from a cruciform base of many degrees, 70 ft. in height. Just where the handle joins the bell is a lotus pattern ornament; the top of the handle is a "htee", composed of a formal umbrella of golden rings, from which hundreds of leaf-clappered bells of jewelled gold and of jewelled silver hang, and on which a vane of pure gold revolves. Rubies to the value of a hundred thousand pounds are set in this htee.

The handle of the Shwé Dagón is plated all over with plates of solid gold. The bell and the pedestal are covered with gold leaf, but as this involves a recurrent expense every three years the trustees of the Shwé Dagón propose to carry the gold plates down over the bell also. It is not thought to be necessary or even perhaps safe to carry them lower. But conceive what this means; conceive the sanctity which suggested and the wealth which renders possible this gigantic expenditure. There is only one Shwé Dagón, and what Lhasa is to the Northern Buddhists among their wild and bare mountain passes, that Rangoon is to the far smaller but also far richer community of southern followers of the master.

About 1854, as a result of a persistent rumour that the centre of the Shwé Dagón was hallowed out, and was used as a treasure house for the immense hoards of the Buddhist hierarchy, an English Engineer drove a narrow shaft through the base of the pagoda. Nothing of value was found, not even an empty treasure chamber, but as the shaft was pierced farther and farther into the interior, shell within shell of earlier Shwé Dagóns were found, till, when the centre was reached, no fewer than seven layers had been discovered. The present building—which is, so to speak, the latest coat of the architectural onion—was finished about 1564. It stands on a levelled hill-top, with a clear space all round it; surrounding this again are smaller shrines, some of Burmese mirror-mosaic, some of heavy stone, roughly resembling the Shwé Dagón itself, some like Indian ebhatris but the vast majority of exquisitely and intricately carved teak. None of them rise to a greater height than a hundred and fifty feet, except the four great Tasadons, which, at the four points of the compass rise from the plinth of the Shwé Dagón itself, and give pretended access to the giant. Trees of all kinds flourish here. Cocoanuts lift their feathery heads in among the intricacies of the lesser pagodas, and sacred fig-trees grow in several places.

Originally there were four great stairs up to the platform, but there is only one now of real importance, that facing due south. This famous stairway of stone steps, worn to slipperiness by the traversings of many million feet, has a fair entrance. Two huge whitewashed leo-gryphs stand guardian on the roof level. Behind them a new carved roofing of teak conducts the pious under shelter to the whitened gate. This is a frightful combination of West and East, and should be neglected. From this gate the steps ascend in semi-darkness. Over-head are barbaric painted beams and carved brackets as roof succeeds roof. On both sides, between the rough and greasy columns which support them, shops have been made and sometimes houses built in. The arcade thus formed is one of the most interesting thoroughfares of the East. There seems almost nothing that is not sold here. Toys of a hundred sorts are there, books of gold-leaf, garlands and strings of champak flowers and marigolds, sweets and confectionery, European picture books and native drawings sometimes of a most devotional and repulsive type, lengths of cotton dyed in every hue known to the spectroscope, gilt caps for children, shoes, umbrellas, fruit of every kind, candles of many kinds—it is a street in itself. But the colours of the wares are eclipsed by those worn by the moving crowds. The Burmese are a sun-loving race, and the poorest wears silk. Here is a man with a black-paper umbrella that is almost an inspiration of taste—the rest of him is clad in voluminous folds of old gold silk. He is a phoung-ye, or Buddhist monk. Last year he may have been a thriving manufacturer on the Strand of Rangoon: next year he may go back. Meanwhile, his head shaven, he adopts the beggar's life and joins at his appointed time in the muttered prayers that all day and all night ascend on incense fumes beneath the temple roofs of the Shwé Dagón. There is a young woman, with neatly coiled black hair, a myrtle-green jacket, and a kind of bath-towel skirt of copper silk. Here is a white-clad Hindu, there a blue and white Mohammedan, drawn hither on as idle a bent as yourself. A child runs up and offers a trifling gift, a cowrie or a flower; she does not want your quarter-annas, but takes them with a delightful prudery. A bridal procession with braying horns, blocks the way, and perhaps, in the foreigner's honour, the comedians of the show will give some burlesque impromptu as they pass. Chinese and Japanese frequent the platform. The former will make sure by a muttered prayer; the latter age the European in his patronising disinterestedness. A leper crawls along to your side and asks an alms. If you give it you will have no more peace, for these maimed and footless wretches will sling themselves from all quarters along the ground beside you as fast as you can walk, though in aspect they are but a bunch of disfigured and knotted limbs.

There is much to see round the platform. Perhaps the story of the great bell is worth re-telling. When Rangoon was first captured some worthy soul thought that it was fitting that the third largest bell in the world—it weighs over forty tons—should find a home in London. With infinite pains and the use of the most recent machinery it was brought down from the Shwé Dagôn put on board a special lighter, and—by an accident—dropped overboard in mid-stream. The ingenuity of the West was vainly taxed in trying to raise it from the river bed. Derricks, cranes, jacks, windlasses, donkey-engines, levers, diving suits—everything was used, and used in vain. It was impossible, and at last it was decided that no more money and trouble should be wasted on the task. Some months later a little company of yellow robed monks came down from the Shwé Dagôn with a petition to the Governor. If they could raise the bell by their own efforts might they keep it. The Governor laughed immoderately, and promptly wrote a special permission on those lines. It made the joke of a week in Rangoon. But not for more than the week. The little Burmans came to the river bank and burnt incense and prayed a while. Then they set out on two great rafts and put their poor tackle of rope and bamboo-sticks together—and up came the bell, and there it is to this day under the two o'clock shadow of the great pagoda.

But by night is the time to see the Shwé Dagôn. There is then a charm about the huge plain, golden pinnacle, centring the darkened forest of teak and irresponsible glass mosaic, which defies analysis. Partly it may be the contrast, partly also the colour, partly the just waving crests of the cocoanuts, partly the faint, ever-present tinkle from the jewelled bells a hundred yards and more above our heads. Partly, perhaps, it is the quietude that is helped rather than hindered, by the blessed mutter of the Buddhist mass, where, round a guttering, yellow candle a small knot of monks sit intoning, their faces and their golden robes thrown into Rembrandtesque relief. Every fantastic tale that ever was told chimes in now to your exceeding liking, and the monstrous leogryphs ache again with the breaking heart of their prototype. The gold leaf on the bod-trees' trunks gleams fitfully, and one facet of a forgotten shrine flares out a point of ruby or emerald from the peopled darkness. The scent of thick incense reeks from a newly-filled censer, where a brighter glow than usual silhouettes the seated worshippers. The movement of the faint white gauze of cloud overhead makes the darkened hitee rock in heaven, and a far dog's bark sounds clear. There are half a dozen cheap orange and red lanterns round a swelling tree bole that has grown painfully round and enclosed a marble Buddha. The upper glint of whitened moon-lit gold wane cuts deep into a sidelong Orion; even now it seems to belong rather to a mariner at sea thirty miles away, than to oneself—by day it is all his. And the last and most permanent memory one carries away from Rangoon is that of this silent and austere sentinel, cleaving its way upward to the dark purple sky, surrounded by a cluster of lesser and ornate shrines, careless of their attendance, careless of the incense and the muttered prayers, but strangely absorbed in the far-distant sea, and perhaps also in those far-distant hills on which the waves broke when the first of the legendary Buddhas halted for refuge on this lonely sea-encircled rock which is now the platform of the Shwé Dagôn.

Englishman.—Special efforts are in progress for a general burning up of all that is to be seen hereabouts in connection with the expected visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales. The accomplishment whereof will, however, remain in doubt, practically to the last day fixed, because of the extreme uncertainty of the weather conditions at Quetta and neighbourhood during the time of the year fixed for the royal visit.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The Prince in reply to the address of welcome presented to him by the Mandalay Municipality on Tuesday, pays a supreme compliment to Upper Burma when he says that it is in no sense behind other parts of the Empire. Mandalay has not yet reached—though it may covet—the cosmopolitanism of Rangoon, and after all one prefers to see it through the eyes of Kipling. Perhaps—who knows?—it was the identical pagoda which the Prince and Princess visited on Wednesday, that inspired the lines:

"By the old Moulmein pagoda, looking eastward to the sea,
There's a Burma girl a-sittin', and I know she thinks of me;
For the wind is in the palm-trees, and the temple-bells
they say,

'Come you back, you British soldier, come you back to Mandalay!'"

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The casket to contain the Madras Presidency address to Their Royal Highnesses' designed and manufactured by Messrs. Surabiah and Co., of Madras, is on view. The casket is in the form of a massive silver elephant with a howdah and mahout in full ceremonial trappings of gold, inlaid with rubies, emeralds, etc., and is altogether a most handsome and striking piece of work.

Rangoon Gazette.—(17th January).—This afternoon was held the last important event of Their Royal Highnesses' visit, a garden party at Government House, with a regatta of native rowing and sports upon the North Moat. The occasion reproduced some of the features of the similar party at Rangoon. Representatives of many races had been invited. In Rangoon the Southern Shan States had sent their contingent while here the Northern States sent their Chiefs. The Sawbwa of Yawnghwe, whose picturesque figure was conspicuous at Rangoon, was present here also, superintending and encouraging his lusty Inthas, besides his Northern Shan conferees such as the rulers of Hsipaw, Maingun and South Hsenwi. Representatives of tribes had come from the wilder districts of the far north. There was a group up of Palaungs and Kachins honoured by the invitations of their future sovereign as a reward for conspicuous loyalty or good service. The extreme limit of British dominion to the north was personified in Marawa, a dignified and able-looking man. His Royal Highness seeing this picturesque group of figures from the Moat as he passed in the Royal barge expressed his desire to meet them, but the introductions of the afternoon were so many that no opportunity could be found. They were under the charge of Mr. Hertz, Deputy Commissioner of Myitkyina. A number of ladies and gentlemen were introduced to Their Royal Highnesses in the course of the afternoon, the Prince being particularly thoughtful in desiring the introduction of the Police Officers and others who had contributed to the comfort of his stay in Mandalay.

The races commenced early in the afternoon, some twenty crews competing so that by the time the heats had finished dusk was already beginning to fall. The Inthas met with but moderate success. One of their two crews of racers won its first heat but succumbed in the second, while the other lost to a Burmese crew on its first attempt. Their stroke with leg and arm is more powerful but slower than the old hand paddle. Clad in short blue trousers, fawn-coloured jackets and conical caps ornamented with a top of three russet leaves and their long paddles bright red, they were the most notable in appearance of all those competing.

Their Royal Highnesses who entered the enclosure shortly after four entered the Royal barge about half-past and were towed with a small party slowly once up and down the Moat. Two other barges were towed by the crews of Inthas. The band of the Middlesex Regiment played during the afternoon.

After a private dinner at eight o'clock Their Royal Highnesses attended pines in the Palace grounds and thereafter proceeded to the Japan which will sail to-morrow at daylight.

The visit to Mandalay has been conspicuous for the unaffected pleasure and pride which all classes have displayed in Their Royal Highnesses' presence.

The Irrawaddy Flotilla Company's steamer Japan, with the Prince and Princess, left Mandalay at 6-30 A. M., to-day.

Standard.—He may, or may not, have some of the best blood in India in his veins. In the East birth and breeding go a long way, but they are not everything; and in the curious chaos of Indian history strange things happened. Thus the long procession of princes and ruling chiefs who passed before the "Shahzada" on his way through the Empire can only be described as a miscellaneous collection. They differed from each other as much in origin and descent as they did in appearance and religion. Some were of the pure northern strain, men who could trace back in unbroken sequence from the earliest conquerors, who have preserved their race to this day, uncontaminated by admixture with the inferior castes, the black-children of the soil, or with the infidels. Some of them were Arab or Afghan or Tartar raiders centuries ago, and some the descendants of cow-herds and Court favourites and soldiers of fortune, who were upstarts when the English came.

It was interesting to note the variety of types these feudatories exhibited at the receptions, which were held in each province and group of States, in order that they might make their salute to the Prince, and present him with the nazar, or offering of gold coins, which he touched and remitted. Not infrequent was the kind of person whom perhaps many of us would be inclined to regard as the typical Raja, the huge man, with thick lips, a vast face, great insolent shoulders, like those of a Brahminy bull, a bloodshot, saturnine eye, an elephantine regal gait; a king obviously, though not quite the sort of king whose subject one would care to be under genuine Oriental conditions. But there were princes of a very different make—high-bred, gentlemen, tall and lithe, with olive complexions, and oval faces, and regular features of the Brahman or Rajput cast; or lean, wiry, hook-nosed, eagle-eyed warriors from the border; and dark, short men from the south. And in their characters and their situation was as much variety as in their faces and their figures.

A few years ago it would have been easier to classify them than it is to-day. Broadly speaking, they would have fallen under two main headings, at least in the estimation of the Indian Foreign Office and the Political Departments. There was the virtuous Maharajah and the Maharajah who lacked virtue. The unvirtuous Maharajah still exists, but he is mainly a survival, and he has had his claws so severely pared and his wings so closely clipped that his more picturesque lapses from the straight path are no longer possible. We have made examples of so many of his kind that he has become exceedingly cautious; nor do his supervisors and the representatives of the Paramount Power allow him so much latitude as the more indulgent "politicals" of the past. The unvirtuous Maharajah was often inclined to treat his State as his own private property, and to spend its revenues for his personal gratification. He filled his great rambling palace with monstrosities from Paris, for which he was charged blood-curdling prices. He spent lakhs of rupees on emeralds to adorn his own person, and diamonds for his favourite wife or more favourite dancing-girl. He built new wings to his noble old residence, of monumental hideousness, and emptied the State treasury to pay for horrible glass lustre chandeliers, crystal thrones, and gilded Lord Mayor's carriages; he wasted his substance on a stud of elephants with silver howdahs, on fighting bears and tigers, and on whole menageries of animals, wild and tame.

These were the milder indulgences, and we did not, and do not, interfere with them so long as they are compatible with a reasonable amount of good government. But when His Highness took to twisting the tails of his Sardars, his knights and barons, in order to make them yield more than the feudal revenues, when he levied mediæval benevolences and plundered his merchants and traders, when he courted rebellion by general maladministration, and tried to suppress it with his match-lock men and his ancient batteries of smooth-bore muzzle-loaders, it became necessary to bring his performances to an end. Nor could we permit his private life to go beyond a certain level of scandalousness. We used not to be too particular in these matters, and we preferred not to inquire curiously into the interior economy of the palace. But the Eastern despot, who lives in the true Eastern fashion, finds moderation difficult, and easily slides into practices which make it impossible for self-respecting individuals or governments to have any friendly relations with him. In due course, the career of the unvirtuous Maharajah is brought to a conclusion. After sufficient warning, the Government of India drops down a heavy hand upon him, and flattens him out to rise, as a rule, no more. Sometimes the State is put into commission, under the Political Agent, and the Rajah is given a period for repentance, with a promise of restoration if he shows signs of amending his ways. More often he is deposed and pensioned off, and his throne is conferred upon some reputable brother or cousin; or one of the royal infants is taken away to be educated up to the latest Anglo-Indian standard, while a Council of Regency is appointed to do those things which seem good in the eyes of Simla and the Local Agency.

Like other dethroned monarchs, the deposed Maharajah does not always take his fall quietly, and may show a disposition to give trouble, sometimes by fomenting internal intrigue within his late dominions, more frequently by trying to reach the ear of the Viceroy and other influential persons in Asia and Europe. As a rule he is harmless, and relapses after a time to a struggle between his allowance and his pleasures. A curious little incident occurred while the Prince of Wales was the guest of one of the greater chiefs, a promising young ruler, with sporting and Anglicising tastes, who has been substituted, within the past few years, for a highly disreputable old predecessor, whom it had been found necessary to depose. There was a garden party at the Residency, the royal visitors being present, together with the young Maharajah and most of the native and Anglo-Indian notabilities of the district. In the midst of the entertainment, while the band was playing and the guests were busy with tea and ices, the slightest possible signs of activity were visible among the local official group, and the briefest of consultations was held with the officer commanding the Residency guard and the officer commanding the troops brought up from the nearest British cantonment. Not till afterwards was it known—and then only to a minute number of persons—that the deposed chief had been in need of attention. The old ruffian had made various applications to be allowed to see the Prince of Wales which had been ignored; and finally, on the afternoon of the garden party, news was received that he had astrated off on his motor-car from his château a few miles distant to pay his respects in person. This could not be permitted, so a small party of well-mounted souars were despatched to head off the vehicle and lead the discredited potentate safely home again.

The Unvirtuous Maharajah, though he had a taste for Western luxuries and Western extravagances, was usually Oriental and Conservative in his political attitude. He had no sympathy with modern progress, and strenuously objected to reforms, which, as he perceived, must often cost money that he preferred to spend on himself, his household, and his zenana. Schools, model prisons, hospitals, irrigation works, and famine relief would make a considerable hole in his private Civil List. Therefore his Highness entrenched himself behind Hindu or Muslim orthodox, and protested as vehemently as he dared against any innovations. Sometimes, indeed, he may have been unselfish in his opposition, knowing that the reforming schemes would bring more Englishmen and English influences into his dominions, and so shake the belief of his subjects in the wisdom of their fathers and the ancient social and religious ways. One of the best of the present ruling chiefs, a man of the highest character and deservedly respected by English and natives throughout India, takes that view. He is a champion of the old Hindu system and upright and conscientious Sovereign, who does the best for his subjects according to his own lights; but he sets his face against the wholesale adoption of European methods. He does not want his people (and can we blame him?) to live in imitation English houses, and wear shoddy English clothes; he sees no great necessity for teaching them to read and write, holding that education will only turn them from hunters and herdsmen into clerks and babus. He keeps rigidly to the caste rules, and he will not eat with Europeans, or drink the brandy and champagne in which a good many of his princely cousins are accustomed to drench themselves. Even the railway seems to him undesirable, and it needed a good deal of pressure before he would permit the line to approach his ancient and picturesque capital. His territory is rich in mineral deposits, but he will not allow them to be worked by modern appliances, and even discourages the beneficent advances of the company promoter and the share-monger. Nor will he patronise British sport. He shoots the tiger and spears the wild pig, and leaves polo and racing and cricket to others.

The Virtuous Maharajah, on the other hand, is full of English ideas. He is enlightened and progressive. He adopts the Anglo-Indian method of administration, perhaps even institutes a Council, and imports a Bengali or two to act as Secretary or Legislative member. He reforms his judicature on the English model, and allows the Penal Code to prevail. With European assistance he improves his jails, and sometimes even puts his instructors to shame by the excellence of his work. There is not, in the whole of India, a more admirably equipped and arranged prison than that in the Maharajah of Bikanir's capital: I doubt, indeed, whether there is a better one anywhere. Its cleanliness, sanitation, and good order are beyond reproach; and to see murderers, thieves, and dacoits, peacefully, and it would seem happily, employed in turning out lovely carpets is a lesson in penology. The Bikanir jail is one of the few in India which is run at a profit to the State. Again at Jaipur there is a museum, which is more than equal to any in India, with the single exception of that at Lahore. The Maharajah of this State has shown himself a most discriminating and liberal patron of art and science; and he, and others, have founded excellent colleges and are zealous promoters of the higher education.

This is one side of the Anglicising activity of these younger, progressive princes. The tendency develops in other ways, interesting, but not always of such unquestionable utility. They have an inclination to gratify Western tastes more reputable than those of their predecessors, but sometimes quite as costly. The old rambling palaces with their rookery of passages and inlaid cells, behind marble screens, are deserted; and a fine new building, with large modern saloons and reception-rooms, is erected. His Highness will often be a keen sportsman himself, and a munificent patron of many kinds of sport. He will aspire to win the Polo Cup for his State, and his durbar will be required to pay the expenses of training a first-class team and buying them ponies at prices far beyond the resources of the least penurious of British regiments. He may even keep a racing-stable, bring over stud-grooms and trainers from England, and jockeys who will carry his colours at the fashionable Indian race meetings.

The good Maharajah's English friends will be only too ready to encourage him in so meritorious an extravagance as that of promoting open-air recreations. "You ought to have a pack of jackal hounds, Maharajah Sahib", says one set of enthusiasts; "You should turn that field into a lawn-tennis ground", suggests another. Anxious to oblige, the Chief provides both the hunting and the tennis, much to the satisfaction of the subalterns and the young ladies of the station. Meanwhile, his own personal tastes must be gratified in other ways. So enlightened a student of Western institutions can hardly get on without frequent visits to Bombay and Calcutta, and an occasional trip to the still more instructive cities of London and Paris. Perhaps, when he asks permission to quit his dominions, the Government of India ungraciously informs him that he has been expending far too much money on his various diversions, and reminds him that his subjects are suffering great privation from the failure of the rains. The Virtuous Maharajah sighs, and proceeds to organise famine relief, not in the ancient rule-of-thumb fashion of his royal ancestors but according to the English system. He has his trials, for the new way is not always understood, and it has to be worked, very often, by the old officials. It is said that during a recent famine, the British Resident remonstrated with a native prince on the mismanagement of his relief works. "These men, whom your Highness sent to distribute food, are simply robbing you." "Eshmitt Sahib", said the Maharajah, "is there a man in all my country, except yourself, who does not rob me." Indeed, there are many difficulties before the reforming Raja in this transitional age. The more credit to him that he overcomes them so well as he often does.

Western Daily Press.—The stirring events at home have rather tended to divert attention from the tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales in the Indian dependency. But the progress of Their Royal Highnesses has been marked by every gratifying element, and, despite the enormous extent of the itinerary, there has been a remarkably close adherence to the time-table originally drafted. The punctuality which has characterised the appearances of the Royal party has given the greatest satisfaction to the native population, and has increased the faith of all the dusky subjects of the Emperor Edward in the word of the British Raj. In some respects one of the most interesting sections of the Royal tour is that which has been laid in Burmah. To-day the Prince will tarry on the banks of the Irrawaddy for a day's shooting, and in a day or two hence the Royal party will return to Rangoon (having visited both Upper and Lower Burmah), and will steam thence to Madras. The visit to Burmah has been an event of special interest and significance. When King Edward, then Prince of Wales, was touring in the Dependency, Burmah was not brought within the scheme. That was in the year 1875, when the condition of Burmah was not what it is now. Therefore the present occasion has been the first on which a Prince and Princess of the British Royal Family have visited the most important division of further India. Twenty years have elapsed since Upper Burmah was brought under British jurisdiction. The annexation was the work of the late Lord Dufferin, who derived one part of his title from a well-known Burmese town. The history of the wars which led to the annexation of Upper Burmah is punctuated with lurid incidents. But the sanguinary orgies of King Theebaw constituted the final incitement to annexation. Barbarian and tyrant, Theebaw kept his country in a continual ferment. His cruel excesses were not surpassed by those of King Prempeh, whose deposition from the throne of Ashanti civilisation demanded and eventually secured. There were critics who believed that, such was the deplorable condition of Burmah under King Theebaw, that it would be impossible to restore tranquillity and prosperity, or gain the confidence of the people. Even after Lord Roberts and his army had brought Theebaw to justice at Mandalay, the condition of Burmah remained precarious, and even dangerous. The epidemic of dacoity proved to be most disconcerting; and for years after the deposition of Theebaw and the annexation of Burmah to British India these truculent banditti of the hills rendered the establishment of good government almost impossible. There was no safety of life or of property throughout the country; and the British military police had to contend for a long time against the well-organised raids of the marauders. The ordinary Burman is a pacifically inclined individual and a somewhat lazy one too. He was not very eager to take part in the punishment of the dacoits who swept down from the hills and harried his villages, killed the villagers, and committed all kinds of detestable excesses. By dint of great perseverance the back of this irritating system of guerilla warfare was broken and the feat was accomplished mainly by British-backed columns. The country was gradually cleared of the native brigands, and the elements of recuperation were cultivated with such assiduity that Burmah soon regained its political, social, and economic equilibrium.

The Prince of Wales has not been in a position to institute direct comparisons between the condition of Burmah in 1876 and in 1906. But history has furnished him with the data, and His Royal Highness would be fully able to appreciate the change. He found that Rangoon, the emporium of Burmah, had increased enormously in importance and prosperity. Indeed, next to Calcutta, Rangoon is the chief port of the Bay of Bengal, and every year adds to the bulk of its trade, because it taps an enormously fertile and extensive region. The multiplication of railways in Burmah has done much to change the face of the country, to incite the natives to engage more industriously in trade, and to introduce reforms which might, under other circumstances, have been long delayed. But the river Irrawaddy is the magnificent "silent highway" which intersects Burmah from the north and south, and over its bosom enormous quantities of merchandise are conveyed to the coast, and thence to the markets of Europe. Up and down the banks of the Irrawaddy the Royal party has within the past weeks passed sometimes by rail, and occasionally by steamer on the river itself. They have penetrated as far north as Mandalay, where there still exist many interesting relics of Theebaw's despicable rule. The remoteness of Mandalay from the coast not unnaturally militates against its rapid commercial expansion. But even under the influence of this drawback it has made enormous progress during the twenty years that it has been under British administration. As a correspondent, telegraphing from Mandalay yesterday, said, "Prosperity and contentment clearly reign throughout the country, and are reflected in every face—a striking contrast to the gloomy forebodings with the annexation of Upper Burmah" provoked in certain quarters. British experience in the government of India proved to be invaluable when it became imperative to find a solution for the Burmese problem.

The British administrators have learned to weigh aright the value of native opinion. They had become experienced in divining the trend of native aspirations, and with a little skilful adaptation it was found that after the scourge of dacoity had been overcome, the Burmese were ready to respond, and willingly, to the influence of a sympathetic control. The telegrams descriptive of the Royal party's visit to Mandalay are extremely interesting and suggestive. The Prince, the Princess, and their suite spent much of their time in sightseeing in the inland city, where so many tragic scenes were aforesaid enacted. And Mandalay and its environments present a veritable feast to the industrious sightseer. Though the war was responsible for much destruction, there remain all those curious and occasionally magnificent relics which usually distinguish a Royal city from the others—for Mandalay was a couple of decades ago, or a little more, the site of King Theebaw's palace, and one of the centres of the spiritual control exercised by the Buddhist hierarchy. Everywhere the Royal party went the receptions were most enthusiastic, a proof, if one were needed at this late period, that the Burmese are thoroughly satisfied with British rule, under which they have regained prosperity and adequate guarantees of the sanctity of the home and of life and property. By the majority of the Burmese people the Prince and Princess of Wales have been regarded as the embodiments of that beneficent Power from which they have reaped inestimable advantages.

20TH JANUARY 1906.

Civil and Military Gazette.—The Englishman understands that the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal and Lady Fraser were anxious that the ladies attending the purdah party at Belvedere should receive some suitable memento of the occasion; and it was ultimately decided to ask the sanction of the Prince and Princess of Wales to have a medal struck, which might be presented by the Princess of Wales to the ladies who attended the purdah party. The obverse of the medal gives two overlapping profile portraits of the Prince and Princess, the likeness being very good. The inscription is simply "T. R. H. the Prince and Princess of Wales". The reverse of the medal shows in the centre a palm tree, at the foot of which is crouched the Bengal Tiger, while on the right of the tree is the Prince of Wales's feathers and on the left the Star of India. The surrounding inscription of this side is "to commemorate the Royal visit to the Indian Empire 1905-06." On the rim of the medal are the words "Belvedere, January, 1st, 1906". A second medal was struck, as was the first, by Messrs. Hamilton and Company to commemorate the Royal visit, the obverse showing a three-quarter face portrait of the Prince and another of the Princess, the medallions facing each other, and being encircled with a double loop of rope terminating with a Staffordshire knot. Above the two portraits and between them is shown the Crown, and beneath, the badge of the Indian Empire. The reverse of the medal is the same as that of the medal used at the purdah party. From this second die 20 medals in silver and five hundred in white metal were struck and distributed to petty officers and sailors of H.M.S. Renown and Hyacinth; and 4 silver and about 1,500 white metal medals to the children forming the choir on the occasion of the maiden entertainment and other children who lined the routes, the distribution being made by the Inspector of European Schools.

Englishman.—The press correspondents with the Prince of Wales left Rangoon to-day for Madras, by the Jelutong. Indian Daily News.—The Prince's programme to-day includes a duck shoot at Paunglin, where the river steamer was due to arrive at eight this morning. At the landing place the Commissioner and Deputy Commissioner of Minbu were present, and the elders of Salin and Sinbugyun. A pavilion was erected at the top of the landing place, and troupes of amateur dancers gave a performance. The Prince rode for about a mile to the Lake, where a shoot was arranged.

After anchoring at Minhla to-night, the Japan reaches Prome, about 4 P.M. to-morrow. Their Royal Highnesses joining by train after dinner, and reaching Rangoon early on Sunday morning. They immediately board a launch, which conveys them to the Renown for the voyage to Madras.

Lady's Pictorial.—By travelling all night I was able to witness the arrival of the Prince and Princess of Wales at the Fort railway station. A picturesque crowd awaited the royal train, scarlet robes of Judges, academical gowns of clerics mingled with the uniforms of the political and military officers, red cloth and rich rugs marked the royal path to the daïs for the reception of the customary municipal address. Whenever possible this document is read by the senior Indian member of the Board, the Prince always desiring to show special courtesy to the natives of the country whose guest he is. A strip of white satin, lettered and fringed with gold, with a border of conventional wild roses, contained the felicitations and welcome of Agra. The casket was a characteristic specimen of the pietra dura for which the local workmen are famous. It was hewn out of a single block of marble, and inlaid with more than eight thousand bits of malachite, agate, and other valuable stones. A little variety was given to the proceedings by the nine-year-old Rajah of Bhadawa handing a bouquet to the Princess; the ribbons were worked with the Prince of Wales's feathers in gold. The Rajah was a quaint little figure in killed white robes hung about with jewels and miniature weapons.

In the afternoon Their Royal Highnesses honoured the members of the Agra Club by accepting their invitation to a garden party in the historic precincts of the Sikandra Bagh. The word Sikandra is the native corruption of Alexander, the name, it is supposed, in some way commemorates the invasion of India by the great Macedonian. The place is now celebrated as the sepulchre of the Moghul Emperor Akbar, whose sarcophagus is enclosed by exquisite fretwork in marble. A very beautiful effect is obtained at sunset when the westering rays filter through the delicate tracery. At the head is a low pillar on which tradition says the Koh-i-noor once rested. Flanking the main entrance to Sikandra are minarets which for more than a century were in a somewhat dilapidated condition. They have lately been restored by order of Lord Curzon to whom India owes much for the preservation of her archaeological and historic treasures. As an instance of the keenness of observation and unfeigned interest the Prince brings to bear on his temporary surroundings, His Royal Highness suggested that the newly-erected pinnacles should be treated with tobacco juice to render the marble of uniform tone with the older portions of the structure. The music was furnished by the band of the 17th Rajputs, the loyal regiment, a significant designation when one remembers the tragic occurrences of the Indian Mutiny less than half a century ago. For the Oriental guests a tent had been provided with flagons of rose-water, cardamoms, betel-nut, and other strange refreshments. In a small marquee were displayed a few of the treasures of the Bhurtpore Raj. Among them was a table-cover of the inevitable crimson velvet brodered with gold and gems to the value of some £4,000. Needless to say, the dresses were of the most recherché description. Her Royal Highness came in a pale blue gown, the skirt inlet with a broad band of a darker shade, narrowing down to the front, the coat was Eton in shape, with rounded tabs. The toque was white with a tuft of blue feathers placed on the left side, and worn with a spotted veil. The Countess of Shaftesbury was in fawn-grey with a mauve hat trimmed with velvet of a deeper tone, and plumes of graduated purple. Lady Eva Dugdale was wearing a flowered silk with a trellis pattern in narrow black velvet placed at intervals round the skirt, and repeated on the bodice. Lady Digges La Touche was all in heliotrope, her charming young relatives, Miss Caswell and Miss. Onslow, were in green and pink respectively. How much they will have to tell of their eventful sojourn in the East when they return to their homes across the sea, the one to Chicago, and the other to Toronto. Lady La Touche is herself a Canadian. Lady Gaselee, to the universal regret, was unfortunately not well enough to be present. Lady Locke Elliott came over from Lucknow, her dress of blue and white having a long basque resembling coat tails. Mrs. Reynolds was in black and white. Mrs. Winter in grey, and Mrs. Hopkins in cream voile elaborately appliquéd over white silk. The last-named lady had the honour of presentation both to the Prince and to the Princess. On Sunday, the 17th, Their Royal Highnesses, accompanied by their suite, attended divine service in the Cantonment Church, St. George's as it happened. The sermon was preached by the Bishop of Lucknow. It made appropriate reference to Akbar, the Emperor always associated with Agra to his interest in all spiritual questions, and to his futile attempt to form a new religion of his own. The collection was for the benefit of the Allahabad Free Schools, and we were aptly reminded of the Arabic inscription on Akbar's great mosque, "Said Jesus:—Thy best possession is what thou hast given in alms." I may add that it was in the boys' department of these schools that the Eurasian claimant to the Gardner peerage was educated. At the parade service his Royal Highness was in the naval uniform which suits him so well, the Princess all in cream colour, a single pink rose in the toque striking the only note of deeper tone. The next day took place the most important function connected with the Royal visit, the unveiling of the statue of her late beloved Majesty Queen Victoria, subscribed for by the inhabitants of the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh. The memorial consists of a standing figure in bronze, with allegorical representations of Truth and Justice on either side, and is a very fine example of the work of Mr. T. Brock, R.A. The ceremony was of the most impressive character. Mr. Justice Knox, President of the committee, read an eloquent address, to which the Prince gave a sympathetic reply. His Royal Highness then pulled a cord, and the fall of the Union Jack disclosed the majestic figure which perpetuates the memory of the first Empress of India. Troops presented arms, bands played the National Anthem, and a royal salute thundered out from the fort. Their Royal Highnesses declared themselves much pleased with the statue, both as a work of art, and as a likeness of their revered forbear. Standing in the Park MacDonnell, named after the Irish Secretary, whose name is now as familiar to the English as it is to the Anglo-Indian public, the statue gains in effect by its environment. Around it green grass, beyond the white dome of the Taj, and in front the red walls of the fort. Her Royal Highness wore a specially beautiful gown in honour of the memorable occasion. It was of satin, in her favourite shade of blue, with clusters of pinkish flowers scattered over the gleaming surface. Deep lace tabliers edged with very narrow black velvet, gave a double skirted appearance. The toque sparkled with gold paillettes; the parasol was white over black, with an ebony stick and silver handle.

In the evening we all foregathered at the Lieutenant-Governor's camp, in response to the invitation of Lady Digges La Touche, "to meet their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales." The illustrious guests arrived soon after ten o'clock, and remained quite a long time. The only Indian present was H. H. General Sir Pertab Singh, Maharajah of Idar who is attached to the suite of the Prince. An anecdote I wa told perhaps explains why this gentleman is always the recipient of signal marks of favour. When on a sporting expedition some years ago, one of Sir Pertab Singh's British guests fell ill and died. The Indian host tended him like a brother, and assisted to bury the young officer. It seems a simple act of kindness enough till one learns that it is considered pollution for a high caste Rajput to touch a corpse. How many of us would show friendship to a member of an alien race at the peril of our own souls? The General is a very fine polo player, an immense favourite with all who have the honour and pleasure of his acquaintance.

The gown worn by Her Royal Highness was of rose-pink velvet, with panels of chiffon covered with iridescent beads and pearls. The same beautiful ornamentation mingled with lace outlined the decolletage, and falls of lace hung from the shoulder to the elbow. With a diamond tiara and necklace of the same blazing gems she looked magnificent. The ladies-in-waiting appear to tactfully array themselves generally in white, the Countess of Shaftesbury having medallions lightly traced in black down the front and around the edge of the skirt. Lady Digges La Touche looked exceedingly well in a very handsome robe of grey velvet, with a panel of grey chiffon over orange silk, and touches of orange brightening the carriage. A bandeau of twisted orange velvet supporting a trio of diamond stars in her fair hair was most becoming. Lady Gaselee was also in grey, a sequined chiffon. We were very glad to see her out again. Many lovely dresses were to be seen at the brilliant entertainment, too numerous for detailed mention.

Naturally the Prince and Princess were shown the regulation sights of Agra; they are so well-known as to need no description.

Madras Mail.—Arrangements are being made to enable the public to view the progress of the Royal Party from the City Station to the British Residency on the 5th proximo. Inside the race-course railings, and over the brow of the hill on the other side of the road, persons who wish to see the procession will be accommodated. A strong force of Police, to the number of 600 of all ranks, leaves Bangalore for the Capital by special train to-day.

Pioneer.—An opportunity being afforded to the public of Rangoon, large numbers visited the Renown and Terrible this afternoon. The crew, numbering over 900 sailors and marines, very courteously showed the streams of visitors over both ships and explained to them the very interesting objects that confronted one on every hand. On the Terrible is one of the naval guns which was used during the ever memorable siege of Ladysmith.

The Shan visitors, with Mr. C. E. Browne, Political officer in charge, were among the visitors to the cruiser Terrible. The party which numbered 200 was conveyed in launches lent by the Port Trust. The Sawbwa of Yawnghe was absent in Mandalay, but the rest of the notables were present and the Sawbwa of Kengtung was received with a salute of nine guns from the cruiser. It was the first time the majority of them had ever seen a steamer, and the first time any of them had been aboard a big war-vessel. The Shan party now breaks up, the Karens returning this evening and the others proceeding to their homes to-morrow.

Queen.—It is fortunate that the Prince of Wales is able to include in his Indian tour a visit, albeit a hurried one, to beautiful Burmah, one of the fairest, most attractive and most interesting provinces in the Indian Empire. There are many superficial points of resemblance between Burmah and Japan, but Burmah has so far escaped the disfiguring finger, aesthetically speaking, of modern progress and civilisation. As a nation Burmah is, of course, incomparably inferior to enlightened and progressive Japan, but she is infinitely more interesting.

To the impressionable tourist and especially to the artist, the Land of Pagodas is a country of delight, with its rich colouring, varied scenery, and the gaily and insouciance of its people, a kind of blend of Irish and Japanese.

No tourist can afford to omit the river trip from Rangoon to Mandalay. The usual programme even for the leisured tourist is to Mandalay by rail and return by steamer. But there is so much of interest in the Irrawaddy that both journeys should be made by boat, one at least by cargo steamer. In the tidal waters near Rangoon the interest is chiefly human, and there is great variety in the craft from the ponderous rice barges (peingaws), teak-rafts, and steam tugs to sampans and canoes. The landscape changes as we pass to the upper reaches—the banks are clothed with tropical trees and shrubs and bordered sometimes for miles by plantains broken at frequent intervals by villages—blotches of red on the landscape. A striking feature of most of the river craft are the high poops with the elaborately carved steering chairs. The huge sails of the peingaws are another very picturesque feature in the landscape—seen miles away they look like great birds.

Then the enormous teak crafts are very curious and picturesque. Teak is the most valuable product of Burmah; it is harder even than iron wood, quite impervious to the attacks of white ants, capable of taking as fine a polish as mahogany, and is, in short, one of the most precious kinds of timber known to commerce.

There is great variety in the scenery which suggests in turn lake and river scenery in Europe. From Killarney we pass to a Scotch loch or one of the English lakes; again another reach, brightened with the huge sales of the peingaws, suggests the Nile with its dahabeahs, while a softer note in the landscape appears, and we might be in a wooded reach of the Thames like Cliveden. Then every little hill is crowned with the golden spire of some pagoda or the quaintly outlined roof of some monastery.

The Royal city of Mandalay is disappointing at first sight. The city has been laid out on the American plan, and most of the houses are of brick and plaster, interspersed with an occasional bamboo house. After the beautiful river scenery it is somewhat of an anti-climax to reach what looks at first like an American city set down on a plain, while the aesthetic advantage which might have been afforded by the river is lost by the city having been built a mile and a half from its banks.

To get a general idea of the topography we must climb Mandalay Hill, whence we get a fine panoramic view. From here the objectionable feature, from an artistic point of view, of the city, its straight streets, running at right angles, is less obtrusive. Indeed Mandalay seems another "city of magnificent distances." Very impressive is the sight of this city of gardens, with the innumerable pagodas and seven-tiered monastery roofs peeping through the masses of greenery.

If Mandalay be painfully modern to the sightseer in quest of the picturesque, the great bazaar should please him. Though we have not here the narrow lanes and alleys of Indian city bazaars, for the bazaars are wide streets, yet it is of unfailing interest and variety. It is thronged with buyers and sellers from all parts of Burmah. Sikhs, Ghoorkas, and even Thibetans may be encountered here. It is a long, straight, level ground for the tourist bent on purchasing curios, meso wares and ornaments. Silversmiths and merchants, lacquer dealers, cheroot and cigar vendors, makers, seem to predominate. The most attractive strangers are those devoted to jewellery. The shopgirls selves seem to carry a great part of their stock-in-trade on persons, and are often magnificently dressed. A curious is to attach rosettes of rubies and diamonds to the lobes of ears, while jewelled ear-tubes are thrust through the

The Royal Palace is supposed to be the chief sight of Mandalay, though it is of far inferior interest to the pagodas noticed below. It stands in a mile-square inclosure, called Fort Dufferin, and is surrounded by a moat 100 yards wide, which is the most picturesque feature of the place.

The gaudy halls and pavilions of Theebaw's enormous palace have either fallen into disrepair or are used as Government offices, clubs, schools, etc., while the great hall of audience has been converted into the garrison church.

The Aracan Pagoda is by far the most interesting Buddhist temple in Mandalay. All the religious life centres here, and, indeed, it is to Mandalay what the Schway Dagon is to Rangoon. This pagoda is some two or three miles beyond the city. It is approached by four entrances at the cardinal points. The western entrances is guarded by two colossal monsters which at a distance bear a strong resemblance to the Schway Dagon leopards, only on a near view they resolve themselves into huge cats.

The East Gate is, however, the main approach, and here the worship of Buddha's votaries culminates. The scene is extraordinarily bizarre and yet impressive. "The frescoed front," to quote the graphic description of Mr. Scott O'Connor, "is gorgeous with the colouring and imagery of the East. Palaces, crenelated walls, and lotus-covered waters, ascending spires, kings and princes in cloth of gold and jewellers' vestments, nobles and monks, fabulous beings, elephants and horses, myriads of soldiery, demons of the grossest ugliness, and all the pains of hell, the transitoriness and the suffering of life are here delineated with singular, if effective, realism."

After attempting to decipher this extraordinarily grotesque imagery, it is a startling transition to watch the surging crowds of all sorts and conditions. For the precincts of a pagoda are as much a market-place and recreation ground as a place of worship.

Monks and nuns, wrinkled hags and toddling babies, brilliantly attired girls carrying trays of flowers, rough, white-hatted Shans pass and repass, while in startling contrast, beggars and lepers sit in alcoves holding out beseeching hands, while a blind fiddler plays mechanically for alms. Among them English tourists stroll with an air of aloofness, and every now and then Sikhs or Goorkhas from the barracks stalk about unmolested.

Of the other pagodas well worth visiting are the "450 Pagodas of the Law" and the Aindaw Yah Pagoda. The latter bears some resemblance to the Schway Dagon of Rangoon, and is surrounded by monasteries and subsidiary shrines. The 450 Pagodas constitute a kind of Buddhist bible in stone. Each pagoda is built over a marble slab containing a precept of Buddha, and the whole make up a complete copy of the law which those who run may read.

Perhaps the most lasting impression after a visit to Burmah is that of the innumerable statues of Buddha in contemplation, several of which will be seen in every village, while in the large monasteries they may be numbered by hundreds. They never vary in type, and, next to the wrapt expression, the most striking features are the fingers, which are always of the same length —a symbolical meaning, no doubt, attaching to this. There can be no question that Buddhism is a far more elevated religion than the older Brahmanism, with its gross materialism and idolatry. Yet it is hard for the Western mind to understand the significance of the essence of the Buddhist faith—the rejection of existence by absorption into Buddha, which is the aim and hope of every devout Burman. The full accomplishment of this mystic ideal is, however, reserved for the few, the Phloonges, or monks, and is the reward of exceptional and lifelong self-sacrifice.

Burmah Gazette.—The Japan anchored at Pakokku this afternoon (18th January). The weather has been cool with a north breeze, but there is a mist in the morning.

This afternoon the Japan with the Royal party aboard reached Paunglin from Pakokku where she anchored the previous night at three o'clock. The Prince with eight other guns from the Royal party started for the scene of the duck shoot about a mile distance. Very good sport was obtained. The Prince bagged a couple of dozen birds. The Japan remains here overnight starting for Prome at daylight.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE PAPERS PUBLISHED IN BENGAL, FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 20TH JANUARY 1906.

Burdwan Sanjivani.—The Burdwan Sanjivani [Burdwan] of the 9th January asks if the Prince of Wales was gracious enough to try to know the condition of Bengal and its people. His Royal Highness is prayed to heal the wound which now pains every Bengali heart.

Samay.—The Samay [Calcutta] of the 12th January writes as follows:—However much the English may disbelieve the Indians, the latter still respect them, or why in the midst of overwhelming sorrows and distress should the Indians have expressed so much eagerness to see the Prince and Princess of Wales. The Prince came to India avowedly with the object of gaining a personal knowledge of India and its people. But this purpose has not been served in practice. Of India His Royal Highness has seen only so much as the officials have chosen to show him, and has heard only so much as the officials have cared to tell him. No native was allowed to approach His Royal Highness without official permission. His Royal Highness has seen nautches and tamasahs. He has also seen how happy and prosperous the Anglo-Indians have grown at the expense of the Indians and how the English have completely subjugated the Native States of India. Besides these, the Prince has seen some of the great cities and picturesque sceneries in India. But what have the Indians gained by all this? To them it is as if the Prince had not come, because he did not succeed in gaining any knowledge about them. It was a serious mistake on the part of the authorities in India to keep the Prince aloof from the Indians and thus raise a barrier between the Sovereign and the subject. The consequence of this mistake cannot but be serious for both the parties. How long will the officials be able to hide the rottenness of the Indian administration? How long will they be able to keep in darkness the weakness and imbecility to which the Indians have been reduced by the official disregard of the late Queen's Proclamation. In its address to the Prince of Wales the Corporation of Calcutta spoke of the wealth and prosperity of India under the English. The statement was not merely an exaggeration, but it was altogether groundless. If India is rich and prosperous, why do thousands of people die every year of starvation in the land? The most fertile of brains cannot imagine a more preposterous lie than that that country is rich and prosperous in which zamindars and talukdars lose their estates for being unable to pay their revenues before sunset, in which people see everything blank before them for failure to pay subscriptions demanded by officials and in which raiyats have to sell their plough cattle and agricultural implements for paying off their debts and zamindari rents. Again, if India had been governed, as the Bombay Corporation said in its address to the Prince, without distinction of creed, caste or colour, would Lord Curzon have been able to do so much mischief to the Indians? And would Sir Bampfylde Fuller and Sir Andrew Fraser have been able to commit so much oppression on the Bengalis?

Hitaradi.—The Hitaradi [Calcutta] of the 12th January says:—The Prince of Wales has come to India. But what sights are presenting themselves before his eyes as compared with those that presented themselves before the eyes of his Royal father ! As the Indian people have on the one hand been unable to receive His Royal Highness with open arms, so on the other he has been unable to make a good survey of their real condition. The sweet words of the sycophant, the homage paid by a few seekers of official favour and the information supplied by Government officers are the only sources from which the Prince may derive any knowledge of India during his tour. This is the Royal visit to India ! Oh, the fireworks, the purdah party and the illumination !

When the occasion comes for wasting the people's money, India must act in the true fashion of an Oriental. But in other matters she is not considered as an Oriental. For what amount of revenue has been remitted, how many prisoners have been released,—in short what has the land gained by the Royal visit ? What cause have the Indians to be jubilant over the Royal visit ? Will the mean-minded sycophants and the paid servants of Government think over the matter ?

Daily Hitavadi.—The Daily Hitavadi [Calcutta] of the 13th January has the following :—The Review of Reviews says :—“Their (Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales's) tour will cover pretty well all the great centres of Indian life, from Mandalay on the East to Karachi on the West, and will occupy four or five months. It is to be hoped that the succession of pageants will not be so continuous as to prevent Their Highnesses going amongst proletariat of the field and of the schools, and learning at first hand the actual state of things. The impressions left on the mind of an Heir-Apparent may prove of more value than many agitations.”

The above remarks are no doubt very sound. But while it is not the custom in India for sovereigns to make themselves acquainted with the real condition of the subjects by direct intercourse with them, the officials kept the Prince so constantly engaged in festivities and merriments that His Royal Highness found no time to converse with any native and acquire a knowledge of the sorrows which afflict the children of the soil. His Royal Highness has not seen the tears that flow from the eyes of the tax-ridden, starving millions of the country, the miseries of the Indians that are wrought by oppressive officials and the sufferings that are caused by the deadly malaria. The Prince's tour in India has, in fact, been useless.

Bangavasi.—The Bangavasi [Calcutta] of the 13th January says that the Royal visit to Calcutta, so far as the arrangements made for it by the authorities are concerned, has grieved the Bengalis. That it has had this effect is not because prisoners were not released, or poor men were not fed, or because a number of Government servants were dismissed during its continuance, but because the Prince was unable to make himself acquainted with the sorrows and grievances of the people or with the misdoings of Sir Bampfylde Fuller and Sir Andrew Fraser. But the extremely grateful Bengali will nevertheless calmly bear all this and pray to God for the long life and prosperity of the English sovereign and the rest of the Royal family and for the welfare of the English nation, because the Bengali nation still hopes that its prosperity is bound to follow the prosperity of the English.

Ratnakar.—The Ratnakar [Asansol] of the 13th January writes as follows :—The Prince came, but what did he do for us ? No tax was reduced, our sorrows remain the same as before and official oppression has not abated a bit. What have we then gained by the Royal visit ? We have gained three things—first, the sight of amusements and festivities ; second, ill-treatment at the hands of the police ; and third, waste of money.

As for the officials it was but natural that they kept the Prince constantly engaged in merriments and festivities in order to hide their own misdoings from him. But we are at a loss to make out what induced the poor, wretched, half-starved natives of the country to assume smiling looks on the occasion and join in the round of merriments ? Had not these men taken a pledge, on the day of the partition of Bengal, to refrain from taking any part in official festivities ? It was no doubt the duty of the people to welcome the Prince. But the Prince was a rich man and he would not come to the humble abodes of poor people and hear sad accounts of their sorrows and grievances, their wants and complaints. And even if His Royal Highness had actually heard of these things, what could he do without the consent of officials and ministers ? What is then the use of making His Royal Highness acquainted with our sorrows and grievances ? He is the son of our sovereign, and it was our duty to pay respects to him, and that we should have done from a distance, because he would not come to our humble abodes. But uninvited the people went, like dogs, to take part in the round of festivities got up by the officials and, like dogs, they were received with blows and kicks by the police and white men. It appears from all this that Bengalis have no sincerity in the outbursts of patriotism to which they occasionally give vent.

Ratnakar.—The same paper with regard to the Prince of Wales's visit says :—What did the Prince see in this country and what had his father seen. The people of India could not welcome His Royal Highness with open hearts ; and the Prince on his part got no opportunity of really meeting the people ; he had to leave the country only after hearing the sweet words of the flatterers and witnessing the wagging of the tail of the authorities. This is all that the visit of the Prince to India amounts to.

Bangavasi.—In noticing the Royal visit the Hindi Bangavasi [Calcutta] of the 15th January asks :—O Prince ! Your Royal Highness had the pleasure of a tour in India and in due course you will safely reach your home, but what have you done for us the poor and helpless inhabitants of India who hoped to receive some permanent benefit at your hands, for you are their future king. We are glad to see that your gentle mind was impressed with the loyalty of the Indian people ; it may therefore be hoped that India will be benefited some day or other. Did Your Royal Highness meet a gentleman of the middle class in addition to those of the highest classes or care to acquaint yourself with the real condition of the people ? In ancient times, the Rajas and Maharajas used to travel in disguise to ascertain the real condition of the people. It was therefore your duty to get an insight into the condition of your subjects.

You are a Prince, and you had nothing to fear. Had Your Royal Highness seen their real condition and heard their grievances you would have been able to inform your august father of the miserable condition of poor India, but alas ! you acted only as a puppet in the hands of your officers ; you moved as they desired ; you could not give effect to your wishes regarding any object even if you so intended.

The burden of ruling this vast Indian empire will one day devolve upon you, but you will not be able to visit India then ; this was therefore the best opportunity for you to acquaint yourself with the condition of the masses. The opportunity has not passed away yet. Your Royal Highness will be in this country for about two months longer ; even if you now care to know something, you can learn a great deal—nay the whole of it. After you have ascended the throne, you will have to see everything through the eyes of your ministers. Had you been able to see the real India now, the people could have expected much from you then. It is a pity that you are spending your time in seeing dances and plays, making shooting excursions and exchanging visits and not trying to acquaint yourself with the real condition of the people. Tell me truly, O Prince ! is this not your duty ?

Among the gentry, some received titles, some photos, some walking sticks, and a few were pleased by you with mere sweet words ; but what was done by Your Royal Highness to give consolation to the masses, or to impress them with the fact that they have been visited by their future Emperor, in the capacity of the Prince of Wales? Of course they have one means of keeping in mind the Royal visit; and that is the black marks on their body inflicted by the batons and whips of the police which they received when going to see the Royal processions.

O Prince! the poor people of the metropolis were likewise in the hope that they would be given a good dinner, a luxury to which they are very seldom treated and the friends and relations of those unlucky ones who are dragging their existence in the jail hoped that in commemoration of the visit of their beloved and generous Prince, a number of prisoners would be set at liberty, and those in whom they were interested might perhaps, be included in the number, but there is no sign yet of their hopes being fulfilled.

O Prince! the Indians did their utmost to commemorate the Royal visit; the Maharaja of Darbhanga contributed Rs. 1,00,000 for the purpose, but what have Your Royal Highness done on your part?

Hilavarta.—With reference to the public entertainment given in honour of the Royal party at the maidan, the Hilavarta [Calcutta] of the 14th January says:—

The distinguished assemblage which saw the Prince on the maidan near the Fort on Tuesday before last did not include the representatives of the people. A few of the gentlemen present were disgusted with the entertainment given before the Prince. The sankirtan party more resembled a Sonthal dance. To the Prince Dhruwad, Tillana (strains of music) and sankirtan are all the same. It was the duty of the Reception Committee to consult the public on the point.

Hilavarta.—In an article headed "Benefits of Travelling," the same paper says:—Thirty years ago His Majesty the King-Emperor Edward VII visited India and America in the capacity of the Prince of Wales, and thereby gained much knowledge. But it is not known what knowledge the present Prince of Wales has acquired by his one week's stay in this city. If His Royal Highness's visit to all the Indian cities resembled that of Calcutta, it must then be said that he gained no knowledge whatever regarding the natives of India. The way in which he saw the people by coming here was no better than that in which he could have seen them by staying at home. His Royal Highness was so surrounded by the Anglo-Indian officials that he saw nothing but these officials on all sides; his eyes could not penetrate the ranks of the whites to reach that of the blacks. The cry of the grievances of the multitudes was drowned in the loud cheerings of the welcomes and receptions. The officials managed to hide the real condition of the people from the Royal gaze; and exhibited only the bright side of the picture. They did not take the Prince to those parts of the country where famine is now raging, lest His Royal Highness should come to know that India, once of gold, has now been converted into a large burning ground (crematory).

His Royal Highness witnessed the illuminations, the fireworks, and the military parades in Calcutta and has carried with him the honorary degree of D.C.L. of the Calcutta University. His satisfaction with the police arrangements gained a title for the Commissioner of Police, Mr. Halliday. The Sheriff of Calcutta was made a Knight. Knighthood was conferred upon the son of Sir Jotendra Mohan Tagore.

But His Royal Highness has obtained no information regarding the treatment to which the three hundred millions of people have been subjected by the officials. Thousands of people had come from villages to get a glimpse of His Royal Highness, but they had only to return to their homes after receiving blows at the hands of the Police constables. Did anybody communicate this to His Royal Highness? It remains to be seen if the officials who tried to conceal the real condition of the people from the Royal gaze will receive their due return.

Had any foreign Prince visited our country, we would have shown him our prosperity and wealth only, and would have concealed our poverty and indigence, to assure him that we were very happy under the British rule; but the Prince of Wales is our would-be Emperor, and we are his subjects, and whatever belongs to us is really his. Now that we are his subjects, we are like his sons. It behoves him, therefore, that he should enquire whether we are happy or in trouble; whether his officers (servants) are treating us kindly or otherwise; whether they are acting in accordance with the Proclamation of Her Majesty, his noble grandmother, or trampling it under their feet.

Although we have been reduced to straits, His Royal Highness's servants (officers) in order to hide their own fault will surely represent that the people of India are happy, and their prosperity is daily increasing. A servant may say that he is working very hard and attending to his duties, still the master should enquire whether his servant tells a lie or speaks the truth.

The Prince during his Indian tour visited all the places worth seeing; he saw the Kutub Minar and the Tajmahal; he inspected the Khyber pass, and is about to visit some of the other places of interest—in fact he has seen in India all that is interesting, except the people themselves.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE PAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE BOMBAY PRESIDENCY.

Phaniz.—"That the Royal tour in India has proved so far an unqualified success goes without saying. After the completion of the Calcutta week of feasts and festivities, part of the tour is over. . . . Everywhere the rich and the poor, the prince and the peasant have vied with one another in according a cordial, hearty and a right royal reception to the grandson of Queen Victoria the Good, of happy memory, who wrought her people lasting good

The Prince has seen historic and picturesque India. He has seen the pomp and pageantry, and the glittering howdahs, and stately elephants, of the Native Princes, who spared neither money nor trouble in receiving befittingly the son of the Emperor of India. The Prince has come in close contact with the handful of Englishmen, who hold the destinies of the multitudinous masses in India in the hollow of their hands.

To be brief, the Prince has seen up to now the bright side of the shield. Has he observed the dark side of the picture? Has he had a glimpse of the real India? And what is real India? Where are her real people to be sought? The late Viceroy told us in his farewell oration at the Byculla Club dinner: 'my eye has always rested upon a larger canvas crowded with untold numbers—the real people of India—as distinct from any class or section of the people. It is the Indian poor, the Indian peasant, the patient, humble, silent millions, the 80 per cent. who subsist by agriculture, who know very little of policies but who profit or suffer by their results, to whom I refer.' This is a true picture of the real Indian people drawn by our versatile ex-Viceroy. We ask whether this picture of the real Indian people ever met the eyes of our Royal visitors up to now. Without seeing this picture without observing the rural life of India, without visiting the hovel of the Indian peasant, without looking at his simple food and without pondering over his dismal state, the Prince will not be able to form a conception of what real India is."

Mahratta.—14th January 1906. "The tour of the Prince of Wales is coming to a close. No one in India has taken any interest in it excepting, of course, the Native Chiefs and a few toadies whose sole pastime is to curry favour with the official class. For the rest the Prince will have come and gone just like any other cold weather tourist who exchanges with the Indian people no conscious greetings and whose sole object is the pleasure of travel. What impressions this future Emperor of India has received from this eastern dependency of the Empire we can scarcely know. The salams, and salutes, the banquets and fêtes, the expressions of loyal sentiment and homage that he has received from the select or chosen few in this country are as little representative of the nation's feelings as the few measured inches of set speeches which Sir Walter Lawrence wrote for him may be of the real sentiments of the Prince himself. The royal tour has equally failed to touch the imagination of the British public. According to Mr. Stead, beyond a languid feeling of curiosity as to the contents of the Prince's daily bag no one seems to concern himself about the royal progress." Elsewhere writing about the exclusion of the people from the College Square at Calcutta when the Prince was to pass by it, the paper remarks:—"They who closed the College Square at Calcutta against the people when the Prince was to pass by it did His Royal Highness a grievous wrong. For they thereby deprived him of the only opportunity of hearing how Bande Mataram sounded like Mr. H. E. S. Cotton, who, as a member of the Calcutta Corporation inquired of its Chairman why the College Square, which is under the control of the Corporation, was closed against the people, was referred to Mr. Carlyle of the Bengal Secretariat, who explained that the exclusion of the people from the College Square was due to the fact that the leaders of the students had not been able to give the assurance that shouts of Bande Mataram would not be raised. The tone was likely to prove, it was assumed, offensive and hence the precaution. But what if the offensive sound had been heard by the Prince? He would have inquired about the meaning of it and would thus have come to know of one fact about India which he could not otherwise possibly know. That fact would have enabled the Prince to know India better than he now does. All light and no shade cannot make a true picture. Nor is real India made up wholly of sweet flattery and sweeter dishes. As Mr. Stead puts it, the Prince's tour may have enabled him by this time to find that India is something greater and better than a gigantic game preserve, but this kind of mere negative knowledge is hardly sufficient for the heir-apparent to the British throne

Like the guardians of the captive Prince Buddha, the Anglo-Indian officials have carried out their resolve of effectively preventing any word or sound of sorrow or disapprobation from reaching the ears of the British Prince. May we hope that, even like Buddha, His Royal Highness too will be blessed with a secret revelation of the reality of his surroundings in his comfortable captivity."

Evening Jámé.—20th January 1906. "The glowing accounts of the popular receptions, accorded to Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales throughout their tour, emphasise once again the necessity of calling for some Royal gift to the people, something tangible that they could appreciate and remember in the days to come. Neither the stars and decorations conferred on a few individuals nor the release of a few hundreds of prisoners can be looked upon as presents to the People. We do not like the people to say in future years 'Oh yes, they came here, but what did they bring us?' The departure of Their Royal Highnesses will synchronise with the presentation of Lord Minto's first Budget. Can His Excellency not provide for a present to the people in it?—something to make the masses remember the Royal visit for all time?"

Kal.—19th January 1906. The tour of the Prince of Wales through India has not created a hundredth part of the stir and excitement caused by the swadeshi movement. There is bustle and commotion for a day or two in the towns visited by the Prince, but after his departure there is a perfect lull again and not a trace is visible of the Prince's visit. It is to be regretted that the Prince's tour should be so uneventful. If the Prince did not want to leave any memorial of his visit in a form that would cost money, he could at least have been liberal with his words. Lord Curzon has made himself famous in this way. The Prince's public utterances, we are sorry to say, are dull and uninteresting to a degree. They are composed by Sir Walter Lawrence, who seems to be a past master in the art of writing rapid speeches, which mean nothing in particular. The Prince's tour is bound to be unproductive of any good to the Indians. We pray to God that it may at least be pleasant to him.

Hindu Panch.—17th January 1906. Our Emperor lives far beyond the seas and exercises no independent power of his own. He is completely in the hands of Parliament and resembles more or less the King on the chess-board. What can we expect from the son of such a Sovereign? We orientals think that a king is all powerful, but in England political power is wielded by the working classes and the King has to be content with the yearly grant or allowance which is voted for him. What wonder is there if the son of such a powerless Sovereign goes away from India without conferring on us any boon? Even assuming for argument's sake that the Prince is able to see things for himself and realises the miserable condition of the Indians and the inordinate oppression practised by the officials upon the people, will he be able to ameliorate our lot a bit? At the most, he can seize a convenient opportunity to communicate his impressions to his Royal father when none of the Ministers are hard by. The King-Emperor will probably be grieved to hear his son's account, but beyond that even His Majesty cannot go. This is all due to the present form of the British constitution, but an enslaved people like ourselves have no business to concern ourselves with the question whether that form is suitable or otherwise. Many people are finding fault with the Prince for having enjoyed himself right royally in Native States. But what else can he do? Should he travel through the country like a beggar?

Indian Spectator.—20th January 1906. "A paragraph appeared in the English papers some time ago that the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales to India had revived in the leading Indian journals the discussion of an idea not altogether new—that of having a Prince of the Royal blood as Viceroy in this dependency. It received some amount of attention at the time of the Delhi Durbar. Mr. Theodore Morrison, who advocated it in his 'Imperial Rule in India,' urges it again in an able and lucid article in the current number of the North American Review. A correspondent of the Times of India understands that the King-Emperor is personally in favour of it. It may, however, be too much to expect a speedy realisation of the idea. There is no Disraeli at the head of affairs in England just now

At the present stage it would be premature to discuss the proposal in detail. In outline it would assign to the Prince-Viceroy a position analogous to that of the King in England. He would dissociate himself from controversial politics, the actual government being carried on by the Governor-General—differently styled, if necessary—in Council

The Gaekwar thought that the Prince would be the social head of the community in India: His Highness's position precluded him from expressing any opinion on the political aspect of the proposal. The political position of the Chiefs would remain unchanged: only the person representing the paramount power would be a member of the Royal Family of Great Britain and not the Governor-General

With a representative of the Royal family in India—judging from our experience hitherto—the relations between the rulers and the ruled are likely to improve materially in favour of the latter. We discern in the proposal a better solution of the race difficulty in India than press criticisms and Viceregal reproofs—as the Viceroys are now constituted.”

SELECTIONS FROM ENGLISH PAPERS OWNED BY NATIVES OF MADRAS AND FROM VERNACULAR PAPERS PUBLISHED IN MADRAS.

Sradesi.—Referring to the suggestion that the Viceroy of India should be selected from the members of the British Royal family, the Sradesi, of the 20th January, considers that this suggestion is not a wise one. It fears that if a member of the Royal family be the Viceroy of India, the people will hesitate to criticize freely the measures of the Government and that much harm will be caused thereby. The appointment of a large number of Indians to high posts and consulting them in matters relating to the administration of the country will, in the opinion of this paper, tend to promote the fidelity of the people to their Sovereign.

Desabhimani, Bezvada and Guntur.—The Desabhimani of the 18th January hopes, that His Majesty the King-Emperor will during his régime convert India into a British “Protectorate” and thus establish his prestige and magnanimity. It adds that if His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales were to rule India assisted by a Council, then India would undoubtedly be a prop to the British Empire. If the English do not realise the benefits of such a suggestion, they will do well, it remarks, to bestow on the Indians, to some extent at least, the privileges of self-government in order they may improve themselves and be highly helpful to others.

Andhraprakasika.—The Andhraprakasika, of the 17th January, strongly reprobates the action of the Royal Entertainment Committee in Madras in selling tickets for admission to galleries erected in public streets to witness the forthcoming Royal procession. It remarks that this is not a circus or a theatre; and that undesirable people such as public prostitutes will freely rush in and take their seats with respectable people causing no little annoyance to them. Even at the time of the Coronation of His Majesty the King-Emperor the public thoroughfares in London were not encroached upon, but only private persons erected galleries near their houses and made money. If sufficient amount were not received for expenses in connection with the reception of the Prince, there might be some excuse for the course adopted, though it would not be unobjectionable. But when Rs. 60,000 are in hand, the paper cannot imagine why the Reception Committee has ventured to adopt this shameful procedure. It hopes that as there is one more week for the arrival of the Prince, the Committee will see its way to immediately cancel the arrangements made. Otherwise, not only will the Committee be an object of disgrace but their conduct will reflect on the honour of the Prince.

Svadesamitran.—The Svadesamitran, of the 17th January, protests against the proposed arrangement of selling tickets for admission to the stands erected along the route of the Royal procession in Madras, and says that this is a novel feature of this city. It states that the Prince and the Princess are sure to be much afflicted, when they come to know that the faithful subjects of the British Empire, who were very anxious to see them, had to purchase tickets, as if the Royal personages were curious objects exhibited in a museum. This paper therefore enjoins the citizens not to occupy the seats in the galleries, but to stand behind them and witness the procession, and remarks that those who fail to do seek their self-degradation.

Nadegannadi.—A correspondent to the Nadegannadi, of the 20th January, complains that the postage charges on parcels are too high, and suggests that, in commemoration of the visit of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales to India, the minimum charge may be fixed at 1 anna for 5 tolas. The correspondent says that this measure of relief will make the people remember the visit with gratitude for a long time to come.

The editor of the same paper states that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales paid in Calcutta Rs. 1,500 to a Christian church and in Bombay a similar amount to a Hindu temple and to a Mussalman mosque, respectively; and that he hears that His Royal Highness is going to give Rs. 1,500 to a Buddhist temple in Burma. The editor observes that while these religions have been honoured by His Royal Highness, the Parsi and Jain religious institutions ought not to be left in the cold.

PUNJAB FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 20TH JANUARY 1906.

The Sat Dharm Parcharak (Jullunder), of the 12th January 1906, after stating how large sums of money are to be spent in connection with the Prince of Wales' visit to Rangoon, enquires whether the Burmese are unaware that a famine is about to break out in the country. Were the thousands of Rupees they intend wasting on mere empty show spent for the benefit of thousands of their famine-stricken fellow-countrymen the latter would have been saved the starvation in store for them.

“The royal visitors have left Calcutta after a week's stay. They were not allowed to cross the line that divides the European quarter of the city from the Indian quarter. Those who went to the receptions and illuminations organised in their honour complain of having received rough-handling at the hands of the Police. Government was all in a tremor at the prospect of the royal cars being assailed by shouts of ‘Bande Mataram.’ Though a whole day was spent in putting up wooden structures in College Street for the accommodation of young collegians and others on the occasion of the Prince's visit to the Senate House, Government was suddenly seized with panic and ordered the whole thing to be pulled down and carted away under cover of night.

“The Calcutta Corporation spent Rs. 20,000 of the money it wrings from the poor rate-payer (often as the Patrika reminds us at the cost of his household chattels, which are knocked down to the highest bidder when he fails to pay up to time) in buying a present for the Princess. They could do no less—the thing had to be done in slap-up style or not at all. The reputation of the ‘Gorgeous East’ was at stake. And it was therefore right that lakhs of rupees should be spent in making a holiday for the Prince and illuminating the European part of the city till it looked like one blaze of light that marked the rays of the sun.

A Delhi correspondent writing to the Paisa Akhbar (Lahore), of the 16th January 1906, contends that it is wrong to say that Muhammadans are allowed to go into mosque with their shoes on. Indeed, Musalmans are as much opposed to shoes being taken into their mosques as are Hindus or Sikhs to their places of worship being treated in the same manner, and this not through narrow-mindedness but in consonance with the teachings of their religion. The Managers of the Jumma Mosque, Delhi, should, therefore, request His Excellency Lord Minto to forbid all European visitors to the mosque to enter even the compound without putting on shoe-coverings. The writer also objects to the mosque being illuminated in connection with loyal demonstration observing that places of worship ought on no account to be put to such use. He also insinuates that the dinner taken there by Lord Curzon on the occasion of the Coronation Durbar perhaps included that, the entry whereof into a house, let alone a mosque, renders the place impure.

UNITED PROVINCES FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 20TH
JANUARY 1906.

Surma-i-Rozgar.—The Surma-i-Rozgar (Agra) of the 8th January, referring to the proposed release of a number of well-behaved prisoners, and the reduction in the terms of imprisonment of some others in Burma, in honour of the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales to that province, says that it has not heard anything as to whether the Royal visit has been or will be similarly signalized in other provinces of India.

Indian People.—The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 14th January, says:—We have been noting the presents made by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales to the places of worship visited by him. The first offering was at the Golden Temple at Amritsar where His Royal Highness presented Rs. 1,500. A similar amount was presented to the Jumma Masjid at Delhi. Before leaving Calcutta His Royal Highness sent a similar amount to the Lord Bishop for the Cathedral. Thus the Prince of Wales has made offerings to Sikh, Muhammadan and Christian places of worship. Up to the present, however, no such offering has been made at any Hindu shrine. There was some likelihood of such a present being made to Kālī's temple at Kalighat in Calcutta, but the Royal visitors did not pay a visit to that shrine. We hope that during the Royal visit to Benares the Prince of Wales will present the same amount that he has given at other places to the temple of Viswanath. Hinduism is followed by the largest number of people in India, and Hindus form the vast majority of the population. They are also the most intelligent and loyal section of the population. When His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has presented a uniform sum of money to every religious shrine or church, it would be both wise and graceful not to overlook the claims of the Hindu religion. We do not believe there's any difficulty in making such a present, while its omission may lead to disappointment and misconception which are in the highest degree undesirable. The amount of the present is of no consequence, it is the sentiment that means everything. Since His Royal Highness has associated himself with every other religious institution, the most ancient and the most largely followed religion of the country should not be overlooked.

Citizen.—The Citizen (Allahabad), of the 15th January, says:—We are glad that in his presidential address at the last Congress, Mr. Gokhale referring in the most loyal terms to the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to India, observed "the throne in England is above all parties—beyond all controversies." We must say that it is a pity that in Bengal the middle classes have shown themselves to be oblivious of this truth. Many of the members of these classes abstained from taking any part in the loyal demonstrations held in Calcutta in honour of the Prince and the Princess' visit. We wonder that the Bengal leaders did not point out the obvious truth that it was unconstitutional to let politics intermingle with our attitude towards the King-Emperor of the heir-apparent. If we must insist on the Government to be constitutional, we ourselves must be so in every particular. The plea that the Government of India often acts unconstitutionally justifies our acting so, is not sound; and we repeat it has not been at all wise on the part of our Bengal friends to boycott the Prince. Moreover, the very circumstance that His Royal Highness has in his speeches delivered in India given expression to very kind sentiments towards the people, and has in Bombay granted an interview to an ex-President of the Congress to learn from him all about the wants, grievances and aspirations of the Indian people, should have persuaded our brethren in Bengal not to ostracize him in the way they have done. Finally, the Prince and the Princess being our guests, no Hindus should have turned their backs on him. We cannot certainly believe that the attitude of our Bengal friends towards the Prince will expedite the withdrawal of the partition scheme.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—In connection with the Royal Visit the Maharaja of Bobbili arrived last night, the Nawab of Banganapalle and the Zemindar this morning. The Rajah of Korvetnagar, the Rajah of Kalhastri last night and the Maharaja of Jeypore this morning. The Rajah of Punganur this morning. The Rajah of Vizianagram arrives about noon to-day.

Madras Mail.—Sir,—It has no doubt occurred to you, as it has undoubtedly to all Policemen, both Officers and men, that it is about time some practical demonstration of the recommendations of the Police Commission be given. The orders of the Government of India were published in your columns as long ago as last March, and a throb of pent-up satisfaction was felt throughout the whole Department, from top to bottom. At last more pay and better prospects seemed to be within the reach of all. The nerves of the Department had been sorely tried by waiting for even glimpses of the bare outlines of the promised land, and, when they were viewed the prominent question asked was:—"When will it take effect? Some sanguine ones suggested from the 1st April; others, who are better acquainted with the dilatoriness of Under Secretaries, were less sanguine. However, all thought that since Rs. 10 lakhs had been allotted for the current financial year at least the men would get their rise in pay; but even this seems as far off as ever it was, and they so badly paid, so open to public censure, have to wait for what is theirs by right.

With all the pomp and ceremonies that are consequent upon the Royal Visit, has it not ever occurred to those who have the arrangement of the details of the onerous task thrown upon the Policemen? Others are enjoying the holidays graciously granted in honour of the Royal Visitors. Is it a holiday for the Policeman? One slip on his part, notwithstanding the fatigue he may have gone through during the preceding 24 hours, and the show would be spoilt; and yet he is even denied what no firm of business men would deny its employees once it had sanctioned it.

It is not playing the game fairly. The men have given up talking about their extra charity dole and the officers their better prospects. They all know it is not their chief's fault, for he is far too good a sportsman not to play fair; but if at this season of general rejoicing we could but think our prospects had been improved at a time when our Prince was with us. I feel confident that the dissatisfaction which is now apparent on all sides would disappear, and there would not be found a more loyal servant of Government than the Indian Policeman.

Madras Mail.—The following Press communiqué was issued on Friday evening:—As His Highness the Maharaja of Travancore will not be present in Madras on the occasion of the Royal Visit His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales will drive direct to Tulloch's Gardens on Friday the 26th instant, when his Royal Highness visits His Highness the Rajah of Cochin, i.e., via Mount Road, Binney's Road, Commander-in-Chief Bridge, Commander-in-Chief Road and College Bridge, and will return by the same route. His Royal Highness will reach Tulloch's Gardens about 1 p. m.

The Valiya Raja of Chirakkal, with his two nephews, kariasthans and followers started Saturday in a grand procession to the Azikkal railway station and left for Madras. The route, the shops and station premises were beautifully decorated. The Valiya Rajah of Walluvanad and his party arrive here on the to-morrow.

A correspondent writes:—"On the occasion of the Royal visitors returning from Guindy next Thursday evening, a pretty effect would be produced if all the Boat Club boats were to cruise about on the sea side of the bridge, between the Hon'ble Mr. Yorke's house and the Theosophical Institute. The river is wide here, if not deep, and with sails set, and decorated with flags, and lanterns if dark, a charming night would be presented."

A general rehearsal in connection with the approaching arrival and reception of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales was held yesterday. The whole of the troops detailed to take part in the function turned out and lined the route from the Harbour to Government House. The entire body of Cavalry to form the escort was also in attendance. Six Non-commissioned officers of the 6th Battery, R. F. A., took up the place which is to be allotted for the six sections of the R. F. A., which will take part in the procession with their guns. The procession started at a walk, but when Parry's Corner was reached it moved on at a steady trot up to the entrance to Government House. His Excellency the Governor, His Highness the Rajah of Cochin, and the Prince of Arcot were present, and several of the other Chiefs and Zemindars who are to take part sent their carriages. The parking of carriages at the Harbour was carried out in a thoroughly systematic fashion under the supervision of Mr. W. O. Horne, I.C.S., Inspector-General of Police, Mr. O. R. Jones, Commissioner of Police and Mr. C. L. Bidie, Deputy Commissioner. For every carriage a special square was marked and numbered off, and each carriage as it drove in was allotted its proper place, so that when the procession was formed there was no delay or confusion. The Police arrangements along the route, which were in charge of Mr. H. M. Upshon, Assistant Commissioner, also left nothing to be desired. A very large crowd of people lined the roads to witness the procession. Everything went off satisfactorily.

Restrictions under the Epidemic Diseases Act are notified in the Gazette of India upon the issue of railway tickets from places in the Mysore State to Madras and the neighbouring places, between the 17th and 29th instant, as the Governor-General-in-Council is satisfied that there is a danger of the spread of the outbreak of dangerous epidemic disease with which Madras city is visited if persons from the Mysore State are permitted to assemble at that place on the occasion of the ensuing visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales.

Pioneer.—The Japan anchored at Pakokku last evening. The Prince's programme to-day (Friday) included a duck shoot at Paundlin, where the steamer reached this morning. The Commissioner and Deputy Commissioner of Minbu were present at the landing stage. The Prince of Wales rode for about a mile to the lake, where a shoot had been arranged. After anchoring at Minbu to-night the Japan reaches Promé about 4 p.m. to-morrow. Their Royal Highnesses joining the train after dinner. They are due to arrive at Barr Street Jetty, Rangoon, at 6-30 a.m. on Sunday, and will, without delay, board the launch which conveys them to the Renown for their voyage to Madras. Their Royal Highnesses, Sir Walter Lawrence, Sir Arthur Bigge, Major-General Beatson, Sir Charles Cust, Captain Wigram, Lieutenant-Colonel Charles and Lady Eva Dugdale will be conveyed to the Renown, and Commander Godfrey Fausset, Mr. Dugdale, Major Campbell, Major Grimstone and Major Watson to the Terrible.

The members of the Rangoon Gymkhana entertained the crews of the fleet lying in the river this afternoon. Over three hundred men from the Hyacinth, Fox, Perseus and Terrible put in an appearance, while others who would have come were prevented from doing so by losing their way on the road up to the Gymkhana which is about four miles from the wharf

3RD JANUARY 1906.

Englishman.—The Prince and Princess of Wales left Rangoon this morning by the Renown having duly arrived at Promé in the Japan at 6 p.m. on Saturday. The Railway line from Promé was illuminated throughout the entire length. The departure was private. The Royal train arrived at Barr Street Jetty at 6-45 a.m. A temporary platform was erected for the landing of the party, and the jetty had been decorated with plants and flowers. A large gathering of officials awaited the arrival of the train, and the Rangoon police lined the roads and railway line to prevent obstruction and wheel traffic crossing the line. Their Royal Highnesses remained in the train an hour before alighting. When the Prince alighted it was eight o'clock. The Lieutenant-Governor, Lady and Miss White, Colonel Lawford, Mr. Gates, Chief Secretary, Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Laurie, Mr. W. H. Dawson, and a number of others were then present. Until Her Royal Highness appeared the Prince stood conversing with the Lieutenant-Governor. He then shook hands with Lady White and Miss White, and was introduced to several officials present, including Captain Kincaid, Mr. Huddleston and other railway officials who had accompanied the Royal train to Rangoon.

As their Royal Highnesses moved down to the Barr Street jetty along a carpet way they were introduced to Karenni Ief Sawlawi by Mr. Gates. Their Royal Highnesses then proceeded to the jetty and boarding a launch left for the Renown, which sailed for Madras at 9-40 a.m., escorted by the Tergible, Fox and Perseus. Wireless communications will be established with the Hyacinth when the Royal party are 300 miles from Madras, the Proserpine acting as intermediate.

At Mandalay His Royal Highness conferred the M. V. O. on Major Strickland, Deputy Commissioner on special duty, and at Promé the same honour on Mr. J. P. Hay, Manager of the Flotilla Company.

Morning Post.—From the hour that we left the Khyber behind us and turned our faces eastward the rain has followed us as closely as though it were tied to our skirts. Living under cloudless skies and suffocated with dust, the accounts, that we read of the rains just behind us of tents dragged down, polo grounds a quagmire, and railways silted over seem quite incredible. Yet all the way from the North-West Frontier the rain has hunted us, sometimes, as at Agra, so near that we only missed it by minutes, sometimes, as at Lahore and Pindi, so heavy that it ran into inches. Had our journey been delayed by a week every arrangement would have been ruined, indeed very few could have survived, for when two inches of rain falls upon six inches of dust the resulting mixture is a powerful deterrent to motion, and camp life becomes, an affair of compromise, especially where, as in Northern India the winter rains mean a considerable and most uncomfortable decrease of temperature, which was low enough even as things were to send us all into our overcoats immediately after dinner.

As it is we have only had to put up with the dust in one of the dustiest seasons that Northern India has known which at the worst can but vex your temper, spoil your clothes and give you a "dust-throat" or dust fever, while in our wake the trustful native has been ascribing to the seraphic puiscance of the Royal favour those showers of which he stood in such urgent need. They have come indeed too late to be of much use to him in the country over which we have mostly been. The fate of the rabi, his winter crop, is sealed already; but the rain will help feed the cattle and even where it has been lightest it has given the overworked oxen a few days' respite from the well. It has wrung one's heart to see the precious water, for lack of which the crops were withering and the beasts growing lean poured lavishly over hundreds of miles of unresponsive roadway, just to lay the dust before us. In India a man is the universal water cart, a mere goatskin the content of it, a jerked wrist the means of distribution. Where a Royal route was not marked by flags it was marked by bhishtis. Tens of thousands of them there have been, with their queer forward stoop, the cold, wet, heavy skin about their loins, their humble, anxious faces, flinging, with that clever flirt of the wrist, the water far out across the dusty way, and hasting back the instant it is finished to refill their maskaks. At Gwalior, admittedly on the verge of famine, this brave concealment for our sake was especially pathetic. Every tank was dry, the water garden was an oven of baking asphalt, the empty canals cracked under four months' ceaseless sun, the polo and parade grounds were hidden by the parched north wind under a ceaseless surf of dust. Yet all was green about the Palace, a fresh, damp, odour, came from the hot paths, the roses lifted rapturous heads; no one could have suspected scarcity. But it was all for us. "When you gone," said the head mali, looking mournfully over it. "All done; all die." The place was being kept alive only for our visit: after that not another drop of water could be spent upon it; the flowers would shrivel, the grass wither, and the dust which whirled and fumed outside the gardens would sweep over them too.

Seeing how little there is in Northern India that is what one might call chromolithographically Indian, one was grateful for the elephants of Gwalior, which gave a touch of that expected Eastern glamour which is so glaringly absent from the scene as one sees it. Travellers return and illustrate their books with photographs which are described as typical of the life they illustrate. But the temples, and the shrines, and the palaces are no more typical, of Hindustan than St. Paul's or the Tower is typical of London. They are indubitably, there, and they have a part—a small part—in the life of the people; but what is typical of Northern India in the cold weather is the mud hut the dusty field, the dry nalak, the shrivelled tree. But none of these things make striking photographs, and so the untraveller reader gets an impression of India as a land of palms and palaces and tigers and snakes. Now, the landscape is really, over thousands of square miles, little different from what may be seen in Europe, a land for the most part level and monotonous and depressing. The trees are not the same, but they look the same; the crops are a mere sprouting greenness or nothing at all; the villages are not so unlike the villages of poor peasantry nearer home as to surprise the eye. There are the people, of course, brown, and dressed mostly in dirty white; and the oxen at the well-head. But these do not go far to fill out the country to the cheated vision, a vision prepared for snakes and scorpions and monkeys and tigers and palm trees; for a land of wild beasts and pestilent vermin and a generous Eastern vegetation. Of these things we have seen little. The snakes and scorpions and monkeys not at all; tigers—beaten up with the infinite care and after months of fostering solicitude—only at Royal shoots; palm trees occasionally—in botanical gardens. Even the musquito is a treasured rarity, a thing of scarcely credible report. The only things typical of India with which we are on intimate terms are the kite and the grey-backed crow. Hence Scindia's thirty-six elephants drawn up at the station to mount the Royal party, gorgeous with their painted faces, their howdahs of beaten gold and silver, their golden earrings and necklaces, each of them a strong man's burden, the great silver-gilt bells and heavy anklets, the gold-embroidered cloths and trappings, these great beasts filling the whole station yard, cherished, as had nothing before, our disappointed vision; and on elephants at Gwalior, we parabolically lived; elephants guarding the Royal routes, elephants hauling us up the steep rock face of the Fort, elephants for treading out wounded tigers. For once, at any rate, India was better than the Zoo. The Maharaja Scindia, our host at Gwalior, is one of the most striking personalities in India to-day. In height something under and in girth something over the average, one might miss at a first glance the impression of energy but for his eager, interested eyes. There is a vermilion mark upon his forehead which carries the memory back to the ruthlessness of his raiding Maratha ancestry; about his neck are ropes of pearls or collars of diamonds which would seem exuberantly magnificent even on a woman; he is in all his dealings with his people as regally Eastern as we permit the East to be. Yet under the mark and the jewels and the manner there is a mind as modern as public school and university can manufacture at home. Its interests are in schools, markets, hospitals, drainage, finance, municipal affairs: its energies are devoted to making the State Army a really practical contribution to the British Raj: its relaxation is in sport. Taking merely what one may call its Occidental latitudes, it would not be easy even in England to match its breadth, capacity, and variety: to find a man who has proved himself so sound a financier, so practical a philanthropist, so astute a soldier, so good a sportsman. Yet its modernity has not led the Maharaja in the way that young India is most inclined to go. He does not seek his pleasures in Simla or in Paris: he finds them in work among his own people.

He owns a hundred miles of railway which runs up to his palace doors, he has a garage full of motor-cars and he can drive car and locomotive or strip the works of either as skillfully as any chauffeur or engineer; nor is there a point in the working of his line on which he cannot offhand answer the most searching question. In his thirty thousand square miles of territory are four hundred primary and four high schools, an arts college, a technical school with scholarships for industrial training; while schools for the Sirdars, with a civil and military side, and a special school for civil servants, provide trained recruits for State employment, and rescue the sons of the landed gentry from a life of sloth. The Maharaja is his own Prime Minister as well as Commander-in-Chief of his Army, which, apart from its old-time warriors and ancient batteries for horse, ox, and elephant, supplies a valuable contingent to the Imperial Service troops which he is fully qualified to handle. Really, when one adds that every detail of every function during the Prince's visit, from the procession of elephants with which it opened, to the tiger shoot with which it closed, was organised and supervised by the Maharaja; when one remembers him whirling down alone on his motor at daybreak to greet the first of his guests, himself presenting the Sirdars at the durbar, reading his own address of welcome as President of the municipality, explaining every idiosyncrasy in the local manufactures, leading his brigade of Cavalry at the gallop, tramping with his beaters up and down thorny hills in search of a wounded tiger, and rolling the beast over as it charged him not thirty yards away—one is afraid of suggesting comparisons with a ruler nearer home as multifarious in his energies. But the comparison would be misleading. The Maharaja Scindia is, for all his capacity, as unaffected as a boy.

The cheers, the first hearty cheers we had heard at a Royal banquet, which greeted his professions of loyalty and the honours conferred upon him in the Prince's reply proved in what real esteem he is held by those who know him. And while still blushing under the proofs of Royal favour he jumped up with boyish impetuosity to repair with his own hands some hitch in starting the little silver train by which the spirits and cigars were to pass themselves round after dinner. The action was so natural and so characteristic that he cheered him again; yet, happily the inclination to do things himself does not lead him to interfere with other men's duties or to take too inquisitive a share in the working of his administration. Such is the ruler of Gwalior, a product of the new order of New India, the complete contrast that can be imagined to the generation which is passing away, to the venerable Maharaja of Nabha, the Maharaja of Jaipur, and the Maharana of Udaipur. These grew up with the consolidation of our Imperial power during the later years of the past century. They were men of another type, of different ideals, and it cannot be pretended that their immediate successors, the men brought up in the English manner, have all been able to escape the disabilities which must attend every transition period. It is at least of hopeful augury that in the Maharajas of Gwalior and Bikaner the graft of Western training has not robbed the Eastern stock of that virility and intelligence which have left such indelible traces on the past of India.—(H. F. PROVOST BATTERSBY.)

Times of India.—Those members of the Royal Staff who have been staying at Government House here leave to-night (20th January) by special train to join Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales at Madras.

21ST JANUARY 1906.

Aberdeen Free Press.—Other parts of India may claim supremacy over Calcutta for beauty and antiquity, but Calcutta is peerless in its commercial as well as imperial importance. We are very proud of ourselves, and we think we have given the Prince and Princess of Wales the greatest reception of all the centres they have visited. Nature has not been very good to us in the way of scenery, but we have the river with its tonnage exceeding that of Glasgow, and we have the Maidan. The wealth and enterprise of the city have called in the service of Art where Nature fails, and we have produced the prettiest show that Calcutta has ever given, or that the Prince and Princess have yet received on their tour.

On Friday the 29th December, Their Royal Highnesses arrived at Howrah Station, which is to Calcutta what Torry is to Aberdeen—only that the river between is a majestic waterway of ocean-borne traffic. Howrah Station is practically on the west bank of the Hugli, and it was arranged that the Royal visitors would come to Calcutta by steamer rather than drive across the pontoon bridge which brings common folk into the centre of the commercial quarter of the city. In this, as in many other particulars, the precedent of thirty years ago was followed when Calcutta received Albert Edward Prince of Wales. As the Royal train steamed in, the naval guns on the Admiral's ship boomed out the salute, and in a few minutes a white pilot vessel came steaming alongside; but the cheers that greeted her were rather previous, as she was only the decoy from the river steamer that white paint and gold had converted into a Royal yacht for the nonce. Glasses and cameras were turned in that direction, and the Princess was observed all gracious and winsome on the deck, towering over the Prince of Wales, who, with his affable bonhomie, was soon engaged in shaking hands with the great ones of city and province. On the steamer the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, the Chief Justice, the General Commanding the Division, and the Lord Bishop were presented, and they escorted the distinguished visitors ashore between lines of the Naval Volunteers drawn up as a guard of honour. Three hundred yards from the bank was a dais, on which were placed two solid silver chairs, upholstered in red plush, for the use of the guests. These ornamental seats are an heirloom in the family of the Maharaja of Burdwan, the greatest landowner in Bengal, a faithful supporter of the Government, and a man of advanced views. The chairs did duty on a subsequent occasion. On their way to the dais the Prince and Princess shook hands with about a hundred persons chosen as representatives of the many-sided life of this million-headed city. Officials, merchants, shopkeepers, municipal lights, provincial landowners, and distinguished persons. The Prince wore uniform and the Princess a costume in greyish blue, which is apparently her favourite colour. The Prince has a hearty way of shaking hands as if he really enjoyed it, and the Princess looks delightfully gracious and affable. They were enthroned at once in the affection of the most democratic city in Asia. The municipal address was presented in a casket of gold, bearing typical views and the arms of the city in that delicate ivory painting which has made Delhi famous. The Princess received a beautiful diamond necklace, which she at once put on amid the acclamations of the select spectators in the enclosure, 2,000 in number, who represented the million. The Prince read his reply in a clear ringing voice, which carried over the enclosure.

In a few minutes more the gay scene ended, and the drive to Government House began. The Royal Field Artillery headed the procession, the Viceroy's bodyguard (Lancers), the 15th Hussars (mounted half on greys, half on bays), the Calcutta Light Horse (volunteers, principally merchants), and above all, the Imperial Cadet Corps, captivated the eyes of the spectators. The said cadets are 24 in number, sons of native princes, in training to become officers. Each man is mounted on a black horse, with a saddle-cloth of snow leopard skin; the uniform is white with gold lace on the breast, and blue facings of the variety of blue known as Star of India; the headgear is a puggree of white and blue. The gallant bearing of these princely centaurs stirred the imagination of the crowd more than any other part of the escort, and the sunlight glinting on their sabres brightened the artistic triumph of the blending of black and white and blue and gold, and vindicated the dramatic instincts of Lord Curzon, who not only founded the corps, but designed the uniform and mount. Wherever they have appeared in the ceremonies of this week the Cadet Corps has drawn out spontaneous and unstinted applause. The Europeans applaud because of the harmony of colour, and the natives cheer because the corps represent the princely families of the land. It is the function of the Royal visit to cement all communities in a rivalry of loyalty, and to unite their admiration of the cadets. It is estimated that half a million people witnessed the procession from Prinsep Ghaut to Government House. What a scene it was! The westering sun flooded the gay spectacle with gentle December light; then as the sunset came the twilight rapidly diminished the glare and diffused a tint of peaceful neutralness over the swarming plain subduing the monstrosity of costume and the unpoetical commercial architecture into a dreamland kalcidoscope. Every carriage in Calcutta was on the roads, all the costumes from black coats and silk hats of London make to the gayest colouring beloved of Orientals. The ladies rejoiced in hats and gowns specially imported—and the scene faded away into night, tempered by the cold silvery beams of the crescent moon.

At 9-30 in the evening the Prince held the only levée of his tour. Over two thousand men attended. In the first hall there was a crush that Aberdeen students can only compare to a struggle between Bajans and Semis at the entrance to "Homer's" class-room in dear old King's College, in the palmy days before girls were admitted to the University and men were tamed. Again the Prince struck all with his gallant bearing and his almost jovial geniality. On Saturday came the races, and on Sunday, the State service in St. Paul's Cathedral, which was crowded to the doors. The audience enjoyed the distinction of worshipping with royalty, and observed Their Highnesses and noted their devoutness, but grumbled at the unnecessary length of sermon which our learned but inelastic Bishop inflicted on the Royal pair. The whole service took nearly two hours, of which the sermon occupied a quarter. There was a new and painfully elaborate setting of the Te Deum, the composition of the local organist. The service was on the whole very impressive, and all the world was there.

On New Year's Day the Prince and the Viceroy, and the Commander-in-Chief held a review of ten thousand troops on the Maidan. The annual proclamation parade of local troops was swelled this year to royal dimensions. It was a splendid spectacle. From three o'clock in the morning the native town poured forth its myriads; at seven when Europeans began to arrive, the ring of the enclosure was a surging mass of coloured humanity flanked by carriages (the majority boxes on wheels from which the horses had been unyoked, and which served as platforms for their occupants). In the morning mist troops could be observed moving across the plain as Broken shadows. As the sun rose gladly for the first time this year above the horizon, it flooded the plain with warmth, and the haze lifted. At 8-30 the Prince and Princess, and the Viceroy and Lady Minto and the Commander-in-Chief, all duly escorted and portioned off drove up a lane between crowds of spectators, and drew up near the flagstaff, from which the Royal Standard floated. The inspection by the three Mighties was no perfunctory affair. The Prince, Lord Minto, and Lord Kitchener rode abreast, and passed up and down the massed lines. After returning to the saluting base, Lord Minto rode out and summoned the troops to give three cheers for the King. The band played "God Save the King," and the royal salute was fired. The Royal Field Artillery, the Cossipore Artillery (Volunteers and Scotchmen), and the Naval Volunteers took part in the big gun firing. At intervals of ten shouts the infantry fired a musketry salute. It ran up the line like clockwork, and back again behind, a few belated volunteers bringing up the rear with sporadic clicks.

The march past was splendid—sailors from the warships here at present, marines in their curious uniform of blue swallowtails and white trousers, gunners with naval guns, artillery volunteers, the Light Horse, the 15th Hussars, the Imperial Cadet Corps, and two infantry regiments, the King's Own Lancasters, and a detachment of others marched past the standard. They were followed by native troops, who marched gallantly. Sikhs from the Punjab, Mussulmans from Delhi and Oudh, and troops from Madras swung past the base, and impressed the crowds. Then followed volunteers by the hundred. Then Royalty drove away, Viceroyalty followed, and the local great scrambled after them, and the democratic myriads swarmed over the plain on their homeward way.

Englishman.—The Lieutenant-Governor has received the following letter from Sir Walter Lawrence, Chief of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales's Staff. Prince of Wales's Camp, India, January 19, 1906.—My Dear Sir Herbert,—I am directed by His Royal Highness to try to convey to you some expression of the pleasure which the Prince and Princess of Wales have experienced during their too short visit to Burma. Everything has been so happily arranged and so brightly carried out that it is really impossible to choose between the beautiful scenes which Their Royal Highnesses have witnessed in Rangoon and Mandalay. Perhaps nothing delighted the Prince and Princess of Wales more than the illuminations at Rangoon, and though it must have marred the full effect and have caused disappointment and trouble to those who have devoted time to the entertainments, still to Their Royal Highnesses the spectacle was in every way delightful and successful. I am to ask you to convey to all who have joined so heartily in making the visit of Their Royal Highnesses so pleasant and interesting the warmest thanks of the Prince and Princess of Wales. They know and thoroughly appreciate the heavy labour which has fallen on all departments and classes and they would be grateful to you if you could intimate to all concerned that their visit to Burma has given them unqualified pleasure. Yours sincerely, (Sd.) Walter Lawrence.

Englishman.—After their few hours' visit to Aligarh on the 8th March, the Prince and Princess of Wales will proceed direct to Quetta, arriving there on the afternoon of the 10th.

Indian Daily News.—The "Madras Mail" says that the Government of Madras have begun to make inquiries amongst the Native citizens of Madras, through the Commissioner of Police, as to the public feeling with regard to altering the name Black Town, the desirability of which has been discussed in its columns. A large proportion of the correspondents suggested an alteration to Amphilth Town, but by far the best and most appropriate suggestion is the alteration to George Town, which the "Madras Mail" says would not only be a graceful compliment to the Prince, but would commemorate his visit to Madras in a special and permanent manner, besides, this name is singularly appropriate in conjunction with the Fort, which is named after St. George.

Madras Mail.—The topic of the day is, of course, the forthcoming Royal Visit to the Station. The preparations for the reception of Their Royal Highnesses in the Station are all in an advanced state. The arches at various points along the line of the route by which the Prince and Princess will drive are being rapidly put up and many of them promise to be gorgeous structures; and it is not difficult to guess from the improvements to certain roads and without consulting a copy of the official programme which are the routes to be taken by the Royal procession. The Reception Committee have received another contribution of Rs. 100 to the fund subscribed to meet expenses and the total has now reached Rs. 3,910. Rehearsals of the various functions which are to take place in honour of the Royal Visit have been held. The actual unveiling of the Queen's statue in Cubbon Park was practised yesterday morning and was entirely successful. The curtain which is to conceal the statue till the moment for unveiling arrives, is fixed to a wire frame running on four metal posts, the ends of the frame being drawn together by a spring clutch which keeps it in place above the statue. A cord is attached to this clutch which, on receiving a slight pull, opens the clutch and releases the tension on the frame which causes the frame to open out, and the veil glides to the ground in a fraction of a second, leaving the statue uncovered.

During the last few days the trains which are to convey the Royal Party from Bangalore to Mysore and back, and then from Bangalore to Guntakul, have been having trial runs. When travelling on the S. M. Railway the Royal train will be in charge of Mr. W. B. Wright, Traffic Manager; Mr. Brock, Loco-Superintendent; Mr. Sergeant, District Loco-Superintendent; Mr. Hallam, District Engineer; and Mr. Creighton, District Traffic Superintendent. The Royal train leaves Mysore at midnight on the 4th proximo, and is timed to arrive at the City Station 8-30 A.M. on the 6th idem. The British Resident, the Dewan of Mysore, and other big officers will arrive by an earlier special. The British Resident and Mr. Moss-King are leaving for Mysore to-night and will await the arrival of the Royal Visitors at the capital.

Madras Mail.—The Government have, it appears, begun to make enquiries amongst the native citizens of Madras, through the Commissioner of Police, as to public feeling with regard to altering the name of Black Town, the desirability of which has recently been discussed in our columns. We have received numerous letters on the subject, a considerable proportion of our correspondents suggesting an alteration to "Amphilth Town." But by far the best and most appropriate suggestion that we have yet met with is the one contained in a letter which we publish in another column to-day. "George Town" would not only be a graceful compliment to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and would commemorate His Royal Highness's visit to Madras in a special and permanent manner: but the name is singularly appropriate in conjunction with the Fort which is named after St. George, the Patron Saint of England. We hope that the authorities will give this happy and excellent suggestion their earliest attention.

Rangoon Gazette.—On the arrival of the Irrawaddy Flotilla Company's steamer Japan at Promé, Their Royal Highnesses expressed to Mr. Findlay, the General Manager, and Mr. Hay, the Manager, their warm thanks to the Company for having placed this fine steamer at their disposal and for all that had been done to make the trip, as it had been, a thoroughly delightful one. The Prince conferred the M.V.O. of the fourth class on Mr. Hay; Mr. Findlay received a silver cigar box; Captain De la Taste, Commander of the vessel, a diamond pin; Captain Kincaid, Agent of the Railway, Mr. Huddleston, Traffic Manager, and Colonel Peile, in charge of the police arrangements, also each received a diamond pin from the Prince. The Japan is expected to arrive in Rangoon this evening.

A correspondent writes: Now that Their Royal Highnesses have left Rangoon on their way home after what, it may be hoped, was a delightful tour, credit must be given to the Commissioner of Police, and his very able Assistants for their perfect arrangements and control of the streets through which the Royal party drove. Some of these Assistants were men selected from the districts, e.g., Messrs. S. Johannes and Cole, the former having seen excellent service in Magwe and among the Kachins. These officers had the additional honour of being placed on duty at Promé also, when Their Royal Highnesses passed through.

Standard.—It is the opinion of the most brilliant Anglo-Indian statesman of our age that the real Indian aristocracies, the princely class, and the reigning families, were never so well content with British supremacy or so loyal to the Empire as they are to-day. Up to the post-Mutiny settlement, and long beyond it, there were always Princes who could be, and were, centres of disaffection. The insubordinate or disappointed chief easily drifts into that position, and the older Indian administrators were quite right in regarding an ill-disposed Maharaja of one of the greater dynasties as a possible source of danger. They knew that these personages, powerless as they seemed at the moment, might under conceivable circumstances become formidable.

One must, of course, distinguish. There are Rajas and Chiefs of all kinds in India, from the Nizam whose subjects are more numerous than those of the Queen of Holland, the King of Belgium, the King of Denmark, and the King of Portugal combined, to the petty Nawab or Raja with a few square miles of territory and a lakh or two of revenue. But the reigning Prince of one of the greater and older dynasties is undoubtedly a personage, even outside his own dominions. It was impossible to mingle with the crowd in the cities through which the Prince passed without feeling that some of these potentates aroused an interest in the native deeper than that evoked by any British official not excluding the highest of all. A Lieutenant-Governor or a Chief Commissioner, the virtual ruler of thirty or forty millions of people, is assuredly a more important and more powerful personage, especially in his own Province, than any of the local ruling Chiefs. Yet I am sure that the multitude, or some of them, looked on the Maharaja, as he went by in his gilded coach and four, followed by his caracoling escort, with a livelier and more sentimental curiosity than that which was evoked by the "Lard Sahib" himself. For one thing, he often represents something of significance. One man may be the head of a great religious community; another the premier prince of a race which is invested with a special sanctity by millions of Hindus; a third the inheritor of a stirring tradition of conquest and successful war. Even when their material power is trivial, they may wield a moral influence sufficient to render their content or discontent with the prevailing regime a matter worth consideration.

In the old days they were usually discontented. It was very natural that they should be so. They had submitted to the paramount Power with reluctance, sometimes because they had been subdued by force of arms, sometimes because of irresistible pacific pressure, sometimes because it was the only way to save themselves from being wiped out by stronger neighbours. But they did not enjoy the situation, nor did they appreciate the blessings of Imperial rule. Equal laws and equal rights had few attractions for men whose mere existence was an assertion of the principle of inequality. An Eastern despot, who did what he liked in his own country, subject to the chances of rebellion, and made war when he pleased, would seldom care to exchange this exciting irresponsibility for an uneventful security and a dignified dependence. The Government of India put him in leading strings and deprived him of some of his most cherished indulgences. The true Oriental licence to plunder and misgovern was practically withdrawn. His territory was no longer his private property; he was expected to consider the feelings and interests of his subjects, with what he, no doubt, considered quite superfluous solicitude. The patriarchal mixture of oppression and generosity had to make way for something more nearly resembling the rule of law. The process annoyed the chief, and did not always please the people, who sometimes preferred the old, irregular, free and easy arrangements. Besides, the Raja really disliked the English and their ways, many of which seemed to him offensive or absurd, or irreligious, and he would have been heartily glad to see them cleared out of India. So he was potentially disloyal though wise enough not to quarrel openly with the Power that was master of his destinies.

The theory of the statesman to whom I have referred, and of many other distinguished Indian administrators, is that the attitude here suggested has been changed in recent years. The members of the great Indian ruling and princely families are becoming reconciled to the British supremacy, and are in many cases its cordial supporters. They no longer endure it with sombre acquiescence. On the contrary, they understand the prevailing system, they appreciate the benefits it confers upon the country, and they would be the last persons to rejoice at its overthrow. The younger generation has a tendency to be Anglophile. Some of the feudatories have been educated in England or under English teachers and tutors; many of them are on very friendly terms with English officers and officials, they rather like their ways, they join in their sports and games, they meet them in business, on the polo field, on the parade ground, and to some extent in society. They have abandoned a good deal of their exclusiveness and aloofness, and find it possible occasionally to get on terms of frank camaraderie with the better kind of Englishman. Then they know more of England and of the extra Indian world generally. Some of them travel, or read European books, not excluding fiction from the fair land of France. They cultivate a taste for modern inventions and modern progressive ideas as to sanitation and education. All these things put them in a better frame of mind than their sulky and resentful fathers before them.

Add to all this that we are at length making some headway towards bringing them back to the only career which really suits a member of an Eastern military caste. We are giving them a revived interest in soldiering. We have always permitted the native States to keep up armies of sorts. But it was our policy that these armies should be ineffective for fighting purposes. The princes might have a limited number of men in buckram, or in red or khaki coats, or in mail armour, to play with; but we could not afford to let them be efficient enough to become dangerous. Consequently, we refused to allow the feudatories to have their regiments drilled by European officers. We do not permit them to have batteries of breech-loading artillery, and we forbid the purchase of good modern rifles. The forces of the native States were all paraded for the Prince of Wales's inspection as he passed through, and some of them made a very brilliant appearance, for we exercise no veto upon the sartorial fancies of the Maharaja, and if His Highness chooses to clothe his horde of military retainers, armed with smooth-bore muskets or old Enfield carbines, in uniforms of canary yellow or blue and silver, we do not offer any objection. His subjects like the show, and are pleased to see these obsolete warriors facing about and presenting arms, while Colonel Gopal Singh or Major Mohammed Khan gives the word of command in what is supposed to be the English language. But to a young Raja of spirit the whole affair must, doubtless, seem silly and theatrical, and perhaps no more than a proof of humiliation and dependence. A man sprung from generations of warlike ancestors, who won their way and held it by the sword, must chafe at the restriction which limits him to an army of stage supers and provides no real career for the cadets and collateral branches of his royal house. That was one of the reasons why the Maharaja aforetime gave himself to unworthy causes. He "chewed blang and toyed with dancing girls," as described by Macaulay. What else was he to do, when we had made his government an unreality, and his army a farce.

But we are now opening to him a wider avenue of activity. We allow him to raise a contingent for the Imperial Service Corps, which he may make as efficient as he pleases. Each unit of the Imperial Service Corps is recruited exclusively in the native State to which it belongs. It is part of the army of that State, it is paid for out of the revenues of the Maharaja, and the officers are his own subjects, holding their commissions from him. All that the Indian Government requires is that there shall be a British inspecting officer, to secure that the force shall be kept up to the standard of the Indian Native Army. It has modern weapons, and receives the latest instructions in drill and tactics, and it may be called upon to take its place in line with British troops when the Imperial Government goes to war. The Maharaja is left a considerable latitude of choice as to the kind of contingent he will supply. The horse-loving Rajputs of Jodhpur contribute a dashing regiment of lancers. In Bikanir, the Desert State, they have a first-rate camel corps, which did valuable service in Somaliland and China. The Maharaja of Jaipur contents himself with a workmanlike and useful train of transport carts. When the Prince of Wales was at Lahore, a review of all the Imperial Service contingents of the Punjab chiefs was held at Mian Mir. There were between three and four thousand troops on the ground of all arms, except artillery—since the Mutiny we do not put field guns into native hands—and a better display of physique, good marching and riding, and accurate drill could scarcely be seen in any country. There was little to choose, so far as the eye could judge, between the Mahomedan and Sikh soldiers of Kapurthala and Patiala and the best regiments of our Native Army. And these contingents, it must be remembered, were in all cases commanded by their own State officers. Colonels, captains, and subalterns were of the same districts and the same races as their men. Many of them were relatives of the chiefs—his brothers, nephews, or cousins, or members of the landowning families who owed him feudal allegiance.

And we do more than this to gratify the military tastes of our Indian warrior castes. The young scions of the reigning houses can be educated at the Rajkumar Colleges, where they receive a combination of that sort of training which an English lad can get at a public school and at Sandhurst. When they leave these academies they can join the Imperial Cadet Corps, a very select body, which was one of Lord Curzon's happy thoughts. This squadron of high-born youths was much in evidence at the Prince of Wales's reception in Bombay, and a very nice, manly troop of young cavaliers they looked, fit to be the escort of any sovereign with their pretty fawn uniforms, their turbans of turquoise blue, and their saddle-cloths made of the skin of the snow leopard. The idea is that some of these young gentlemen shall obtain direct commissions in the Indian Native Army. One of them has already been appointed to the general staff, where they think extremely well of him.

In all this we are going on the right lines. The Imperial Service Corps and the Imperial Cadet Corps undoubtedly do something to satisfy the fighting instincts of the leaders of the fighting peoples. And we are, perhaps, justified in concluding that the ruling families have no reason to be discontented with the place assigned to them in the scheme of things. One might say that a sensible man, in the position of an Indian feudatory chief, ought to be well satisfied. If we have taken much from him he have also given him a good deal. We have rendered him secure. His throne is no longer precarious. He can "sleep well," like King Duncan, though not in his grave. Treason, domestic broil, foreign assault "can touch him not and harm him not again," provided he exhibits a moderate diligence and a moderate good sense in the task of government. We might dethrone him ourselves, but we should allow neither rebel barons nor ambitious rivals to overturn him. Moreover, he has great opportunities of doing good if he cares to use them; he occupies a fine position; he has honours and dignities; and if he manages his estates economically he can have plenty of spending money, without the anxieties which usually attend the possession of wealth in an Eastern society.

For these benefits he should be grateful. Perhaps he is; but he has his grievances. They are apt to bulk large when he is not on good terms with the political officer appointed unto him by the Supreme Government. The "political" is not always the most tactful of human beings. Those who are selected by the India Office to manage the greater States which come under its direct authority are usually able men. But the Provincial Governments nominate Agents and Residents to their own groups of minor States, and one does not invariably hear the best accounts of these gentlemen. The position does not attract the most capable and ambitious officials of the Civil Service, because there is no great prospect of promotion in it. An aspiring young civilian, who hopes for a Lieutenant-Governorship or a Chief Commissionership, or a post on the Council, as the crown of his career, will not consent to spend his active life in an unimportant Residency. The Department has to fall back on a military man who has taken to civil employment, or it selects possibly a second-rate member of the bureaucracy. He may be fussy, or pretentious, or pompous, or merely ignorant and idle. There are political officers to whom most of these epithets could be applied. When such an individual has to manage justifiably a subtle, intriguing, and irritable native princeling, at once proud, sensitive and suspicious, the machinery is not likely to work with smoothness.

At the best it does not run easily. The more we educate and Europeanise the native gentlemen, the less do they like being held in leading strings. The Raja feels that his brain is at least equal to that of a fussy, middle-aged, middle-class colonel, and he is quite aware that this diplomatist is nobody in particular when he goes back to his own country. In the old days that fact was hidden from him. Mysterious beings were emitted from out of the darkness of an unknown land. They might be princes themselves, or great councillors of State whose seat was on the steps of the Imperial Throne, for what His Highness knew. But the mystery has been stripped bare. He goes "home", he knows all about our politics, he reads our newspapers, and assimilates even the valuable and informing "society" paragraphs. Fussy colonels impress him no longer. He takes them at about the valuation of their own countrymen, which is not exalted, and if he is young, able, ambitious, progressive, he is inclined to ask why he should not be permitted to manage his own affairs and those of his people without perpetual and patronising supervision. "You are making men of us," said one young Europeanising prince to an English friend of mine, who had contrived to gain his confidence. "Isn't it about time to leave off treating us like children?"—(SIDNEY LOW.)

24TH JANUARY 1906.

Aberdeen Free Press.—Fifty-nine Indian ladies had the honour of meeting the Princess of Wales at Belvedere, the residence of the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, on New Year's Day. Bengal, which is the home of political agitation, and a very hot-house of Western learning, is backward in the emancipation of the fair sex. The best Hindus in Calcutta and neighbourhood have hitherto jealously guarded the sanctity of the Hindu zenana by prohibiting their ladies from going to functions, even where the purdah (curtain), or seclusion of women from male gaze, was guaranteed. When invitations were talked of to this party, there was a storm in a teacup in Hindu society. It was connected with the political agitation which has swept over Bengal in recent months. But in spite of threatened opposition the party was held. Some of the most notable landowners of Bengal sent their wives, and many prominent citizens of Calcutta followed suit. The precautions taken to secure privacy will sound almost ludicrous in Aberdeen. Four carriages at a time drove into the porch at Belvedere. The horses were unyoked, the male attendants departed, and curtains were let down. The female attendants released the pent-up ladies, who had been carefully shut up inside their carriages till this moment. They were ushered upstairs by female attendants, up a carefully curtained staircase to a drawing-room, into which the guests, duly assembled, were locked. The Princess was exceptionally gracious to her future subjects, whose difficulties in meeting her she duly appreciated. The Countess of Minto and Lady Fraser were present, the latter as hostess. European ladies had besieged Private Secretaries for permission to attend, which had been rigidly refused. Lady Fraser had invited one European lady to act as interpreter, a lady not unconnected with Aberdeen, and she was the only outsider that took part in the function. The Princess handed a silver medal to each of the fifty-nine ladies to commemorate the occasion. She put the medals round the necks of the Maharanis who were present, and into the hands of the lesser lights.

It was a distinct triumph to carry through this purdah party in Calcutta, and probably the next one will be more easily achieved. The ladies who had the courage to attend will cherish the recollection all their lives. Probably they will be able to convince some of their sisters that even a Viceregal reception, when they cannot have a Royal one, presents an excellent opportunity of showing off the family jewellery. Even in unpretentious houses in Calcutta there is a wealth of jewellery that would make good folks at home break the Tenth Commandment. What it is in the palaces of the great no man knows, and but few women. But great shows would soon afford the opportunity of bringing priceless jewels to the light, and one can well believe that even the proverbial bashfulness of Hindu women would thaw before Royal or Viceregal light, and the numerous passive virtues that Hindu men extol in their women folk, would not be proof against the delightful temptation of dazzling the eyes of their sisters with better jewels than theirs.

On the afternoon of the 2nd January a delightful entertainment was given to the Prince and Princess by Calcutta citizens, 2,500 of whom were present to witness the display. A portico of white wood on a masonry pediment had been erected in a horse-shoe shape, with entrance drive at one end and raised dais at the other. The dais was a gorgeous mingling of West and East. Blue silk hangings indicated Europe, but the silver chairs in red plush, and the silver posted canopy over the chairs, were truly Oriental. So were the four valiant nobles that grasped each man his post. The Maharaja of Burdwan, the Maharaja Sir Jotindra Mohun Tagore, with a rent-roll of £100,000 a year, the Maharaja of Gidhaur, a great landed proprietor in Behar, and the Mussulman Nawab Salimulla of Dacca—were the canopy holders. The wealthiest man on this side of India was gaily conspicuous in purple velvet, with a headpiece composed of diamonds and an cigarette. He was greatly in demand for explanations, and, as he danced about the dais, he looked for all the world like a gorgeously appressed monkey on an Italian street organ. But tell it not in Gath, for he is a great nobleman, and such description might pass for sedition in this unhumorous age. Just before the Prince and Princess arrived, the sun, which had been obscured all day by unwonted clouds, burst forth and lighted a vision of beauty such as has been rarely seen in the City of Palaces. Then the outsiders appeared, and Lady Minto and her beautiful daughters drove up. After an interval came Their Royal Highnesses and the Viceroy in the same carriage. It was now 4-30 in the afternoon, with an hour or so of daylight before us.

After a series of introductions to Their Highnesses by Sir Andrew Fraser, who was the presiding genius of this entertainment, the programme began. Curious offerings were made to the Prince and Princess of rose-water and garlands, and white sandal scented with saffron and musk, which required the services of six nobles. A song of welcome composed in honour of the last Prince of Wales's visit thirty years ago, by Sir Jotindra Mohun Tagore, was sung. This was followed by a native clowns' dance. They were arranged in sombre raiment covered with floating stripes of rainbow coloured paper, and as they beat drums and cymbals and native instruments they produced the effect of a ludicrous bedlam. This was followed by a religious dance meant to be solemnising, but which was only amusing. After a sweetly plaintive musical piece played on ancient Indian citatheras and other stringed instruments, there came a Sikkim dance performed by hillmen who pirouetted about sword in hand; and then a Bhutanesse dance, also by hillmen, who gyrated and kicked up like any ballet girl. Perhaps the weirdest item was the Tibetan Ghost Dance, danced by Tibetans who wore masks and skeleton faces, and absurd elephant heads. By this time the sun had set and as if by magic a myriad of electric lights blazed out. Above the canopy was a coloured piece of light showing the Prince's Feathers and the Royal Arms. Beyond the hangings to the west there now became visible the outlines of the fireworks and illuminations that were to end the evening. Trees on the maiden were tricked out with numerous lanterns, and graceful scaffoldings of bamboo were hung with a myriad little lights of various colours. Meantime the massed bands played several pieces with a precision only too rare in Calcutta, and the last item on the programme began. It was a silly performance with quarter sticks by native fencers. It was not tolerated for many minutes—an astute manager perceiving the commonness of the performance, waved his flag and the paluans disappeared. The Royal party drove away amid ringing cheers, and after an interval fireworks began with a lavish prodigality that satisfied even Indian natives, who dearly love many coloured lights.

The great illuminations came off on Wednesday night, the 3rd. After a garden party at Government House at which all people on the Government House list were present, and at which the Prince and Princess won golden opinions by their extreme affability, Calcutta began to light up. Electric light, gas light, lamp light in literally a million chirags with different coloured oils, transformed this ugly city into a very fairyland of light. The centre of the city was the area chosen, and probably no city in the world lends itself to so many surprises as Calcutta illuminated. Ships on the river were traced out in light. The central piece was Dalhousie Square, where great buildings stand—the north side had the Secretariat of the Bengal Government, which was magnificently illuminated; the west side has the Post Office, which was a sea of light, and its dome a crown; on the south side is the Telegraph Office, which flashed back the reflection of a thousand lights and radiated from its tower a sparkling crown. In the middle of the Square is a tank whose surface mirrored the forest of lights. The east side is held by great shops and offices, and these were gorgeously decorated likewise. There never was such a magnificent scene in Calcutta before, and it may safely be said that the Empire could not produce a much finer scene than gratified the Royal guests last night. It was a splendid success. There were acres of light—and infinite varieties of design. The route of the procession began at the Fort, where Their Royal Highnesses had been dining with Lord Kitchener, up to Chowringhee, which was a blaze of light, down the Esplanade, where the new Foreign Office glowed a virgin in bridal attire, all white, past shops with less modest illuminants, and round into Government Place. Through the trees Government House shone out, and the streets were glorified out of all knowledge. Light triumphed abundantly. A great procession passed through the lighted streets along with the visitors' carriages, and the throng was almost indescribable.

One of the greatest achievements of the Royal visit has been that it brought the Tashi Lama from Tibet to India for the first time in Tibetan history. He is a picturesque figure in all the entertainments, and his presence has been a great catch. Henceforth the Tibetan people will have more respectable ideas of their Indian neighbours and of the white men that rule them. The visit is not only gratifying in itself, but is politically significant, and we may hope that in time the sullen aloofness of the Tibetans will melt away, and that they will enter into friendly relations with us.

Indian Daily News.—Though compressed within a few days that did not exceed a week, the Royal visit to Burma will be long memorable. The actuality excelled the anticipation. Scene after scene of a splendour that was not garish was rapidly unfolded, accompanied by an enthusiasm which found expression in the crowds that marked the Royal progress from Rangoon to Mandalay and back again to the chief port of Burma. The memory of that week is a succession of vivid pictures of flower-like beauty set in the gold of the Shwe Dagon and the Arakan Pagoda. The wonderful reception of the Prince and Princess on landing was a vision of the silken East, where the colours are soft and restful, and the physical note is cheerful content. A wonderfully rich country, Burma is a land of brightness—bright in the natural gaiety of its people and bright in its prospects under British rule. In the street and in the places where the people thronged to see the Prince and Princess, the dominant note was a fresh and spontaneous cheeriness that only a people naturally bright could display. When the Shwe Dagon was left behind a shaft of pearl light under the reflected glow of powerful electric lamps, it was a scene of enchantment that was passed through in the night. Railway stations had become Aladdin's Palaces of rosy light, and the line ran through a continuous garden of carnival lamps. Daylight revealed a country of luxuriant productiveness whose prolific growth amply explains the natural joyfulness of the people. The religious philosophy of Burma is not gloomy, but, were it otherwise, the fertility of the country would save the Burmese from becoming a gloomy people. The present of India may not be really sad. It needs but little prosperity to enable him to rejoice, but famine and plague and centuries of depressing and oppressive religious and social customs have given him a melancholy aspect to which the Burmese are strangers. The never-to-be-forgotten Regatta at Mandalay emphasised the love of the Burman for brightness and gaiety and for movement and colour of a thoroughly sparkling nature. The Burman is obliged by his religion to spend some portion of his life in a monastery, but he loves the wine of life and the monastic period seems to give him a zest for its enjoyment. He clothes himself in the colours of the sunrise and the sunset, and his love of music and dancing has carried the development of those arts in Burma to a higher pitch than in India. The standard which has been attained in musical and dramatic art was seen in the Pwe, which the Prince and Princess witnessed on the night of their departure from Mandalay. Proceeded by a puppet show, an entertainment was given somewhat on the lines of light opera and clever enough to maintain the interest of an audience which scarcely understood a word uttered by the performers. The brunt of the performance fell upon an artist who displayed remarkable powers as an actress and as a dancer in the most difficult and fantastic movements. Burmese dancing as illustrated by this exponent is something a great deal more complicated than graceful posturing. It is a combination of posturing with the most eccentric performances of an English pantomime artiste and is much more arduous and prolonged than anything a pantomime artiste is called upon to do. Yet this Burmese actress not only acted and danced, but sang, and that with many of the mannerisms of a European prima donna. Her voice was hoarse, for Burmans seem to be relentless towards their theatrical favourites, but at times she sang with surprising freshness, and her trills and cadenzas showed that Burmese dramatic music is approaching a florid style. Burmese orchestral music has indeed advanced a great way in that direction. In noise and discord it seems to be approaching what is now the highest development of Western musical art. To this last impression of Mandalay succeeded the charm of the voyage down the Irrawaddy by easy stages to Prome. When the Renown was eventually boarded below the Hastings shoal, all Burma had become one of the most enchanting memories of the tour, a vivid impression to charm, when the mental pictures of more garish scenes had faded. In Madras Their Royal Highnesses turn another bright page of the gorgeous volume of the shining East which has been opened before them.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales left Rangoon in the Renown on the 21st, and are expected to reach Madras at 2 p.m. on the 24th, the public reception taking place at 4-30 p.m.

Madras Mail.—The Hon'ble Mr. Bayley, accompanied by Messrs. Cassoon-Walker and Dunlop and Colonel Nawab Asfur Jung and the Minister, paid a day's visit to the Royal shooting camp at Narsimpet on the 16th instant, where the camp arrangements are rapidly approaching completion.

Local tradesmen are complaining loudly of the fact that the visit of the Prince of Wales is not proving as peculiarly beneficial to themselves as to outsiders. So far as furniture is concerned, they have just cause for complaint, for it would have been far more appropriate to have patronised the local makers of art furniture, instead of indenting upon English firms, such as Maple and Oetzmann, for English furniture. I am sure the Royal visitors would themselves like to see the degree to which native artisans can carry the perfection of their art, and would be only too glad to escape from the sight of English furnishing, if only for a few months. They have come mainly to see India as herself—not England in India; and so long as their comfort is ensured, and this can be done without undue indents on London, they do not ask for more.

Pioneer.—Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales arrived from Prome this morning at 6-45, alighting at Barr Street Jetty at 8 A.M., where a landing platform was set up for the occasion. Though the departure for Madras was private a large gathering of officials was present to welcome Their Royal Highnesses, who looked well after their journey to Upper Burma. Among the officials were the Lieutenant-Governor, Mr. Gates, Chief Secretary to the Burma Government, Colonel Lawford, Mr. Laurie, President of the Rangoon Municipality, and others. After the usual introductions of the Government officials, Captain Kincaid, Agent of the Burma Railways, and other railway officials who accompanied the Royal train to Rangoon from Prome were introduced, and the Prince and Princess with the Royal Staff bid good-bye and proceeded on board the Renown, which left for Madras later. The Renown was escorted by the Terrible, Fox, and Persous. The Royal party will reach Madras on Wednesday. Last night, Colonel Lawford presiding, the members of the Pegu Club entertained to dinner the officers of the squadron. The Hyacinth had left on Friday, but the officers from all the four other ships were present.

Times.—One evening in November 1885, Lord Dufferin, then staying at the Residency at Indore, kept dinner waiting for a quarter of an hour. He made no secret of the cause of such unusual unpunctuality, explaining it as due to his having to attend to the final orders for the advance on Mandalay. Few, perhaps, of the guests realized at the moment that they heard what was practically the announcement of an addition to the Indian Empire of a province which, in area of British territory alone, without counting the fringe of subordinate States, was to exceed what was then known as British Burma. The orders issued that evening sounded the death-knell of a government which, ever since the British had had any dealings with it, had been distinguished alike by its overweening conceit, by its arrogance, by its tyranny over its own subjects, and by its ill-usage of peaceful traders. Its treatment of the Burma Trading Company, which had by its river steamers maintained a precarious commerce with the capital of King Thebaw, led directly to its downfall. The conquest of that despot's army and the capture of himself proved an easier matter even than had been expected, but it took four years of constant fighting and hard work before the so-called dacoits, who were really the undisciplined armed forces collected round a corrupt government, were finally broken up and subdued. By 1890 it was possible to say that Upper Burma was as peaceful as, or even more peaceful than, the Lower Province, which owed its annexation to Lord Dalhousie. That province had long been weighed down and prevented from development by the existence of its unruly neighbour, and it was now free to advance on the road to prosperity.

When the Prince of Wales reached Rangoon he found himself in a country very different from the vast plains in which life had been travelling between the North-West Frontier and Calcutta, and amongst a people of a disposition at least as different from that of the inhabitants of Upper India. From Peshawar to Calcutta the train is scarcely ever in sight of hills, whilst in Burma, wherever the traveller goes by rail, by river, or by road, he never gazes on a horizon unbroken by hills or rolling downs. In India he finds a people generally sedate, staid, and little addicted to holiday-making; in Burma every native is a born holiday-maker who enters into his pleasures with the laughter and simplicity of a grown-up child. The picturesque telegrams of our Special Correspondent have fully illustrated this side of the Burmese character.

The higher administration of the province does not differ in principle from that of other parts of the Indian Empire, but below it there is a much more extensive use of the leaders of the people themselves, and the headmen and elders of villages and of wards in towns play a larger part than in most provinces of modern India. Over the greater part of Burma there never hangs the depressing cloud of the dread of famine, and even in the dry central zone the seasons are a matter of far less anxiety than in many parts of India proper. The whole province, especially Upper Burma, is still in the making, and for many years to come it will be possible to watch the process as carried out by the methods of the Twentieth Century. Amongst these methods one of the most important is railway construction, which in Burma necessarily received a great impulse at the Annexation in 1886. At that date the existing province of British Burma had but two railways, one connecting Rangoon with Prome, the other gradually pushing its way northward by the Sittang Valley, but reaching no further than Taungu. Naturally Upper Burma under the rule of Thebaw had no railway, and it was not till May 1888 that the work was pushed on from Taungu to Mandalay, which was reached in less than a year. Thus through railway communication was opened between the modern capital of Upper Burma, with its 180,000 inhabitants, and Rangoon. The growth of the latter city has been very remarkable. Fifty years ago it contained but 20,000 souls and its facilities as a port were elementary. Now it numbers nearly a quarter of a million of inhabitants, and has developed a shipping trade with conveniences therefore which cause it to rank next to Calcutta and Bombay among Indian ports. The Rangoon-Mandalay Railway has now reached Myitkyina, as far north of Mandalay as the latter is of Taungu, whilst another line leads from the Upper Burma capital to Lashio, in the Northern Shan States, and other branch lines have been constructed. In Lower Burma Bassein has been linked to the Prome-Rangoon line, and two years ago the railway from Rangoon towards the west and south was opened to Martaban, on the right bank of the great river Salwin, near the port of Moulmein.

Local enthusiasm for railway construction seems to have had a tendency to run riot, and when Lord Curzon, in 1901, worked his way by land from Assam right through Burma he found himself compelled to call attention to the extravagance of some of the schemes advocated in Rangoon. He pointed out that the idea of continuing the Lashio line up to the Salwin, on the Chinese frontier at Kun-lon, would involve immense difficulty and expense, only to catch a trade which was carried across the river in a couple of dug-outs. Such a railway could not hope to compete with the great waterways which are the natural outlets to the sea. The project for connecting the upper province directly with the railway system of Assam was, as the Viceroy had seen for himself, one not to be supported, in view of its immense physical difficulties and the unprofitable country it would traverse. Burma will, no doubt, eventually be linked by rail with India, but it is more probable that the line will start from Rangoon across the range known as the Arakan Yoma, and thence between it and the Bay of Bengal, to Chittagong. This route is being surveyed at the suggestion of Sir Hugh Barnes, the late Lieutenant-Governor of Burma. That officer also took a deep interest in the scheme for opening up the fertile plateau of the Southern Shan States, where great areas are waiting to be cultivated only until a railway enables their produce to reach the sea. The project was looked upon with distrust when it was laid before the Government of India some years ago, but Sir H. Barnes's inquiries go to show that the prospects of trade were then underestimated. A minor, but not unimportant, consequence of the railway would be the opening to Europeans, exhausted by the enervating climate of the low country, of an excellent sanitarium on the plateau.

For irrigation operations there is fortunately not the same demand in Burma as in India, but in the central zone or lesser rainfall much has been done, and is to be done. Three large canals are in process of construction, and the Mandalay canal has already been able to render good service when the early rains of 1903-04 failed. Yet another project, the Ye-u canal, estimated to irrigate 100 square miles annually, is under consideration.

The mineral resources of the province have still to be completely explored and developed. The operations of the Burma ruby mines are well known in England, and, of course, it is only since the annexation of Upper Burma that these mines have begun to be worked by European methods. There are considerable possibilities in the way of gold, and tin mining has as yet scarcely begun to be developed. The production of petroleum is already considerable and promises well. Coal, not of very good quality, is found in the Shan States, on the Upper Chindwin, and at Mergui, and iron exists in many places, though, so far, it has not been worked by scientific methods.

In its forests, with their immense resources in teak and other valuable woods, Burma possesses an asset the great importance of which was not, apparently, at first appreciated. In 1870-71 British Burma had but 133 square miles of reserved forest, bringing in a gross revenue of some £45,000; now there are more than 20,000 square miles reserved, outside the 100,000 which will probably eventually be broken up for cultivation. The forest revenue is over £550,000 gross and close attention is being given to preservation and development. The world's demand for rubber is growing rapidly with the advent of motor-cars and cycles and many other opportunities for its use. The possibilities of the Burma forests in this direction have not been lost sight of, and there is a Government plantation of rubber trees, extending over some 2,000 acres, at Mergui.

Nothing is more hampering to the progress of a country than the constant unrest generated by unsettled boundaries of its territory, where wild and semi-independent tribes have, in the unsettlement, a motive for fighting ever at hand. Since 1885 the whole question of boundaries has been practically settled. The Siamese boundary has been demarcated and that of China was finally ascertained in 1900, with the exception of a small portion where wild, practically independent tribes defy the authority of the Chinese officials. The boundary between Assam and the turbulent people who inhabit the northern hills has also been laid down.

It is impossible here to go in any great detail into the future possibilities of Burma, but enough has, perhaps, been said to show how great they are. The tendency in Rangoon is apparently towards too wide an outlook. As Lord Curzon said there in 1901, Burma has first to consider the many possible and profitable openings for railway construction within her own borders before clamouring for such a luxury as early railway connexion with India, or for such a doubtful benefit as the Kun-lon line. Those are projects which can well wait till the internal communications, both by road and by rail, connecting the productive parts of the country with the great waterways or the sea, have been worked out to their full extent.

25TH JANUARY 1906.

Daily Chronicle.—The arrival of the Prince and Princess of Wales in the ancient city of Clive, the first foothold of the British in India, must have dispelled many illusions. The Prince as a sailor, and the Princess as a student of India, must have gathered that the Madras harbour was at one time an object of scorn, that the climate was abominable, and the people poverty-stricken. As a matter of fact, so greatly has the harbour been improved of recent years that the Renown and the Terrible were able to anchor within a stone's throw of the shore, whereas at Bombay the anchorage lies a mile out, and Calcutta is eighty miles away from the sea-sweetened breezes, which are pleasanter here than in Bombay, Calcutta or Rangoon. The new buildings, in the Indo-Saracenic style, and the yellow beach made a gorgeous spectacle; while the people, who crowded the streets in denser throngs than anywhere else during the tour, bubbled with enjoyment, as poor men never did.

Madras has indeed proved worthy of the splendid traditions associated with the names of Clive, Duplex, Bussy, and the Comte de Lally. Towards the close of the drive from the harbour to Government House, the Royal party saw something of the stately suburban life which is characteristic of Madras. A feature of the visit will be an entertainment given by the citizens, when the Khurds, a wild tribe living in the Ganjam district, will come to Madras for the first time in order to perform their native drama, while a musical and acrobatic entertainment will also be given.

After the public reception to-day the Prince laid the foundation stone of the Victoria Technical Institute. To-morrow he receives the visits of the chief princes of Madras, the Maharaja of Travancore, the Raja of Cochin, and the Raja of Pudukkottai; while in the evening the abovementioned entertainment will take place. On Friday return visits to the Ruling Chiefs will be paid, and there will be a State reception at night. On Saturday there will be a purdah party, when the chief native ladies will be presented to the Princess. On Sunday the Prince and Princess attend Divine Service at the Cathedral, and leave privately for Mysore in the evening.

Daily Telegraph.—The arrival of the Prince and Princess of Wales to-day in Madras was made the occasion of a general festival. At one o'clock His Majesty's battleship Renown approached the harbour, but the first gun announcing her coming had long been forestalled by the multitudes who lined the streets of the city. From the humble beginnings of Mr. Francis Day, in the reign of Charles II, this, the third most populous and important city of India, has expanded indeed. To-day one could hardly believe that the population of the capital was only half a million; it seemed that there were all that, and even more, lining the well-kept roadways.

The general aspect of the Madrassi crowd differs from that of a Northern Indian gathering in the gayer colours worn upon darker and certainly more freely exposed skins. After Burma this vivid colouring was, of course, less noticeable, but except at Jaipur it would be impossible to match the occasional galaxies of chrome yellow, crimson, and raw red which figured here and there upon the benches which stretched on both sides of the road almost from the harbour to Government House.

A welcome was given to the Royal visitors which for volume has only been exceeded in Calcutta, and in excitement and enthusiasm has not been equalled hitherto in the course of the tour. Especially vociferous were the crowded sections set apart for the school children of Madras, of whom 12,000 or 14,000 were actually present along the route.

Their Royal Highnesses looked well after the rest afforded by the river trip and sea voyage, and betrayed evident pleasure at the warmth of the greeting they received in this, the most ancient of our Indian settlements, the home of Clive, and at present the capital of the best governed and developed of all the provinces of our Indian Empire.

After a delightful voyage from Rangoon, in ideal weather, His Majesty's ships Renown and Terrible anchored in the harbour at one o'clock this afternoon. The formal welcome took place in a huge, gaily decked shamiana on the pier where there was a representative British and native assemblage of several hundred persons.

The Corporation's address was read by the President, Mr. Pears, and was accompanied by a valuable casket.

The Prince, in reply, said that he had looked forward to visiting that old, historic city, our oldest possession, and the oldest municipality of British India. He expressed his deep appreciation of the generous efforts and carefully planned preparations which had been made for his reception. Referring to the King's visit, His Royal Highness said that His Majesty's recollections of Madras were still vivid and happy.

In the course of the day between thirty and forty thousand poor were fed in various quarters of the city, the Brahmins being fed in the temples.

Englishman.—The Prince of Wales is a sailor and the Princess is an uncommonly keen student of Indian affairs. No doubt unflattering guides has prepared them for anything but a pleasant impression of Madras. That her harbour is a bye-word amongst sailormen and shipowners, that her climate is at the best of times like that of the bottom of a well, that her people are poor and her industries languishing. Are these not amongst the commonplaces of what passes for informed Indian opinion? But the backwardness of Madras bears a sound family likeness to another Anglo-Indian commonplace, the legend of the extraordinary administrative perfection of the Punjab. Each bubble has only to be pricked to burst. And to-day was a day of agreeable disillusionment.

First came the explosion of the harbour myth. It must have surprised His Royal Highness not a little to find that in this abused and condemned port the Renown and her giant escort the Terrible could steam easily into the walled anchorage regardless of the state of the tide and moor a stone's throw from the shore. In the magnificent harbour of Bombay the Renown was near a mile from the Bunder and the Terrible a mere smudge on the horizon. At Calcutta the battleship anchored at Saugor and her sister was many miles further out at sea. At Rangoon both war vessels moored below the Hastings shoal. It will not be betraying a confidence to recite a characteristic story of Her Royal Highness. As the launch Hourah was steaming down the Hughli the Princess was being duly impressed with the manifold excellencies of Calcutta. The size of the river, the depth of the channel, and the safety of the navigation. "Yes," she smilingly retorted, "but you could not bring the Renown up here." True at certain seasons the sea sweeps so strongly through the eastern entrance to the harbour that the Madras anchorage is unsafe, but that eastern gap in the sea wall is soon to be closed and a sheltered opening to the north-east built. It would never have been constructed but for the interference of the Secretary of State's advisers. Madras as a port has suffered severely from ignorance and the bad effects of the 1881 cyclone, but with courage it still has a future.

Then came the heat myth. It was steamy certainly, but a strong sea-sweetened breeze blew, which made the mist days in Bombay and Rangoon, and even the afternoon of arrival in Calcutta, a perspiring recollection by comparison. Flicked by this breeze the wavelets danced across the harbour and broke with a happy roar on the beach. Pleasant it was to sit on the shade of one of the old surf boats built up of rude planks as rudely sewn together, which were long the only means of landing in Madras and are still so well suited to the purpose that they had to be called in to land at Obbia the men and horses of the Somaliland force, when the steel boats were beaten shapeless. The blue waters were furrowed with smart launches and immaculate gigs bearing Lord Amphilh to visit Their Royal Highnesses. Those who crowded into the large reception pandal probably found the waiting hour anything but a cheerful one, but this penalty of distinction was avoided by the irresponsible beachcomber for whom the panorama unfolded its best and brightest side.

And then the "Poor People." Not even in Bombay, or Delhi, or Amritsar did Their Royal Highnesses see such a dense, packed crowd, or hear more joyous chatter. Luckily in the central streets strong barriers were erected for no human cordon could have held that throng back. Behind this barrier the crowd was so solid that the proverbial sardine may be said to lie at his ease by comparison. If it may be regarded as a sign of depression to ripple and bubble with enjoyment then these strong featured, swarthy men and women of the South may be regarded as poor. But the impression this enthusiastic and intensely interested "levée en masse" left on the mind of those not unused in reading the signs of the East was of a people quite comfortably provided with this world's goods, by no means insensible to the lighter side of life, delighted to welcome the Shazada and his Consort and determined to enjoy their holiday.

To such accompaniments the Prince and Princess entered Madras. Their launch steamed round the warships and while the welkin rung with the Royal salute, they were received by Lord Amphilh and Lady Amphilh, who to the regret of every body are soon leaving Madras, and presented with a municipal address.

The short drive from the harbour to Government House is crowded with signs of the new Madras and with memories of Fort St. George. On the one hand the High Court in the Hindu saracenic style and the Madras bank building, which is strongly reminiscent of the fort at Agra and Fatehpur Sikri, which typify the rebuilding of the city. On the other the venerable fort with its smoth green glacis, which brings to mind the work of men like Dupleix, Clive, Bussy, Lally, and Coote. What brains and courage, hopes and ambitions are summed up in the mere enumeration of the names of the men, who in a short half century decided the fate of Hindustan. And then nearing Government House the procession passed into the avenues of handsome boxage, the wide lawns and the solid houses of the stately suburban life of Madras, and which make it the only Presidency town, where the Englishman has room to live.

Indian Daily News.—Another bright page in the history of the city of Clive has been written to-day. Fresh from the vivid scenes of Burma's gay loveliness, from the charms of the youngest province of the Empire of British India, the Prince and Princess of Wales to-day landed in Madras. Bombay is justly termed "the Beautiful"; Calcutta has been called the "City of Palaces," but Madras, where the foundations of British Empire in the East were laid, is more nearly the India of our dreams. The first British capital in India is a city of tropic verdure and exceeding charm, but the later capitals in the pride of rapid growth have looked with doubtful eyes upon the city and the presidency which have been described by an epithet curiously inapt. What the Prince and Princess saw when they landed this afternoon was a city shining beneath a great glory of light, its wide roads shaded by luxuriant and splendid trees burgeoning with blossoms. Such a setting needed no gilding, and wisely, but little decoration in the way of bunting and arches was attempted. What was done, however, was bright, and the arches erected throughout the city, if of doubtful beauty, were at least typical of Southern India.

Multitudes of people lined the roads with amazing colour of the brightest and warmest tones. Stands were filled with crowds of school children in their gayest gear flaunting bright banners and cheering loudly, and the whole route along which the Prince and Princess passed was a dazzling and animated panorama of pictures painted in strong lights. The scene at the reception was as bright as any that has marked the succession of welcomes offered to Their Royal Highnesses during the tour. The reception took place in a great pavilion built on the new pier of the harbour thirty years ago when the King-Emperor landed in Madras. The harbour did not exist, but His Majesty inaugurated its construction by laying the memorial stone. Its completion enabled the warships to lie almost alongside the pier, and her escort was anchored no more than a stone's throw from the place of landing. The pier had been converted into a pavilion with gilded domes over the entrance, forming a covered way to the central pavilion where the ceremonial took place. Ropes of flowers and many flags formed the decoration of this shamiana where there was a glittering assembly, including native chiefs and zemindars, profusely bejewelled and lavishly clothed in satin and plush and gold embroidery. A prettily arranged dais was backed by royal purple and scarlet with the Prince's plumes in silver on the purple ground. The Renown entered the harbour about one o'clock and previously messages of welcome and thanks had been exchanged between Lord Amphilh and the Prince by ethergrams passing between the Hyacinth and the Renown.

The reception pavilion began to fill before 3 o'clock. The Governor, accompanied by the Chief Justice, the Bishop of Madras, and the Members of Council, boarded the Renown to greet Their Royal Highnesses about 4 o'clock, and having returned to the pier-head, the Royal landing took place precisely at 4.30.

The thunder of salutes from the warships close under the pier told the waiting crowds that the Royal barge was on its way to the warf. A few minutes afterwards Their Royal Highnesses had landed, and the Governor had presented the Chief Justice, the Bishop, the Members of Council, and the Lieutenant-General Commanding the Secunderabad Division. The guard of honour of the South Indian Railway Volunteers was inspected, and thereafter the Raja of Cochin, the Raja of Pudukkottai, the Nawab of Banganapalleund, and the young Raja of Sandur, a boy of 13, were presented, as well as the Consuls and high officials of Government. Their Royal Highnesses having entered the main pavilion, the members of the Corporation advanced, and the President, Mr. S. E. Pears, read the following address of welcome :—

May it please Your Royal Highnesses,—On behalf of the City and Corporation of Madras, we, the undersigned Municipal Commissioners, beg to offer to Your Royal Highnesses our most hearty and loyal welcome. When some four years ago Your Royal Highnesses visited most of the principal possessions of the British Empire, our disappointment that India was for the time excluded was perforce consoled with the hope that this country might some day be still favoured. That hope has today, to our great good fortune, been fulfilled. We hail with joy Your Royal Highnesses' presence amongst us to-day as one more of the proofs of the good-will felt by His Majesty the King-Emperor towards the people of this country. We beg Your Royal Highnesses to convey to His Most Gracious Majesty and to accept for yourselves the expression of our sincere devotion to the throne, our attachment to the Royal family, and our grateful appreciation of the many blessings conferred on this country by the just, wise, and merciful rule inaugurated by our Queen-Empress Victoria, of over-revered memory, and continued by His Most Gracious Majesty our King-Emperor. Permit us to conclude this sincere expression of our loyalty with the earnest hope that Your Royal Highnesses may both be spared to enjoy many years of health and prosperity with true happiness to yourselves and with continued blessings to the many millions whom it may be your high destiny to command.

The address was enclosed in a silver casket, which was then presented to the Prince by the senior native member of the Corporation.

His Royal Highness replied as follows :—

Gentlemen,—I thank you for the hearty welcome which you offer to the Princess of Wales and myself. We have looked forward with much pleasure to visiting your old and historic city, which I believe to be our oldest possession and oldest municipality in British India, and I desire to express our deep appreciation of the generous efforts and carefully planned preparations which have been made for our reception by you and the citizens of Madras. We anticipate with interest the scenes which await us during the next few days, and we hope to use the opportunities which you and Lord Amptill have given us for seeing your city and its people. I will not fail to communicate to the King-Emperor your loyal assurances. Though thirty years have passed since he was your guest, my dear father's recollections of Madras are still vivid and happy. Gentlemen, I again thank you for the affectionate terms in which you have greeted us to your city.

The ceremonial over, Their Royal Highnesses left the pavilion, and His Royal Highness having inspected the guard of honour furnished by the Suffolk Regiment at the entrance, the Royal progress along the densely thronged crowd to Government House began. The Royal escort included a detachment of the 13th Lancers, the 6th Battery, Royal Field Artillery, the Mounted Infantry, Madras Volunteer Guards, and a detachment of the Government Body-Guards. Following the carriage of the Royal suite was a procession of the State equipages of the Ruling Chiefs and Zemindars to the number of thirty-one. The Maharaja of Travancore was unable to be present through illness, the Zamorin of Calicut, the Vailya Raja of Palghat, and the Zemindar of Peddakimedi and North Vallur had intimated their inability to attend.

To-night a State banquet was held at Government House, followed by a largely attended levée. During the day the poor of the city had been fed, and Brahmins at the various temples have also had special provision made for them. The multitude of poor with whom the day has been thus made memorable numbered nearly forty thousand.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The Renown, which left Rangoon on Sunday morning, reaches Madras to-morrow, and the Prince and Princess of Wales land in the afternoon. The conditions of the voyage to Madras have been as agreeable as those of the journey from Calcutta to Rangoon. The Hyacinth left Rangoon on Friday morning an hour or so ahead of the British India steamer Jelunga which carried the Press correspondents.

In the afternoon, the Jelunga found the Hyacinth with two boats out, and a life-buoy in the water; the crew of the flagship were going through life-saving practice.

This prefigured something which was to happen very soon, for the next afternoon, Saturday, the alarm of "Man overboard" was raised on the Jelunga. The ship was full of coolies in the steerage returning from Burma to Madras, and one of these had been seen to mount the rail and plunge into the sea. He immediately struck out, showing himself to be a strong swimmer. The ship was put about directly the alarm was given, and having described a circle, and the man having been located, a boat was lowered. The man continued to swim strongly until the boat reached him. He was hauled aboard and immediately collapsed; but when the boat was being hauled up to the davits he made another attempt to jump into the water. He received immediate attention from a couple of doctors, on being got aboard, and was placed under careful restraint. He said he wanted to go to heaven, and his demeanour altogether suggested insanity. The incident created some excitement, but commendable despatch had been exercised by Captain Grier and his officers in rescuing the man, and the Jelunga renewed her course half-an-hour after the alarm had been given. She anchored outside Madras harbour last night, and on the passengers landing this morning, the Madrassi was handed over to the care of the police. The Hyacinth arrived this morning.

Madras Mail.—The landing of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales at Madras yesterday afternoon was a brilliantly successful function. As recorded in the short account we gave yesterday, Madras and her thousands of visitors turned out en masse to give her Royal visitors a right royal welcome. From an early hour in the afternoon the streets and houses along the route filled with eager and excited crowds determined to miss no part of the imposing ceremony, and a considerable time before the hour appointed the pavilion in the harbour began to fill with a distinguished fashionable assemblage of those bidden officially to greet Their Royal Highnesses on arrival. The huge enclosure, magnificently decorated, presented an animated appearance, and at no time did it look overcrowded with its thousand and more occupants. The Ruling Chiefs, titular Rajahs, and Zemindars, many resplendent in magnificent jewels and gorgeous costumes, arrived in good time and took their allotted places in the splendid pageant. Many commented with regret on the fact that His Highness the Maharaja of Travancore, the leading Ruling Chief of Southern India, and one of the leading Chiefs in the whole of India, was unavoidably forced to forego taking his place; but the classic and beautiful West Coast was represented by His Highness the Raja of Cochin, the progressive, beautiful and historically interesting Native State which abuts on that of his brother of Travancore, and the other Chiefs from Malabar. The genial Raja of Pudukkottai was there, in Imperial purple and gold, while many who did not know him overlooked the minor Raja of Sandur, Ruler of a small State hidden away in the hilly region of Bellary District, an almost forgotten remnant of that Mahratta power which at one time harried the land from North to South and from East to West. From the neighbourhood of the Cyclopean ruins of Vijayanugger came the Raja of Anagundi, who claims descent from the rulers of that grand Hindu Kingdom of old whose representatives are now petty chieftains scattered throughout the Peninsula. The titular Rajas and Zemindars made a brave show, but it would occupy too much space to detail their claims to take part in the historic assembly.

His Excellency the Governor of Madras, accompanied by Her Excellency Lady Amptill, escorted by His Excellency's Body Guard and a half squadron of Gordon's Horse, left Government House and arrived at the new pier in the Madras Harbour at 3.45 p.m., and five minutes later His Excellency proceeded on board H. M. S. Renown to welcome Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, His Excellency's departure on this mission being announced by a salute from the battery on the foreshore. Lord Amptill was accompanied by the Hon'ble Sir Arnold White, Chief Justice of Madras, the Lord Bishop of Madras, the Hon'ble Mr. Gabriel Stokes, C.S.I., and the Hon'ble Mr. G. S. Forbes, the two Members of Council, all of whom were then presented to Their Royal Highnesses by His Excellency. At 4.10 p.m. His Excellency and the accompanying officials returned to the pier, and, almost immediately after, a stir on board the Renown announced that preparations were forward for the landing of Their Royal Highnesses. At 4.25 p.m. the Prince and Princess of Wales left the Renown, the Hyacinth and Fox announcing the fact with Royal salutes of 31 guns each, the cracking report of the naval guns being in sharp contradistinction to the heavier boom of the shore batteries. A short journey of five minutes or so in the Royal barge bearing the Royal standard differentiated by the Prince of Wales's escutcheon and label, brought Their Royal Highnesses to the pier, when a Royal salute again boomed out from the shore batteries announcing that the Prince and Princess of Wales had at last set foot on the shores of Madras. His Royal Highness was in the white undress uniform of an Admiral of the British Fleet and wore the ribbon of the Star of India, together with the insignia of the other numerous Orders of which he is a member. The Band of the Guard-of-Honour played the National Anthem, and the Royal standard—the same one that was used when the King was in Madras—was hoisted. Their Royal Highnesses were received on landing by His Excellency the Governor, Her Excellency Lady Amptill, the Hon'ble Sir Arnold White, the Lord Bishop of Madras, the Hon'ble Mr. Stokes, the Hon'ble Mr. G. S. Forbes, Lieutenant-General Sir Charles Egerton, Commanding the 9th (Secunderabad) Division, the Judges of the High Court, Mr. Murray Hammick, Chief Secretary to Government, the Members of the Board of Revenue, Surgeon-General W. R. Browne, the Additional Members of the Madras Legislative Council, Mr. S. D. Pears, Chairman of the Madras Corporation, Mr. F. J. E. Spring, the President, and the other members of the Port Trust, Mr. W. O. Horne, Inspector-General of Police, and Colonel H. L. Mayne, C.V.O., C.B., Commanding the Madras Brigade. Among others present in the reception enclosure were the Consuls and Vice-Consuls of foreign nations present in Madras, and the following Ruling Chiefs, Nobles, and Zemindars:—His Highness the Raja of Cochin, His Highness the Raja of Pudukkottai, the Nawab of Banganapalle, the Raja of Sandur, the Prince of Arcot, the Maharaja of Jeypore, the Maharaja of Bobbili, the Raja of Vizianagram, Raja of Venkatagiri, Raja of Kalahasti, Raja of Pithapuram, Raja of Karvetnagar, Raja of Ramnad, Zamorin of Calicut, Second Rajah of Calicut, Valiya Raja of Chirakkal, Valiya Raja of Kadattanad, Valiya Raja of Palghat, Valiya Raja of Walluvanad, Raja of North Vallur, Raja of Kallikotta and Attagada, Raja Vasudeva, Raja of Kollengode, Raja of Anagundy, Zemindar of Sivagunga, Zemindar of Udaiyarpalayam, Zemindar of Punganur, Zemindar of Kangundi, Zemindar of Wuyyur, Zemindar of Devarakota, Zemindar of South Vallur, Zemindar of Ettiyapuram, Zemindar of Kurupam, Zemindar of Bhadrachalam, Zemindar of Parlakimedi, Zemindar of Peddakimedi, Zemindar of Dharakota, and Raja Sir Savalai Ramaswami Moodelliar.

A guard-of-honour of the South Indian Railway Volunteers, with band, was drawn up on the pier and received Their Royal Highnesses with the Royal salute. The Prince, accompanied by Lieutenant-General Sir Charles Egerton and Colonel Mayne, then inspected the guard-of-honour, while the Ruling Chiefs, Consuls and Vice-Consuls, the high officials of Government, the Indian gentlemen invited by Government to be present, the President of the Corporation, the Sheriff of Madras, and the Trustees of the Port moved into the small pavilion reserved for their accommodation. This pavilion was prettily decorated with foliage, plants, and a large maroon valance, with a heavy gold fringe, draped the entrance of the large pavilion. Here His Excellency the Governor, at the request of His Royal Highness, made certain presentations, after which Their Royal Highnesses accompanied by Their Excellencies the Governor and Lady Amptill, proceeded to the larger pavilion, where were assembled a large number of heads of departments, gazetted officers of Government, and the leading European and Indian citizens of Madras, together with a large number of ladies.

The Prince and Princess of Wales and the Governor and Lady Amptill having ascended and taken their places on the dais, accompanied by His Royal Highness's suite, the President and the members of the Corporation were commanded to present their address. Having taken their places in front of the dais, Mr. S. D. Pears read the address.

The address, which was enclosed in a beautiful silver casket of excellent workmanship, was presented to His Royal Highness by Mr. W. S. Venkataramanjulu Naidu, the Senior Commissioner of the Corporation. The casket was 10 inches high and 6½ inches long, and was mounted on an ebony plinth 4½ inches high. It rested on four scroll feet with elegant scroll work round the sides, and in the centre of the front was some fine relief work, which gave the casket a very handsome appearance. Rising from each corner of the casket were three palm trees with hooded cobras coiled round them. Four silver pillars supported the casket, and embossed on the centre front and back panels was the Corporation's coat-of-arms. The High Court was reproduced on the left front, and on the right was an excellent representation of the Senate House. On the corresponding panels at the back were the Chepauk Palace and Government House, Madras; and on each end were forest views, in one of which appeared a huge elephant. Mounted on the corners of the lid were four tigers, and surmounting the casket in the centre were the Prince of Wales's feathers, supported by a most artistic design of scroll and fluted work, some ribbon and scroll work setting off the portion where the lid fitted on the casket. On the inscription plate on the ebony plinth the following was engraved:—
"To Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales in token of the loyalty of the City and Corporation of Madras, January, 1906." Messrs. T. R. Tawker and Sons of Mount Road were the designers and manufacturers of the casket.

His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales made a reply.

The Commissioners of the Corporation were then presented to Their Royal Highnesses, who, standing at the foot of the steps of the dais, graciously shook hands with each of them. The Commissioners then withdrew, and the ceremonial in connection with the public arrival being over, Their Royal Highnesses and Their Excellencies left the dais to take part in perhaps the most imposing procession that has ever been seen in Madras. Before doing so, however, His Royal Highness, with Sir Charles Egerton and Colonel Mayne, inspected the Guard-of-Honour of the 2nd Suffolk Regiment, with band and colours, which was drawn up in the harbour compound and received Their Royal Highnesses on emerging from the pavilion with the Royal salute, the Band playing the National Anthem. Before the procession moved off, the loyalty and affection of Madras found vent in a roar of cheering, the first informal indication of the genuineness of the welcome, which was repeated a thousandfold all along the route.

The procession to Government House was then formed as follows:—

It was a unique sight, this imposing procession of over fifty equips, headed by an array of mounted troops such as has not, within the memory of most of us, been seen in Madras. The most interesting feature of the escort was the presence in it of the 6th Battery of the Royal Field Artillery with its guns. It is not usual, except on very ceremonial occasions, to use Artillery for this purpose. It is, however, always done when the Viceroy visits Hyderabad in State. There the Nizam claims his prerogative on State occasions of being escorted by two complete Cavalry Regiments of his forces, and the Viceroy, as His Majesty's representative, not to be outdone, has to have, in addition to two Cavalry Regiments, a Battery of Royal Horse Artillery as well. The military pageant has been, and will be, surpassed in other places; but such as it was, it was a show that not many of the enormous crowd which lined the long route from the harbour to Government House have seen, or will probably ever see again, and to the man in the street it must seem only right and proper that the advent of the King-Emperor's son, and the heir to his throne and his vast dominions, should have been received with a pomp and circumstance, which, to their unaccustomed eyes, was the best possible. For in addition to the escort composed of the 30th Lancers (Gordon's Horse), the 6th Field Battery, Royal Artillery, the Mounted Infantry of the Madras Volunteer Guards, and His Excellency the Governor's Body Guard, the streets throughout the entire route were lined with troops, while the roads leading into those selected for the Royal route were blocked by surplus numbers of the gunners from St. Thomas's Mount. The route was divided into four sections, which were respectively under the command of Major Montagu, of the Suffolk Regiment, Lieutenant-Colonel Sutton, of the 88th Carnatic Infantry, Lieutenant-Colonel Lampen, and Major Hamilton, both of the 2nd Rajputs. The first section extended from the harbour gate up to Parry's Corner and was lined by 100 men of the Madras Artillery Volunteers, 200 men of the 2nd Suffolk Regiment, and 200 men of the Madras Railway Volunteers. The second section extending from Parry's Corner to the South-West corner of the Law College compound, and thence to the South Indian Railway crossing, was lined by 40 men of the 88th Carnatic Infantry and 100 men of the South Indian Railway Volunteers. The third section, from the South Indian Railway crossing to Wallajah Bridge, was lined by the 2nd Queen's Own Rajput Light Infantry. The fourth section, from the Wallajah Bridge to Government House Bridge, was lined by the Madras Volunteer Guards and Cadets, numbering about 350, and from the bridge to Government House gate by No. 52 Company, Royal Garrison Artillery. There was also a strong force of police all along the route, who creditably acquitted themselves in the discharge of their duties.

Madras has frequently donned holiday attire, but she has never, we venture to say, quite surpassed her present effort. The reasons for this are many and obvious. In the first place, the growth of her prosperity in recent years has been accompanied by an uprising of stately buildings, official, mercantile, etc., which has done much to remove the reproach of a lack of dignity when Madras has been compared with the other presidency capitals, and, above all things, it has considerably improved the aspect which the town presents to those approaching her from the sea. In the second place, it was, with wisdom, decided to have some sort of uniformity in the scheme of decorations. For instance, the harbour and its precincts and all arrangements connected therewith were entrusted to the harbour authorities under the experienced supervision and guidance of Mr. F. J. E. Spring and his staff, though, practically speaking, the bulk of the work fell on the shoulders of Commander Baugh, R. I. M., of the Port Office, who was assisted by Mr. Corfield and Mr. H. C. Taylor, the Harbour Master. These gentlemen were responsible for having an exceedingly unpicturesque and utilitarian spot in the harbour premises converted into a pavilion fit even for the reception of Royalty. These arrangements were early taken in hand, but when nearing completion were almost ruined by the unseasonable but providential and heavy rain which fell last week. It would have been a poor compliment to pay the harbour authorities to suppose for a moment that they were not capable, given a fair spell of bright weather, to repair the damage so as to make it impossible to believe that it had ever existed, and they have shown by results that "where there's a will there's a way."

A long description of the pavilion and its approaches has already appeared, but a word or two describing it in its completed state will not be out of place. The white roof of the interior of the pandal was relieved with light fringes of gold braid. The large portion of the pavilion which was utilised for the accommodation of invited guests and the public presented a very gay appearance, and included in the decorations were a very fine array of shields, banners, bannerettes, flags and bunting of every imaginable description, and a novel feature was the use of garlands of roses, identically the same as those used for the street decorations in London on the occasion of the visit of the King of Spain. The dais, too, was decorated in regal colours. A wide strip of purple velvet reached from the floor of the dais to the roof of the pavilion, and in the centre the Prince of Wales's crest was embroidered in gold and silver thread. The effect obtained by this and two dark red-figured silk tapestry curtains, hung on either side of the velvet and extending over the whole breadth of the back of the dais was very imposing. On the floor of the dais a very fine Axminster velvet pile carpet was spread, and chairs were arranged in a semicircle, with a small table in the centre, which was provided for the purpose of holding the Corporation casket. From the spot where Their Royal Highnesses entered their carriage an avenue of Venetian masts with streamers of flags was erected and the harbour compound decorations ended with a handsome pandal just where the railway line was crossed.

Outside the harbour, the Public Reception Committee took charge of such of the arrangements as were to testify to the popular character of the reception. Arches spanned the roads at intervals, erected either by the Reception Committee or by the leading Chiefs and Nobles of the Presidency, each typical in its way of a method of street decoration in which the peoples of the South have secured pre-eminence. The street decorations were entrusted to Mr. G. S. T. Harris, the Consulting Architect to Government; and, finally, all the business houses, etc., on the North Beach Road and the vicinity put themselves into the hands of firms of decorators, with the result that a certain amount of artistic uniformity has been secured. Among the business houses and Government offices that were decorated on North Beach Road were:—The Port Office, Messrs. Arbuthnot and Co., Messrs. Haji Badsha Sahib and Co., the National Bank, Messrs. Best and Co., the General Post Office, the City Magistrate's Court, the Mercantile Bank of India, the Bank of Madras, the Madras Mail, Messrs. King and Co., the Church of Scotland Mission College, the new offices of the Deputy Commissioner of Police, and Messrs. Parry and Co.

The roads from the harbour to Government House were lined with Venetian masts. On the North Beach Road these were entwined with evergreens and surmounted with palm leaves and carried festoons of evergreens and rosettes. Further up they gave place to decorated poles bearing strings of gaily-coloured flags. On the road across the island, these formed a gorgeous vista more attractive than anywhere else. The bases of Munro's Statue and the King's Statue on Mount Road were covered with flowering plants and added to the brightness of the scene.

All the arches of the Reception Committee were erected under the supervision of Mr. N. Appusundram Pillay, Municipal Commissioner. The arch between Messrs. Best and Co.'s premises and the National Bank was in the form of a Hindu temple gopuram and was composed of coconut leaves. Special workmen from Tanjore and Kumbakonam were employed in its construction. Surmounting the arches were white satin flags with the letters "G" (George) and V. M. (Victoria Mary). On the northern face of the arch were a portrait of the Prince of Wales and the British coat-of-arms, as also a representation of the Insignia of the Star of India, and the Indian Empire. The arch between the Telegraph Office and the Presidency Magistrate's Court was entwined with an artificial vine with clusters of grapes peeping through the leaves. The Royal coat-of-arms was emblazoned in colours below the triangle of the arch and the Prince of Wales's plumes were on either end of the arch. The arch between the Deputy Commissioner's Office and Messrs. Parry and Co.'s took the form of an Indian marriage pandal, and was composed entirely of coloured paper and tinsel and decorated with flags. In the road near the Law College is another handsome arch of Indo-Saracenic design erected by the Madras Landholders' Association. Almost opposite St. George's Gate of the Fort was an arch built by the Maharaja of Jeypore, which represented a palace gate with a turret rising on either side. In the triangle above the main gateway were transparencies of Their Royal Highnesses on either side above the triangle. Between this and the Wallajah Bridge was another arch representing an Indian temple arch. On the panels on either side of this were represented the British coat-of-arms. On the top on either side are dancing peacocks, and in the centre of the triangle above the entrance were gatis with parrots on either side. The most striking features of decorations leading up to Mount Road are the two arches which span the road on either side of Government House Bridge, and which were specially designed and prepared for the Raja of Kapileswarapuram by Messrs. Venkiah Brothers. Both the arches represent gateways and bear very elaborately executed paintings descriptive of various Hindu deities. On the top is prominently displayed the Prince of Wales's crest with the Royal coat-of-arms emblazoned above them. A huge Union Jack flies on the top. The arches bear inscriptions offering the Raja's hearty greetings to the Royal visitors. In addition to putting up the arches the Raja had decorated the bridge on either side between the arches.

Neat white barricades were erected on each side of the road, for the simple reason that it was essential for the success of the great procession that an absolutely clear highway should be secured. The slightest incursion of people into this space would not only have disorganised the pageant, but might have been disastrous. Behind these barricades the crowds stood in dense masses, occupying every available square foot of ground, waiting patiently for hours to see the Prince and Princess go by and do obeisance to them. The mercantile offices and the houses along the Esplanade were similarly packed with sightseers of all classes, many ladies taking advantage of this most comfortable and convenient way of witnessing the pageant. On the North Beach Road, along the Esplanade, the five-tier galleries that had been erected by the Reception Committee were literally packed with crowds brilliant in holiday attire. It was a happy thought on the part of the organisers of the public reception to erect these stands. They were extensively patronised by loyal sightseers who were willing to pay a reasonable fee for securing a favourable spot from which to see the Royal visitors, and it stands to reason that, in dealing with the enormous had to commence hours before the stands afforded far more comfortable resting places than if the people had to stand. As it is, it speaks volumes for their enthusiasm and loyalty that many of them braved the afternoon sun and glare for hours in order to catch a passing glimpse of Their Royal Highnesses as they drove by. Those situated in the stands by the harbour had after all the best opportunities of seeing the Prince and Princess, because of the slow space at which it was necessary to start the procession in order that the component parts of it should exactly fall into the positions assigned them. This was to some extent secured by previous rehearsals; but in this connection it is impossible to speak too highly of the elaborate police arrangements which made this possible; and when the Wallajah Bridge was crossed and the island was reached one of the most pleasing features of the whole proceedings witnessed. The Government of Madras when asked to contribute to the funds of the Reception Committee, very generously did so, but their gift was governed by kindly stipulations which ensured two classes taking part in the festivities who might otherwise have been overlooked. They insisted that the school children of Madras, without any distinction of class, creed or nationality, should be given an opportunity of witnessing the great procession in comfort; that they should be given a treat in honour of the occasion, and that the poor should also be fed. The Reception Committee accepted this trust, and galleries for the school children were erected on both sides of the board road leading across the Island from Wallajah Bridge to the Government House Bridge. Here about 16,000 of the school children of Madras in their gayest holiday attire were packed, row on row, to give Their Royal Highnesses a loyal greeting that must have touched their hearts as much as any that they have yet received in a tour in which they have experienced many touching instances of loyalty and affection to the Royal House and to themselves in person. The solicitude that secured for the children this unique experience also ordained, as stated, that they should have a treat, and this was given them in a liberal supply of cakes and fruits, etc., before they took their places. In addition, they were given an interesting souvenir of the event, each child being presented with a medallion commemorative of the occasion.

Arrived at Government House, only the equipages and escorts of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales and Their Excellencies the Governor and Lady Amphil entered the gates, the rest of the procession breaking off and dispersing. Gordon's Horse will not soon forget the day when they went into Government House, Madras, in front of their future King. The remainder of the escort were equally smart, and the scene was most impressive. On the steps of Government House there was a group of the hospital nurses of Madras, affording another instance of the efforts to let all take part in the great ceremony. When Their Royal Highnesses passed the guard-of-honour there was, of course, a general salute, and shortly afterwards the roads were again open to traffic. The crowd opposite Government House was very dense, but it was absolutely orderly and the police arrangements were admirable.

The Princess looked particularly charming, and repeatedly bowed to the people as the Royal carriage drove through the streets. Opposite Government House a real roar of loyalty went up, and Her Royal Highness was visibly pleased. Their Royal Highnesses went into Government House, His Excellency the Governor drove in shortly afterwards, and the Royal arrival was complete.

Soon the orderly scene vanished as if by magic, the troops were withdrawn, and the streets were filled with surging crowds, discussing in animated tones every detail of the historic incidents which had come under their observation.

In accordance with the request of the Reception Committee the Trades' firms and other buildings in Mount Road and the neighbourhood were charmingly illuminated, and during the early part of the night turned that fine thoroughfare into a blaze of light. The extensive frontage of Messrs. Spencer and Co.'s compound was brilliantly illuminated in the style which was so effective at the Coronation celebrations. The other firms had their frontages lighted up with artistic arrangements of varying degrees of excellence, a very noticeable feature being a large and beautiful arrangement of the Prince of Wales's feathers in tiny incandescent lights on the façade of Messrs. Addison and Co. The island will be seen at its best to-morrow, on the occasion of the people's entertainment; but the portion of the Law Courts facing the Esplanade was illuminated with buttis, Chinese lanterns and transparencies. Most of these illuminations, however, slickered out early; but those who were enterprising enough to extend their wanderings as far as the harbour, even at a late hour of the night, would have witnessed a scene of marvellous beauty. The three battleships Renown, Hyacinth, and Fox were outlined in every single detail, from stern to stern and from masthead to water-line, in electric lights. Those who did not see the great Naval Review at Spithead at the celebration of the Diamond Jubilee of the late Queen Victoria would have had a faint idea of what the entire fleet in British waters looked like picked out in miles and miles of living fire, reflected in the sea. Unfortunately those who missed the sight last night are not likely to have it repeated during the next few days, as the Royal Squadron is, we believe, under orders to sail for Trincomalee and Bombay.

The beautiful Banqueting Hall presented an animated and imposing spectacle last night on the occasion of the Levé held by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. The arrangements were perfect in every detail. The interior of the Hall, illuminated, as it now is, with electricity, was filled with a large and distinguished gathering of gentlemen consisting of military officers in full dress uniform and a large number of civilians, officials and non-officials, European and Indian, who were to be presented to His Royal Highness. The Hall was charmingly decorated with ferns and foliage plants, and was divided off into compartments for convenience in marshalling the presentations. A guard-of-honour of the 2nd Suffolk Regiment was drawn up in front of the Grand Staircase and Lancers of His Excellency the Governor's Body Guard lined the Hall and the dais. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and His Excellency the Governor, with their respective staffs, arrived in State and entered the Hall to the strains of the National Anthem played by His Excellency the Governor's Band, which was in the gallery. The Prince, wearing the uniform of a General Officer, supported by the Governor, having taken his place on the dais, the presentations began and occupied exactly 50 minutes, nearly 800 gentlemen being presented.

Madras Mail.—In honour of the Royal visit the town of Waluwanad was profusely decorated; 2,000 poor were given doles of rice, and all the officials, vakils and townsmen in gala dress witnessed the distribution. Three hundred school children were given a treat.

The Royal visit was celebrated at Ottapalam by the poor being fed, the schoolboys being treated, prayers being offered, and a procession. The Coronation Reading-Room was opened with much ceremony.

The Royal visit to Madras has been celebrated in the Nidadavole and Medur Estates by the illumination of the Estate buildings and temples and the holding of thanksgiving services in all temples on both Estates.

In honour of Their Royal Highnesses's arrival in Madras, Mr. K. Venkata Reddy Naidu fed 5,000 of the poor of Ellore to-day and Mr. Achutharamia clothed 150.

25TH JANUARY 1906.

Madras Mail.—Yesterday the whole of the Presidency of Madras and the Native States connected with it united in offering a most loyal and hearty welcome to Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales. H. M. S. Renown, with the Royal visitors on board, arrived safely in Harbour in accordance with the revised arrangements, after a calm voyage across the Bay from Rangoon. Preparations for the official landing and reception were carried out in accordance with the programme laid down, and with all the pomp and circumstance befitting the occasion. Patriotic Madras could not have hoped for a better mise-en-scene for the Royal arrival and reception; for it is universally acknowledged that our city is seen in its most pleasing and picturesque aspect from the sea. Indeed, there are few more striking landscapes in the East than its nine miles of sea-front, beginning in the north with the solid and substantial blocks of mercantile and bank buildings that venerate the poorer purlieus of Black Town, continued along the Esplanade with its splendid group of Law Court buildings, on past the old Fort, the cradle of British dominion in India, thence along the bank and across the mouth of the Cooum to Chepauk with its noble piles of public buildings in Indo-Saracenic style, and then along the whole long length of the Marina with its background of palms and trees to the old Portuguese settlement of San Thome and the distant Adyar.

In approaching the Harbour yesterday afternoon Their Royal Highnesses can hardly have failed to be struck with the beauty of the view as the declining sun shed its afternoon glow over the background of this long panorama of foreshore. Further, Their Royal Highnesses, who, as we all know now, are as keenly interested in the India of the past as in the India of to-day, can hardly have failed to reflect on the historical memories associated with the scene before them. Although the fine old battlemented fort that is now to be seen is not the tiny original Fort that Mr. Day erected in the days of King Charles, it stands on the selfsame spot—on a site which represents the original nucleus of the great British Indian Empire of to-day; and as such it is hallowed ground to all Britishers. But we in Madras do not live entirely in memories of the past. Despite the fact that the main stream of Indian Commerce, both with the East and with the West, no longer flows, as it once did in the early days of the British along our Coromandel coast, Madras and the Presidency of which she is the capital can nevertheless boast of a steadily increasing trade and a continued advance along all the lines of modern progress. Southern India, too, yields to no other part of the country in loyalty to the British Crown and in gratefulness for the peace and prosperity which results from a settled and benevolent Government. As we have remarked on a previous occasion in connection with the present Royal visit to India, the people of South India are justly reckoned amongst the most loyal, best educated and most law-abiding in the whole of India, and from them the son and heir of the King Emperor and his gracious Consort may be sure of the most respectful and loving homage. In Their Excellencies Lord and Lady Ampthill, too, the people of this Presidency possess tried friends and well-wishers whose personal intimacy with Their Royal Highnesses will enable them to speak fully and freely on everything that pertains to the Presidency.

The spontaneous enthusiasm of all classes which has been evoked by the arrival in our midst of the Royal visitors is no more than what might be expected from a people whose warmth of feeling for the Royal House has ever been very real and heartfelt. And certainly, on an occasion like this, it is more satisfactory to dwell on the enthusiasm of the masses than to dilate on the dignity of the official ceremony of the reception. The latter was carried out yesterday afternoon with the most commendable precision and was in all respects, in its dignity and in its impressiveness, worthy of so auspicious and notable an event in local annals as a visit from the Heir-Apparent to the Crown and his gracious Consort. From the time that His Excellency the Governor proceeded on board, in company with a few of the highest officials, to the time that the Royal cortege turned into the gates of Government House, nothing was omitted which forethought and attention could devise to ensure a thoroughly "Royal" reception. The changes in the original programme necessitated by the later arrival of H.M.S. Renown were to a certain extent upsetting at the time when the announcement was first received last week; but the Chief Secretary to Government, the Brigade Staff, and the Military Secretary to His Excellency the Governor, upon whom has fallen the chief burden of the official preparations, met every new difficulty promptly and effectually. The heavy rain of last week, too—welcome and God-sent as it was felt to be in our drought-stricken areas—interfered sadly with the decorations and with preparations generally; but these drawbacks also were quickly overcome, and the rain not only brought a sense of relief over a wide area of country but gave the city of Madras itself a good washing and freshening up for the visit of Their Royal Highnesses.

It is very unfortunate that the premier Ruling Chief of the Presidency, His Highness the Maharaja of Travancore, has been prevented by illness from being present in Madras during Their Royal Highnesses's visit. The attack of chicken-pox from which His Highness has been suffering is fortunately a mild one; but an infectious disease of the kind is not to be made light of, however desirous His Highness may be to pay homage to, and exchange visits with, the Heir to the throne. For the rest, the other Ruling Chiefs of the Presidency have been able to come, besides a large number of members of the landed aristocracy of the Presidency. Thus, the Royal Procession yesterday afternoon, from the Harbour to Government House, was a most imposing one, as was the public reception at the Harbour itself. As for the crowds along the route of the Procession, long before noon it was seen that they would be enormous. With ample open spaces along almost the whole route there was room enough for everybody to see something of Their Royal Highnesses. During the next four days, too, Their Royal Highnesses will be frequently seen in public. The programme of events during the Royal visit is a moderate one enough; but in this the official organisers have shown good sense, for an overcrowded programme must be irksome and tiring to Their Royal Highnesses, while a lighter programme is more likely to leave a sense of pleasure and appreciation. For the rest, the Public Entertainment on the Island to-night and the laying of the foundation-stone of the Victoria Memorial Hall to-morrow will be the two principal public functions; and one and all will hope that they will be in every way successful.

For the moment, let us once more voice the sentiments of the whole of the population of the Presidency, in tendering to Their Royal Highnesses a most loyal and hearty welcome, and in wishing them every possible enjoyment during their stay in Southern India. Their Royal Highnesses have now seen a large portion of Western India, Northern India, and Eastern India. In Southern India Their Royal Highnesses will find themselves in the real tropical, palm-tree India of popular story and tradition. The one matter for regret is that Their Royal Highnesses will see so comparatively little of this part of India—so much less, indeed, than was seen thirty years ago by His Majesty the King-Emperor, who visited, not only the beautiful West Coast, with its palm-fringed shores and background of blue, jungle-clad Ghauts, but also the teeming, prosperous, picturesque Districts of the South, with their superb Hindu temples. However, as we have said before, both time and distance preclude Their Royal Highnesses from seeing quite everything that is worth seeing; and what the portion of the tour devoted to South India lacks in extent will, we may be sure, be counter-balanced by the heartiness and enthusiasm of the public welcome which they received in the Presidency City.

Pioneer.—Sir Edmund Poe, C.V.O., Rear Admiral Commanding the East India Squadron, arrived this morning from Rangoon in his flagship Hyacinth. A salute was fired in honour of his arrival. He paid a visit to His Excellency the Governor in the forenoon. Lieutenant-General Sir C. Egerton paid a visit to Sir Edmund Poe this afternoon, the usual salute being fired from the flagship.

Rangoon Gazette.—Hajee Mahomed Yusuf Ismail of Rangoon has generously given a sum of Rs. 30,000 for the purpose of erecting ophthalmic wards and their necessary adjuncts attached to the General Hospital, Mandalay. Although formal orders have not been issued the Lieutenant-Governor of Burma has informed the Inspector-General of Civil Hospitals that by command of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales the wards are to be named after the Princess of Wales. Presumably they will be known as the "Princess of Wales Ophthalmic Wards." The donor requires that the fact that the wards were built at his cost, were presented to the Mandalay Municipal Committee, and are so named with the special sanction of His Royal Highness be recorded in a prominent position on the building. He also requires that he be not held responsible for the maintenance of the building or the necessary staff. The plans and estimates are to be subjected to the approval of Colonel King. The Inspector-General of Civil Hospitals has reminded the President of the Mandalay Municipality that, whilst under Major Pridmore's efforts the number of eye-operations and the consequent relief of distressing disability has recently greatly advanced, the only accommodation now available for this important branch of surgical science is the absolutely unsuitable ward below the present operation room.

Times.—Even after Burma the Prince and Princess of Wales must have been struck with the warmth of their reception this afternoon in the capital of Madras Presidency. It was certainly a pretty sight from the shore as the Renown and Terrible steamed into the crowded harbour and took up their appointed berths with unerring precision. But the sight from the ships must have been equally striking—the stately city, all beflagged and decorated for the occasion, stretching for miles along an open coast backed by a veritable forest of luxuriant vegetation.

Their Royal Highnesses were received, on landing at the pierhead, by Lord and Lady Amphil with the principal military and civil officials, and the ruling chiefs and great landed proprietors of the Presidency. After the presentation of an address from the municipality, to which the Prince replied in telegraphic terms, the Royal procession passed along two miles of spacious streets and avenues, more densely packed with eager spectators than in perhaps any other Indian city yet visited, into the beautiful grounds of Government House, where Their Royal Highnesses will reside during their stay here. Lord Amphil's tenure of office expired in the ordinary course last month, but, to the great satisfaction of Madras Presidency, His Excellency was invited to remain for a few weeks longer in order to entertain the Prince and Princess during their visit to Madras.

Of the three Presidency capitals of India, Madras unquestionably possesses what the French of the 18th century called le grand air. Its public buildings, except Government House, hardly compare with those of Calcutta or Bombay. But its splendid avenues and stately private residences, grand old houses standing in park-like enclosures, convey an impression of inherited distinction and reposeful dignity which the bustling streets of Calcutta city and the industrial atmosphere of Bombay both equally lack. One can readily believe that Madras dates back to the specious times of Queen Elizabeth, under whose Royal Charter the East India Company erected, in 1620, the beginnings of the fort which in the following century played no conspicuous part in the long-drawn struggle between France and England for supremacy in India. It is, in fact, from Madras that the British power set forth on its unpremeditated course of conquest which was ultimately destined to establish the Pax Britannica from Tutikurin to the Himalayas.

But the stirring period of Madras history ended with the final overthrow of Tippu Sultan and the transference of the centre of political gravity to Calcutta. Since the beginning of the 19th century Madras Presidency has been in the fortunate position of having no history. Its northern rivals call it spitefully the benighted Presidency. No epithet, however, could be more undeserved. For, if its annals for the last hundred years have been unsensational, its record in respect of education, intelligent administration, material prosperity, and all that goes with peaceful, continuous progress would entitle it rather to be called the model Presidency.

The whole Presidency of Madras has a charm and interest of its own. The luxuriance of its tropical vegetation and the perennial warmth of its equable climate differentiate it not less widely from Central and Northern India than do the fundamental characteristics of its people. The race is entirely different. They speak languages of another stock; their customs are largely different; and, if their religion is Hinduism, the interpretation it has found in the great Dravidian temples of the South bears the stamp of unquestionable originality. Southern India is the ancient non-Aryan India, and even Christianity here is relatively ancient, for it dates back here to a period far earlier than that of the political invasion of India from the west. In many ways Southern India is more remote from us than any other part of the sub-continent; yet in many ways it seems to have shaped itself more readily to our influences. This, perhaps, is one of the many features which impart to it peculiar interest.

Times of India.—Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales landed in Madras yesterday evening and were welcomed with a cordiality unsurpassed by any other part of the Empire. The oldest Province of India yields to none in its loyalty and devotion to the British Throne. Unfortunately the time at the disposal of Their Royal Highnesses does not admit of a visit to some of the districts which would have conveyed to them some idea of what Kipling meant when he said that the poetry and the romance of India lies buried in the South. Southern India boasts of having the only civilization and literature which has not had a Brahmanical and Sanscritic origin in the whole country. The colonies of Brahmanic communities, which were founded in the midst of the Dravidian races before the Christian era, have thriven remarkably well under British rule, and may be still seen in their ancient centres maintaining themselves in haughty exclusiveness from the population among whom they live. The famous temples and palaces of the South are almost the only specimens extant of a pure Hindu architecture untouched by foreign influence. Already in Burma Their Royal Highnesses have had an opportunity of witnessing the notable part which the industrious and intelligent workmen of Madras are taking in the development of that province. In Madras itself they will find the people taking to English education with a natural aptitude to be found nowhere else in India. In respect of externals, the Hindu of Madras has evinced a decided reluctance to adopt Western models. But he has assimilated Western ideas with much success, and evidence of the fact is to be found in the high efficiency of the system of education, the notable success which has attended the development of local self-government in rural tracts, and the succession of great native officials who have risen to distinction in the Presidency. Even in the capital city, the Prince and the Princess will be able to form an estimate of the immense beneficial influence which Christian Missions have exerted on the education of the general population, and the elevation of some of the most depressed classes that are to be found anywhere in India. Representatives of three prosperous and well-governed Native States will greet them—those of old-world Cochin and Travancore, and those of the enlightened and thoroughly modern principality of Mysore.

It is a matter of congratulation that the duty of introducing Their Royal Highnesses to the various phases and interests of Madras life has fallen on an administrator so well beloved of the people of the Presidency as Lord Amphill. The extension of Lord Amphill's term of office so as to cover the period of the Royal visit was one of the happiest ideas—it is a pity that they were so few—of the late Secretary of State for India. In Lord and Lady Amphill the people of Madras have found not merely amiable and sympathetic occupants of Government House, but the truest representatives of their feelings and aspirations. Firm and resolute where wrongs had to be righted or maladministration brought to an end, Lord Amphill has won the hearts of the thirty-eight millions of people entrusted to his care, and there is universal regret in Southern India at the prospect of his impending departure. A large portion of the Presidency is occupied by zemindaris which are permanently settled, and the zemindars exercise considerable influence by virtue of their wealth and social position. Lord Amphill has always shown a tender solicitude for their well-being and dignity, and by the Act passed during his administration making their estates impartible he has done more than any previous administrator to ensure the permanence and continuity of their status and prosperity. This act of policy has evoked the deepest gratitude of the zemindars, who have shown themselves remarkably amenable to good advice during Lord Amphill's term of office. Towards the vast ryotwari population of Southern India, His Excellency's attitude has been one of great sympathy and consideration. He has gone freely among them, heard their grievances from their own lips, and by a prompt redress of them where redress was required, or by a patient explanation to them of the position and purpose of Government, impressed them with a strong belief in the justice and good intentions of the Administration. The political agitator has been inconspicuous in Madras during Lord Amphill's administration; because there was not much room left for a popular misunderstanding in regard to its objects and motives. Though they went to Madras unusually young Their Excellencies leave behind them a reputation for wisdom and sympathy which many persons of riper years may envy. The Prince and the Princess could have no better guides to the sympathy and loyalty of the Southern province than Lord and Lady Amphill.

Madras is distinguished from some of the other provinces of India by the rigour of its mofussil life. The capital city does not absorb all the best intelligence and energy of the population. One of the most obvious proofs of this peculiarity is afforded by the personnel of the Legislative Council. In Bombay, for instance, most of the members are residents of Bombay city. In Madras the districts are directly represented, and that the electors take an intelligent interest in the exercise of their privilege is shown by the fact that no single member has been allowed to sit for several successive terms in the Council. The educational and some of the oldest and most efficient of the province are located in mofussil towns.

The Presidency the labouring classes have taken to emigration quite freely. Large numbers go to Natal, chiefly from the districts of North Arcot, Madras Malabar, Chingleput, Kistna, Vizagapatam, and Godavari. Burma attracts a considerable contingent of emigrants every year. The Straits Settlements took nearly 30,000 persons last year, most of whom were from the Tanjore districts. Mauritius, the Seychelles, and Fiji are other British Colonies where the emigrant from Madras finds a profitable means of livelihood. The mass of the population being agriculturists under the ryotwari tenure the growth of co-operative habits in money matters is essential to the development of industries on a modern scale. Some forms of co-operative credit societies have proved extremely successful in Madras, but the systematic application of the principle to agricultural improvement and to industries is yet largely a work of the future. The attempts to carry out the provisions of the recent legislation of the Government of India in respect of co-operative credit societies have met with encouraging success in the province. The industries that already exist are by no means inconsiderable. The chief of them carried on in factories are cotton-ginning, coffee-curing, fish-curing, indigo-pressing, oil-pressing, printing, rice-curing, rope-making, sugar-refining, tanning, tile-and-brick making, and tobacco-curing. Besides these there are several indigenous industries such as wood and ivory-carving, brass-ware, silk-weaving and jewellery in which considerable skill is evinced by the artisans. In aluminium a new industry has been established chiefly by the exertions of Mr. Chatterton, with the support of Government. Chrome-tanning and improved hand-loom weaving are other directions in which Government have encouraged Mr. Chatterton's endeavours to further industrial progress. Besides these indications of a peaceful and flourishing province, advanced in education, contented, and loyal to the core, Their Royal Highnesses will not fail to be interested in the many monuments which Madras has to show of the earliest period of the history of England in India. If in Burma they saw the coping-stone of the Indian Empire, in Madras they will see such of its first beginnings as have escaped the ravages of time.

United India and Native States.—The Southern Presidency may or may not be benighted. But undoubtedly, in its appreciation of the beneficent effects of British Rule and in its loyalty to the Sovereign, it is by no means behind its sister Provinces. We respectfully offer our poor but none the less sincere welcome to Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, who landed on the shores of Madras yesterday afternoon. As the grandson of our first Empress, who was a sympathiser with all our joys and sorrows, and as the son of the King-Emperor, the Peace Maker of Europe, and with President McKinley the Peace Maker of the World, and as possessing in himself a truly sympathetic nature and a kind heart, we offer him and his charming Consort a cordial welcome to our city; and though it may not be possible for our future Emperor and Empress to see all sides of Madras life, nevertheless we hope our august guests will feel they are in the midst of their own people.

26TH JANUARY 1906.

Daily Graphic.—Of the many novel and picturesque experiences which the Princess of Wales has encountered in India few can have appealed more strongly to her womanly sympathies and interests than the purdah parties organised by native ladies in her honour. The regulations for the purdah party at Calcutta illustrate in a striking way the conventional limitations which bind the social lives of Hindu women of the upper classes. The object of the regulations was, of course, to protect the native ladies attending the Royal reception from the annoyance, deliberate or accidental, of a glance from any strange male eye. To this end most elaborate precautions were taken, even to the painting of skylights and the locking and screening of doors, while the arrangements for the setting down and taking up of guests remind one of the care with which the photographer conveys his sensitive plates from the dark room to the camera. It is not for us to contend that the Hindu lady loses little by the exclusion of male society; but we doubt not that even in her narrow sphere she finds numberless possibilities both of usefulness and pleasure.

Daily Telegraph.—The rest of India professes to be vastly diverted with Madras. There is no civilian so newly landed that he cannot poke his little fun at the "benighted presidency," no subaltern who does not smile at the Madras troops. All this is wholesome enough. The plain truth is that Madras has reached a pitch of security, prosperity, and efficient administration that leaves little still to be done—little, that is, while the rest of this teeming peninsula demands attention more urgently and in more elementary departments of government. Education has been carried as far in Madras as it safely can be carried—the very street boy in her capital speaks and delights in speaking English. Irrigation in other parts learned its first steps from Madras, and though the splendid systems of the Punjab are now far more gigantic and support a thousand to Madras's ten, it yet remained for the southern engineers to conceive and carry out the principle of the Periyar dam. From one end of the presidency to the other order is perfectly kept—Madras's sneerers say easily kept indeed, but is that of necessity a reproach?—save when some Moplah community sets out on its undistinguished warpath, or a religious quarrel has embittered the relations of two Saivite communities. Taxation is better distributed here, more cheerfully rendered, than elsewhere, and the actual returns are proof enough that in material prosperity Madras, the milch cow of India, is easily first among the provinces of the peninsula. Yet Anglo-India still diverts itself at the expense of the southern presidency.

It is worth while to consider this for a moment. The tendency is, as has been said, healthy enough in reality. A man's reach should exceed his grasp, or what is the light-blue ribbon of the Star of India or a seat on the Council for? Madras has long passed through that age of striving and heart-sickening anxiety in which from time to time the rest of our Asiatic Empire seems to labour still. And it is for that reason that she has ceased to be interesting. There is much to administer, there is little left to achieve. No turbulent frontier province here challenges the pluck, or character, or tact of men; no internecine quarrel between Mussulman and Hindu threatens the peace of a commissionership, no famine or plague drains the life-blood of ten thousand square miles. Her stormy youth is passed, the new battlegrounds are a thousand miles from her, and, far removed from frontier strife, Madras rests and works in peace. But she has had her jeunesse orageuse, her battlegrounds gave birth to an Empire, and there was one terrible moment when the frontiers of British India were but a gunshot from the walls of Cuddalore. If it were not encouraging to realise that upon initiative and advance the ambitions of young Anglo-India are still set as firmly as ever, there would be something sad in the fact that Clive's province is now regarded as an uninteresting backwater; if it were not true that all things are with more pleasure chased than enjoyed, there would be something ridiculous in the lesser estimation in which is held the one and only district in India that, after many years, approximates to-day to that ideal of peace and prosperity which our rule professes as its aim, and in very truth strains every nerve to secure.

Life in Madras runs on placidly, far from the uncertainty that is the core of all the enjoyment of Englishmen. The rest of the peninsula takes uncrediting example from her in almost every department of administration, and the ryot of the Ganges valley owes more contentment to the ripe experience of Madras than he will ever know or his local benefactor ever confess. With all the happiness of an unhistoried State, Madras goes its way rejoicing, but unming, and almost wholly unvisited. The ignorance of Upper India in this matter is surprising—in the Punjab or the United Provinces hardly one official in two hundred has ever journeyed to Madras, and all the average Army officer knows of the south is confined to a year or two's unwilling acquaintance with Bangalore. Yet Madras teems with interest. Apart from her history—and it is all of a piece with this ignorance that Clive remains unhonoured to-day in India by even an obelisk—the racial and architectural peculiarities of the south are far more characteristic of the inhabitants than elsewhere. Here the Mohammedan flood was stayed. Except on the sea coast, where the Gulf traders put into the quiet ports, there is little of Islam here, and caste reigns with a supremacy which is found nowhere else in India.

There is hardly a village community in the south, from the Puliahs and the Todas—outcasts from even the lowest and most despised of sweeper gatherings—to the lordly Brahmin, who walks along groaning aloud continually that all lesser men may clear away from his path, which is not full of quaint interest, Merias, thieves and descendants of men butchered on the elephant by the snake-eating Khonds; Arudras and Irulas, whose women are sufficiently married if a man allowed them a whiff from the cheroot in his mouth, or a mouthful from their dinner, perhaps of roast monkey or boiled rat; Brahmins who marry plantain trees; and men of Tanjore, who secure good harvests by swinging men from trees by a hook fixed in the muscles of the back—there is not a superstition or a caste prejudice of India which does not still flourish in Madras, despite the spread of education and the easy and full railway inter-communications which within the last few years have been almost completed in many districts. Perhaps human sacrifice may still be carried on in some remote mountain tract, for all the protestation of the neighbouring tribes; certainly, some of the customs of the Malabar coast are as unnatural, if not as inhuman. The point of view is all.

Some years ago Lord Amphil, the retiring Governor—to whom no small part of the continued and confirmed prosperity of the presidency must, in common fairness, be ascribed—tried to explain the objections which the Indian Government entertained to the "hook-swinging" practice to which reference has been made. Finding that other considerations were urged in vain, His Excellency employed the argumentum ad hominem. "How would you like to be 'hook-swung' yourself?" The reply was instant but disconcerting, "I should have no objection." The man who spoke was a man of position and reputation. In this flourishing great Eden there is still ample evidence of the vast gulf that divides not only the East from the West, but one part of the East from another. Still, in Madras there is the India that eighteenth century travellers described—unchanged, unchangeable perhaps, certainly all the healthier for being allowed free and fair play, whatever the crooked bent of custom, myth, and tradition. Men have walked over red-hot ironbars within a drive of Government House; dead daughters are still married on the Nilgiri Hills; to secure their husbands' escape the women of the Koragas still tear themselves till they faint for loss of blood; the men of the Kuravas still practise the "convade." Yet the land is no whit the worse for these follies, and the inhabitants are much the happier.

It would be difficult to point to any part of all our wide dominions where our rule has proved more beneficial, and one is at a loss whether to admire or to smile at the imitative dexterity of Roman missionaries on the South-West Coast, who still permit their converts to observe with all strictness the prejudices of their caste! For the ethnologist and the student of human nature alike there is no field like that of the tribes of Southern India, and it is the last and best testimony to our wisdom that they may be observed side by side with the prosperity and content which are too often regarded as achievable only at the cost of partial Europeanisation of those committed to our care. Dull Madras may be, but there is no such prosperity in any State as in that which has at last curtailed the chances of personal distinction, except in the dull lines of a more and more perfect Administration, and to this happiness Madras can at least lay claim.

Englishman.—At every stage in the progress of Their Royal Highnesses through Madras you are reminded that this is the virgin soil of British dominion in the East. To-day the rulers of Cochin and Pudukottai were received by the Prince. It was in Cochin that the earliest Portuguese adventurers effected a footing in the sixteenth century and duly subsequently established dominion. Haider Ali overran it in the course of a career of victory almost unchecked, until he beat himself out as many a mightier prince has done against the impenetrable wall of British stubbornness. It passed over to the dominant power when the Mahomedan dynasty in Mysore was finally extinguished, since when the restored Hindu house has maintained the smoothest relations with the paramount power. A land of palms and paddy, of spreading lagoons, and the lush of tropical vegetation which is the India of our early dreams and hopes, it holds now the reputation of a state courageous in its progressiveness and distinguished by the solidity of its administration.

Pudukottai is a State little known outside the Madras Presidency, except in connection with an enthusiasm for motoring. Yet a century and a half ago, in the days when the Madras forces were knocking unpleasantly at the gates of Trichinopoly, they were in no small measure dependent upon the Tondaman of Pudukottai for supplies. The State was again a staunch ally in the wars with Hyder, and the Poleghar campaign against the intruders into the Ganjam district. The Maharaja of Travancore was prevented from paying his devoirs to the Prince by an irritating attack of chicken-pox. Lord of the most picturesque parts of Southern India of those hills, forest and jungles, which yield the finest big game shooting outside Assam elephants, and tiger, bear and bison, his house too has an honourable record of steady loyalty to the British in their contest with Tipu. In the assemblage of chiefs and zemindars is the Prince of Arcot. The spoil of Mogul and Maratha, Laly and Coote, Arcot has a niche in Indian history whence it will never be cast down, if Clive had done nothing but defend the fort with his poor five hundred mixed troops against the ten thousand fanatics who hurled themselves against it he would still be in rank with the great Englishmen.

This afternoon His Royal Highness came into contact far more closely than on any previous occasion with the problem that really lies at the root of the Indian administration, the problem of the land, when a deputation of the Madras Landholders Association presented him with an address. The Association represents the big landed gentry of the Presidency from the zemindar with his revenue of near two hundred thousand pounds a year to the squireen with a few thousands. These are the landed capitalists to whom the Indian Government ought to be able to look for co-operation in the work of developing Indian agriculture from the primitive state in which it now is to a condition more productive, whilst still in harmony with the genius of the people. They are a stratum of the community almost unknown in the purely ryotwari tracts, but whom the framers of that system looked forward to creating in some measure by the lapse of the inefficient ryots' holdings.

But that co-operation has not been forthcoming. If we ask what part the zemindars and taluqdars and malguzars have had in improving Indian agriculture and in showing how a great Indian estate should be managed, the answer could be nothing but unflattering. On the other hand how often has this dreary cycle been repeated; a career of extravagance, culminating in hopeless debt, the interference of the Court of Wards, with the careful nursing of the estate back to prosperity and its thorough disinfection, the rendition of the estate to the heir with a fat surplus, only to find him dissipated and the whole process begins anew. Meanwhile what has been done—agricultural improvement has been accomplished by the Government unaided by the landowners. And what of the future? Looking round the large deputation one noted many rich dresses and some pleasant faces, but looked in vain for the signs of energy and character which have made the county families of England and the Junkers of Germany sources of strength to the nation, drawn from their contact with the soil.

Still the future cannot be as the past. The Madras Impartible Estates Act provides a substitute for the law of entail and prevents the splitting up of the great estates into unproductive fractions. The Madras Estates Land Bill, now under consideration, is designed to consolidate the rights of the tenant. The Bombay Government have also taken power to prevent the work of the Court of Wards from being immediately nullified. Then the steady almost unnoticed operations of the Court of Wards is gradually pushing matters forward. When an estate has been disinfected and its system braced up, though it be almost immediately reinfected with the virus of sloth and neglect, the disease cannot spread as rapidly as it did in the old decrepit body. The advance of education is also doing its part. But the Government and public opinion will demand larger common service from the great landowners than has been yielded in the past. With the extension and the enriching of their privileges will be expected a higher conception of the duties of their position.

The following is the reply of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales to the address from the Madras Landholders Association:—Gentlemen,—It is a great pleasure to the Princess of Wales and myself to have this opportunity of meeting the members of your important association, and I heartily thank you for the welcome which you offer to us. I have noticed with satisfaction your genuine feelings of devotion to the person of the Sovereign. Everywhere we have had proofs of the same loyal sentiment, but nowhere has it been more eloquently expressed than here in Southern India. I shall be very glad to communicate your assurances to the King-Emperor and to tell him that our visit to Madras has been the occasion for this enthusiastic demonstration. With you I earnestly hope that our visit to India will not be without useful results. Already the Princess and I begin to feel that we are at home and understand much that no books and no amount of study would have revealed to us. We both recognise the serious importance of our mission to India and we pray that it may be fruitful both to you and to us. I thank you most heartily for all that you have said and we both of us wish all prosperity to the members of your association.

Afterwards Their Royal Highnesses drove to Guindy, the pleasant retreat of the Governors of Madras, where they took tea with Lord and Lady Amphilil; then in the evening they were entertained by the citizens on the Island when in addition to other attractions some Khonds, a wild tribe, who live on the Maliahs in the Ganjam district, and who were brought to Madras for the first time in their history, danced.

Indian Daily News.—This morning, after the usual Mizaj Puri ceremony, the Prince received visits from the Raja of Cochin and the Raja of Pudukottai. The Princess in the meantime visited the Victoria Caste and Gosha Hospital accompanied by Lady Amphilil.

This afternoon the Prince gives an audience to the zemindars and nobles of the Presidency now in Madras, and receives an address from the Madras Landholders Association. This address, after offering a warm and cordial welcome to Their Royal Highnesses, refers to the King-Emperor's visit to India, and expresses a hope that the direct knowledge of the life and thought, the wants and aspirations of the vast and varied millions inhabiting this ancient land, which Their Royal Highnesses will gain during their tour, will bear abundant fruit when they are called to sway the destinies and guide the progress of India.

To-night an entertainment will be given by the people of the Presidency and another address will be presented.

The reception of the zemindars and the presentation of the address from the Madras Landholders Association this afternoon took place in the banqueting hall of Government House. It was a simple ceremony and was witnessed by none but those immediately interested. There were about thirty Rajas and nobles present in all their splendour of jewels and robes of purple, crimson, green and cream heavily embroidered with gold. After they had been individually presented, the Raja of Venkatagiri, President of the Landholders Association, read the address, to which the Prince replied as follows:—

Gentlemen,—It is a great pleasure to the Princess of Wales and myself to have this opportunity of meeting the members of your important Association, and I heartily thank you for the welcome which you offer to us. I have noticed with satisfaction your genuine feelings of devotion to the person of the Sovereign. Everywhere we have had proofs of the same loyal sentiment, but nowhere has it been more eloquently expressed than here in Southern India. I shall be very glad to communicate your assurances to the King-Emperor, and to tell him that our visit to Madras has been the occasion for this enthusiastic demonstration. With you, I earnestly hope that our visit to India will not be without useful results. Already the Princess and I begin to feel that we are at home, and that we understand much that no books and no amount of study would have revealed to us. We both recognise the serious importance of our mission to India, and we pray that it may be fruitful both to you and to us. I thank you most heartily for all that you have said, and we both of us wish all prosperity to the members of your Association.

At half-past four Their Royal Highnesses drove out to Guindy, where they had tea in the gardens of Government House. There large numbers of people lined the route.

After dinner to-night the Prince and Princess attended an entertainment arranged by the public of Madras where an address was presented from the people of the presidency, accompanied by a casket formed of a silver elephant mounted on a stand with mahout, howdah and furnishings. The howdah and trapping were studded with rubies. The address was inscribed by a stylus on cadjan leaves, typical of the ancient method of keeping records and religious writings. The text was read by Sir S. Subramania Aiyar, Chairman of the Committee and a Judge of the High Court. After referring to the foundation of the British Empire in India in Madras two hundred and seventy years ago and the lively satisfaction which the visit of Their Royal Highnesses had occasioned, the address stated:—“His Majesty's Indian subjects are now afforded the opportunity of testifying their loyalty, devotion and attachment to the Crown under which the inhabitants of the country live in the enjoyment of peace, prosperity, security and justice unknown to their predecessors in historic times and unexampled in the annals of great empires.” Finally Their Royal Highnesses were assured that in no part of the British dominions would be found a people more loyal to their Sovereign and more devoted to the Prince and Princess.

The route to the island where the entertainment took place was decorated with ropes of greenery and flowers, and the island was splendidly illuminated. The entertainment was of a purely native character, and included a performance by Khonds, a wild tribe from the Ganjam district who had never before been seen in Madras.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—"Max" writes in Capital:—

Our late Tibetan visitors went away highly delighted with their stay in Calcutta. All the retinue of His Serenity the Tashi Lama were well provided with toys to take back with them to their children in Tibet. These toys, as I mentioned before, were purchased with the money sent to Capital Toy Fund by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and his staff, so the Tibetans are charged with the message to their bairns that each toy is a direct gift from the Prince of Wales. The articles were distributed amongst the men a few days before they left, and created such delight and amusement in the camp that Mr. J. Claude White, the Political Officer, Sikkim, through whom the toys were distributed, when sending his thanks for the gifts, naively adds that he is afraid from the manner in which the elders are taking to the toys themselves, that some of them will not reach the youngsters for whom they were intended. A large sprinkling of mechanical toys were sent, working models of railway engines and trains, steam-ships, motor cars and tramears, war-vessels, etc., etc., so that the fathers in describing many of the things they saw will be able to illustrate their descriptions with object-lessons. Altogether we have reason to be proud of the recent peaceful Tibet Mission. Nothing but good can come out of it.

Madras Mail.—We referred in our leading article yesterday to the arrival of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales and to the preparations made for Their Royal Highnesses' reception on landing from H. M. S. Renown. The whole official programme was carried through with admirable order and precision; and there was not a contretemps of any kind from beginning to end. Indeed, the excellence of the arrangements formed the subject of conversation everywhere; and the authorities, especially those officials upon whom the chief burden of the various preparations devolved, are heartily to be congratulated on the success of the whole ceremony. A prettier sight could not be imagined than the spacious decorated reception pandal in the Harbour premises, looking out upon the shipping, with the afternoon sun throwing a brilliant glow over everything, and a cool, gentle breeze blowing from the sea. The leading motif of it all was the sea, which the Prince loves so well; and it was to the accompaniment of the soft, murmurous lapping of the tide waves on the sands that His Royal Highness listened to the Corporation's loyal Address and graciously replied to the same. His Royal Highness, as usual, struck the appropriate note in his reply, referring to our "old historic city", the "oldest possession and oldest Municipality in British India."

It was not, however, until Their Royal Highnesses left the reception pandal and proceeded in procession to Government House that the masses of people had their chance of welcoming the Royal visitors. Never before has Madras witnessed such dense crowds; and along the whole route thousands upon thousands in packed masses had been waiting patiently for many hours. Thanks to the length of the route and to the spaciousness of the thoroughfares chosen, there was room even for such a huge crowd, and the lowliest cooly could enjoy at any rate a glimpse of the future Emperor and his Consort. It was, too, a good-humoured crowd as well as a patient one; and the Police arrangements throughout, both at the Harbour and along the Royal route, were carried through without difficulty of any kind. The only thing that jarred a little was the hasty tawdriness of some of the decorations; but the heavy rain of last week must bear some of the blame for that. The day's proceedings fittingly ended with the levée at the Banqueting Hall, at which an unprecedentedly large number of gentlemen were present to pay their homage to His Royal Highness.

It will be seen from telegrams which we publish to-day that the visit of Their Royal Highnesses is being celebrated in many up-country towns also.

Mr. C. V. Swaminathaiyar informs us that he submitted a copy of his letter, proposing that Black Town should in future be called George Town (which appeared in our issue of the 22nd instant) to His Excellency the Governor, who has replied as follows through his Private Secretary:—"I am desired by His Excellency to inform you that he thinks the suggestion made in your letter a very good one. But before anything further is done, His Royal Highness's pleasure must be ascertained." We have no doubt that His Royal Highness will be agreeable to the rechristening of Black Town with a name so appropriate to the present occasion.

Madras Mail.—As announced in a brief note in our last issue a deputation of Madras landholders, headed by the Raja of Venkatagiri, waited on His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales at the Banqueting Hall yesterday evening. His Excellency Lord Amphil introduced to His Royal Highness the Raja, who, in his capacity as President, read the following Address:—

May it please Your Royal Highness,—We, the members of the Madras Landholders Association, most respectfully beg to offer to Your Royal Highness and to your beloved Consort, Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, our most loyal and heartfelt welcome to the capital of the Southern Presidency. The gracious visit to this country, thirty years ago, of your illustrious father, our present King-Emperor, then Prince of Wales, at the wish of the great and noble Queen-Empress Victoria of revered memory, is still fresh with its many pleasurable associations in the hearts of those who had the privilege of witnessing and participating in the functions connected with it. The present generation enjoying the blessings of His Majesty's direct rule rejoices that the happy precedent of the future Sovereign of the Empire visiting this distant Dependency has been now followed, and cherishes with equal esteem and pride the privilege it now has of according to Your Royal Highness a hearty and joyous welcome and expressing its allegiance and devotion to the Throne. The Hindu community is justly commended for its instinctive reverence and attachment to the person of the Sovereign, enjoined alike by its ancient religion and by its cherished traditions, and the whole of the Indian Empire, which is so truly described as the brightest jewel in the British Crown, naturally delights to give expression on this happy occasion to its deepest and most abiding sentiments of love and loyalty to its future Sovereign. We would assure Your Royal Highness and Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales that the welcome we offer, though it may fail to attain the splendour and magnificence with which Your Royal Highnesses have been greeted in other parts of the Empire, yields to none in its warmth or genuineness. We hope and trust that the direct knowledge of the life and thought, of the wants and aspirations of the vast and varied millions inhabiting this ancient land which Your Royal Highness will doubtless gain during the present tour, may bear abundant fruit when, in the fulness of time, Your Royal Highness is called to the high and arduous responsibility of swaying her destinies and guiding her progress. In conclusion, we beg once more to offer Your Royal Highnesses our warm and cordial welcome, and we fervently pray that God may shower on Your Royal Highnesses His choicest blessings and that Your Highnesses may carry with you pleasant and happy recollections of your sojourn in this country and of our loyalty and attachment to the Imperial Throne.

The Address was enclosed in a casket which was of a unique design. It was mounted on an ebony plinth 4½ in. high, and in the centre of the plinth a silver plate was fixed bearing the inscription "Presented to Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales during their Visit to Madras, January, 1906."

The casket proper is 14 in. high and 21 in. long of solid silver. There are also four panel scenes from Indian life on either side of the casket beautifully finished. On the front is represented a field in course of cultivation. On the opposite side of the casket the scene consists of a paddy field with a native village in the distance. On either end of the casket are scenes from the Ramayana, one representing the return of Sri Rama from Mithila after his marriage ceremony and his reception by his people, and the other portraying his coronation and ascension to the throne. The lid of the casket is exceedingly handsome and the four corners of it are set off with the Prince of Wales's feathers, in solid silver, and two doves, each holding an olive spray, are beautifully mounted on either side of a gilded crown on a Maltese cross which surmounts a wealth of fluted and scroll silver work and adds the finishing touch to one of the prettiest caskets that has been presented. The casket was designed and manufactured by Messrs T. R. Tawker and Son, the well-known firm of jewellers and silversmiths, of Mount Road.

His Royal Highness made the following reply:—

Gentlemen,—It is a great pleasure to the Princess of Wales and myself to have this opportunity of meeting the members of your important Association, and I heartily thank you for the welcome which you offer to us. I have noticed with satisfaction your genuine feelings of devotion to the person of the Sovereign. Everywhere we have had proofs of the same loyal sentiment, but nowhere has it been more eloquently expressed than here in Southern India. I shall be very glad to communicate your assurances to the King-Emperor, and to tell him that our visit to Madras has been the occasion for this enthusiastic demonstration. With you I earnestly hope that our visit to India will not be without useful results. Already the Princess and I begin to feel that we are at home, and that we understand much that no books and no amount of study would have revealed to us. We both recognise the serious importance of our mission to India, and we pray that it may be fruitful both to you and to us. I thank you most heartily for all that you have said, and we both of us wish all prosperity to the members of your Association.

At His Royal Highness's request, the Raja explained the special features of the beautiful casket which was examined with interest by the Prince. At the conclusion of proceedings the deputation took leave of His Royal Highness and withdrew. His Royal Highness with his Staff and His Excellency Lord Amphthill retired to Government House.

Very large crowds of spectators assembled on the island yesterday evening to have another glimpse of Their Royal Highnesses as they drove past to Guindy, as had been originally arranged. But the drive to Guindy had been abandoned and Their Royal Highnesses resolved to proceed to the Adyar and return to Government House along the Marina. Hence the start from Government House was delayed to a hour later, but this did not seem to tire the patience of the assembled people. Shortly after 5-30 p.m. the Royal Party left Government House. In the first carriage drove His Royal Highness with Her Excellency Lady Amphthill, while Her Royal Highness with Lord Amphthill followed in the next carriage. They were greeted with continued outbursts of applause as they drove along the route.

It was just growing dusk as Their Royal Highnesses reached San Thomé which was gaily decorated and beautifully illuminated, but as the Royal Party arrived at the northern end of the Marina a very pretty sight awaited them. The whole length of the seaface right up to the Senate House was one blaze of lights. Over a hundred catamarans had been engaged and illuminations and fireworks were displayed from these. The public buildings on the Marina, namely, the Office of the Inspector-General of Police, the Presidency College, the Chepauk Palace and the Senate House, were all illuminated, while the statue of Her Majesty the late Queen Victoria was beautifully decorated. Their Royal Highnesses, going down the Marina, turned into Government House through the Chepauk Park gate.

By seven o'clock yesterday evening the Mount Road began to be lit up, and as the various establishments proceeded to display their illuminations, the scene became very bright and impressive. For sheer brilliancy there was nothing to touch Messrs. Spencer and Co.'s show. Many thousand small lamps must have been employed, for the whole of the lengthy front to the compound, as well as round the corner was a mass of light, and there was a fire-engine in front in case of anything going wrong. In various coloured lights appeared the design "God Bless the Prince and Princess of Wales" and five or six large Washington lamps, hung from the building itself, fully lighted the interior of the compound. Messrs. Addison & Co.'s illuminations were modest but specially pretty, and included a large plume of the usual feathers in bright small lights. Messrs. Venkiah Brothers were great in the line of handsome Chinese lanterns, and in short nearly all the large business establishments had spared no trouble or expense to show their loyalty. Messrs. Higginbotham & Co., Tawker & Co., and D'Angelis and Son, and amongst smaller firms the Carnatic Warehouse, were noticeable, whilst Messrs. Maclure & Co. greeted the Prince of Wales in his title of the Duke of Rothesay. Practically all classes were represented in the vast crowds who thronged the streets, and the Eurasian community was especially in much evidence. The applause became frequent as the various Native Princes and Rajas drove past the lines of the people towards the Island. As the Island Bridge was approached, the crowd of carriages increased, and slowed down to a walk as they passed Government House gates and began to cross the bridge over the Coom. Still however, excellent order was maintained, and while the Police are to be congratulated on the result of their efforts in this direction, the people themselves also deserve a word of praise. Messrs. Oakes & Co.'s premises, showing three brilliant stars of lights, were about the last of the illuminations upon the Mount side of the Island Bridge, but coming round to the Central Station there was a really fine sight, the high Clock Tower being lighted up to the very summit, and the whole face of the station being picked out with myriads of twinkling lights. Here and there too, in even the poorer native shops, there were small but loyal attempts at illumination. To return to the Mount Road for a brief space, it must be remarked that there were one or two notable exceptions amongst the shops to the general rule of illuminations, and there was also one shop which had included the curious ornaments of swinging puppet figures amongst its decorations. But nevertheless the general effect was very fine and undoubtedly Madras rose to the occasion. It was interesting to see the attraction which two transparencies representing the King-Emperor and Her late Majesty Queen Victoria had for the native population, for there was a constant crowd round these two, although the decorations of this particular shop as a whole were comparatively modest. In the Black Town quarter the illuminations were generally not so brilliant as those on the Mount Road, but still they were to be seen and were in many cases sufficiently tasteful. The traffic in these portions of the town was perhaps more troublesome than in the more crowded Mount Road, for here the energetic Policemen were not so numerous and the indifferent jukawallah had more chance of making a nuisance of himself. But with this exception the proceedings may be pronounced a great success.

The Island which was the scene of the public entertainment was encircled by myriads of twinkling lights which in the distance merged into one another and became a belt of flame. Scattered about its extensive area were huge beacon towers, always a feature of such illuminations. Artistic and very effective was the grouping together on the fronts of date palmas and in other ways of Chinese lanterns. Swaying, in the breeze, the scene was altogether charming. We are afraid, however, that the majority of those who were assembled at the pavillion missed the most striking feature of the illuminations. We refer to the Victory, Captain Taylor's masterpiece, and the other floating structures on the Cooum, which, last night at least, contributed to the pleasure of Madras without asserting its odoriferous existence.

The public entertainment to Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales on the Island last night will long be remembered as one of the most brilliant functions ever held in Madras. For some time past the Reception Committee had been at work erecting a specially fine pavillion for the purpose, and the building of this structure was left entirely in the hands of Mr. M. Venkatasawmy Naidu. The recent rains completely marred the progress of the work, and the Committee was almost in despair when the Island became flooded last week and the pandal was under three feet of water. When the rains ceased, however, the work was resumed with renewed activity and a truly magnificent pavillion was completed in a marvellously short space of time. There was no special design given by the Committee, but the whole idea was left to Mr. Venkatasawmy Naidu. Looked at externally there is nothing very striking in its appearance, but the wealth of its beauty lies in the interior. It is a crescent-shaped structure with masonry foundation and measures 145 feet by 35 feet. The roofing is supported by solid masonry columns, thus reminding one of the great Tirumala Naick's Palace at Madura. The Royal centre which is supported by eight columns has a most exquisite background of elaborate mica work resembling a throne. The columns were painted light blue with gilded dado work at the bottom, and they are decorated with specially appropriate shields and flags. The roofing was beautifully draped in white and encircled with effective mica decorations. Six exceedingly handsome curtains of similar workmanship were put up on the sides and these looked very attractive and pretty. The lighting in this part of the amphitheatre is supplied by fifteen grand chandeliers. The flooring was covered with Japanese matting and a very fine suite of furniture was provided for the accommodation of the Royal Party. The furniture for the other sides of the amphitheatre has been specially manufactured for the occasion, and has been upholstered so as to secure uniformity of colour. These portions of the pavillion were lighted by acetylene gas lamps, while outside there were Washington lights all round at intervals. Directly in front of that portion of the pavillion allotted for the Royal guests, on an octagonal masonry foundation, a nice little stage was erected for the Indian theatrical performances. A unique feature of the entertainment which was purely Indian in character was a performance by the Khonds, a wild tribe who live in Malahs of the Ganjam district, and who appear in Madras for the first time, having been specially brought down to provide one of the most interesting and novel items in the programme. These curious aboriginal hillmen grotesquely clad, with buffalo horns attached to their heads, armed with bows and arrows and thangis, their battle-axe, went through a weird dance apparently intended to illustrate faction fight between two sections of the tribe in days gone by. A touch of realism was imparted to the exhibition by the weird howls with which they ushered themselves into the arena. They performed with great gusto and refused to stop till the young Civilian, who was in charge of them, used his influence and induced them to withdraw, not, however, before His Royal Highness had inspected their weapons. The elderly Mahomedan with the performing parrots is a well-known itinerant performer in Madras. He has now performed before Royalty and has nothing more to wish for. The feats of swordsmanship and acrobatic performances are familiar to the majority of our readers, but they attracted more than passing attention from the Royal guests. The services of Rama Moorti, the Indian Sandow, were also requisitioned by the Reception Committee, and he gave a short but very convincing proof of his strength, balancing on his chest a granite block of over 3,000lbs. in weight while his attendants smote it with hammers. Magic and conjuring were done by Swaminatha Sastriar, a well-known performer, and the Surabish Brothers. The former gave a curious exhibition of archery with his feet. We must not omit to mention the sanscrit songs with Indian musical accompaniment, specially composed and sung in honour of Their Royal Highnesses, nor the short but very clever mnemonic performance of Ranganatha Tatha Chariar, of Conjeevaram. A brilliant display of fireworks brought a most successful entertainment to a close. The illuminations and the fireworks, which were unusually splendid, attracted a record crowd not only on the Island but in the neighbourhood, so much so that locomotion, not to say wheeled traffic, was impeded for a considerable time after the performance was over. The Police, who were specially reinforced, did their best to keep order, but with the departure of the Royal Party and the Governor and Lady Amphil, the crowd apparently got beyond their powers of control, and much confusion prevailed.

Long before the appointed hour the pavillion was filled with a gay and fashionable assemblage. Their Excellencies the Governor and Lady Amphil arrived quietly and were followed, a few minutes later, by Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, who arrived in State and drove up to the front of the pavillion escorted by the Body Guard and Gordon's Horse. They were received by the Committee, headed by Sir S. Subramania Iyer, the Chairman.

Madras Mail.—His Excellency the Governor presented the members of the Reception Committee and then Sir S. Subramania Iyer read the Presidency Address, which was as follows:—

Your Royal Highnesses.—With feelings of the deepest loyalty and the liveliest pleasure we, the inhabitants of the Presidency of Madras, and of the territories of Travancore, Cochin and Pudukotta, welcome Your Royal Highnesses to the shores of Southern India. In the historic Fort, named after the Patron Saint of England, whose walls and ramparts were visible to Your Royal Highnesses from the sea, were laid the first foundations of British Empire in India, close on two hundred and seventy years ago. Although our Presidency City has somewhat declined in relative importance since that first epoch, yielding some of its original status to the other Presidency Cities, more fortunately situated on the busier highways of commerce, we may still point to a remarkable and continued growth in our population and trade under the benign and peaceful auspices of the British Government. In common with the many millions of His Most Gracious Majesty's loyal subjects in British India we heard with joy of Your Royal Highnesses's intention to visit this great Dependency of the British Empire and to complete thereby Your Royal Highnesses's personal acquaintance with the British Dominions beyond the Seas, so happily and successfully begun during Your Royal Highnesses's prolonged tour in 1901. Your Royal Highnesses's present visit to India affords one more proof of the deep concern and lively interest which Your Royal Highnesses evince in the progress and welfare of His Majesty the King-Emperor's subjects throughout the British Dominions; and at the same time it brings to us the best assurance of the goodwill felt by His Majesty towards the people of this country. Furthermore, it affords to the many millions of His Majesty's Indian subjects an opportunity of seeing with their own eyes, in their country, their future Sovereign, and of testifying to their loyalty, devotion and attachment to the British Crown, under which the inhabitants of this country live in the enjoyment of peace and prosperity and security and justice unknown to their predecessors in historic times, and unexampled in the annals of great Empire. We beg that Your Royal Highnesses will convey to His Most Gracious Majesty, and accept for yourselves the expression of our loyal devotion to the Throne, our affectionate attachment to the Royal Family, and our heartfelt appreciation of the many blessings conferred on this country by British rule. From our hearts we the inhabitants of the Presidency of Madras, bid Your Royal Highnesses welcome, and in conclusion we would beg to assure Your Royal Highnesses that in no part of the British Dominions will be found a people more loyal to their Sovereign and more devoted to yourselves.

His Royal Highness, in replying, said:—

Gentlemen,—I was very glad to hear from your Governor, Lord Amptill, that I should have an opportunity of meeting you, the representatives of the great Presidency of Madras, and of the States of Travancore, Cochin and Pudukotta. On behalf of the Princess of Wales and myself I tender you our sincere thanks for the warm-hearted Address which has just been read. We both of us do feel a "deep concern" and "lively interest" in all that affects the welfare of our fellow-subjects. We fully realise the privilege which we are now enjoying of seeing these distant parts of the Empire, and are most grateful for the affectionate manner in which Southern India has greeted us. It is a great regret to both of us that we are unable to visit others of your famous Cities, or to stay in some of the States. We have read of Trichinopoly, Tanjore and Madura, and of the charms of Travancore and Cochin. But time will not admit of our stay in India being prolonged, and it is for this reason that we are so glad to have had the chance of seeing you this evening. We shall be most grateful if you will tell your friends when you return home that your Address in no way exaggerates the interest and love which we have for this great country and its people.

Madras Mail.—Yesterday was a comparatively busy day for Their Royal Highnesses as from midday onwards there was always some function demanding their presence and attention.

At 10-30 the ancient and dignified ceremony of Mizaj Parsi or enquiring after a distinguished guest's comfort and welfare was performed on behalf of the Rajas of Cochin and Pudukotta by members of their suites. Satisfactory assurances having been given, the deputations withdrew.

The same two native rulers paid State visits to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. Mr. A. Y. G. Campbell and an Aide-de-Camp of the Prince's Staff proceeded to Pulloche's Garden, the residence of the Raja of Cochin to conduct him to Government House. The Raja was accompanied by Mr. J. Andrew, the Resident, the Dewan and other members of his suite. Similar ceremonies were observed in connection with the visit of the Raja of Pudukotta who was accompanied by Mr. Alan Butterworth, I.C.S., and his Dewan. The 88th C.I. furnished the Guard-of-Honour, and the usual salutes were fired.

At 3 p.m., His Royal Highness granted audiences, at the Banqueting Hall, to the following Rajas, Zemindars and nobles who had been invited by the Government to Madras in connection with the Royal visit:—The Maharaja of Bobbili, the Maharaja of Jeypore, the Raja of Venkatagiri, the Raja of Vizianagram, the Raja of Kalahasti, the Raja of Pittapuram, the Raja of Karvetnugger, the Raja of Ramnad, the Valiva Raja of Chirakkal, the Erlapad Raja of Calicut, the Valiva Raja of Kadathanad, the Valiva Raja of Walunanad, the Raja of Kallikote and Attagada, the Raja of Kolengode, Raja Ranga Appa Row of Wuyyur, the Zemindar of Ettayaram, the Zemindar of Sivagunga, the Zemindar of Parlakimedi, the Zemindar of Mandusa, the Zemindar of Dharakota, the Zemindar of Punganur, the Zemindar of Kangundi, the Jagirdar of Arni, the Zemindar of Oodayarpolliem, the Zemindar of Devarakota, the Zemindar of South Valur, the Zemindar of Bhadrachellam, the Zemindar of Kurupam and the Raja of Anagundi. The Zemindars having taken their seats in the Hall, His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, accompanied by His Excellency the Governor, entered and having taken his seat on the dais, the Zemindars were led up in turn by Mr. L. M. Wynch, Private Secretary to His Excellency the Governor, and Mr. A. Y. G. Campbell, the Assistant Secretary in the Political Department, and His Excellency the Governor made the presentations. The Tamil, Telugu and Malayalam Translators to Government were present to act as 'Interpreters' for such of the Chiefs as could not speak English.

Afterwards the Madras Landholders Deputation, comprising the following members, presented their Address:—The Maharaja of Bobbili, the Maharaja of Jeypore, the Raja of Venkatagiri, Raja Appa Row of Wuyyur, the Zemindar of Mandasa, the Zemindar of Kangundi, the Zemindar of Oodayarpolliem, the Zemindar of Devarakota, the Zemindar of Kurupam, the Zemindar of Pollavaram, the Zemindar of Thintalapattivonta and the Zemindar of Chunampet.

A slight change was made in the programme for yesterday. The drive to Government House, Guindy, was abandoned for the shorter route by the Adyar to San Thomé whence Their Royal Highnesses proceeded to the Marina to Government House.

Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales paid a visit to the Royal Hospital for Caste and Gosha Women, situated in Triplicane, at 11-30 a.m. yesterday. Her Royal Highness was accompanied by Her Excellency Lady Amptill and drove up to the Hospital from Government House in a carriage and pair escorted by a detachment of His Excellency the Governor's Body Guard. The Hospital was very neatly decorated with foliage plants, and at the entrance a maroon valance draped the steps. Her Royal Highness the Princess and Her Excellency Lady Amptill were received here by the Superintendent, Mrs. Winckler-King, M.D., and led into the Visitors' Room, where the Princess inspected the photographs of Ladies Dufferin, Grant-Duff and others. Lady Bashyam Iyengar's Delivery Ward was first visited and the Lying-in Ward, which is adjacent, was inspected. In the Mahomedan Gosha Ward, to which Her Royal Highness was next taken, the Princess appeared much struck with the rich series of the patients. The Ladies' (Paying) Ward was next visited and here the peculiarity of the jewellery worn by the rich Brahmin ladies attracted the Princess's attention. Her Royal Highness next walked into the Operation Room and admired the new glass operation table just presented by Mr. P. Masilamony Mudaliar, the well-known contractor. Her Royal Highness was then conducted downstairs to the Hindu ward and inquired into the nature of each patient's case, the length of time they have been in Hospital, etc. The Princess expressed her sympathy with all the patients through the Superintendent. She was much pleased with Hospital and noticed with approval the large numbers of the higher classes who sought admission to it. The Princess made an entry in the Visitors' Book and promised to send a copy of her photograph to the Hospital.

The visit was marred by an unfortunate accident which occurred just as Her Royal Highness arrived. The road opposite the Hospital was densely crowded and one of the horses of one of the Mounted Police kicked a little Brahmin boy in the face. The lad was brought into hospital and taken to the outpatient's dressing room, where he was examined by Mrs. Winckler-King, the Superintendent, in the presence of Her Royal Highness and Lady Amptill. After examination, the lad was, as a special case, attended to and detained as an inpatient. Her Royal Highness seemed much distressed by the accident and frequently while going round the Wards made enquiries of the Superintendent as to whether the accident was of a serious nature and expressed regret as its occurrence. After Her Royal Highness had returned to Government House she sent the Surgeon to His Excellency the Governor to see the boy. We are glad to be able to announce that the injuries are not of a serious nature, and the boy is being carefully looked after.

By command of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales a fireworks display will take place from H.M.S. Hyacinth and H.M.S. Fox to-morrow commencing at 9.30 p.m.

During Wednesday's memorable scenes, photographers, amateur and professional, were very busy all along the route taken by the Royal procession, and many excellent snap-shot must have been taken. The arrival of H.M.S. Renown and Terrible afforded particularly striking views, as did the saluting by H.M.S. Hyacinth and Fox in the Harbour. Mr. W. A. Forshaw, the photographer on the Mount Road, has favoured us with copies of several excellent views which he took of these scenes from the top of the Madras Bank, whence a splendid view of the Harbour and its approach is obtainable. Two 15 x 12 photographs show the Renown at anchor in the Harbour and the Terrible entering, while other smaller views depict the Hyacinth and Fox firing the Royal salute, the Renown entering the Harbour, the Terrible swinging round to anchor, and other scenes—all are very sharp and clear and forming admirable mementoes of a memorable occasion.

Madras Mail.—In honour of the Royal visit the town of Waluwanad was profusely decorated; 2,000 poor were given doles of rice and all the officials, Vakil and townsmen in gala dress witnessed the distribution. Three hundred school children were given a treat.

The Royal Visit was celebrated at Ottapalam by the poor being fed, the school boys being treated, prayers being offered and a procession. The Coronation Reading Room was opened with much ceremony.

On Wednesday about 1,000 poor were fed at Anantapur the needy clothed and all school children were fêted in honour of the arrival at Madras of the Prince and Princess of Wales. The public have had a day of great rejoicing.

The Royal visit to Madras was celebrated warmly at Coondapoor. Rice and coppers were distributed to the poor: sports were held and the prizes were distributed by Mrs. Brown. The assembly was photographed and entertained with music. A special song was then sung by the girls. The President, Mr. Lancashire, made a speech which was followed by the National Anthem and three hearty cheers for Their Royal Highnesses. The proceedings closed with the distribution of sweets to the children.

The celebration in British Tangacherri in honour of the Royal visit to Madras was a splendid success. The programme consisted of the despatch of a telegram of welcome, and a meeting of the inhabitants, music, sports, a torchlight procession, a treat to school children, a variety entertainment and fireworks. The town was brilliantly illuminated.

The celebration of the Royal Visit at Calicut was a great success and the Joint Secretary of the Celebration Committee despatched the following telegram yesterday to Sir Walter Lawrence:—"The people of Malabar tender a loyal and respectful welcome to Their Royal Highnesses on arrival in the Madras Presidency. The happy and historic event is being celebrated to-day throughout the District.

Standard.—The peoples of India are, speaking generally, a docile and peaceable folk. The great majority of them are averse to strife and bloodshed in any form. They do not like killing man or other animals, even in self-defence or for food. Most of them are habitual vegetarians; many are forbidden by their religion to take life under any circumstances. Though Buddhism was driven out of the peninsula by the Brahmans, it left its impress upon the dominant sect, in a dislike to violence in any form. The "mild Hindu" is not a mere figment of the imagination. The Hindu, when excited, can become wild rather than mild. But, taken in the mass, he is assuredly not a first-class fighting man. He will endure oppression, or endeavour to counter it by subtlety and craft, rather than resent it openly. His tendency is to obey authority even when wrongly exercised. In fact, he is a highly governable person.

If it were not so, our task would be difficult to the verge of impossibility. As it is, though we hold India by force, that force itself is, in point of numbers, almost contemptible. The Indian army is much the smallest in the world in comparison with the size of the country. In Germany there is one soldier, actual or potential, for about every twenty civilians, women and children included; in France there is one among twelve; even in the United Kingdom at least one person in forty or fifty has been drilled, more or less, to the use of arms. The population of India is close on 300 millions, and the troops of the King-Emperor, Imperial Service Corps, and all total up to some 250,000; that is to say, one soldier for every twelve hundred of persons. Naturally, the military profession is not much in evidence in the greater part of the peninsula. It is as if the army, let us say, of Belgium or Switzerland had to do duty for the whole of Europe, excluding Russia, from Lapland to Sicily. There are large tracts of India, where a soldier is never seen, and there must be millions of peasants who do not set eyes on a military uniform from one year's end to another. Yet the experts assure us that these unguarded tracts are perfectly safe, and that over the greater part of them rebellion is as unlikely as it would be in Bedfordshire, and a serious disturbance beyond the power of the police to handle almost equally improbable. We keep a few troops in cantonments near the large cities, where there are European residents and a possibly turbulent mob; and even this is thought by many soldiers to be a superfluous sacrifice to the tragic memories of the Mutiny. The New School would like to take them away from the encervating plains altogether, trusting to the railway to truck them down again when needed and quartering the troops upon the frontier and the districts adjacent where the great wars of the mastery of India will be waged in future as they have been waged in the past.

It is, then, to the far North-West that you must go to see the Anglo-Indian Army, and the men who hold the sword of Britain in the East. You see it best of all near the point of the blade, the tongue of land thrust up into the mountains from which the invaders of India have dropped. Peshawar lies a little back from the extremity, a town of soldiers, and where the soldier rules. Elsewhere the civilian bureaucrat is omnipotent; here he is subordinate to the warrior caste. The Chief Commissioner of the North-West Frontier Province is a military officer, and so are his principal assistants. For the whole district is like a fortress with the ramparts manned, or like a ship of war cleared for action. Even in peace time it is always on guard. There is a simmer of unrest in the very air, and you feel it as you come up from the busy, tranquil, toiling Hindustan down below. The moral change is as great as the physical, and that is marked enough. In this far northern region we come back to the northern winter. There is a savage bite in the frost-laden morning wind which sets you longing for the open grates and blazing hearth-fires of home; and though the sun comes out strongly for an hour or two at midday, the mercury runs down thirty degrees at dusk, and in your tent or draughty bungalow you shiver under all your rugs and blanket. The unwary voyager, coming out with only thin flannels, to match his conception of the Indian climate at all seasons, finds himself hurrying to the bazaar, and is thankful for the pothin—the coat of sheep-skin and embroidered yellow leather—which he can buy for a few rupees.

It is a country that straightens a man's back and strings up his muscles. There is no softness in the town, the people, and the atmosphere of Peshawar. We have left the region of bright colours and smooth faces behind us, the gay cotton robes, the green and orange, and crimson turbans of Rajputana, the shrewd Marwari merchants and the sleek Hindu tradesmen. When the Prince of Wales held his first reception at Peshawar we had a scene till then unfamiliar to us in India. Here was no galaxy of corpulent notables, shining in silks and broadcated satins, and hung round with jewels. The border chiefs, who offered their packet of gold coins, or put forward their sword-hilts for the Prince to touch, did not make a decorative group, if judged by their costumes. Most of the Chiefs were plainly, some were even shabbily, dressed, and they stumbled into the Royal presence, these wild men of the hills, with none of the self-confident ease of the down-country Rajas. I noticed that not one of them paid the least attention to the Royal Lady sitting beside the Prince; indeed, they seemed too nervous to salute her, though, perhaps, being all Mahomedans, they might have deemed it contrary to etiquette to recognise her presence in any way. They looked as if they would have been far more in their element leading their tribesmen in a foray against a neighbouring clan, or lurking among the rocks to cut off a convoy. Both occupations are familiar to most of them. Several were concerned more or less directly in the great tribal rising of 1897, when all the Marches were aflame.

Just now our frontier officials have a good understanding with the Chiefs, who are helping to guard the passes through the mountains, and are doing their best to keep their people from interfering with traders and travellers. Yet the peace of the Border is fitful and precarious. At the very moment when the Prince was at Peshawar two of the tribes were at war, though they had very courteously agreed on a week's truce so that His Royal Highness might not be incommoded in his journey through the Khyber Pass. In our passage along that famous defile we could see the little shelter trenches up the hill-side which the belligerents had dug for the greater convenience of pursuing their war-like operations. And on the night before our arrival a British picket, not many miles distant, had been attacked (probably by a band of raiders out on a rifle-stealing expedition) and four Sepoys had been wounded. On the Border they lie down to sleep with their weapons ready to hand, English and natives alike; for one never knows what may happen in this wild region. When the Prince drove through the streets of Peshawar to the Ghor Kattri, where General Avitabile, in the days of Ranjit Singh, used to have his weekly hangings, the streets were guarded by the Black Watch, the Gordons, and the 37th Dogras. The Highlanders and the Hindu soldiers stood in a close line, and behind them were rows of tall Pathans, gaunt and bony, with keen eyes and vulturine Semitic beaks. There was not much saluting, and no shouting and cheering at all; but the Mountaineers gazed with frank and friendly curiosity on the son of the King, whose uniforms had not infrequently been the mark for their jezails.

Peshawar, indeed, with its quietly respectful crowd, and its windows hung with waxcloths and carpets of local manufacture, seemed loyal enough. But the soldiers had ball-cartridge in their pouches, and the people were kept sternly from coming too near the edge of the pavement. An Afghan Musulman may go Ghazi at any moment. When he does so, he becomes the most dangerous creature that walks the earth—not so much a lunatic as a demoniac, under the influence of an irresistible hypnotic suggestion which impels him first to kill an infidel and then to get killed himself, in order that he may go straight to Paradise. Even when the Border in a general way is quite tranquil, an isolated Ghazi may break out and destroy a valuable life or two before he can be shot or knocked on the head like a mad dog, which is the only way to deal with him. An officer of one of the local corps told me that he never took the short ride from Peshawar to Jamrud, which is British territory and ordinarily undisturbed, without a loaded revolver on his person; for a Ghazi might pop out even there and he did not wish to afford the public the undignified spectacle of a British officer bolting before a screaming fanatic. Against the Ghazi the white man, unprovided with firearms, has no chance. He can only run away.

So the Prince and Princess were well guarded all the time they were on the frontier. Even at the garden party in the grounds of Government House precautions were unobtrusively observed. It was odd to notice that the attendants and Royal servants were armed, at what was otherwise a very English seeming entertainment. The cantonments of Peshawar are among the most delightful in India, with their wide avenues lined with trees that keep their greenery in this northern climate, and their bungalows set in gardens where the English flowers bloom.

It is strange to pass from the pleasant umbrageous suburbs to the Mahomedan city, with its flat-roofed houses of sun-dried brick, looking down from loop-hole windows and jealously latticed casements upon the stream of mixed Asian humanity—Afghan, Afridi, Tartar, Mongolian—flowing through the narrow streets and dark alleys in which a European is warned that it is wiser not to walk after dusk.

Whenever you cast your eyes upwards in the cantonments or the streets of Peshawar, the dragon-teeth of the hills are before you. From the gate of the Ghor Kattri, or the roof of the barracks, or the bastions of the fortress, the mountain barrier fronts you, grey-green in the morning, golden brown in the day, glowing with rose and reddened umber at sunset; and Peshawar is a historic city because it faces the breach in that wall of sandstone and shales by which the men of the north have been marching upon the plains of India since history began. The Scythian, the Tartar, the Arab, the Moghul, the Persian have come that way. The Afghan perhaps the Muscovite, would swoop through it to-morrow if the sentinels of Peshawar were withdrawn.

Yet there is little to see in the Khyber, and no memorial of all the triumphant or dejected pilgrims who have traversed its stony sands. From Peshawar the railway leads across some dozen miles of rough pasture and arable land, which is dead level plain to the very foot of the hills. Here stands the Fort of Jamrud, looking like a great battleship anchored at the mouth of the dangerous strait. The road, which English engineers have made, goes winding up between barren hills, treeless and bare to the summits which Pollock crowned with his infantry and batteries when he forced the pass on his way to relieve Jellalabad in 1842. At intervals there is one of those fortified farms, with round towers, like the peels of the Scottish border, in which the women and the cattle can be placed at night. Nothing tells more strongly of the insecurity of the country than these embattled dwellings. After the great tribal rising in 1897, when we were swept clean out of the Khyber by a sudden wave of Moslem fanaticism, many of the towers were demolished; but we have permitted new ones to be erected, nor, indeed, could we well forbid it since we do not hold the Afridi country, but have only a short right of way through the Pass itself. We guard the road, and punish any breach of the peace fifty yards on either side of it. Beyond this narrow ribbon we claim no rights, and if the tribesmen shoot each other outside the limit we make it no business of ours. Along the Pass itself British forts, crenellated and machicolated, with loopholed walls and steel shutters for protection against musketry fire at close quarters, alternate with the native strongholds. At Ali Masjid, in the middle of the Valley, which was sacked by the tribesmen in 1897, there are now barracks and a strong garrison of Khyber

Rifles. Here the mountains rise higher and the scenery gains in boldness and thence onward past gorge, and jutting masses of rock, and deep chasms, the skilful spirals of the road twist and turn, till it opens upon a fine basin, in the midst of which stands Landi Kotal, on the edge of Afghanistan the last outpost of Britain on the road from Central Asia.

The Wardens of the Marches, that is to say, Colonel Deane, the Chief Commissioner of the North-West Frontier Province, and Major Roos-Koppel, who commands the Khyber Rifles, had resolved that no risks should be taken when the Prince drove through the Pass. In the ordinary way the Khyber is guarded twice a week; sentries are posted and pickets are out from the forts, and on those two days it is safe for the tourist to take his longa through, and for the great caravan from Central Asia, with its train of laden Bactrian camels, its horses and its pack mules, to plough slowly through the sand to Peshawar Bazaar and Railway Station. On this Monday in November the royal cortège went by under the watchful eyes of a small army of troops. There was a line of sentries all the way along a few yards above the roadside, and if the eye travelled upwards on every conspicuous height or jutting fragment of rock it fell upon the khaki uniform and glinting bayonet of other sentries. Minute figures, perched two thousand feet in the air, were presenting arms to the procession that must have looked like a train of toy carriages in the dusty thread of road below them. These were the men of the Khyber Rifles, and the whole seventeen hundred of them were on duty that day, and we know, though we could not see them, that an equal number of the tribal levies formed an outer cordon on the further heights beyond.

But if the Prince was well defended, his defenders themselves were men who had been many of them, fierce enemies of the rule and the civilization he represents. The Khyber Rifles are Afghans who have been taken into our pay, and drilled and disciplined under our officers. It is the policy which made the Black Watch and the Gordons out of the caterans and cattle-raiders of the Scottish Highlands, and it seems to be succeeding almost as well. A handful of young English officers are turning their savages into first-rate British soldiers orderly, obedient, and proud of their service. When you look at these admirable battalions of disciplined infantry, with their two squadrons of smart cavalry, you find it hard to believe that these are the own brothers and cousins of the long-haired picturesque barbarians who come out from their hamlets to stare at the royal travellers.

And the men who have done this thing? We saw some of them at Landi Kotal, by the Afghan end of the Pass. It is a desolate place enough, this lonely sentry-box on the Empire's rim. All round it are the brown, bare mountains; in front is Afghanistan and the unknown dangers beyond; behind, the long sandy path that goes snaking through the hills and is the only way back to India and Home. In this forlorn abiding-place you will find the British subaltern, neat and cool and comfortable, a boy with clear cheeks and smooth hair, who handles his half-hundred sun-baked ruffians much as if they were the Second Eleven and he their captain. He has to be something of a linguist, an ethnologist, a cartographer, a diplomatist, this cheerful youngster; he may be shot down by a stray sniper from the hills any morning, as he goes his rounds; he has no one to talk to but three or four of his own comrades, no society, no amusements, hardly any leisure; he is always drilling his men, or teaching them or making up their accounts, or finding out what mischief is brewing among their villages. His life is as hard and as busy as that of the juniors in the ward-room of a man-of-war; he takes it with the same reserved vivacity; he keeps his health, his manners, his sense of humour. There are those who say that the young British officer is always foolish and always idle. They should go and look at him in India, and, above all, on the Frontier.

27TH JANUARY 1906.

Englishman.—It is a happy circumstance that upon the several occasions since he landed in India the Prince of Wales has been able actively to associate himself with memorials to his revered grandmother the Queen-Empress Victoria. At Agra he unveiled the noble statue, which is one of the many monuments of her reign, raised by the loyal and generous population of the United Provinces. At Lucknow he was to have performed the same graceful office, but unfortunately the work was not completed. At Calcutta he inaugurated the All Indian Memorial, which will be the most beautiful modern building in Hindustan, and in Rangoon he opened the Victoria Memorial Park. In Madras to-day, His Royal Highness was able actively to assist in a movement, which is most closely identified with the life and times of the great Queen.

On the celebration of the 1887 Jubilee, a general desire was manifested that the permanent memorial should take the form of a technical institute. With the Government grant nearly a lakh and a half of rupees were placed at the disposal of the managing trustees and the income from the fund was utilised in giving scholarships to teachers and normal students to enable them to be trained in the existing institutions. When it was decided to raise a monument to the late Queen-Empress it was agreed that it should be for the encouragement of technical and industrial education in co-operation with the existing body and that a building should be erected in furtherance of the object of the fund. Such is the genesis of the movement in its practical shape, it will be handsome pile in the Indo-Saracenic style, as exemplified at Fatehpur Sikri, and will form the recognised head-quarters of the technical institute and constitute a bureau of information on technical and industrial subjects and provide a lecture hall and a centre for exhibiting a collection of the best specimens of the arts and crafts of the Presidency.

The ceremony was simple and dignified. The Prince and Princess, and the Governor and Lady Amphyll arrived in full State. Sir George Arbuthnot read an address, to which His Royal Highness in reply said:—

It is a great pleasure to the Princess of Wales and myself to take part in this ceremony, an outward and visible sign of the devotion of the people of Madras to our late lamented Queen-Empress Victoria and we are greatly touched by the feeling tones in which you speak of her beloved and venerated memory. The object of The Victoria Memorial Technical Institute, namely, to develop the talents and improve the condition of the artists and craftsmen of the Presidency is one which I am confident would have appealed in every way to Queen-Victoria, who always followed with interest every practical effort, which aimed at making the lives of her Indian peoples more prosperous and contented. You may rest assured that this undertaking will have the approval of my dear father the King-Emperor, as it has the sympathy of the Princess of Wales and myself. It is interesting to know that a movement set on foot to commemorate the Queen-Empress's Jubilee in 1887, has seen its consummation in a memorial to her long and glorious reign. I am gratified to learn from your address of the generous assistance and co-operation which the movement has received from your Governor Lord Amphyll and that you are indebted to the Government of Madras for the site, and for a considerable grant towards the building fund. I congratulate you upon the valuable honorary services which have been rendered in the administrative council of the institute since its formation in 1887. The Princess of Wales and I sincerely trust that the Victoria Memorial Technical Institute may in every way fulfil the high ideal of its founders and conduce to the further prosperity and general well-being of the people of this Presidency.

Lord Ampthill then in bluff hearty words expressed the joy of the people of the Presidency in having Their Royal Highnesses as their guests and in the active participation of Queen Victoria's grandson with their memorial to the beloved Queen-Empress. Then he recalled that it was Queen Victoria, who sent him to India to be Governor of Madras and her parting words still rang in his ears. "Be kind and sympathetic to my Indian people."

But a significant and very happy coincidence marked the ceremony. Copies of the local journals were according to custom enclosed in a glass casket placed in the hollowed nether stone. In those journals was printed an extract from the leading English newspaper recording the deliberate opinion of one well qualified to judge that "its record of education, its administration and its peaceful progress entitles Madras to the designation of the model presidency of India." The eulogy is justified the absurd fiction as to the benighted presidency has endured long enough, but it was a pleasant circumstance that this appreciation came at a moment which gave it a permanent record.

The dignity of the Prince's speech at Madras in response to the loyal address of the Madras Landholders' Association is in keeping with the circumstances and place in which it is uttered. The Royal party have now traversed enough of this great Peninsula and come in contact with a sufficient number of personalities and races to form some idea of the immensity of the activities of the Indian Empire. They have realised that India is not to be understood by books or by study. "We both," said His Royal Highness, revealing in a sentence the spirit in which he has entered upon the tour, "recognise the serious importance of our own mission to India and we pray that it may be fruitful both to you and to us." The last sentiment is one which India must heartily reciprocate, if, indeed, it is necessary at this stage of the tour to say so.

Lady's Pictorial.—It is really remarkable the number of the Royal Family who are at present abroad, for while the Prince and Princess of Wales are in India, the Princess Henry and Eugénie of Battenberg are on the Riviera, the Duke and Duchess of Connaught are in South Africa, Prince Arthur of Connaught is on his way to Japan, and Princess Louise Duchess of Argyll and the Duke of Argyll are in Egypt.

Madras Mail.—The ceremony in honour of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales on the Island on Thursday night was something more than a public entertainment for it included the formal presentation of the Address of the people of the Presidency, and His Royal Highness's gracious reply thereto. There can be no doubt that the Address voiced the sentiments of the whole of the loyal population of this Presidency and of the Native States attached to it when it remarked:—"Your Royal Highnesses' present visit to India brings to us the best assurance of the goodwill felt by His Majesty towards the people of this country. Furthermore, it affords to the many millions of His Majesty's Indian subjects an opportunity of seeing with their own eyes, in their own country, their future Sovereign, and of testifying to their loyalty, devotion and attachment to the British Crown, under which the inhabitants of this country live in the enjoyment of peace and prosperity and security and justice unknown to their predecessors in historic times, and unexampled in the annals of great Empires." And His Royal Highness's reply contained reciprocal sentiments that will be read with pride and pleasure throughout the Presidency. "We both of us," remarked His Royal Highness, "do feel a 'deep concern' and 'lively interest,' in all that affects the welfare of our fellow-subjects. We fully realise the privilege which we are now enjoying of seeing these distant parts of the Empire, and are most grateful for the affectionate manner in which Southern India has greeted us."

Both the casket in which the Address was enclosed and also the format of the Address itself were typically Indian. In the fully caparisoned and bejewelled elephant we see the great pachyderm which is an indispensable adjunct of every important Indian ceremony and festivity; while the Address, inscribed on eadjan leaves placed between sandal boards, held together by a silken thread and enclosed in an ivory box, is emblematic of India's indigenous literary records, compiled before the stylus and the palm-leaf gave way to the fountain-pen and the sheet of paper. For the rest, in their essential aspects the whole proceedings last night may be said to have been entirely Indian. It is true that the Anglo-Indian community of the Presidency gladly assisted and contributed to the Reception Committee's arrangements both for the public entertainment and other ceremonies. There were several Anglo-Indians also on the Reception Committee; and, lastly, one of the three zealous and hard-worked Secretaries was an Anglo-Indian who has been the guiding spirit in everything, devoting himself heart and soul to devising and perfecting all the arrangements. But the character of a "people's" reception and entertainment of Their Royal Highnesses has been preserved as much as possible all through. And wisely so, for Their Royal Highnesses have come to India chiefly to make acquaintance with the natives of the country. As the Times so well observed when Their Royal Highnesses left England:—"Such an event as the visit of the heir to the Crown—her Crown as well as ours—can only strengthen the loyalty of India, and her confidence that she is not a mere Dependency, but an integral and honoured portion of the great dominions which compose the British Empire. But its benefits will be equally great to the Royal visitors themselves. A Sovereign's first duty whether he be an autocrat or the most strictly limited of constitutional Monarchs, is to know his people; and he cannot really know them unless he has met them face to face and seen them in their own surroundings." This, as we have remarked before, is specially true in the case of an Oriental country like India, so widely different from the great Colonies, which are merely other "Britains across the seas." And sufficient is known already of Their Royal Highnesses' doings in India to justify the observation that Their Royal Highnesses' chief care is to get to know the Indians themselves as much as circumstances permit. Wherever Their Royal Highnesses have journeyed so far during the present tour they have endeavoured to realise this object and have embraced every opportunity of adding to their knowledge of India. Of this we have testimony from the Prince of Wales himself, in the reply which His Royal Highness made to the Address of the Madras Landholders yesterday, when His Royal Highness graciously remarked:—"With you I earnestly hope that our visit to India will not be without useful results. Already the Princess and I begin to feel that we are at home, and that we understand much that no books and no amount of study would have revealed to us. We both recognise the serious importance of our mission to India, and we pray that it may be fruitful both to you and to us."

We do not say that the wholly Indian entertainment last night contributed much to Their Royal Highnesses' knowledge of India. But at any rate Their Royal Highnesses were again for a time (as has been the case on other occasions during the tour) in a really Indian milieu seeing and hearing something of things truly Indian. Thus, it is something for Their Royal Highnesses to know that the sentiments of the typically English song "God Bless the Prince of Wales" can be rendered in the stately shlokas of Sanskrit verse, and intoned, not less impressively perhaps in the measured notation of Hindu music. The weird dances of the wild Khonds from the remote jungles of the Ganjam Malahs may serve to remind Their Royal Highnesses that the Indian Empire embraces uncivilized as well as civilized races. And yet thanks to British justice and power the Khonds are not so uncivilized now-a-days as to resort to the terrible Meriah sacrifice of human victims that caused British officials in the Malah country so much trouble in days not long gone by. Again, in the representation of Indian drama, a very foreshortened specimen of which formed an item in last night's programme, Their Royal Highnesses must have been interested to observe rules and canons of histrionic art apparently so totally different from those that appeal to Western nations. Even the pavilion in which the entertainment was held was typically Indian. By daylight it looked cuteh enough, no doubt, though that hardly matters in a country where the weather can be more or less depended on; but at night, with the bright light on the sparkling tinsel draperies inside, and the architectural design of the exterior solidified in shadow, all looked palace like and festive enough. Of fireworks and illuminations Their Royal Highnesses have seen much during the Wanderjahre they have spent travelling through the British dominions; and doubtless Madras last night did not shine, literally and metaphorically, as brightly as others have. But at any rate there was a noble and memorable background to the scheme of illuminations in the old Fort, whose glacis, battlements and buildings were vividly lighted up and formed a noble screen for such a pyrotechnic display. It is interesting to remember that almost on the very spot where last night rockets were going off and firewheels whirling round, stood a Battery of French siege guns, what time our neighbours from Pondicherry were trying to break down the old Fort walls.

Madras Mail.—The forenoon yesterday was spent quietly by Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales. Taking advantage of an unoccupied morning, Their Royal Highnesses, accompanied by Their Excellencies Lord and Lady Amphil, paid a visit to the Government Central Museum at 11 o'clock. They were received and shown round by Mr. Edgar Thurston.

The first official engagement His Royal Highness had yesterday was at 1 P.M. when he returned in State, at Tulloch's Gardens the visit paid him by His Highness the Raja of Cochin. His Royal Highness was accompanied by his suite and was received by the Raja with all the prescribed honours and ceremonies for such State functions.

At 3-30 P.M., His Royal Highness graciously accorded private audiences to the following Chiefs and Indian gentlemen:—The Nawab of Banganapalle, Raja of Sandur, Sir V. Bhaskaryam Iyengar, Raja Sir S. Ramaswamy Moodelliar, the Hon'ble Sir S. Subramania Iyer, the Maharaja of Bobbili, and the Hon'ble the Prince of Arcot.

A correspondent writes:—As it was known that Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales were to return from Guindy through San Thomé, this (25th instant) evening, His Lordship the Bishop of Mylapore directed the several institutions under him to be decorated and illuminated and joybells to be rung from the Cathedral tower as Their Royal Highnesses drove by. From 5 P.M., crowds began to gather along the route and were kept in order by the Police; and as it began to get dark, the lamps for the illumination began to be lighted. Suddenly the Police were withdrawn and the people were told to go home, as the tea at Guindy had been cancelled. This of course put a stop to the illuminations, and the bell-ringers in the Cathedral tower left their post. The crowd, too, began to disperse, and soon only a few stragglers were left to straggle across the roads as usual, when, to the surprise of these the Royal party did drive through San Thomé. The Prince and Princess seemed highly pleased at the suddenly elicited enthusiasm of these few.

Five hundred poor people were sumptuously fed by the Prince of Wales' Reception Committee, Madras, and clad by Raja Sir Ramaswamy Moodelliar, C.I.E., in connection with the Royal visit to Madras at the Muthialpetta Annadharma Samaj. About 1,500 poor have been fed, under the auspices of the Annadharma Samaj, by the Raja of Dharakota, and the Raja of Nuzvid in honour of the Royal visit.

We regret that, through an oversight, the names of Volunteer Officers were entered in the Levée List we published yesterday without their Military rank, and that the names of the Rev. J. Lazarus, the Rev. W. D. Clarke, the Rev. J. Sathinathan and the Rev. A. Theophilus and Mr. E. Srinivasa Chariar were omitted.

The Madras Volunteer Guards mustered much stronger on Wednesday, on the occasion of the arrival of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, than we gave them credit for. The Corps turned out 670 strong, besides 30 of the Mounted Company who were on escort duty, and not 350 as stated in our reports.

Raja Rangayya Apparow Bahadur, of Nuzvid, has, in honour of the Royal visit, granted holidays on the 24th, 25th and 26th instant to his Primary and High Schools at Nuzvid and to the Huzur and Tannah offices of his Estate. He has also instructed the Chennapuri Annadharma Samajum at Madras to feed 500 poor at his expense. He has also had prayers offered and poojah performed in the temples of his Nuzvid and Nidadavole Estates for the long life and prosperity of the Royal Family.

On the 24th instant, in addition to the programme already telegraphed the final competition for the Grigg Medal was also held. The programme consisted of over a dozen items. There was a tug of war between the 2nd Cheshire and the Laccadive Islanders, eight a side, the latter being pulled over. In the tug between the Police and the Moplah fishermen the Police pulled their opponents over. The sports were witnessed by several European ladies and gentlemen and a large number of native gentlemen, and at the conclusion, Mrs. Knapp very kindly distributed the prizes. There was a dinner at the Malabar Club, at night, and then came the most popular and attractive item in the day's programme—a pyrotechnic display on the pier and foreshore. The pier was prettily lit up for the occasion with lights of various colours, and the effect, specially at a distance, was exceedingly pretty. The crowd which turned out to witness the fireworks was so immense that the long expanse of beach for over a mile was nothing but a surging mass of humanity. Some of the fireworks were very pretty, and being rarely seen in these parts created much noisy excitement among the multitude. The rush and the traffic were unprecedentedly heavy, but it is to the credit of the Police, assisted by three or four men of the Cheshires, that they preserved order admirably. Some of the European bungalows on the beach were prettily illuminated. The celebration was a success from start to finish, reflecting great credit on the several gentlemen, official and non-official who were in charge of the arrangements. Special mention deserves to be made of the fact that, in the afternoon while the sports were in progress, a long procession of several hundreds of Moplah school boys, headed by their teachers, marched along the main streets with music, and waving flags with patriotic inscriptions.

At Talliparmba, an important village, in North Malabar, the Royal visit was celebrated by the feeding of the poor and the offering of prayers in the local temples on behalf of our illustrious visitors, Mr. Vengayil Kunhi Raman Nayanar, the leading jenmi of the locality, gathered together the Vettuvans, Mavilans, Pulayas and other Hill and jungle tribes and gave them a hearty meal. A simple description of the Royal visit was given to these primitive jungle folk and Mr. Nayanar is improving the occasion by distributing aluminium commemoration medals among the headmen of the various tribes.

Madras Mail.—One of the most important functions in connection with the Royal Visit to Madras took place yesterday evening, namely, the laying of the foundation stone of the Victoria Memorial Hall on the Pantheon Road. As on the day of the public reception at the Harbour, arrangements were made by the Military authorities to line the route. The streets were again filled with a dense and enthusiastic crowd of spectators. Indeed, one of the principal features of the City's welcome to the Royal Visitors has been the enormous crowds which collected along the route on each occasion of Their Royal Highnesses' appearance in public. Madras, next to Calcutta and Bombay, is the most populous city in India, and when it turns out to jubilate, the sight is always imposing; but the normal population has been very largely increased by thousands of visitors from the Mofussil, who proportionately add to our own loyal crowds and to the imposing character of all public demonstrations. With cheerful good temper they spend hours in patient waiting just to get a passing glimpse of Their Royal Highnesses. Yesterday's function was no exception, and it drew quite as large a gathering as any of the preceding days.

Punctually at 4-50 p.m., Their Excellencies Lord and Lady Amphilh left Government House and proceeded to the site of the Victoria Memorial Hall and were, as they always are, heartily cheered as they drove along. Ten minutes later a further outburst of cheering from the crowds assembled at the Government House gate announced that Their Royal Highnesses had started for their destination and the cheering grew in volume as the drive progressed.

As already announced, Mount Road made a brave display in honour of the Royal Visit. Every single establishment, without exception, was decked in festive garb and ornate triumphal arches spanned the roadway at intervals. The route taken was along the Mount Road as far as Neill's Statue and thence along Binny's Road, over Commander-in-Chief's Bridge, along Marshall's Road and Monteith's Road and across Pantheon Road to the pandal by the entrance, immediately opposite Monteith's Road.

As Their Royal Highnesses passed through Monteith's Road, they received a warm greeting from the needle-women of the Friend-in-Need Society's Workshop, who had with kindly forethought assembled on galleries specially erected for them by Mrs. J. N. Atkinson in her compound to afford these poor women an opportunity of seeing Their Royal Highnesses.

The entire route was lined by troops in the following order:—The 2nd Suffolk Regiment from the Government House gate to the tram line by Misquith & Co.; the Madras Railway Volunteers from this point to the tram line opposite Messrs. Smith & Co.'s premises; and No. 52 Company R. G. A. from here up right past the premises of Messrs. Smith & Co. This section of the route was under the command of Major Montagu, of the Suffolks. The second section of the route, under Lieutenant-Colonel Sutton, was lined in the following order:—The Madras Volunteer Guards from Messrs. Smith and Co. to Neill's Statue as also Gordon's Horse and 20 mounted men of the R. F. A. The 88th Carnatic Infantry from Neill's Statue to the Commander-in-Chief's Bridge. The third section of the route, which was under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Lampen, of the 2nd Rajput Light Infantry, was lined by 200 men of the 88th Carnatic Infantry from Commander-in-Chief's Bridge up to the Pudukkottai Maidan, while 600 men of the Rajputs lined the rest of the route from the corner of the Maidan down Monteith's Road to the Institute. The entrances of the several roads leading into the route were blocked by mounted men of the 6th Battery, R. F. A.

On arrival at the Institute Their Royal Highnesses were received by His Excellency the Governor, who was attended by the Hon'ble Sir George Arbuthnot, the President, and the following Members of the Council of the Institute:—The Hon'ble Mr. A. E. Castle Stuart, the Hon'ble Mr. J. N. Atkinson, the Hon'ble Dr. A. G. Bourne, the Hon'ble Dewan Bahadur R. V. Srinivasa Iyer, the Hon'ble Mr. V. C. Desikachariar, the Hon'ble Dewan Bahadur P. Rajarathna Moodelliar, Mr. H. K. Beauchamp, Mr. S. D. Pears, Mr. E. Thurston, and Mr. John Adam (Honorary Secretary). A Guard-of-Honour of 100 men of the Madras Volunteer Guards, with Band and Colours, was drawn up opposite the entrance to the pavilion and saluted His Royal Highness on arrival.

His Excellency the Governor then presented the members of the Council to His Royal Highness, after which the President, accompanied by the members, conducted the Royal party to the site of the pavilion in front of the main entrance of the Hall, at the north-east corner of which the foundation stone was ready to be laid. Here Their Royal Highnesses took their seats on two exceedingly handsome silver chairs, the work and design of Messrs. T. R. Tawker and Soas, which were specially lent for the occasion. The arms of the chairs were silver lions couchant, while the silver framework was decorated in repoussé work of conventional design, surmounted by the Prince of Wales's feathers.

The President, Sir George Arbuthnot, then addressed Their Royal Highnesses, giving a brief account of the history, design and object of the projected building. He said:—

On behalf of the Council of the Victoria Technical Institute of which I have the honour to be President, it is my high privilege this afternoon to express the Council's most dutiful and earnest thanks to Your Royal Highness for having been graciously pleased to consent to lay the foundation stone of our Memorial Hall, which will be, we hope, for all time an outward and visible sign of the devotion of the people of this Presidency to the never-fading memory of Her late lamented Majesty the Queen-Empress Victoria. And though truly it needs not to raise "a marble mountain" on her grave to ensure that that beloved and venerated memory will live for ever in the hearts of her loyal and grateful people alike in India and throughout her vast Empire, yet it is but fitting that our deep feeling should find expression not in words only but in deeds. The object of this Institute is to encourage and develop the talents and improve the skill of the artists and craftsmen of this Presidency and to give effectual assistance to such of them—and we believe they are many—as are capable not only of earning by manual toil a mere living wage, but of becoming skilled artisans, and prosperous citizens, the backbone of a loyal and contented people. Such an object is one which, we think, may fittingly be connected with the memory of our beloved Queen Mother, and we venture to hope and believe that it will also command the sympathy of her son, our Sovereign, His Gracious Majesty King Edward VII, whose dutiful and loyal subjects it is our proudest boast to be, and of her grandson, Your Royal Highness, whose gracious presence in India as well as that of Her Royal Highness, the Princess of Wales has been received with such an outburst of enthusiastic loyalty by Princes and people alike; and whose visit will be not only, we hope, a very pleasant memory to yourselves but a strong link in the chain which binds this vast country of India to King Edward's worldwide Empire. The Council ventures to hope that at this interesting epoch in its history, Your Royal Highnesses will not consider it out of place briefly to sketch the circumstances under which this Memorial Hall has come into being. At the time of the celebration in this Presidency of the Jubilee of Her late lamented Majesty the Queen-Empress Victoria, in 1887, there was a very general desire that the permanent Memorial of that event should take the form of a Technical Institute. The Central Jubilee Committee accordingly resolved that its surplus funds should be devoted to that purpose, and, before declaring itself dissolved, delegated its powers and handed over its funds to a Technical Institute Committee appointed for the purpose of organising the Institute. To the latter Committee Government offered a grant equal to a moiety of the subscriptions on condition that the President and one-third of the governing body should be nominated by Government. This offer was accepted and the Committee was dissolved on the 29th October, 1888, having elected eight members of the new Council. These members, together with the President and four members nominated by Government, forming the Council of the Victoria Technical Institute, resolved that the Institute should be incorporated under Act XXI of 1860. This was accordingly done, the Memorandum of Association being duly registered on the 26th March, 1889. The Institute started with a capital of Rs. 1,40,350. The Council came to the conclusion that the Funds at its disposal were quite inadequate to at once build and endow an Institution where technical training on any satisfactory scale could be given. Government had, however, promised to provide a building, and indeed, as its foundation stone still shows such a building was erected but subsequently devoted to the Art and Industrial Section of the existing Museum. The Council considered that meanwhile its funds might be usefully employed in other directions and accordingly offered scholarships to teachers and normal students to enable them to be trained in such Institutions as the College of Engineering, School of Arts, and College of Agriculture. During the four years, 1890-1893, in which this scheme was in full operation, the Council expended over Rs. 11,000 in such scholarships. By 1894 it became apparent that the new scholarship and other schemes of the Education Department were doing on a far more extensive scale the work originated by the Institute. The Council therefore resolved to husband its resources and wait for better opportunities. This favourable epoch was inaugurated by the accession of His Excellency Lord Amphil to the Governorship of Fort St. George and the Council respectfully and gladly avails itself of this opportunity to express its deep appreciation of the generous and invaluable assistance and sympathy which it has received from His Excellency during the whole period of his administration in Madras to which it has been mainly due that the many and unexpected difficulties which had arisen have been at length successfully surmounted, and that the prospects of the Institute are now so fair and promising. On the death of Her late lamented Majesty the Queen-Empress Victoria, a Memorial Fund was instituted in Madras, and at a Public Meeting held on the 5th March 1901, to consider the proposals of the General Committee of the Queen Victoria Memorial Fund, it was decided that the memorial should be a Queen Victoria Memorial Fund for the encouragement of Technical and Industrial Education in co-operation with the already existing Victoria Technical Institute; that the Fund should be vested in Trustees under a deed to be approved of by the General Committee, and that the Trustees should be authorised to expend at their discretion such portion of the Fund as they might think desirable for the erection of a suitable building as a memorial to Queen Victoria, to be used in connection with the furtherance of the object of the Fund. The result of this Resolution was that by a Trust Deed, dated the 23rd January 1902, the Funds were amalgamated and the Trustees of the Queen Victoria Memorial Fund became members of the Council of the Victoria Technical Institute. The Council having reason to believe that the Government of Madras was favourably disposed towards the aims and objects of the Institute, anticipations which have since been most happily realised, approached Government with a view to obtaining further assistance in erecting a worthy Memorial Hall. Briefly stated, the Council intimated that the object of the Hall—apart from its Memorial purpose—should be to form the recognised Headquarters of the Institute, to constitute a Bureau of Information on Technical and Industrial subjects, and to provide a Lecture Hall, and a centre for exhibiting a collection of the best specimens of the arts and crafts of the Presidency. In the result Government made a grant of Rs. 75,000 towards the Building Fund. Government also purchased the site on which we now stand for a sum of Rs. 27,000 and placed it at the disposal of the Council subject to a payment in aid of Rs. 10,000. The result is the building of which Your Royal Highness is to-day invited to lay the foundation stone. The plans have been prepared by Mr. Henry Irwin, C.I.E., late Consulting Architect to Government. The building will consist of an octagonal entrance hall with rooms on either side for administrative purposes; beyond will be the main Exhibition Hall 80 feet by 40 feet and 38 feet in height. The sills of the windows will be 14 feet above the floor level, leaving a clear wall space all round interrupted only by the doors at either end. The floor space will be considerable, 3,200 feet, so that there will be room for a large number of exhibits. At the end of the hall a door will open into a room designed as a Council Chamber. The exterior of the building will be constructed of cut sand-stone obtained from quarries a short distance from Madras on the East Coast. The polished stone laid to-day by Your Royal Highness is Porphyry obtained from quarries near Seringapatam and is of the same description as that used for the pedestal of the statue of His Imperial Majesty King Edward VII erected in Madras not very long ago. The stones were obtained from Mysore and prepared there, by the kind permission of His Highness the Maharaja. On the external walls of the hall beneath the windows will be panels intended to receive sculptured bass-reliefs, illustrative of the principal events of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria. In the centre of the octagonal entrance hall may be placed a statue of Her Majesty. The architecture adopted is that of the Mogul period and the general character follows that of the buildings erected by the Mogul Emperors at Fatehpur Sikri lately visited by Your Royal Highnesses. The ornamentation of the interior will be carried out in the same style, in the white polished plaster for which Madras is celebrated. The floor will be of marble in geometric pattern. The labour employed will be all local, and the contractor is Mr. T. Numbermal Chettiar, Rao Sahib, of Madras, who has erected many other public buildings in this city and in other parts of the Presidency. The Council cannot close this Address without putting on record its great indebtedness to one of its members, Mr. John Adam, who has given the benefit of his valuable services as Honorary Secretary since the Technical Institute was first decided upon in 1887, whilst in more recent years the assistance rendered by Mr. Edgar Thurston, Superintendent of the Government Central Museum, has been of great value. It only remains for the Council again to express its deep gratitude to Your Royal Highnesses for your presence to-day and to respectfully invite you, Sir, to lay the foundation stone of a building which it hopes will be not altogether unworthy of the illustrious Sovereign in whose memory it is erected, nor of the loyal Presidency of Madras.

The Address was printed in pamphlet form, and copies in maroon parchment covers, finished in gold, were distributed to invited guests and were accompanied by lithographed copies of the different elevations of the building.

The copies presented to the Prince and Princess of Wales were of the same size and printing, only handsomely bound in maroon morocco leather, with padded backs, the first and last leaves of the pamphlet being of crimson satin and beautifully embellished in gold. The whole was the work of Messrs. Vest & Co.

Their Royal Highnesses having inspected the plans of the buildings which were presented by Mr. H. A. Irwin, C.I.E., the Architect of the building, the President requested His Royal Highness to lay the foundation stone. Before doing so, His Royal Highness said:—

It is a great pleasure to the Princess of Wales and myself to take part in this ceremony, an outward and visible sign of the devotion of the people of Madras to our late lamented Queen Empress Victoria. And we are greatly touched by the feeling tones in which you speak of her beloved and venerated memory. The object of the Victoria Memorial Technical Institute, namely, to develop the talents and improve the condition of the artisans and craftsmen of the Presidency, is one which, I am confident, would have appealed in every way to Queen Victoria, who always followed with interest every practical effort which aimed at making the lives of her Indian peoples more prosperous and contented. You may rest assured that this undertaking will have the approval of my dear father, the King-Emperor, as it has the sympathy of the Princess of Wales and myself. It is interesting to know that a movement set on foot to commemorate the Queen-Empress's Jubilee in 1887 has seen its consummation in a memorial to her long and glorious reign. I am gratified to learn from your Address of the generous assistance and co-operation which the movement has received from your Governor, Lord Amphil, and that you are indebted to the Government of Madras for the site and for a considerable grant towards the Building Fund. I congratulate you upon the valuable honorary services which have been rendered, in the Administrative Council of the Institute since its formation in 1887. The Princess of Wales and I sincerely trust that the Victoria Memorial Technical Institute may in every way fulfil the high ideal of its founders, and conduce to the further prosperity and general well-being of the people of this Presidency.

His Royal Highness, attended by Sir George Arbuthnot and Mr. Irwin, then ascended the platform when the ceremony of lowering the stone into position and declaring it "well and truly laid" was gone through with all the precision of a long-established ritual. His Royal Highness was presented by the Architect with a silver trowel, a mallet, a square and a level, which were all manufactured at the Madras School of Arts.

His Excellency the Governor interposed at this stage of the proceedings with the following speech, at the end of which he called for cheers for Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales:—

Your Royal Highnesses,—I beg leave to thank Your Royal Highnesses, not only on behalf of those here present but also on behalf of the entire people of this Presidency, for the gracious act which we have just been privileged to behold. Your Royal Highnesses have, for three months past, had countless opportunities of observing how deep seated in the hearts of the people of India are loyalty to the Throne and devotion to the Royal Family. It is, therefore, unnecessary for me to explain how much it means to us, the people of this Presidency, that this foundation stone should have been laid by the Heir Apparent to the Throne and the grandson of the great and good Queen whose name the superstructure is to commemorate. It is everything to us; we have hoped for it and counted on it, and no other inauguration could have seemed so worthy and appropriate to us. I, therefore, beg Your Royal Highnesses to accept the heartfelt thanks of the people of the Madras Presidency. For myself, I trust that I may be permitted to say this:

Queen Victoria appointed me to be Governor of Madras and I have still ringing in my ears Her Majesty's parting injunction to me to be kind and sympathetic towards the people of this country. I shall never forget that command of Her Majesty. (Cheers). On this occasion I reflect with satisfaction that while my first public act of importance was to join with the people of Madras in their tribute of sorrow at the death of Queen Victoria, my last is to assist at the happy inauguration of the permanent memorial of their love and loyalty. Ladies and gentlemen, there is only one way in which you can endorse the thanks which I have so inadequately spoken on your behalf. I, therefore, call on you to give three hearty cheers for Their Royal Highnesses.

The response was such as has seldom been heard in Madras, hearty, long and loud, a fitting termination to one of the most important public functions in this city with which Their Royal Highnesses have so appropriately identified themselves.

The Egmore Division of the town had its full share of the holiday-making incidental to the Royal Visit yesterday evening. Vast crowds of people had filtered into Binny's Road from all directions, but an especially large contingent arrived by way of Marshall's Road, from Egmore and Vepery direction, and this made great picnic and holiday. The open space at the junction of Binny's Road and Marshall's Road was made a regular gathering place for hack carriages, the roofs of which were crowded with members of the well-to-do middle classes, whilst humble but more agile subjects climbed the trees lining the roads; much interest was displayed in the passing of the various native dignitaries, whilst Their Royal Highnesses were, as usual, most warmly received. Here and there a hearty cheer went up where English citizens were in evidence, but with the best will in the world, our Indian brothers are not good at genuine cheering, and as a general thing enthusiastic clapping was the rule. The Police arrangements were excellent and there was never any confusion.

The return drive started at about 5-30 p.m. and the Royal party again traversed Binny's Road, subsequently crossing the Mount Road and going through the fine open compound of the Madras Club, the building itself being gay with bunting and crowded with the members and ladies. There was no mistake about the outburst of cheering that came from the Club building. Hearty shouts, again and again repeated burst forth, whilst the ladies waved their handkerchiefs. Their Royal Highnesses acknowledged these warm greetings in a gracious manner, the Princess of Wales bowing again and again whilst the Prince repeatedly raised his hat. It was a notable incident this hearty welcome from the representative European population of the old city which, with the Presidency, has received such a notable mark of approval from the Times. It was very appropriate too that the premier Club of the Presidency should have been thus honoured by the Prince, and the hurried drive through the compound was only typical of the speed with which His Royal Highness has had to travel in order to cover the extensive tour that has been laid out for him. In the more leisurely time, a generation ago, his Royal father found time to attend a very successful Ball given in his honour in the fine old building. Emerging from the Club compound the procession traversed Triplicane by way of Westcott's Road and Pycroft's Road. This, the Mahomedan portion of the town, in its own way was as gay as its neighbours and did its best to show the loyalty of the Moslem community to the British Crown.

The crowds here were very dense, and though the road was well kept before and whilst the procession was passing, the comparatively narrow streets were then absolutely filled, and it was difficult to get along even at a walking pace. But the procession passed on to the breezy Marina, which seemed to have called up one of its freshest airs for the occasion, and turning to the right passed the Presidency College, the Public Works Department Secretariat and the Engineering College, and again turning to the right by the Chepauk Palace, returned to Government House by about 6.15 P.M.

Apart from the feeding of the poor by the Committee a good deal is being done by private effort to make the poor of the City happy during the sojourn of the Royal Visitors in Madras. A very large number of mendicants, numbering something like 3,500 were sumptuously fed yesterday at Cook's Road, Perambore, by Mr. Hajee Mahomed Hussain Khan Sahib, principal of the firm of Messrs. Hajee Hyder Khan Sahib & Co., piece-good merchants.

Queen.—In the Madras Presidency we reach a more familiar India—the typical, tropical India known to us by pictures from our nursery days. Here palms, alocs, bamboos, and other tropical vegetation abound, while thinly-clad natives—the loin cloth being the most prominent feature of their costume—take the place of the sheepskin-clad natives of the North-Western Provinces. Madras, too, is emphatically missionary India, as it has been for over a century the most important missionary field in the whole of the Indian Empire.

Madras, which has been termed the Cinderella capital, should be gratified at the Prince of Wales allotting several days to it in his comprehensive itinerary. It is unfortunate that the extensive harbour works, which have been in progress for many years, are not yet completed. The King-Emperor laid the first stone of the breakwater in 1876, and there would have been a special appropriateness if his son could have inaugurated the completion of the work. The harbour has been for many years a white elephant of the Public Works Department and the despair of the Madras Government. In 1881 a cyclone destroyed the greater portion of the works. Owing to the peculiar conformation of the Coromandel coast, on which there is no natural opening or creek on the sandy shore, the necessity for a safe artificial harbour is urgent. The convenience to tourists would be considerable, as Madras is only some 800 miles by sea from Calcutta while it is nearly 1,110 by rail. However the new harbour (which will shortly be completed) will be protected by a breakwater 1,600 feet long, and will, it is expected, enable vessels to anchor here in the roughest weather. Possibly the P. and O. Company, who took off the service in 1887, will then resume calling at Madras.

Madras occupies an enormous area, the city and suburbs being nearly thirty miles in circumference. Consequently in this city of magnificent distances the great housing question, which vexes the souls of Anglo-Indians at Bombay and in a less degree at Calcutta, does not press. A large bungalow with extensive gardens could be had for almost one-third the rent asked for the same accommodation at the other two capitals. Consequently Madras is a favourite residence of Anglo-Indians with families, and in this respect can be compared with Bangalore. The social features of Anglo-Indian life in Madras are pleasant if we ignore the enervating hot-house climate. There are many clubs and other recreative resources, though there is not the whirl of gaiety and the incessant round of society functions of Calcutta during the season, nor is there, as at Bombay, the variety afforded by the large number of distinguished visitors, to say nothing of globe trotters and tourists, who are continually passing through the "front door of India." Indeed Madras is a kind of backwater of travel in the grand tour of India, and perhaps it is partly due to this that the proverbial hospitality of Anglo-India is, if anything more pronounced at Madras than at either of these two capitals.

I have no room to notice the public monuments and other sights of Madras, and, besides, these have been described at adequate length in a previous article.

Mysore, which the Prince of Wales visits after Madras, is one of the most flourishing of the feudatory states of India and, next to Hyderabad, the largest and most important, having a population of over five and a half millions, while its area is almost as large as that of Ireland. In 1851 the continual misgovernment of Mysore, since the death of Tippu Sultan, compelled the British Government to undertake the administration, but in 1881 it was restored to the Maharaja, the father of the present youthful ruler (Maharaja Krishna Wodeyar Bahadur), who was installed in August, 1902. Since 1881 the state has been so well governed and its financial condition so sound that it has earned the honourable sobriquet the model state of India.

There is very little of interest in Mysore City, the capital. The only lion is the palace of the Maharajas, now being restored—a huge modern, tawdry pile. The bazaars, however, should be visited not for their picturesqueness, but because one can buy here at reasonable prices the beaten gold jewellery for which Mysore is famous. It is beaten out almost as thin as paper, but it is chased so artistically and delicately that the effect is not poor or flimsy.

On the hillside of Chamundi, which overlooks the city, is a remarkable colossal figure of a nandi, or sacred bull. This huge monolith is carved out of the solid rock and approached by a flight of 600 stone steps.

Seringapatam, the capital of Mysore till it was taken by us in 1799, is reached from Mysore after a pleasant drive of eleven miles. Its interest is purely historical centring in the famous siege by General Harris and Colonel Wellesley (Duke of Wellington) in 1799. A graphic account of the operations is given in Murray's Guide. It is a little difficult to trace the various positions and "posts" of the besiegers, but two cannons stuck into the ground like pillars mark the exact site of the breaching batteries.

The mausoleum of Hyder Ali and Tippu Sultan is a square building crowned by a dome, with an arcade supported by beautiful hornblende pillars. The exquisitely carved doors were a gift of Lord Dalhousie. The magnanimity of the Government in maintaining this mausoleum of two of the most formidable enemies of the British Raj offers a striking contrast to the treatment of the tomb of another enemy of Great Britain at a later date—that of the Mahdi at Omdurman.

A summer palace of Tippu between the Lal Bagh and the Fort is noteworthy, as it served for some time as the head-quarters of the Duke of Wellington, then Colonel Wellesley. Here are the famous pictures representing the defeat of the unfortunate Colonel Baillie's troops by Hyder Ali in 1789. Their historic rather than their artistic importance induced Lord Dalhousie to have them repainted. The caricature of the British soldiers is grotesque, but the general effect is vigorous and animated. There is a memorial in the Lal Bagh to Colonel Baillie, who died a prisoner of Tippu in 1782.

The incorporated Society for promoting the enlargement building and repairing of Churches and Chapels held its usual monthly meeting on Thursday, the 18th instant, at the Society's house, 7, Dean's-yard, Westminster Abbey, S. W., the Rev. Canon C. F. Norman in the chair. Grants of money were made in aid of the following object, viz., building new churches at new Somerby, St. Anne, near Grantham, £125 for the first portion and South Beddington, St. Michael and all Angels, Surrey, £200 for the first portion; towards rebuilding the church of St. Michael Coppenhall, near Crewe, £125, making in all £225 and towards enlarging or otherwise improving the accommodation in the churches at Alwalton, St. Andrew, near Peterborough, £20 making in all £45; Great Ilford, St. John the Evangelist, Essex, £100, making in all £250; Keelby, St. Bartholomew, near Brocklesdy, Lincs., £15; Skirbeck, St. Nicholas, near Boston, Lincs., £75; and Stanton Harcourt, St. Michael Oxon, £65 in lieu of a former grant of £35.

South Wales Daily News.—With his arrival at Madras, after a voyage from Rangoon, the Prince of Wales may be said to reach the penultimate stage of a prolonged, varied, and most interesting tour through the length and breadth of our Indian dominions. The visit of the present King Edward 30 years ago, when for the first time English Royalty made the acquaintance of the Indian people, was not nearly so fertile in opportunities and incidents, and the very appreciative replies made by the Prince to the various addresses presented to him and the spontaneous sentiments to which he gave expression show that he was profoundly moved by what he saw, and had profited by the rare facilities of travel which he enjoyed, and acquired a knowledge of the country of India and its people such as few men possess. His visit to Burma alone after he left Calcutta must have impressed him with the amazing extent and richness of King Edward's dominions. Burma is a world in itself which his father never saw, as it was only annexed to the Empire ten years ago, and the natural resources of this India beyond the Ganges have been immensely developed by the era of security and righteous government which English rule has introduced. The character of the people is quite distinct from that of the inhabitants of the main continent of India. They are a joyous, pleasure-loving race, fond of bright, vivid, and tasteful colours in flowers, dress, and architecture and even the ceremonies of their nature-loving religion seem a succession of popular pastimes.

But what strikes one most in the Prince's visit is the evident enjoyment he experienced in staying at the courts of the native princes in the interior of the country. Such cities as Jeypore, Ajmer, Oodeypore, and Gwalior are dreams of beauty and wealth, and one might imagine that they had been created by the wonderful lamp of Aladdin. Built on some lofty rock above the margin of a lovely lake, and embosomed among splendid trees, these cities, with their fantastic but harmonious architecture fill the eye of the admiring traveller with the pageant of the delicate and exquisite lace work of their marble palaces, and present a picture of perfect prosperity and enjoyment which may well gladden the heart of the heir to the English Crown. The long English peace, which has lasted now for more than a hundred years, has secured the native princes in the enjoyment of their ample revenues, has multiplied in many cases a hundredfold the productiveness of their resources, has secured them against the possibility of outside aggression and has endowed them with wealth exceeding the fabled magnificence of India in the days of her ancient prosperity before the country had been plundered by hordes of European invaders. What is more, the whole character of the native princes has been transformed. When King Edward, as Prince of Wales, travelled in the country, he resented the predominance of the European element which everywhere met his view. The native magnates were reduced to a subordinate position which irritated the King's desire to stimulate the cult of royalty, and men who ruled over territories as large as those of European States were mere puppets in the hands of Anglo-Indian officials. Now the old order has been changed, and the princes all quite emancipated. They rule their own territories, have their own railways and motor cars, and Maharaja Scindia, for instance, controls and manoeuvres his own troops, and is proud to take rank as a British general. The manliness of the princes has been developed, and now they take the lead in all field sports. It will have been noticed that, when the Prince was out tiger shooting, Scindia and Sir Pertab Singh advanced on foot against an enraged tigress, and shot her before she could come near the Royal party. Such an incident would have been impossible thirty years ago, and whether for good or ill, we have revived the ancient chivalry of India. I do not doubt the loyalty of the princes but the opinion will be general that Lord Kitchener pushed trustfulness too far when he wished to create anew the native artillery which was abolished after the mutiny.

So entirely were Europeans put on one side that in the great commercial city of Bombay the address to the Prince was read by a Parsee knight, who is the chairman of the local Corporation. The Prince, however, was not allowed to see the actual people of India, the dense masses of pleasant cultivators whose steadily growing impoverishment is the reproach of our rule. In India the rich grow richer and the poor grow poorer every day. The commerce of the country has been swollen to great dimensions, but only the merchants and middlemen make money by it. The producer gets a smaller return than ever for his crops. The officials are very proud of the ingenious device by which they have artificially raised the value of the rupee and so saved the Government the loss of several millions a year on the immense amount it is necessary for India to remit to London in rupees for the payment of the home charges. But it is obvious that this mode of manufacturing a surplus only diminishes the value of the return the ryot gets for his exports, because he is paid in rupees, and the higher the value of the rupee is artificially raised, the less is the quantity of the rupees he gets from his creditor. The financial surpluses, therefore, which the Indian Government is so proud of do no good to the country. Now that education has taken root in India, and that an intelligent class of the people has arisen, there are plenty of keen intellects that understand these questions, and the demand grows louder for self-government in order that India may administer her own finances and stop a waste of money which is now quite unchecked, and which seems bound to end in bankruptcy. The people allege, perhaps unfairly in many cases, that their arts and industries are stunted, and that the only effect of foreign rule is to drain away their wealth in the form of remittances to England. This is the explanation of the outcry we hear in favour of the encouragement of goods grown in the country in preference to foreign imports. Englishmen pool-pool this movement and say it is only a seditious agitation confined to Bengal and will soon die out. But Swadeshism has spread all through India, and is steadily gaining ground. Mr. Gokhale, the President of the National Congress held at Benares, spoke in its favour, and an industrial committee has been formed to encourage what is called boycotting. The action of the people is not directed solely against English merchandise, for the priests of Benares refused to receive offerings at their temples unless these gifts were made of sugar grown in the country, and this declaration only hits the chief exporters of beetroot sugar, Austria and Germany. But the prohibition of foreign goods will unquestionably injure the immense British trade in Manchester goods now carried on with India. The Indian mills are already formidable competitors with Manchester, and their capacity to produce finer goods increases every year. What is still more to the purpose is that India has begun to realise the greater delicacy of the cotton goods woven by the hand-loom which may be found in almost every Indian cottage. The hand-loom has been greatly improved of recent years. Lord Cromer has introduced it in Egypt, and it is probably destined to become everywhere a rival of the power-loom, which superseded it more than a century ago. It is astonishing to me that Manchester treats these portents so lightly, but the situation will soon demand the attention of the new Government.

With regard to political administration in India this, of course, is a matter outside the range of the Prince of Wales, but the resignation of Lord Curzon has not settled the thorny question which provoked his retirement. But Lord Kitchener seems to be content with having elbowed Lord Curzon out of India, or perhaps he has been sobered by the accession to power of a Government which is resolved to put its foot down on the pretensions of Indian militarism. At all events, he has become wonderfully modest in the claims to greater executive authority he now puts forward. It is quite a mistake, he tells us, to suppose that he wishes to make himself independent of the civil authority. No one recognises more fully than he does the right of the Viceroy to be supreme. Nor does he even ask that he shall have the financial control of military expenditure; he is quite content to leave this military power to the Military Member of Council. All he demands is that he shall be the sole executive chief of the army. Even his frontier policy has undergone a great modification. He no longer asks for twenty millions more to be taken at once out of the pockets of the Indian taxpayers. On the contrary, he is of opinion that we have nothing to fear from Russia for a good many years to come. The sole remnant of his former arrogance seems to be his statement to an interviewer that, when he wanted more men, he should simply call out "Roll up, Australia." Mr. J. Morley may be trusted to explain to Lord Kitchener that it is not his function as Commander-in-Chief to dictate what fresh troops he wants, and that it will not be for him to call "Roll up" to the Australians, or "Banzai" to the Japanese.

Standard.—A Reuter's Special Service telegram states that Lord Amptill, the Governor, in proposing a vote of thanks to the Prince and Princess of Wales, said that it was Queen Victoria who appointed him Governor of Madras, and Her Majesty's parting words were still ringing in his ears. They were: "Be kind and sympathetic to my people in India."

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE NEWSPAPERS PUBLISHED IN BENGAL FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 27TH JANUARY 1906.

Bharat Mitra.—In reviewing an article on Maharaja Colonel Sir Pratap Singh in the Arya Gazette, an Urdu paper of the Punjab in which the courage and bearing of that Prince has been highly extolled, the Bharat Mitra (Calcutta) of the 20th January says:—Sir Pratap Singh is really a hero, and what the correspondent of the aforesaid Punjab paper writes about him is quite correct. But along with bravery he has one failing in his character, which does not allow him to enjoy the benefit of his courage, and that is his extreme loyalty to the British. One must be loyal, but not at the cost of his own interests and honour. In doing so Maharaja Pratap has not only sacrificed his interest, but, in the opinion of many, his honour as well.

It is a pity that many persons do not know the present condition of Jodhpur. As has been stated above, the mind of Sir Pratap was greatly affected by the ill-treatment to which his nephew and his brother's ranis (wives) were subjected a few months ago. Do the readers know what that ill-treatment to which we allude was? It was the expulsion of his nephew, Maharaj Arjun Singh, the Commander-in-Chief of Jodhpur, together with his mother and ranis on the slightest pretext. But there is yet another and a greater evil than this—it is the present condition of the Maharaja of Jodhpur. Some time ago His Highness was not allowed to stay within his own territory; but although he is now living within his own State, the chief control of the Raj is in the hands of the British Resident, and under his directions Pandit Sukdeva Prasad carries on the administration of Jodhpur, while the Maharaja either plays at polo or at times goes out hunting. His Highness spends the night in the Fort, but in the morning returns to his bungalow. Either the English or the native guardian is his constant attendant: the latter, of course, is the creature of Pandit Sukdeva Prasad. The Maharaja is not allowed to talk to anybody: if anybody comes to pay his respects to the Maharaja, he must do so from a distance and retire. It is said that in the case of a few men written agreement has been taken that they would not only not go near the Maharaja but that they would not have any communication with His Highness on any subject either in writing or by signs or symbols. Many people being thus hard pressed have given up even paying their respects to him. Many years have elapsed since the Maharaja attained majority, but he is being kept in a condition worse than that of a minor. The Indians do not like that the Rajputs should become mean flatterers. But it may be allowed if it be productive of some good. In spite of his high-sounding title, "the Chief of His Royal Highness's Staff," Maharaja Pratap could not save his nephew, Arjun Singh, from indignity or secure ruling powers for himself.

Bharat Mitra.—In noticing the Royal gift of Rs. 1,500 each to the Durbar Sahib of Amritsar, the Juma Masjid of Delhi, and the Church of Calcutta, the Bharat Mitra (Calcutta) of the 20th instant observes:—The Prince has hitherto made no present to any Hindu Temple, but it is probable that His Royal Highness may make a similar present to the Golden Temple at Benares.

Ukaldipaka.—The same paper regrets that the Prince of Wales did not visit the native quarters of the Calcutta town, and was therefore not in a position to carry away correct impressions about Calcutta. The advisers of His Royal Highness did not act wisely.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE PAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE BOMBAY PRESIDENCY FOR THE WEEK ENDING 27TH JANUARY 1906.

Jam-e-Jamshed, 23RD JANUARY.—It is announced that the Railway earnings during the current financial year will undoubtedly contribute handsomely to the expected surplus in the Budget at the end of March. The reason for this is that up to the end of December the increase in earnings over the results of the year 1904 has been considerably over half a crore of rupees. While taking note of this most satisfactory news, one cannot help asking if this should not be an additional reason to encourage the Government to accede to the wish so universally expressed to let the people have some substantial memento of the Royal tour—something that would, as we have repeatedly said, make the people remember and appreciate the visit paid to them by their future Emperor and his Consort. It is the popular impression that, in former times, when sovereigns went about visiting the people, they left behind some tangible and substantial memento of their regard and good will for their subjects—some Royal bounty in the shape of remissions of State dues or reduction of the load of taxation. It would be disappointing indeed if Their Royal Highnesses were to go away without leaving some such token of Royal kindness behind. Under the British constitution Their Royal Highnesses are, of course helpless in the matter. They cannot do anything independently, even if they wished. It is for the Government to help them, and the people certainly hope that Lord Minto will see that a substantial Royal gift is made to His Majesty's Indian subjects before Their Royal Highnesses bid good-bye to them. Cannot the salt tax, we ask again, be done away with?

Kesari, 23RD JANUARY.—The Royal visitors have left Burma and are at present on their way to Madras. In giving descriptions of the festivities in connection with the Royal tour in that province the Anglo-Indian journalists have classed the Burmese above the Indians in point of the cordiality and enthusiasm of their welcome to the Royal guests. The Indians, we think, have done their best in according a loyal reception to the Prince, and if in spite of this it is considered to have fallen short of the mark, they are simply helpless in the matter. The Indian rayat, under the grinding roller of alien rule for over a century, has been rendered morally and politically decrepit and is now utterly devoid of vitality. He could not, therefore, put on a cheery look on the occasion of the Royal visit. If the Burmese, who have been only recently brought under the crushing pressure of the roller of British rule, appeared to the Prince more cheerful than their fellow-subjects in other parts of the country, the latter surely are not to blame in the matter. The Prince, in one of his speeches in Burma, expressed his admiration at the "extraordinary variety of races, religions and languages which are so harmoniously blended in the large centres of the Indian Empire," and said "this harmony is due to the wise policy of tolerance for all creeds, and of equal justice for all races." As regards British justice and equality, we have only to say that the statement contains only a half-truth as far as our experience of the matter goes. The principles of justice and equality are fairly adhered to in cases between Indians and Indians, but where the parties happen to be Englishmen and Indians, the fact is otherwise.

Bakui, 21st JANUARY.—Looking like a disinterested spectator upon the performances that are being enacted on Indian stage, one does not know whether to rejoice or feel sorrowful at the doings of the administrators and their flatterers and whether to call them human beings or two-legged brutes. Famine in a terrible form has begun to be felt in the United Provinces and Oudh, Rājputāna, the Punjab, Konkan and Gujarāt, and in the first two provinces in particular the situation has become very grave, indeed, and cattle are perishing for want of fodder and water. If this kind of destitution had been actually experienced in their households by the authorities and their flatterers, would they ever have thought of spending money lavishly upon the reception of the Prince of Wales as they are doing now? Would they have been forward in making extravagant demonstrations in honour of His Royal Highness? The answer to the above query must be that if they had retained their humanity they would never have acted in the manner they are doing. We are quite sure that if the fact of the people's suffering, the dire miseries of famine and perishing for want of food had been duly brought to the notice of the Prince, he would never have approved of any costly demonstrations being held in his honour. He would certainly have felt that the money spent upon his reception would better have been devoted to afford relief to the famine-stricken. It must be admitted by every thoughtful person that the poor, relieved in this manner, would have blessed the British raj and ensured its stability for a long time. It would be desirable if the authorities and their flatterers were to look at the matter from the above standpoint and to earn the blessings of the poor. If they do not do so and spend the poor rayat's money upon giving a gorgeous reception to the Prince, they will undoubtedly help to produce discontent and indignation among the people. The less of such discontent there is in the country, the better for the rulers.

MADRAS AND VERNACULAR PAPERS PUBLISHED IN MADRAS
FOR THE WEEK ENDING 27TH JANUARY 1906.

Desabhimani.—The Desabhimani, of the 20th January, considers that the Indians will be very fortunate, if a scion of the British Royal family becomes the Viceroy of India and that, in case the Prince of Wales is appointed to govern India, the country will improve tenfold, the grievances of the people will be redressed, and their loyalty will increase.

Vikata Dulan.—The Vikata Dulan, of the 20th January, writes that there is no use in the Prince visiting the Madras City, but that he should visit every nook and corner of this Presidency and personally witness the sufferings which the people undergo owing to the failure of the monsoon, official oppression, failure of justice and heavy taxation.

The Swadesi, of the 24th January, and the Sarvajanamitran, of the 26th idem, welcome Their Royal Highnesses to Madras and pray to God that they may be blessed with long life and prosperity.

The Swadesamitran, of the 26th January, observes that during his short stay in Madras, the Prince of Wales will see nothing but splendour and will have no occasion to witness the sufferings of the millions of poor people. It adds that, if the Emperor of India lived in this country, he would have opportunities of becoming acquainted with the miseries of the poor, and that it is the misfortune of the people of India that His Majesty failed to instruct his son to report to him their real condition after personal inspection.

The same paper, of the 27th January, alluding to the Prince's reply to the address presented by the public of Madras, in which he expressed the wish that his present visit to India would be productive of advantages to himself and to the Indians, states that by conferring political privileges on the people and by abolishing some of the oppressive taxes, his wish may be realized.

The Prapanchatarakai, of the 27th January, in welcoming Their Royal Highnesses, observes that the Prince should not judge, from the costly and splendid arrangements which were made for his reception, that this country is prosperous, but that on the other hand he should realize that the major portion of the population is poor and starving. It further states that if this country were governed in accordance with the terms of the Proclamation of Her Majesty the late Queen Victoria, it would not have been reduced to the present miserable condition, and that innumerable disasters will ensue both to the rulers and the ruled if the existing state of affairs be allowed to continue. This paper, therefore, requests that the Prince should realize all these and inform his father of the same.

Manorama.—A leader in the Manorama, of the 26th January referring to the allotment of places to the Rajahs of Malabar in the Royal procession in Madras, remarks that they were placed in a lower rank than that given to them on the occasion of the visit of the Prince of Wales in 1875. It appears that these Rajahs, who were once the rulers of the country, felt this very keenly and think that they have been insulted by being placed below certain zamindars and Government officials whose status is lower than that of the Rajahs. The article animadverts strongly on the action of His Excellency Lord Amthill in considering the claims of the Malabar Rajahs to precedence over the zamindars, etc., and remarks that at the beginning of His Excellency's régime the people of Malabar were burdened by the enhancement of the assessment of the district and now, on the eve of his departure, His Excellency has lowered the dignity and status of the Rajahs by placing them very low in the procession. The article concludes with the hope that if this mistake was made inadvertently, His Excellency will before his departure place on record a minute, regretting the mistake His Excellency made in allotting places to the Malabar Rajahs in the Royal procession.

28TH JANUARY 1906.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The entertainment given last night by the public of Madras to Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales was the occasion for a great gathering, and for a spectacle of which the chief impressions were the illuminations and profuse fireworks. The entertainment was decided upon as long ago as June last, and the intervening time had enabled an elaborate and effective setting to be designed and completed. A fine drive round the Island with its margin fringed with masses of soft lights and past an illuminated model of the Victory floating on the water led to a great pillared pandal, splendid in decorations of cream and gold, and ablaze with light. Designed like a Hindu marriage pandal, its front was topped by a castellated elevation of Hindu design, and many domes completed the building. The Royal enclosure and its wings formed a horseshoe, the pillars and wide galleries of the amphitheatre being of masonry. Facing the Royal enclosure was a theatre for dramatic performances. Their Royal Highnesses arrived in State, driving into the arena. They were received on the steps of the Royal pavilion by Lord Amphilhill and Sir Subramania Aiyar, President of the Entertainment Committee. The address from all the people of the presidency was read immediately, and after the Prince had replied the entertainment began.

Hindu musicians sang a song of welcome in Sanskrit, composed by Mr. Jagannatha Bhat, Gowani, a Tanjore palace pundit. A translation rendered this chant as follows:—"Gracious be great Prince George, Emperor's heir-apparent, illustrious world burdens' sustainer. May the Almighty bless the Maharajah and his Royal consort with health and happiness. Even in the firmament the sun and moon are not seen together, but all the assembly are now here."

Before this music ceased wild yells had been heard, and when the musicians had removed themselves, in rushed a wild crowd of Khonds. They were armed with spears and curious battle axes. Some carried great oblong shields covered with leopard skins on their backs, and bristling with great bunches of feathers. False beards and other eccentricities completed their fearsome aspect. Their body coverings were close fitting coats over short bellounced skirts, mostly of a dull red or brown colour. Primed with arrack, they danced a savage war dance yelling shrilly the while, and charging together in mimic combat. Coming from Ganjam to Madras for the first time, these people were a revelation of the barbarism which still exists in the wild tracts of the country. The Khonds are described as being too simple-minded to speak other than the truth, but the men are given to drunkenness and occasionally break out in pursuit of revenge, and in fits of brutal passion. They are great hunters, and having great powers of endurance and fleetness of foot they rarely abandon pursuit of a wounded animal until they have run him down.

The rest of the programme after the performance by these people consisted of a dramatic performance, an exhibition by performing birds, feats by a strong man, conjuring, sword and acrobatic performances, and memory feats by a Brahmin. The fireworks had been going on all the time, a number of novel features being introduced, and there was a great discharge of bombs and rockets as Their Royal Highnesses were about to depart. The Prince and Princess drove off amid great cheering.

To-day the Prince returned the visit of the Rajah of Cochin. After granting certain private interviews this afternoon, the Prince proceeds to lay the foundation stone of the Victoria Memorial Hall of the Technical Institute at Egmore. This institution was originally projected as a memorial of Queen Victoria at the time of the Jubilee celebration in 1887. The Government provided a building which was afterwards devoted to the Art and Industrial section of the Museum. The funds placed at the disposal of the Council of the Institute were devoted to scholarships until 1894, when, in consequence of the activities of the Education Department, it was decided to husband the Council's resources. The memorial decided upon when Queen Victoria died was a fund for the encouragement of technical and industrial education in co-operation with the already existing Victoria Technical Institute. The funds were amalgamated, and Government made a grant of Rs. 75,000 towards the building of a Memorial Hall to form the headquarters of the Institute, a bureau of information, a lecture hall and a centre for exhibition of specimens of the presidency arts and crafts. Government bought the site for Rs. 27,000 and presented it to the Council, subject to a payment of Rs. 10,000. The plans have been prepared by Mr. Henry Irwin, late Consulting Architect to Government. The design is of the Moghul period, similar to the buildings at Fatehpur Sikri. The exterior will be of cut sandstone and beneath the windows on external walls will be sculptured bas-reliefs illustrating events of the Victorian era. The interior ornamentation will be Moghul in style, carried out in the white polished plaster for which Madras is noted.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—Recent Home papers contain references to some of the curiosities to be seen at Mr. Imre Schwaiger's, Delhi, which was lately honoured by a visit from the Prince of Wales, who personally congratulated Mr. Schwaiger on his veritable museum of Indian curios. A visit to Delhi will convince anyone of the value of the wonderful collection of curios and works of art which Mr. Imre Schwaiger has got together, and of these perhaps none are of more engrossing interest than the remarkable collection from Tibet, a collection which, while intrinsically valuable in itself, serves to reveal the artistic ingenuity of our new friends over the border. Mr. Schwaiger is pleased to show the apron worn by the ex-Dalai Lama, an article wrought in pure ivory and beads, ivory skulls being a feature of this wonderful apron. Frescoes taken off the walls of Buddhist temples, bells that have been used to the accompaniment of some weird Buddhist chant, and scores of other interesting relics of monastery or temple render Mr. Schwaiger's shop—museum is the more appropriate term to apply to it—a great attraction for tourists to Delhi. Many of these articles will be shortly on their way to the British Museum.

The writer on "Indian Affairs" in the Times, commenting on the new Bombay Harbour Works of which the Prince of Wales recently laid the foundation stone, is evidently persuaded of the manifest advantages of the Western Metropolis and has a firm faith in its future. Of the four principal seaports of India (excluding Burma) he considers that Bombay is most bountifully endowed by nature with facilities for development. Madras, beaten by a perpetual surf, he thinks, will never repay expensive schemes for the construction of a really safe harbour. Karachi cannot be approached by large ships until much money had been spent on artificial work. Rapidly as it is advancing as a port of outlet for the surplus produce of the granary of India, it comes very far behind the great trade centres of Bombay and Calcutta, though it is suggested that there may come a day when its increasing prosperity will be a thorn in the side of both.

Madras Mail.—Various changes in the Mysore programme for the Royal Visit have been made and are published in the Mysore Gazette issued yesterday. The time of arrival of Their Royal Highnesses at Mysore has been changed from 1-30 p.m. on the 29th instant to 3-30 p.m. His Highness the Maharajah will visit His Royal Highness at 4-30 p.m., and His Royal Highness will return the visit at 5-15 on the same date. The foundation stone of the Chamarajendra Technical Institute will be laid by His Royal Highness at 10-30 a.m. on the 30th instant, instead of at 8-30 p.m., as first arranged. The journey to the Shooting Camp on the 31st instant will commence at 10 a.m. and the Royal Party will return to Mysore at 11 a.m. on the 4th February.

Madras Mail.—The following is an official description of the silver casket in which the Bangalore Municipality is presenting its Address to His Royal Highness on the 5th proximo:—

The casket, which is of solid silver throughout, is of an appropriate design, showing that it comes from the Civil and Military Station of Bangalore. The front face shows the Civil side with two views of the Station embossed on oxidised silver panels. One is of the new block of buildings comprising the Public Offices with the Mayo Hall, and the other a charming view of the Ulsoor lake. These panels are divided by the Prince of Wales in frosted silver showing the coronet and letters of the motto "Ich Dien" in burnished gilt. The panels are framed within a jungle scene with elephants among cocoanut trees. The whole of the opposite side of the casket shows one large panel, on which is depicted an interesting group comprising one from every unit in the Bangalore Garrison. The R. H. A., R. F. A. (a gun team) the Carabineers, 30th Lancers, Essex, Bangalore Rifle Volunteers, 69th Punjabis, 77th Moplah Rifles, 64th Pioneers, Army Bearer and Mule Corps, each contribute a man in Field Service order towards this interesting group, which was specially photographed for the purpose of being reproduced on the casket. The two sides show groups of palms embossed on them, and at each of the four corners is a modelled clump or group of coconut trees in oxidised silver, which gives a gracefulness of shape quite unique and distinct from anything we have yet seen in decorated metal artware. The lid of the casket assumes a pyramidal shape, with gracefully pierced scrolls running down the four sides. It is surmounted by a model of the Prince of Wales's crest, which is a Royal Crown surmounted by a Lion statant.

The base shows an elaborate embossed design burnished and frosted in parts, and below this is a delicate pierced scroll, within which is introduced a mural crown, the badge of the Municipal Commission of the Civil and Military Station of Bangalore. The casket is lined with royal blue silk velvet and is fitted on to a real ebony plinth, on which is fitted a silver plate, with the following inscription engraved on it:—

"Presented to Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales by the Municipal Commission, Civil and Military Station, Bangalore, 5th February, 1906."

Madras Mail.—Some of my readers may remember the story of old Ahmed Ali and of how he went to the great Durbar at Delhi and died there from cold and exposure. The old man's medal, of which he was so proud, and his few belongings were sent back to his daughter, who, sad and tearful, had watched him depart from his little quiet village full of pride and hope on his long journey to the north—never to return. She, poor woman, was left badly off as a widow with children. She had come back to live and care for her old father. At his death, of course, his pension ceased and she was left alone and poor. The little mud hut and an acre of ground were hers, so she managed to get along without having to appeal for charity and nothing could induce her to part with the medal her father had won in the Mutiny, though the young Civilian who had been very fond of the old man offered her quite a large sum for it. She gave him the tall staff her father used to use when he went up to see the Sahib-log, but refused to take a single pice in payment, though the staff was unique of its kind. The young man was able, however, to befriend her in many ways without her knowledge, for though poor, she was proud.

It was some years later when, one evening, she went to the well—a regular gossip corner—for water and also to have a "crack" with any neighbour who happened to be there—for it is cheerful to hear a bit of news at times, and if a stranger were there, well, the story of Ahmed Ali and the Durbar was sure to be asked for—and if one has distinguished relations, surely there is no harm in saying so; and if, by accident, one should have the King's letter in the folds of one's cloth, there is no harm in producing it should people seem at all sceptical. It was a curious coincidence that on that very evening Sheikh Hassan's married daughter from Madras should be at the well with her sisters and that she should have the letter with her!

Sheikh Hassan's daughter had news in plenty, and when Fatima, by some re-arrangement of her cloth, let fall the King's letter the conversation naturally turned that way. Sheikh Hassan's daughter tossed her head airily and said:—"The King never went to Delhi, but the King's son is coming to Madras, and that is the truth. There will not be standing room when he comes, the flags will be so thick one will scarce see the sky. Her great ladyship, his Princess, will be with him, so covered with jewels and gold that they say the eye aches to see such splen-dour. In Bombay the Indian ladies showered pearls and roses over her and strewed her path with the fairest flowers, so rejoiced were they to see so fair and gracious a lady. The King's son is as brave as he is kind. His shooting is as the shooting of the God of Sport; in the jungles his path has been strewn with the dead bodies of the tigers and wild animals he has slain."

Fatima returned to her hut and sat thinking and thinking far into the night. It was late when she rose with decided and business-like air and counted over a little hoard of coins she had put aside for a rainy day; the amount was just enough to take her by train to a station, some miles from Madras it is true, but she could easily walk the rest of the way. She had made up her mind to take the medal to Madras and give it to the King's son, and beg him to take it to the King himself and tell him how Ahmed Ali had obeyed his orders and had gone to Delhi to meet him. She slipped away in the early morning to walk the 60 miles to the nearest railway station. Tired and hungry she got there in less than five days, sleeping in the open and only buying enough food to keep her going. She had some miles to walk into Madras and got there the day of the Prince and Princess's arrival in the city. She had never seen so large or so gay a town, and was like a child in her thorough enjoyment of the brilliant scene around her. Hunger and fatigue were forgotten, and when she was told that the Prince was to pass in a short time her joy knew no bounds—"Just in time. What good fortune!"

The procession slowly drew near, the crowd cheering and blessing the Royal couple as they bowed graciously to the thousands assembled to greet them and to do them honour. There was a crash in one corner, so the Royal carriage passed for an instant. Now was Fatima's chance, and she darted through the line of soldiers guarding the road and flung her precious packet into the carriage. For a moment there was confusion, and poor Fatima was seized in triumph by two native constables. But the Princess had opened the parcel and discovered the Medal. She passed it to the Prince, and, by some sudden inward intuition, they guessed there was a story attached to the ancient relic before them. They exchanged a few words and gave an order to the Officer who rode up, and passed on their way.

Some days after a joyous woman arrived in the Indian village and a crowd such as her heart loved, gathered round to hear her wonderful story. With pride she told how she had been taken to see the King's son and his Princess; they had asked for the tale of Ahmed Ali and she had told them all, and they had said it was not fitting that so brave a soldier's daughter should lack a pension, and she was to receive the same as her father did as long as she should live; it was quite true that the Princess was dazzling to look on, her eyes shone like stars, and her smile was the smile of one who had many sons, and the Medal the King's son had promised to give it to the King with his own hand.

Sunday Times.—One of the most interesting experiences of the Prince and Princess of Wales is their visit to the Sacred Temples in our vast Indian Empire.

In His Royal Highness's speech on landing at Rangoon, he laid particular stress on the satisfactory results due to the wide toleration of all creeds and the respect shown by the governing classes to the religious rites of all castes and denominations in India. This toleration under the English Government is doubtless the principal reason why no opposition is shown by devout Hindu worshippers to the entrance of the Feringhee into his temples.

Amongst the most wonderful of these is the one visited during their sojourn in Burma by the Prince and Princess of Wales whilst at Rangoon—namely, the Shwe Dagon Pagoda, the great golden spire of which tapers something like 380 feet into the air. And from Japan and China, from India and Ceylon, come crowding pilgrims to this temple, supposed to be one of the most ancient shrines of the great priest Buddha.

Many of the temples in India are veritable Aladdin's caves, full of buried treasure, and it is interesting to quote the experiences of an English visitor to a certain Indian temple.

In this the jewels and gold displayed were hoarded up exclusively to the service of Shiva (the Unspeakable), the cruel, many-headed goddess of slaughter and death, who reckons to this day so many millions of our Indian fellow-subjects as her worshippers, though all outwardly cruel rites in her honour have long ago been put an end to by the British Government. Here, too, Vishnu is honoured by a marvellous collection of jewels stored in the temple vaults, all of which, as the result of much "backsheesh," were displayed to the astonished Englishman's gaze by the priests.

Through the centuries these treasures have accumulated as offerings from wealthy Hindoo patrons of this form of worship, and amongst them are golden-head ornaments, said to be 2,000 years old, and worn by great princesses of the Zenanas of long ago.

All the gems were set in solid gold so unalloyed that the precious metal bent to the touch, and amongst the items were such things as all round jewelled golden crowns and heavy bracelets and nose rings and anklets to match. Most of these are heavily encrusted with diamonds, rubies, pearls, and sapphires, and one out of several pure gold breast plates was hung round with immense pear-shaped pearls, all at one time Crown jewels belonging to reigning houses in India. Then, literally lying in heaps, were shown long ropes of pearls some of these threaded alternately with huge bead-shaped sapphires or rubies, and bewilderingly beautiful was the small figure of an idol, cut entirely out of one immense ruby, every detail of face and figure being carved in lifelike fashion. Aigrettes, such as the native princes always wear, powdered with brilliants, and State umbrellas ferrules, encrusted with magnificent stones, and the so-called "Goddess-Tridents," all of solid beaten gold. The priests also showed whole sets of ancient solid gold chased armour, and of the single gems were sapphires in the rough.

The solid gold ornaments comprised vases and jugs for altar uses, specimens of gold-carved figures reputed to be 1,000 years old, gold-sealed fishes, and serpents crawling with jewels, as it were; and last, but not least, one great golden breastplate literally covered with priceless rubies, fairly staggered the onlooker.

The jewels are most carefully guarded by the priests themselves, and as Western civilisation has not yet suggested the use of the iron safe, they are kept in immense, ancient, iron-bound, wooden chests heavily padlocked. Temple etiquette demands that whenever the treasure is shown to strangers it shall be in the presence of not fewer than seven Brahmin priests, who are personally responsible for their safe-guarding, and five or six separate keys to fit the same number of separate padlocks must be produced, and an equal number of seals, broken before even one of these jewel chests can be opened. In this one Hindu temple alone it is computed roughly that there is, at this moment several million pounds' worth of treasure accumulated in the service of the ancient gods, and, in looking at these marvels of a past age, one can only sigh to think that such gorgeous gems should have lain hidden from human eye for so many centuries, and pray that, with the spread of religious enlightenment and the decay of superstition, these beautiful things may be properly utilised instead of being hoarded as the useless treasure trove of idols!

Englishman.—The last days of the Prince and Princess of Wales in Madras were spent in close association with the historical monuments of the early days of the British in India, in which the city is so singularly rich. On Saturday they visited Fort St. George which now, after nearly two and a half centuries of chequered history, is still the seat of Government and enfolded the principal Administrative offices. From here was directed the long contest that stamped out the efforts of the French to establish a dominion in the East. This was the base of the military operations which crushed Haidar Ali and Tippu Sultan, the most formidable enemies the nascent power had to meet until it came to death grips with the Maharattas. Here too, the French gained an initial advantage, when they captured the fortress which, wisely pursued, might have made them the dominant power in India. The old ramparts have been breached and partly removed and some day, no doubt, the Government officers will be reverted to hand-somer and more convenient lines. But surely nothing will be allowed to interfere with the conservatism of a site immortalised by the genius of Robert Clive.

We have fallen into the habit of dating Indian history from the tragedy and epic of the fifties. But there were great Anglo-Indians before Nicholson, though even Madras, the scene of his earliest triumphs, has found no time to publicly commemorate the work of the greatest of them all, Clive, or that other distinguished soldier, Coote. While within the fort the Prince and Princess devoted a fruitful hour to the examination of the historical records in St. Mary's Church. St. Mary's is not only the oldest place of worship built by the English settlers in India, but claims to be the only oldest British building of any kind in India, for it was dedicated in 1678 and retains the thick walls and the original rounded bomb proof roof. Here Job Charnock's three daughters were baptised in 1689. Robert Clive was married to Miss Haskeltyne in 1753, and the Elihu Yale was married, who afterwards gave his name to the great American University.

On Saturday all Madras assembled in the pleasant park, for it is nothing less of Government House at a garden party. This morning Their Royal Highnesses attended the Divine Service at St. Mary's Church and left quietly for Mysore after dinner. Thus closed their stay in the third presidency city visited. It leaves none but the happiest memories. For this has been a real people's holiday. They flocked into Madras from all the surrounding districts. They assembled in their scores of thousands wherever the Prince and Princess were to be met. They rang with good humour and enjoyment on each and every occasion. Those who were unable to come to Madras kept high revel in their own town and villages. The Prince and Princess brought everyone together on terms of the most cordial amity. It was the presidency, as a whole, who welcomed the Royal guests and not any particular class. And mingled with the Royal greeting were genuine marks of affection for the Governor and Lady Amptill, which deepened the joyous note. Then every arrangement was carried out with a care and exactness of detail of which any Government might be proud. The visit will leave its prominent mark upon the city in the alteration of the name of the native town from Black Town to George Town, thus obliterating a slight but invidious distinction.

Indian Daily News.—The garden party given this afternoon by Lord and Lady Amptill in the charming grounds of Government House was largely attended, the gathering including a number of Rajahs, Zemindars and native gentlemen, as well as a few of the native ladies who were present at the purdah party which the Princess attended earlier in the afternoon. These gave a note of deep colour among the bright dresses of the European ladies and the white of military and naval uniforms.

The Prince and Princess arrived about five o'clock and stayed till six, many people being presented to them. The introductions were in front of a shamiana facing the lake which Government House overlooks. From a little distance the extensive grounds are thickly wooded with groves of heavily foliated palms and other exuberant tropical trees. A herd of antelope have their home in this park, which is seventy acres in extent and forms one of the most charming enclosures that any Government House in India can boast.

To-night there has been a brilliant display of fireworks from the Hyacinth and the Fox in the harbour.

That portion of Madras hitherto known as Black Town will in future be called George Town. A Gazette Extraordinary issued by the Madras Government states the change is made at the expressed desire of the Prince to whom the popular sentiment in the matter has been represented. The Prince regrets that time will not permit of a visit to this portion of the city. The name George Town appropriately revives the older associations of Fort St. George which was visited by the Prince and Princess at noon yesterday, when they also went over the old church of St. Mary's, where they attended service this morning. St. Mary's has the distinction of being the first of the English Churches built in India, and is probably the oldest structure of British building in India now standing.

The Prince and Princess attended service this morning at St. Mary's, Fort St. George. The rest of the day was spent quietly. Their Royal Highnesses are leaving Madras to-night after dinner for Mysore.

Mysore Herald.—To-day is a red letter day for the capital of this Province. For we will have to-day the proud privilege of welcoming to the capital our future Emperor and Empress. We, in this Native State, have reason to be more grateful and loyal to the British Throne than the subjects of any other Native State. We have received at the hands of the British Government blessings which cannot be exaggerated. After the fall of Seringapatam the British Government made a gift of this Province to His Highness the late Maharaja Sri Mumtaz Ali Wodeyar Bahadur. In 1881 they restored the State to His Highness the late Maharaja after administering the country for 50 years. They trained the late and the present Maharajas and gave them the help of Native Administrators of such exceptional abilities as Mr. Rangachari, Sir Seshadri Iyer, Mr. T. R. A. Thumboo Chettiar, and Sir Krishna Murti, the present Dewan. The good done to the State by a number of British Residents, guardians of the late and present Maharajas and their Private Secretaries, is simply incalculable. The honour which the Heir-Apparent to the British Throne has shown us is one for which we cannot be sufficiently grateful and loyal. We pray to God, that God the Almighty will enable Their Royal Highnesses to enjoy their tour in this province and bear in mind the humble claim that Mysore has for the love and affection of the British Throne.

29TH JANUARY 1906.

Pioneer.—Their Royal Highnesses, accompanied by Lord and Lady Ampthill, visited Fort St. George at noon to-day and were shown interesting and historical sights in the old fortress, including St. Mary's Church. In the afternoon a pardah party was given by Lady Ampthill at the banqueting-hall, at which a large number of Indian ladies were presented to Her Royal Highness. In the evening Lord and Lady Ampthill gave a garden party in the grounds of Government House, at which a large and distinguished company was present to meet Their Royal Highnesses.

H. M. S. Hyacinth will leave the harbour on Monday next in company with H. M. S. Fox and will proceed to Trincomalee. She will leave the latter vessel there and proceed to Bombay where she will await the arrival of H. M. S. Hermes, which left England yesterday. The Admiral's flag will then be transferred to H. M. S. Hermes and the Hyacinth will leave for England.

Pioneer.—In connection with the Royal visit to Madras the Honorary Secretaries of the Reception Committee, Mr.

H. C. King, a solicitor of several years' standing, and the Hon'ble Mr. V. C. Deisikachariar, High Court Vakil and a prominent Congressman, have received the honour of Knighthood.

The Times.—Though the programme of the Royal visit here has not been unduly crowded, the inhabitants of Madras have had ample opportunities of seeing the Prince and Princess, and nowhere in India has it been possible to rely more fully on the orderliness and loyalty of the people themselves to control the behaviour of the immense crowds which have thronged their passage on every occasion.

Besides the usual official functions—a levee, a State dinner, a garden party in the beautiful grounds of Government House, and a most brilliant and picturesque popular entertainment—the incident of perhaps the most permanent interest in Madras was the laying of the foundation-stone of the new Technical Institute in memory of Queen Victoria. This handsome hall for the exhibition of the industrial arts of Southern India will be erected by private subscription on a site appropriately contiguous to the museum, which is one of the most popular and best conducted institutions of the kind in India. The numbers of visitors which the museum attracts every day afford remarkable evidence of the intelligent curiosity and alertness of the people of Madras.

Their Royal Highnesses, who leave to-night for Mysore, attended Divine Service this morning at St. Mary's, which is the oldest English church in India. Madras is full of interesting historical associations belonging to the earliest period of British expansion in India, but none is likely to have appealed more strongly to the feelings of the Prince and Princess, who have everywhere shown the keenest interest in everything connected with the growth of the British Raj and the vicissitudes through which it passed in its earlier stages.

Times of India.—An entertainment to the students and teachers of Mangalore was given by Mr. M. Pais at his gardens last evening in honour of the Royal visit. The gardens were illuminated and over 2,000 boys and girls were present with their teachers, as also the elite of the European and Native communities.

A telegram was sent to Their Royal Highnesses by His Lordship, the Catholic Bishop, conveying the loyal greetings of the Catholic community.

Tribune.—The Prince of Wales's visit to Madras has been marked by a graceful popular act. The invidious name of "Black Town," by which the native quarter of the city has been known since the founding of Fort St. George by the British, has been officially changed, with the Prince's permission, to George Town. The change of name was announced to-day in a special issue of the official "Gazette."

30TH JANUARY 1906.

Daily Chronicle.—After a lapse of five weeks the Prince and Princess of Wales are once more the guests of a Native Prince. Mysore is the most modern and most prosperous of all the Native States of India, but still, like Madras, it recalls memories of the early days of the British struggles to obtain a foothold in Southern India. The names of Stringer Lawrence, Clive, and Sir Eyre Coote on the one hand, and Hyder Ali and Tippu Sultan on the other are indissolubly associated with many a hard-fought battle and many a glorious victory.

Situated on a healthy plateau, and served by an ancient system of irrigation, Mysore is more free from famine than almost any other internal tract of India. It holds within its borders both agricultural and mineral wealth. Famous for its gold mines and its coffee plantations, it also produces ivory and sandal-wood; while the gold mines are worked by electric power from the Cauvery Falls, the first installation of similar magnitude in Asia.

Mysore is also remarkable as the chief example of the reversal of the British policy of confiscating Native States, which did so much to bring on the Mutiny. In 1831, in consequence of misrule and rebellion, the British Government abolished native rule and took over the direct administration of the State; but in 1881 they once more restored the native rulers to power after a lapse of fifty years, and so inaugurated the modern policy of British rule towards Native States, which has done so much to consolidate our relations with our feudatories and make them thoroughly loyal. They now know that they are secure upon their thrones as long as the British power lasts in India. The present Maharaja is a young man twenty-two years of age, who has already won a reputation as an able administrator.

But Mysore is so indelibly stamped with its connection with the British Government and with its long administration by British officials that it has inevitably lost some of the bizarre charm of the antique native State. It is a Native State without the picturesque survivals which marked the Royal entry into other principalities. Except for the chamras, or running footmen, and the household troops armed with Enfield muzzle loaders, there was little to suggest the anomalies of native rule. The road from the station to the Residency led through broad and good streets, and past a new palace reviving the almost forgotten arts of Southern India. The Royal party were escorted by a smart body of Imperial Service Lancers, while the highly useful Transport Corps of the State, was much in evidence. A dense crowd left the impression of a prosperous and happy people.

To-morrow the Royal party visit Seringapatam, the scene of more than one famous siege, where the death of Tippu Sultan brought the long struggle with the British to an end. On Wednesday they leave for a shooting camp, where the feature of the occasion will be a drive of wild elephants into a keddah, or stockade, where they are captured with the aid of tame decoy elephants. This is still the Royal sport of Southern India, and occupies the place held by tiger-shooting in Central India. We arrive at Bangalore on Monday.

Daily Telegraph.—A pleasant journey across Southern India brought the Royal train last night from Madras to Mysore. The change of scenery from the rich, steaming greenery of the low East Coast to the bare and unclad highlands which are the forerunners of the Western Ghats was very marked, but the loss of natural beauty is to some extent compensated by the freshness and coolness of the air.

Mysore as a State occupies a unique position among the ruling chieftainates of India, and the high level of prosperity and material welfare reached by it is ample justification for our policy in surrendering to the native dynasty territory once held and administered as British. Mysore itself is without interest, architectural or natural, and the central event of Their Royal Highnesses's visit here is the keddah, or wild elephant drive, which will take place in the Prince's presence. For the rest, Seringapatam, about ten miles away, will provide an interesting day's excursion.

The Prince was received at the station to-day with a guard of honour, furnished by the Maharaja's troops, and on his way to Government House passed the site of the new Technical Institute, of which he will lay the foundation-stone. As I write he is returning the Maharaja's visit, and the guns of his salute are echoing among the barren hills which ring in the plain on which Mysore is scattered.

Englishman.—Since leaving Gwalior on Christmas Day Their Royal Highnesses have not enjoyed the hospitality of a ruling chief until they entered Mysore in State to-day. And Mysore is the penultimate stage in the long progress through the territories of the great feudatories which began at Indore in November. From Mysore the Prince and Princess travel to Hyderabad and after bidding farewell to the Nizam their State visits cease as the sojourn in Nepal is to be for the purpose of a fortnight's shooting.

Mysore is a great Native State with the usual picturesque accompaniments of Indian rule left out. It was so long under British administration and under the control of able Native Ministers, well versed in British methods, that it has lost nearly all its distinctive marks. In the broad well kept streets the green Curzon Park and the varied and characterless architecture there is nothing to distinguish it from an ordinary plain city. In the prosperous contentment of its people and the well equipped Imperial Service Cavalry Modern India is again suggested. Only two typical old India touches were imparted to the reception spectacles, the Bhalwallas or running spearmen, who preceded the Royal carriage, carrying chamras tipped with bayonet-like points and belagged with the colours of Mysore, and the household troops in yellow and scarlet armed with old Enfields. It is a significant indication of the silent revolution proceeding in India that a State indissolubly associated with two great epochs in Indian history should so have lost its distinguishing features. For Mysore under Haider and Tippu in alliance with the French came very near changing the course of Indian history. And the rendition of the State to the old dynasty fixed the basic principle of our relations with the native rulers and made possible the partnership that now exists.

But you forgot the plainness of Mysore, the joyousness of the city in gala dress. From the station a broad highway leads to the old fort whose walls almost conceal the modern palace now completing, a palace that reproduces the decorative art of Southern India almost extinct until the descendants of the original craftsmen were dug out and showed that their hands had not lost their cunning. It is a road that ordinarily holds little to arrest the eye except that it leads to the two little gilt-topped temples which betray the exuberant richness of Southern India decoration; but packed on the roadside, balcony and housetop with the dark-skinned people of the south, the men with the triple white horizontal band of Siva on their foreheads or the broad white loop with a red centre line that marks the followers of Vishnu, clothe this myriad throng in white and red mass if under a sky of dazzling brilliancy, and make it radiate cheeriness, and you have a human picture that requires no gilded frame.

It only needed the figure of the young Maharaja, quiet, pleasant, dignified, as he drove to greet his Royal visitors, to complete the human element in the scene. The capacity for good in a young prince like the ruler of Mysore, who succeeded a few years ago to his vast heritage carefully conserved and in apple-pie order after a wise and liberal training, is so enormous that you cannot forbear speeding an earnest wish for his well-being. So too did his loyal subjects. Then as the cavalcade preceded by the well turned out Lancers in blue and white and followed by horsemen in scarlet and yellow passed, six thousand children raised shrill trebles in a Kanarese and Sanskrit version of the national anthem. The drive from the station to the Residency was short, but an hour later the populace had another opportunity of viewing the Prince and Princess on the occasion of the formal visit to the Maharaja in the large and unattractive hall, which was built for His Highness's marriage, and where he was installed. And when the onlookers broke up and surged over the road-way in wave after wave of red and white you realised what those waiting lines meant.

The visit to Mysore will be distinguishable by a minimum of State ceremony. To-morrow their Royal Highnesses motor to Seringapatam and attend the State dinner in the evening

Then on Wednesday they leave for Shooting Camp, near which there is an elephant drive on Thursday, and remain there till they set out for Bangalore on Sunday.

The following letter has been received by the Commissioner of Police from the Chief Secretary to the Government of Burma:—"I am directed by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor to express his satisfaction with the Police arrangements made during the stay of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales in Rangoon. Much responsibility for the care of Their Royal Highnesses and for the regulation of traffic fell upon the Police on such occasions. The responsibility was well discharged, and His Honour is indebted to you and all your assistants for your and their successful exertions."

Indian Daily News.—The Prince and Princess of Wales reached Mysore this afternoon and were brilliantly received by the Maharaja with the principal officers and sardars of the State. The Royal train arrived punctually at 3-30 at the City station, where a tasteful pavilion covered the platform in front of the main entrance. The Mysore Imperial Service Troops furnished the guard of honour on the platform, and outside the station another guard of honour was provided by the Mysore Infantry. The Maharaja's Bodyguard, the Mysore Imperial Service Cavalry, and the local regiment were also gathered in front of the station and made a fine soldierly display.

After the formal reception and introductions, Their Royal Highnesses drove to Government House accompanied by the Maharaja and escorted by His Highness's Bodyguard, the Imperial Service Cavalry, and the local regiment. The route was lined by spearmen and the Maharaja's Raghewar and Bhale forces, by the Mysore Infantry, and by sowars of the Mysore Horse. Immediately outside the station were the State servants parading the Maharaja's State emblems. A number of effective arches decorated the route, and the Maharaja's subjects were gathered along the road in vast crowds, the features of the throng including gatherings of students and school children, the assembly of the leading townsmen in a pavilion erected by the Municipality near the Town Hall, and a gathering of Native ladies on the upper storey of the Rangachari Memorial Hall. The Mysore Company of the Bangalore Rifle Volunteers lined the road from the Dufferin Gate to Government House, where the Mysore Infantry furnished the guard of honour. Government House was reached about 4 o'clock.

Half an hour later the Maharaja paid a State visit to the Prince. His Royal Highness returned the visit shortly after. The route to and from the Palace was densely crowded by brightly dressed folk.

Madras Mail.—As regards Their Royal Highnesses, that they are very sensible of the endeavours that have been made by all the people of the Presidency to accord them a whole hearted and splendid reception is evidenced by the following gracious letter which the Prince has addressed to His Excellency the Governor:—

"PRINCE OF WALES' CAMP, MADRAS,

28th January.

"MY DEAR LORD AMPHILL,—The Princess of Wales and I have greatly enjoyed our stay in Madras. Before leaving, we are anxious that you should make known to all classes of the community how grateful we are for the affectionate welcome given to us, not only on the day of our arrival, but on all other occasions when we have appeared among the people. Please also assure them how much we appreciate the thoughtful care which has been bestowed upon all the arrangements for our reception and entertainment. I am especially obliged to you for having afforded me opportunities of meeting and talking with the leaders of Indian Society in the South.... We shall carry away the happiest recollections of Madras and its people.

Believe me,
Most sincerely yours,
GEORGE P."

We are delighted to know that Their Royal Highnesses were so pleased with their visit to this city, and we can respectfully assure them that they carry with them the heartfelt wishes of the whole Presidency for their continued health and happiness, and its warmest thanks for the opportunity which they have afforded it of testifying to its fervent devotion and unabated loyalty to themselves and the Throne.

The special correspondent of the Times of India with the Prince of Wales on tour concludes an account of the ceremony of laying the foundation stone of the Victoria Technical Institute, Madras, by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, with these words:—"A significant and very happy coincidence marked the ceremony. Copies of the local journals were, according to custom, enclosed in the glass casket placed in the hollowed nether-stone. In those journals was printed an extract from the leading English newspaper recording the deliberate opinion of one well qualified to judge that 'its record of education, its administration, and its peaceful progress entitles Madras to the designation of the model Presidency of India.' The eulogy is justified; the absurd fiction as to the 'benighted' Presidency has endured long enough, but it was a pleasant circumstance that this appreciation came at a moment which gave it permanent record."

During the Garden Party the announcement was made that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales had been graciously pleased, earlier in the afternoon, to confer the honour of Knighthood upon Mr. H. C. King, one of the Honorary Secretaries of the Prince's Reception Committee, and Sir Henry and Lady King received the warmest and heartiest congratulations of their innumerable friends. Upon the Hon'ble Mr. V. C. Desika Chariar, another of the Honorary Secretaries, a Knighthood was also conferred, and he, too, received the felicitations of his friends. The Knighthood conferred by His Majesty the King upon the Hon'ble Justice Sir Ralph Benson was announced a short time ago, but it was from the hands of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales that he, on Saturday, received the accolade.

Another honour that was conferred by the Prince was that of the M. V. O. (Member of the Victorian Order) upon Major W. M. Campbell, Military Secretary to the Governor; while yesterday afternoon, Mr. O. R. Jones, the Commissioner of Police, was presented with a handsome souvenir—in the shape of a scarf pin of the Prince of Wales's feathers set with diamonds—of Their Royal Highnesses's appreciation of his splendid services as the head of the Madras City Police.

His Royal Highness, on the recommendation of Mr. O. R. Jones, personally decorated Chief Inspector Bhavanandam Pillay, of the Intelligence Branch, with a medal, while Inspector North, who was in charge of the Government House Police Guard, was presented with a watch.

Mr. Lysdale, the Assistant Surgeon at Government House, received a handsome silver-cigar lighter bearing the Prince's crest.

A very pleasant Purdah Party was held on Saturday from 3-30 to about 4-15 P.M., to meet Her Royal Highness, the Princess of Wales. The Party, which was arranged by Her Excellency Lady Ampthill, was conducted most successfully right through, without a single flaw or pause in the arrangements. Everything had been planned beforehand by Lady Ampthill. Indeed, had it not been for Her Excellency's untiring efforts and far-seeing well-arranged plans, this Reception would not have been the success it was. The Purdah arrangements were also very good; there was nothing inappropriate or inconvenient; and, I believe, when the Party was over, complete satisfaction was expressed by all the ladies present.

The following ladies had the honour of meeting Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales:—The Princess of Arcot with her daughter and daughter-in-law, Shahbariah Begum Sahib, Seyyulun Nissa Begum Sahiba, Mahammia Begum Sahiba with their eight daughters and daughters-in-law, the Maharaja Kumarika of Vizianagaram, the Maharani of Bobbili, Lady Gajapathi Rao, Jannky Rajayie Sahib (sister of the Raja of Pudukottah), Mrs. Sankara Nair, Lady Bhaskyam Iyengar with her seven daughters and daughters-in-law, Mrs. P. S. Sivasawmy Iyer, Lady Desikachariar, Mrs. K. Vasudeva Iyengar, Mrs. R. V. Sreenivasa Iyer, Mrs. K. R. Guruswamy Iyer, Mrs. Narasimheswara Sarma, Lady Ramasawmy Moodelliar with her daughter and daughter-in-law, the Dowager Rani of Kollengode and the young Rani of Kollengode, the Dowager Jaghirdarni of Arni, and the young Jaghirdarni of Arni, the Zemindarni of Bhadrachelum with her daughter-in-law, Gurusanthammami Amma, Garu (aunt to the Zemindarni of Punganur), the Zemindarni of Punganur, the Zemindarni of S. Vallur, Zahara Begum Sahiba with her daughter and daughter-in-law, Khyroon Nissa Begum Sahiba, Mrs. Bauliah Naidu, Mrs. Osman Khan with her four daughters and daughters-in-law.

Six ladies assisted in conducting the party through, namely, Mrs. Molesworth, Miss Sell, Mrs. Firth, Mrs. Subrahmanyam, Mrs. Hensman, and Mrs. Sathianadhan—the last four translating to Her Royal Highness. The dresses of the Indian ladies were of different types. Some of them were very pretty, and the bright colours and flashing jewels made the Banqueting Hall look like an arrangement of parterres of hot-house flowers. A bed of tulips would, I suppose, be the proper comparison—I have often heard an English lady comparing Indian ladies to these beautiful flowers. Altogether the beautiful Banqueting Hall presented a brilliant sight.

The ladies were arranged down the long hall in groups of ones, twos and so on. All stood up and bowed low as Her Royal Highness entered and passed up to the daïs. Then, one by one, or in small groups in the order of precedence, the ladies were led up to the daïs and presented to Lady Amphilh, and by Her Excellency to the Princess of Wales. Her Royal Highness was very gracious indeed, took a keen interest in most of the ladies and conversed most affably with each for a few minutes. Her Royal Highness's gracious courtesy and kindly greetings were much appreciated by one and all. It was noticeable that the Princess of Wales took an unmistakable interest in children. Whenever the conversation was about the children of the Ranis many and kindly were the questions asked about them by the gracious Princess. Her Royal Highness told some of the ladies that it had given her much pleasure to come to India with His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, and to see the many interesting features of this beautiful land. There was not much time to devote to each town separately; but still, the visit was full of interest to Their Royal Highnesses.

After the presentation was over, Her Royal Highness passed down the long hall, bowing and smiling to all around, and, after exchanging a few words with the ladies who had helped, left for the Garden Party. Then Her Excellency Lady Amphilh returned, and with her own kind hands sprinkled rose-water on the guests, presented bouquets to them, and garlanded them with beautiful appropriate garlands, not of flowers, but of fine silver lace threads.

This Purdah Party was indeed a unique reception. So many Ranis and great ladies of our Presidency coming from outside places to meet the gracious representative of their august Empress, who had taken such trouble to come from across the seas, leaving her dear children behind, simply to satisfy the loyalty of the citizens of the Indian Empire. Was it not a sight worth seeing? The Indian ladies were all unanimous in their expressions of gratitude for this high honour, and Her Royal Highness's gracious demeanour was much appreciated. "The Princess of Wales is charming," said one lady to me; "who are we that we should be accorded this honour?" "It is enough that our eyes have been privileged to see the gracious Princess," said another; while another Indian lady quaintly expressed herself:—"Our feet seem to have springs in them; they are so eager to stand up and greet Her Royal Highness." The occasion was unique also in another way. Some of the Ranis, after the Party was over, expressed a desire to be introduced to one another and were very pleased to exchange civilities. It is not often that they get such an opportunity of social intercourse between themselves. Most of them said that this was the first time they had seen the Banqueting Hall. Most of them had never been to such a function; and yet, it was noticeable that the conduct of none of them expressed that nervousness which might have been expected. One English lady said to me:—"Whatever Indian ladies do appears graceful to us." I do not know the cause of this. Whether it is so because English ladies are so much interested in Indian ladies that whatever the latter do appears just appropriate to them, or whether the Indian ladies are really so graceful, I cannot determine. But one thing cannot be denied. It is often great occasions which show the character. And, from the observance of such Parties as the one we are noticing, it cannot be denied that the Indians, especially the ladies of high birth, are really full of innate delicacy, dignity and refinement.

Another fact also deserved notice in the Purdah Party. Some of the Ranis were able to speak intelligible English and conversed, without the aid of an interpreter, with Her Royal Highness. Also, it was observed that the younger ladies were not so shy as they generally are before their mothers-in-law. They conversed freely before the older ladies—a fact worth recording, as it shows a much better and happier understanding between the Indian girl and her dreaded mother-in-law. Before concluding this little account I must not forget to mention that the Ranis thanked Her Excellency Lady Amphilh very much for the privilege she had given them. They were very sorry indeed that Her Excellency was leaving India, and they all expressed the hope that Lady Amphilh would not forget the women of India.

On Saturday night there was another big Dinner at Government House. In addition to the Staff, the following ladies and gentlemen had the honour of dining with Their Royal Highnesses:—Admiral Sir E. Poe, Lady Thomson, the Hon'ble Mr. G. S. Forbes, Lieutenant-General Sir Charles Egerton and Miss Egerton, Sir Ralph and Lady Benson, the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Moore, the Hon'ble Mr. Murray Hammick and Mrs. Hammick, the Hon'ble Mr. H. Bradley and Mrs. Bradley, the Hon'ble Mr. Weir and Mrs. Weir, the Hon'ble Mr. J. Twigg and Mrs. Twigg, the Hon'ble Mr. H. P. Hodgson and Mrs. Hodgson, the Hon'ble Mr. A. J. Yorke and Mrs. Yorke, the Ven'ble the Archdeacon of Madras, Mr. and Mrs. H. D. Taylor, Captain R. L. Nicholson, R. N., and Lieutenant C. Golden, R. N.

The Naval firework display by H.M.S. Hymnith and Fox was in every sense a brilliant performance. This display opened with sixty rockets fired singly from the quarter-deck. Various shells, to the number of twenty, from each ship followed, and these were again followed by ninety coloured rockets in flights from each ship. These were fired in the following order, three flights, each of thirty coloured rockets, from each ship in different colours, from the fore-castle. Three similar flights ensued from the quarter-deck, and then fifty Roman candles came from each ship. Further shells were then fired, which were followed by ten Imperial batteries from the Hyacinth and the same number from the Fox. Repeating shells and special rockets of various descriptions ensued, and more Roman candles. Independent rockets and whistling rockets from the Hyacinth brought about the finale of set pieces of Their Royal Highnesses and the Star of India, on board the Hyacinth. It was a kindly thought on the part of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales to order this entertainment, the more so because it afforded pleasure to a very large portion of the humbler parts of the town which had had very little opportunity of taking a very active part in the celebrations of the past few days. And they took every advantage of it and appreciated it most thoroughly. The streets in Georgetown and the foreshore were crowded with an immense concourse of people, who were delighted with the splendid display, which had special features about it, which were noticed and appreciated by the thousands, everyone of them a connoisseur of pyrotechnics.

On Saturday, shortly after noon, the lowering of the Union Jack from the Fort flagstaff, and the unfurling of the Royal Standard in its place, announced to all that the Prince of Wales was paying a visit to the ancient Fort of St. George. No visit to Madras would have been complete without an inspection of St. Mary's and its historic treasures, and accordingly the Royal Party proceeded first to visit the old Church. The Prince and Princess were accompanied by Lord and Lady Amphilh and a number of the Government House party, and were met at the Church door by the Rev. Canon Malden, Garrison Chaplain; Captain H. W. Heffernan and Major T. E. Fowle, Lay Trustees; and Colonel Dawson, Commanding the Madras Brigade. After these gentlemen had been presented to Their Royal Highnesses, a move was made into the Church, where the various objects of historical interest, monuments, tombs, colours, etc., were pointed out by the Garrison Chaplain. The Prince and Princess had received on leaving Calcutta an advance copy of Canon Malden's "Hand book to St. Mary's," a work which they had evidently studied with interest, for they displayed a knowledge of the old Church which was very much in advance of that of the ordinary sightseer. In the Vestry were displayed the old Registers and ancient records, and the silver plate which form the heirlooms of St. Mary's. The Prince is evidently an expert collector of old silver plate, for the Yale alms dish at once attracted his attention. This magnificent specimen of 17th century silver-smith's work was presented by Elihu Yale in 1687 and is most interesting to a collector, as it is a dated and Hall-marked specimen of a very scarce period.

After spending a considerable time in inspecting all the various objects of interest in the Church and Vestry, the Prince and Princess very kindly inscribed their autographs in the Visitors' Book, thus adding another object of interest for future visitors to see. There are already many signatures of famous persons in this book, which was only started by the present Chaplain in 1903. But the entry on the 27th January 1906, of "George P." and "Victoria Mary" will be considered by generations to come as second to none in historical importance.

After leaving the Church the Royal Party proceeded to the Secretariat, and the Government Record rooms.

The impressive and hearty Service which was held at 11 A.M. on Sunday in St. Mary's form a very suitable ending to the most impressive and loyal welcome which has been accorded to our Royal Visitors by the people of Madras. St. Mary's is not a large Church, but by a careful arrangement of seats accommodation was found for about 500 persons, and before the arrival of the Prince and Princess there were not more than two or three vacant seats. The Military were of course in the great majority, but the senior Service was well represented by Rear-Admiral Sir E. Poe, Commander-in-Chief of the East India Station, who with his Staff and a party of officers from the Hyacinth and Fox occupied the front seats on the right of the Prince and Princess. On the other side, in the Officers' seats, were Sir Charles Egerton, Commanding the 9th Division, with his Staff, and a large number of officers. The 2nd Suffolk Regiment, under Colonel Cubitt, and the 62 Co., R.G.A., under Major Alexander, paraded in large numbers, while there were also contingents from the Governor's Band and the Christian soldiers of the 2nd Rajput Light Infantry. There were, indeed, but few seats available for civilians, but care had been taken to allot those seats to the regular members of St. Mary's congregation, no room being left for any one who had not the right to be present. At about 10-50 all were in their places, and the Band in the west gallery, under Bandmaster Froud, of the 2nd Suffolks, played a short voluntary.

The St. Mary's clock has been giving trouble lately and is not to be relied upon for accuracy. The poor thing is over 80 years of age and needs a rest, so that the striking of 11 about a minute before the Prince and Princess arrived does not necessarily imply that Their Royal Highnesses were late. It would be a graceful act if the Madras Government were to present St. Mary's with a new clock to commemorate a historical event.

About a dozen of the Clergy of Madras, including several native Priests, were in attendance on the Lord Bishop. The Venerable the Archdeacon of Madras was also present. The Bishop and his Domestic Chaplain and the Archdeacon occupied seats in the sanctuary, the remainder of the Clergy were in the choir stalls. The Service was the ordinary Parade Service, just as it is usually held at 7 A.M. every Sunday morning, and was of the simplest description. The hymns were all old favourites, No. 274, "Through the Night of Doubt and Sorrow," was the opening one, while No. 165, "O God our Help in Ages Past," and No. 270, "Soldiers of Christ Arise," were sung before and after the sermon. The result of moving the Band and choir from the east to the west end of the Church has resulted in a vast improvement in the responding and singing. The hymns in particular went with a swing which nearly lifted even the old bomb-proof roof, while the responses were most hearty and congregational. The Service was conducted throughout by the Rev. Canon Malden, who announced that the alms would be devoted to repairing the deficiency in the collections of the school treat this year.

The sermon was preached by the Lord Bishop of Madras, who said:—

We have met to-day for public worship on a historic occasion and in a historic building. As Madras is the cradle of the British Empire in India, so St. Mary's is the cradle of the English Church. It is the first Anglican Church built in India, and its foundations were laid, nearly 228 years ago, in the year 1678. Since that day it has witnessed stirring scenes and the rise and fall of great kingdoms. It has seen the factory of Fort Saint George grow into the city of a great Empire, and its walls are crowded with the memorials of great deeds and noble lives. It has been called, with pardonable exaggeration, the Westminster Abbey of India. But it is not merely its historic associations that appeal to us to-day. It stands in the midst of Fort St. George, surrounded by the outward signs of Britain's military power, as a silent witness to great principles which form the foundation and strength of our Indian Empire. It witnesses to the faith of our forefathers. The English came to India as a trading Company. Their main purpose was to open up trade and make money. It was in itself an honourable and useful purpose, though neither heroic nor unselfish. But, together with the desire for trade, the East India Company was inspired with a very true and sincere regard for the honour of Almighty God and the interests of religion. And it is interesting to note that the first effort made by the English Church for the evangelisation of India was made by the East India Company itself as early as the year 1681, when the Company took charge of a Fund raised by some of the English Bishops, for propagating the Christian religion in the East Indies. And the despatches of the Directors bear frequent testimony to their anxiety for the moral and spiritual welfare of their servants in their Indian settlements. Then again it witnesses to the religious principles on which our Empire stands. It has been said that the strength of our Empire in India is due to the toleration and justice by which our rule is marked. That is true. But we must go deeper down than that to find the true foundation of our government. If England is tolerant and just, it is because for centuries past her people have based their national life and policy on their faith in God. The history of the British Empire in India has, doubtless, been marked by many errors and blunders and, sometimes, also by deeds that make us blush for shame. It would not be a human Empire if it were not so. But still, in the main, despite any weakness and self-interest that may have stained the annals of our past history in India, there has been a true and living faith in God and a sincere belief that the power and authority which our Sovereign wields in India are held as a solemn trust from the King of kings. It is due to our faith in God and our loyalty to Jesus Christ that the one great purpose which to-day inspires our rulers in India is neither the desire for gain, nor the glory and prestige of a worldwide Empire, but the welfare and prosperity of the many millions entrusted to their care. And it is the religious character and religious principles of the Sovereign and peoples of Great Britain that will secure for them a lasting hold over the loyalty and affections of the people of India. There are no people in the world which have a deeper sense of religion than the peoples of this land. Religion and religious philosophy have been for centuries past the one absorbing interest of their lives. It has been truly said that they live religiously, die religiously, work religiously, eat religiously, and even sin religiously. Their whole daily and family life is bound up with religion in a way that to us is almost inconceivable. A godless government would never retain the affections and respect of a people like that to whom religion is the very breath of life. For the last twenty-two years I have lived in India in close contact with the peoples of India of all classes, high and low, rich and poor, and I can say, without hesitation, that the Englishmen who win most thoroughly the regard and the trust of the people among whom they live and work are those who are known to be most true to their own religion and most consistent in their Christian lives.

And then, again, St. Mary's Church bears its witness to our hope for the future. The British Government have learnt from their religion the great principle of toleration, and their attitude towards the many religions of the various races in India is one of strict neutrality. Thank God that it is so. Any attempt to propagate Christianity in India not merely by the sword, but by political power and influence would be as fatal to the true interests of the Christian Church itself, as it would be dangerous to the State. But, while maintaining a policy of strict neutrality, we should be dis-loyal to the religion we profess and the Divine Master whom we serve, if we did not earnestly hope and pray that the time may soon come when all India will be turned to Christ. At the most solemn moment in the Coronation of our English Sovereigns, a copy of the Holy Bible is presented to the Sovereign by the Archbishop of Canterbury, who says as he presents it:—"Our gracious King, we present you with this book, the most valuable thing the world affords." The people of India would not love us the more if we showed that it was to us a matter of indifference whether they accepted or rejected what we ourselves publicly proclaim to be the most valuable thing that the world affords. Believing as we do that the Gospel of Christ is indeed the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, we believe, and are compelled to believe, that the one great hope for the future of India lies in her willing and sincere acceptance of Jesus Christ as the Way, the Truth, and the Life. What India needs is just what every other people in the world needs, i.e., moral regeneration and moral progress. Apart from that, no other form of progress is possible. And we believe that nothing can bring to India the moral regeneration she needs except faith in Christ. We may give to her the blessings of peace, justice and settled Government, we may develop largely her material resources, we may bring to her the light of Western science and literature. But her deepest need will still remain unsatisfied. The truth alone can set men free, and for the truth India is now waiting. We thank God then from the bottom of our hearts for the marvellous progress of Christianity in India during the last century, and we look forward, with confidence and hope, to the day when India, with all its wonderful capacity for religion and earnest striving after truth, will find in Christ the Saviour of the world and the desire of all nations.

During the singing of the last hymn the alms, which amounted to Rs. 101, were collected by Captain Helleman and Major Fowle, the Lay Trustees, assisted by Garrison Sergeant-Major Leech and Private Cross, Church clerk. After the Benediction had been given by the Bishop the whole congregation stood and sang "God save the King," additional fervour being given to this time-honoured custom by the fact that our future King and Queen were singing with them.

After the Bishop and Clergy had retired to the vestry the Royal visitors and the Government party drove off, and the soldiers marched back to barracks to the strains of their Regimental March. A number of visitors, including Rear-Admiral Sir E. Poe and Captain Nicholson of the Hyacinth remained behind for a short time to inspect the Church and look at the old records, etc.

A pleasing incident took place in the Fort on Sunday, after the Parade Service which Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales attended. Staff-Sergeant Goolamier, who has had 49 years' service with the Madras Volunteer Guards, and who has for the past two years been stationed at Waltair, was commanded to be present, and His Royal Highness saw him and spoke to him after the service. He enquired into the details of Staff-Sergeant Goolamier's service and was informed that he had been a Member of the Guard of Honour of the M. V. G. who received His Majesty the King when, as Prince of Wales, he visited Madras.

On Sunday afternoon Their Royal Highnesses drove to Guindy for tea and returned to Government House via San Thome and the Marina. This being the last appearance of Their Royal Highnesses in public during their stay in Madras a very large crowd lined the streets. At San Thome, the children of Mrs. Firth's Orphanage and the Gordon Home were drawn up at the gate of the Institution and gave the Prince and Princess a hearty greeting. The San Thomé Cathedral and Orphanage and their neighbourhood were gaily decorated. In fact, the residents of San Thomé were determined not to miss this last opportunity of seeing the Royal visitors. All along the Marina also dense crowds had assembled to see the Prince and Princess drive past.

A correspondent writes:—"It was simply charming of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales to have afforded the people of San Thomé an opportunity of seeing and doing honour to them on Sunday evening, after our disappointment on the 25th. Although intimation that Their Royal Highnesses were likely to drive to San Thomé at about 6-15 p.m., was received only in the course of the afternoon, the decorations and illuminations of the route were got ready with marvellous speed, and by 5 p.m. the approaches to the High Road were blocked with expectant throngs of people, whose clapping and cheering were heard above the clanging of the bells of the Cathedral, as Their Royal Highnesses passed by, at about 6-30 p.m.

Their Royal Highnesses left Madras on Sunday by special train. The route to the Central Station was illuminated, as also were the Station premises. The interior of the Railway Station was nicely decorated and the platform covered with the conventional red baize. The departure was purely private and none but Their Excellencies Lord and Lady Amphilh and Staff were present. The whole route was, however, again crowded with spectators. A Royal salute was fired this morning announcing the departure of His Royal Highness.

We regret that in our report of Military arrangements in connection with laying the foundation-stone of the Victoria Memorial Hall, we omitted to state that the S. I. Railway Volunteers lined the streets for the last 200 yards of the route. A detachment of the Corps came to Madras from all parts of the Company's extensive system to take part in the military functions in connection with the Royal visit.

The following Resolutions were passed by a General Committee Meeting held at the Caine's Reading Room, Royapettah, on the morning of the 27th instant:—That a hall be built in Royapettah in commemoration of the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales; that subscription be invited from the public, noblemen, Rajahs and Princes; that the following gentlemen be requested to form a Committee: The Prince of Arcot, Rajah Venugopal Bahadur, M. Ethirajulu Pillay, Mr. M. Chengalvarayalu Naidu, Mr. E. S. Hensman, Dr. S. Sathianadhan and Mr. C. Kesava Row.

We are asked to announce that Mr. Madapati Venkateswara Row Pantulu, Nuzvid, Kistna District, has, in commemoration of His Royal Highness's visit to this Presidency, founded a scholarship of Rs. 150, known as Prince of Wales' Scholarship, tenable for two years, to enable the deserving and successful student from Rajah Rangayya Appa Row Bahadur's High School at Nuzvid, with which he has been connected as the responsible Manager for the last fifteen years, to prosecute his studies for F. A. in any affiliated College in the Northern Circars.

Eight hundred poor were fed by the Prince of Wales's Reception Committee, Madras, and seventy were clad by Rajah Sir S. Ramasamy Moodeliar, C.I.E., on Thursday, the 25th instant, at Bandar Gardens, Sembiam, in honour of the Royal visit.

Madras Mail.—A very interesting ceremony took place at Government House on Saturday afternoon, when three well-known citizens of Madras received the honour of Knighthood from His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. The ceremony was held in the drawing room, at one end of which His Royal Highness was seated. The first to be admitted was the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Benson, on whom the honour of knighthood was conferred by His Majesty the King on the 1st instant. Mr. Benson was accompanied by two supporters, one on either side, by whom he was led into the Royal Presence, and in accordance with established precedence, bowed on entering the room, and, having advanced to the centre of the room, bowed again. He was then led to the footstool immediately in front of His Royal Highness, upon which he knelt; and the Prince, taking a sword from one of the Staff, struck him lightly first on the left shoulder and then on the right and said:—"Rise, Sir Ralph." His Royal Highness then shook hands with Sir Ralph and congratulated him upon the honour which had been conferred upon him. Exactly the same procedure was followed in the case of Mr. H. C. King, who was the next to receive the honour of knighthood. The third recipient was the Hon'ble Mr. V. C. Desika Chariar, the only difference in his case being that there was no accolade, or "dubbing" with the sword.

We have already referred to some of the more recent of Sir Ralph's many excellent services, which make the honour which has been conferred upon him particularly appropriate. Few, however, know that in his long and varied record of 32 years' service Sir Ralph has several times received the thanks of Government. On the first occasion he, and a small number of other Civil officers, were specially thanked in the Farewell Order of Government issued at the conclusion of the great famine of 1876-78, when His Excellency the Governor in Council expressed himself as under the "deepest obligation to the officers named." The good work which Mr. Benson did in connection with the settlement of the Nilgiris in 1883 also attracted the notice of Government. Afterwards he laboured in connection with two very important Committees, in 1883 and 1884, to each of which he was appointed Secretary. The first was the Committee appointed to draw up a scheme for giving effect to Lord Ripon's wish to extend the system of Local and Municipal Administration throughout the country. After the recommendations of the Committee had been approved by the Government a small Committee was appointed to draft the Bills to give them effect, and these eventually became the Local Boards and District Municipalities Acts of 1884. In connection with each of these Committees Mr. Benson received the special thanks of Government. It is a striking instance of the leisurely manner in which legislation is sometimes conducted in this country that at the time when Sir Ralph was appointed to the High Court, ten years ago, he was on special duty in connection with the Tenancy Bill which is now, at length, before the Legislative Council. Sir Ralph Benson also served as Under-Secretary to Government in the Revenue and Public Departments; as Secretary to the Board of Revenue; and as Registrar of the High Court—a very varied experience.

In the honours which the Prince of Wales conferred on Sir Henry King and Sir Vembakam Desika Chari His Royal Highness has honoured all classes of the community of this Presidency, whose representatives these two gentlemen were. They are a graceful and handsome acknowledgment of the efforts of the people to accord Their Royal Highnesses a hearty and fitting welcome.

Pioneer.—Mysore, the visitor judges, is a place not to be easily moved to its depths. Coming here at another time one might even carry off the erroneous opinion that it has no depths. The impression it produces on first inspection is of a certain want of character. It is young without being energetic, pleasing without being beautiful. No fault is to be found with its agreeable features which doubtless grow upon one on longer acquaintance, but there is nothing to compel the admiration at first sight. The city lies on an undulating plain at the foot of a remarkable hill, which, rising to a height of 3,500 feet, hangs over it somewhat as Hymettus overhangs Athens. This mountain preserves the associations of the older and darker Hinduism. A colossal bull of Shiva is still to be seen half way up the ascent and on the summit there is a temple round which a small settlement still remains the worship of Kali, for whose benefit human victims used to be hurled on great occasions down its gloomy precipices. Below all is modern. The Hindu Mysore was demolished by Tipu the better to assert the supremacy of Seringapatam, and only the remnants of the old fortifications, or here and there an old temple remain to carry back connection with the past. The Mysore of to-day is contemporaneous with the present reigning house and as an instance of how close the connection is throughout, the Dewan of to-day is grandson of that Purneah who was appointed First Minister by Lord Wellesley after the fall of Tippu.

The town that has thus come into existence is one of broad streets, fine avenues and ample open spaces. It has many fine public buildings for which the undulating nature of the ground has provided an effective site. The bazars are wide and most unorientally well kept. As befits the capital of the model State educational institutions of all kinds and of the latest type, such as students' homes, are much in evidence, and there is even a public school for the blind. The people who inhabit this city of tranquillity are a quiet prosperous looking folk as leisurely in their ways as the Southern Maharatta Railway which connects them with the outer world. It is difficult to detect any marked characteristic of dress or demeanour. On the other hand, there is a total absence of anything like swashbucklery or of the villainy and mediocrity which usually take up their quarters at the gates of an Eastern Court. The grave looking State officials in their becoming undress of dark coat, white trousers and puggree, as they sit backwards and forwards among the throng in their carriages fitly represent the decorous and stately character of the concern. The very climate seems disposed to avoid extremes and to repress them in mankind. It would be ungracious to disparage it while there are so many worse about. "Shall I compare thee to one summer's day," O January day of Mysore? That were surely an injustice. But even and temperate as thou art, thou dost much recall a good monsoon day in Bengal, when the sky is well flecked with clouds and a cool moist breeze sweeps over the wide plains. A climate in which it is possible to go abroad at any time but at all times much pleasanter to sit still.

But for the last three days this pleasant, placid Mysore has given ample evidence of being stirred to its depths. Long before that of course the Maharaja and his officials had been quietly busy with their preparations. On Saturday last they had the place ready and the public as it were were invited to walk in. They have responded apparently as one man. The carriages and goods vans of the railway have been bringing them by thousands, while every road leading to the town shows a continuous procession of passengers afoot and in all kinds of vehicles, the commonest being the cart drawn by oxen with the peculiar recurved horns which are a feature of the country. Affable animals these are and intelligent and, unlike the suspicious bullock of Upper India, appreciate being made much of even by a strange European. Now and again the stream of people is parted by the interposition of a motor-car coming up from Bangalore, for the entire Royal Party goes out to the shooting camp three days hence by this means and there is a run on all cars procurable. The Maharaja, however, has a stable full of his own and as an expert driver is said to come only second to Scindia. But to return to the people. The crowds flocking in seem to require a minimum of control and direction. They are moving quietly about the centre of the town taking in the decorations and will presently settle down for themselves in their places along the route of the procession in placid expectancy. It would be a rash thing to attempt to say how far the love of sight-seeing is strong in all to Indian peoples. Anyhow they are all there and only the man who actually waters the field and feeds the bullocks, the one indispensable human being, is absent.

The town is bright with decorations. The whole route of the Royal party is lined with venetian masts connected with ropes of streamers, and in Curzen Park, which is a sort of Mysorean Tuilleries, being an oblong garden bordered with palaces, offices and shops, the effect rises to brilliancy. The Prince and Princess will occupy the Residency, while in the spacious grounds of Government House, a palatial building, devoted in ordinary times to the reception of State guests, a handsome camp has been pitched for the Staff and visitors.

The occasion so eagerly anticipated by Mysoreans has passed off in the most gratifying way. The royal train arrived punctually on the stroke of 3.30, and as the first gun of the salute boomed an audible murmur of expectation ran along the great crowds lining the route. The ceremonies of reception at the station did not take long as there was no address to be presented, and the party were soon seated in their carriages. The spectacle as the procession came down the slope of the Curzen Park was a striking one. Over the heads of the gaily dressed crowd one caught sight of the pennons of the 1st Mysore Imperial Service Lancers, a smart and handsome corps in blue with white facings, and conspicuous for the excellence of their mounting. Then came the Maharaja's Bodyguard, a select few turned out with all the brilliancy of an Imperial Cadet Corps; next the equivalent of the Beefeaters, a corps of hallwardens in red, who were on foot but maintained a pace which would have troubled the men of the Tower, and then the Royal carriages. His Royal Highness, the Maharaja and Sir Walter Lawrence were in the first, the Princess and the Resident in the second. Her Royal Highness, in spite of the heat of the afternoon, had considerably kept the hood of the carriage down that the public might not be disappointed, and the action seemed to be instinctively appreciated by the crowds, who greeted her passing with cries which, if not exactly cheers, were obviously exclamations demonstrative of the heartiest admiration and warmth of sentiment. The procession was closed by the second regiment of Imperial Service Lancers, a corps in scarlet but otherwise a counterpart of the first, except that their mounting did not equally take the eye. After a short pause came the exchange of state visits, which afforded the multitude further opportunities of feasting their eyes on the caravels and the exalted principals, but the day's wonders have not ended with the going down of the sun, for to-night the whole city is ablaze with a brilliant and effective scheme of illuminations, and it will be late hours before the sight-seers and rejoicers are satiated with the wonders of this memorable day.

Times.—The Prince and Princess of Wales were received on their arrival this afternoon by the Maharaja and highest officials of Mysore State with the usual ceremonial.

Mysore city, bright as it is to-day with its festal decorations and picturesque crowds and large bodies of troops in the brilliant scarlet uniform of the Mysore army, possesses few features of special interest, and, apart from a few official functions, including the laying of the foundation-stone of the new technical institute, will serve mainly as a centre from which Their Royal Highnesses will make excursions. First they will visit Seringapatam, Tippu's famous stronghold, where his grave has been tended by his conquerors ever since "the light of Islam went out" after our last assault upon the then formidable fortress in 1799. Afterwards an excursion will be made into the fine sporting district, where the Prince will remain a couple of days in camp.

Mysore is not only one of the largest and most important of the Native States of India—its area and population are about the same as Scotland's—but it has a unique history. It is supposed to have been the kingdom of the mythical Monkey-King who sent Hanuman, the Monkey-Headed, to aid Rama in his expedition against Ceylon, and the story is told at length in the Ramayana. But without going back to those ancient legends, the present ruler of Mysore possesses a genealogical table which traces his descent to the son of a Rajput family who carved out a kingdom and founded a dynasty in Mysore at the end of the fourteenth century. In the seventeenth century Mysore was swept by the rising tide of Mus-sulman dominion in Southern India under the famous Haider Ali, and it was the British Power so rashly challenged by his son and successor Tippu, which upon his overthrow restored Mysore to its Hindu rulers.

So far there is nothing in the annals of Mysore to differentiate its history from that of many other Native States, but the sequel is unique. For the infant Prince whom we had placed in 1799 on the throne of his ancestors grew up under such unfortunate influences that by 1831 the whole country actually rose in rebellion against his misrule, and the Government of India, after many futile remonstrances, was driven to the extreme course of assuming the direct administration of the State for an indefinite period. It might, indeed, have lapsed altogether into our hands had we denied the right of adoption to the old Maharaja, as we were lawfully entitled to do. The wiser course adopted by the Indian Government has been one of the most striking examples of the sincerity of our desire to preserve the independence of the Native States. The adoption of a son and successor was sanctioned, his titular sovereignty was recognised immediately after the old Maharaja's death, and at the end of the young Maharaja's minority full sovereign powers were in 1881—i.e., after a lapse of exactly 50 years, restored to the ruler of Mysore. That event, known as the "Rendition of Mysore," has been one of the most important incidents in the internal history of India during the last century, for it finally destroyed the deep-seated apprehensions to which Lord Dalhousie's policy of annexation had given rise in the minds of the ruling Chiefs all over India.

It has been in every respect a singularly successful measure, for during the brief reign of the young Prince in whose favour the "Rendition" took place, whose life was prematurely cut short by illness, and during that of his eldest son and successor, the present Maharaja, His Highness Krishnaraja Wadiar Bahadur, the State of Mysore, in spite of grievous visitations of both famine and plague, has thriven exceedingly and earned for itself, by the wise administration of its Dewan, the title of "the Model State." It is, perhaps, the only Native State in which it can be truly said that the duties of government are discharged with an efficiency and integrity that compare not unfavourably with the administration of British India. Its public works, the development of its railway communication, its fine system of irrigation from the Kaveri, its fertile plantations, and last but not least, the encouragement given to its mining industry, which has resulted in the opening up of the largest and richest gold fields in India, have done as much for the furtherance of its material prosperity as the even-handed administration of justice, the equitable adjustment of the burdens of taxation, and the promotion of education for women as well as for men have done for the raising of the moral standard of the people. Mysore, also possesses, alone in India, a sort of Representative Assembly, which meets annually for a few days in the capital to lay before the ruler the petitions and grievances of the various classes through their delegates, and to hear from his own lips a paternal explanation of the measures proposed by his Government. Opinions vary very much as to the practical usefulness of this institution, which has hardly yet emerged from the experimental stage. But it is, at any rate, an interesting experiment.

Times of India.—The Native State of Mysore where the Prince and Princess of Wales spend the next few days, offers unrivalled opportunities of interest to the antiquarian, the ethnologist, and the statesman, as well as to the sportsman and the lover of natural scenery. Among the countries to which Asoka sent out Buddhist missionaries occurs the name of Mahisa-Mandala, whose identity has been placed beyond doubt by the discovery fourteen years ago of the edicts of that renowned monarch in one of the northern districts of Mysore. From that remote period up to the middle of the eighteenth century, when it passed for a brief but eventful interval into the hands of Mahomedan rulers, Mysore continued in the hands of her native kings. From Tippu the State was rescued by the British, who eventually handed it over to the representative of its ancient rulers, whose descendant is now the host of Their Royal Highnesses. There is no more righteous page in Anglo-Indian history than that which records the relations of the paramount Power with the Mysore State. Mysore has a further historical interest for Englishmen as the place where the Duke of Wellington laid the foundations of his illustrious career. The State, though situated on the plateau of the Deccan, is redeemed from the barrenness characteristic of the table-land by the presence of rivers, the chief of which is the romantic Kaveri. The scenery on the banks of this river is of surpassing beauty, alike where she leaps down from her strongholds in the mountains of Croog as where she half encircles the historic city of Seringapatam. At Seringapatam, the capital of Hyder and Tippu, there is little left except their tombs to remind one of their rule. Even the spot where Tipu fell fighting during the capture of the island city is overgrown with jungle. The elephant drives, for which great preparations have been made in view of the visit of Their Royal Highnesses, are a sport peculiar to Mysore. The observant eyes of the Prince will note in the faces of the Mysore people the bright and cheerful aspect which Hinduism bears wherever it is left to pursue its own evolution uncoerced by outside influence.

If Englishmen can be proud of the part they have played in the history of Mysore, Indians can be no less so. The history of the State since 1881 when it was handed back to the father of the present Maharaja has been a history of solid and uniform progress. During the greater part of the period, the State was administered by a native statesman of great strength of character, of great ability, and with intense convictions as to the importance of the application of modern scientific methods to the development of the resources of the country. To the late Sir Seshadri Iyer, Mysore owes a deep debt of gratitude. In the face of unpopularity, he steadily pursued his policy of internal development and gave the State its railway, its great irrigation works, its valuable gold-mining industry, and its magnificent electric power supply. During the years of his administration, a deficit of 30 lakhs was converted into a cash balance of 170 lakhs in favour of the State. There is some reason to fear that the vigorous and successful policy of developing the resources of the country which he inaugurated is no longer in the ascendant in the Councils of the State. Not only in industrial matters, but in respect of social and educational progress, Sir Seshadri conceived and set himself to carry out a policy of active and energetic encouragement. The Maharani's College in Mysore is one of the most successful educational institutions for women in India, and it is entirely the outcome of the enlightened philanthropy of Her Highness the Dowager Maharani, in whose highly successful regency during her son's minority, the State had the inestimable advantage of the late Sir Seshadri Iyer's guidance. The deceased statesman was once described by a distinguished Anglo-Indian historian as one who had given his heart to Herbert Spencer and his heart to Para Brahma. In him, and through him chiefly in modern Mysore, the East and the West are blended in the most harmonious fashion.

An attempt to give the people a direct means for bringing their desires to the notice of the Administration, was first made in Mysore among Native States. The example has been since followed by one or two other states in Southern India. The powers of the members of the Representative Assembly are, of course, far more limited than those enjoyed by the members of the Legislative Councils in British India. The institution of such an Assembly seems to have proved successful, and the people do not seem to require much more in the nature of association with the Administration at present. The State has been fortunate in the men who have from time to time represented the Imperial Government within its borders. They have all been actuated by sincere sympathy and the deepest interest for the welfare of the State. Both the late and the present Maharajas were educated and trained to the discharge of the duties of their high and responsible position by Englishmen of high character and great attainments. Lord Mayo believed—Lord Curzon has expressed the same belief—that the work of rearing up young Eudatories to a high sense of their public duty was a worthy work for the British officers of rank and talent. In no case has this work been more worthily done than in that of the present Maharaja of Mysore, and it must be a source of peculiar gratification to His Highness that the guru under whom he learnt his lessons is now the accredited representative of the Sovereign Power at his Court. The worthy and capable officer who fills the important post of Private Secretary of His Highness is entitled to not a little credit for the manner in which the administration has weathered some of the difficult problems with which it has been lately confronted. With an intelligent population and with its vast natural resources, the policy which is calculated to produce the most enduring good to Mysore is the policy adopted by Sir Seshadri Iyer, Sir P. N. Krishnamurti has been a conciliatory and safe administrator, but safety when obtained at the cost of complete stagnation is apt to prove more dangerous than an energetic and, of course, well-judged policy of development. The prospect that the Tata Research Institute will be located in Bangalore—a town as noted for its salubriousness as for its picturesque quality—has become a certainty. That will open up opportunities of scientific education for which the rapid development of industrial projects alone can provide adequate scope and encouragement. The people of Mysore have looked forward to the Royal visit with an enthusiasm not exceeded anywhere else. We have no doubt that Their Royal Highnesses will carry with them the happiest impressions of the loyalty and devotion of Mysore, her people and her ruling house.

31ST JANUARY 1906.

Daily Express.—The Prince and Princess of Wales were the chief actors this morning in a little incident which will be remembered in Mysore long years after the ceremonials of the Royal visit are forgotten. As they were motoring to Seringapatam to view the ruins, the Princess saw a native policeman lying in the road. He had been preceding the Royal motorists on a bicycle, and had fallen and broken his leg.

The Princess ordered the driver to stop, and the Prince, alighting, walked along the road to where the man lay. On hearing the nature of the injuries, the Prince assisted in obtaining water for the man, and did not return to the car in which the Princess remained until the man had been removed to hospital.

The action was intensely appreciated by the natives present, and the news of the Prince's kindness spread rapidly.

An eye-witness tells me that as the man was carried away the natives could be heard asking one another: "Who could have supposed that so poor a man could ever have been so fortunate as to receive such notice from the Shahzada?"

When the Royal visitors returned from Seringapatam every one had heard the story, and they were received with unprecedented enthusiasm.

Nothing could have impressed the native mind more than the sympathy shown by the Emperor's son for a humble native official. The details will be carried to every corner of the State.

Englishman.—Mysore is in the curious position of being a State with no real capital. Clean and pleasant Mysore city with its wide streets and cheerful prosperous population is the nominal headquarters, but the executive offices are at Bangalore, eighty-five miles away. And there the active life of the State centres. The true historical capital is at Seringapatam, eight miles distant, whence Haider Ali and Tippu Sultan directed the campaigns and intrigues that made Mysore a great power in India and a bogy to the British governors of Madras, who were slowly emerging from the factor stage. Indeed

Mysore has little more title to be considered the State capital than the circumstances that it holds the Maharaja's palace, the finest modern building in that style and which revived the decaying arts of Southern India, and that it is the scene of the principal State ceremonies.

In Seringapatam Their Royal Highnesses spent the cool dry hours of the early evening, and there renewed the rich historical associations with Haider and Tippu, Wellesley, Munro, Cornwallis and Lally that they formed in Madras. The way lay over a pleasant undulating road lined with banyans and tamarinds and mangoes, bursting with bloom, running through irrigated land, showing the rice stubble and green with the early sugarcane. Then almost before you can realise the fact the motor glides over the bridge spanning the Cauvery and plunges amongst the moat and ditch rampart and fausse bray that sentinelled the seat of the Mahomedan usurper's brief power. The path as quickly mounts to the plateau and you are amongst the ruins of the fortress that stiffened the most formidable enemy after the Marathas the British in India ever had to meet.

The interior of the fortress is a ruin. Of the ordered pomp and splendour of Tippu's court scarcely fragments remain "fresh lime look on its broken arch, its ruined wall." Its chambers desolate, and portals foul. Yes, this was once the ambitious airy hall. Here it was that Haider Ali Khan, the grandson of a religious mendicant from the Punjab, elbowed aside the old Hindu dynasty and built up a kingdom that swept from Travancore to the walls of Madras and placed in the field some eighty thousand armed and disciplined troops. It was to reduce Seringapatam that Lord Cornwallis assembled what was probably the largest army in Asia ever under the undivided command of one English officer. When he sat down before the fortress in 1792 he controlled forty-eight thousand English and native soldiers, afterwards reinforced by nine thousand troops from Bombay at whose arrival Haider realised that discretion was the better part of valour. The name of French Rocks particularises the headquarters of the French force under Lally which was Tippu's ultimate undoing, for it induced those intrigues for which the high-souled Mornington found such a drastic remedy.

Even in its decay Seringapatam conveys the impression of great natural strength. Standing on an island produced by the bifurcation and re-uniting of the Cauvery it was protected by every artifice known to the age. The river at this season is a multitude of streamlets tumbling amidst a desert of grey rocks, but in flood it must be impassable, except by the bridge. You can see now the two cannon, which mark the site of the breaching battery, stuck up in insolent contempt of the artillery on the ramparts, the marks of the round shot on the walls and the breach through which Baird led the assault. Baird was for three and a half years a prisoner in Seringapatam, so one can imagine in what temper he passed through the gap. Not that his spirit required any artificial stimulus, for was it not his own mother who on hearing that Haider's prisoners were chained two and two, exclaimed, "God help the man who is chained to our Davie." A tablet marks the spot, where Tippu fell, shot by a soldier, who sought to rob him of his jewelled sword belt, as he lay wounded in his palanquin. Nor is there any difficulty in identifying the dungeons, where were confined the prisoners of Pollilur, that miracle of bungling leadership and soldierly courage. Looking round these narrow heated walls you wonder that men could be chained up for years ill-fed, ill-fed and ill-tended and care to live. Physically they had a different race of Anglo-Indians in those days.

Standing in a detectable garden on the outskirts of the fort, a garden recalling the Mohamedan monuments of Northern India is the doomed building that shelters the tombs of Haider and Tippu. History records actions of Lord Dalhousie toward the Native States that were harsh and impolitic, but he gave the ivory inlaid doors that now adorn a tomb that is still a centre of Mahomedan pilgrimage. Wellington too had the reputation, whether undeserved or not, of being a hard and unsympathetic man. But when as the youthful administrator of the newly conquered State, he entered into the occupation of Tippu's summer palace, the Doulat Bagh, he found that the quaint native painting representing the battle of Polilore was decayed. He had it restored and it is as fresh to-day as when Wellesley left India, the stout little British square with the wooden soldiers in their stiff stocks, the Mysorean hordes and the French contingent, all hopelessly out of drawing and perspective, but with a certain character notwithstanding. How many Polilores are there in British military history when blundering leadership was redeemed by individual courage.

Before motoring to Seringapatam Their Royal Highnesses had a State duty to perform. The State of Mysore has long possessed an honourable record in matters educational. The late Dewan Sir Seschadri Iyer had a keen appreciation of the value of education, of the importance of basing the State policy upon scientific principles and liberally financing it. He gathered into the service of the durbar a strong and zealous staff, and the lines he laid down have been followed by his successors. But to-day a material step was taken in completing the State machinery. Some thirteen years ago an industrial school was opened by the ruler of the State, since which time drawing and modelling, carpentry, smithwork and pottery have been taught to boys of all classes and the numbers on the rolls have increased to over two hundred. From modest beginnings the expenditure on the institution has risen to Rs. 33,000 in the current year, whilst the earnings of the students are estimated at nearly Rs. 20,000. Hitherto these classes have been housed in hired buildings of an unsatisfactory character, and as their progress in this unsuitable environment has shown the verility of the movement it was decided to locate them in a single establishment to be known as the Chamarajendra Technical Institute called after the founder. The local branch of the Government press will also be transferred to the Institute and printing included amongst the industries taught there. This building which will cost more than a lakh of rupees will at once commemorate the late ruler of Mysore and the visit of Their Royal Highnesses.

The news was received to-day of the death of the venerable King of Denmark, which directly affects most of the reigning families of Europe. It of course very nearly affects the English ruling house, and Their Royal Highnesses were attired in mourning when they attended the foundation-stone laying to-day. In inviting the Prince to perform the ceremony the Maharaja said that the participation of Their Royal Highnesses in the ceremony was an event of the happiest augury, the memory of which would remain a perennial source of inspiration and encouragement to all connected with the schools. The building destined to rise upon the site would serve to perpetuate in a shape it was hoped pleasing to His Royal Highness, the recollection of the great honour conferred upon the Maharaja and the State by the Royal visit.

Before laying the stone the Prince of Wales said:—

"Your Highness, I am very glad to be associated with this industrial institution and to have an opportunity of showing my sympathy with the artisans of Mysore and of India. The Princess of Wales and I have greatly admired their work at various places on our journey, and I am heartily in favour of any movement that may either tend to improve the handicrafts of India or raise the social position of the artisan. We have seen much of the arts in India but have seen very little of the artisans, and I am especially delighted to take part in any ceremony which may lead towards the amelioration of one of the most deserving and most important classes of the Indian People."

At the State dinner this evening His Highness made a statesmanlike speech, proposing the health of the Prince and Princess of Wales, saying that if ever the time came the whole resources of the State would be at the disposal of the British Raj.

May I record a characteristic episode of to-day's motor ride to Seringapatam. The Royal motor car carrying the Prince and Princess of Wales, the Maharaja, and the Resident Mr. Stuart Fraser was preceded by sepoys riding motor bicycles. One of these skidded on the road and heavily threw the rider snapping his leg like the breaking of a stick. A small crowd immediately gathered and noticing this as he passed the Prince had his car stopped and enquired the cause. On being informed he at once opened the car jumped out and saw personally the nature of the man's injuries. He also at once ordered water to be brought nor did he quit the scene until he saw that the injured man had received every care and attention and that arrangements had been made for his prompt removal to the hospital. Then and then only did he allow his journey to be continued. The Prince's kindness and ready sympathy made a deep impression on the knot of on-lookers. Their feelings may be gauged from this characteristic remark "how fortunate is our brother to receive this consideration from the Shahzada."

Hindustan Review.—With the end of last month a well-defined stage was reached in the Royal tour in India. Early this month Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales crossed over from Calcutta to Burma. During the period of two months that the Royal visitors have been in the country they have travelled from Bombay to Peshawar, and from Jammu to Calcutta, the hill stations being left out. They have traversed over a great part of the country, seen a great variety of people and formed some idea of the magnitude of the Indian Empire. They have now passed on to what may be fittingly called Greater India, to a country recently acquired. The Aryan type will now be replaced by the Mongolian, and different customs and manners will now meet the Royal visitors. The purda system of Northern India does not exist in Burma, and women, gaily dressed, will crowd as eagerly as men to see Their Royal Highnesses. The orderliness and the good humour of the people which arrested the attention of the Prince of Wales in Calcutta and other parts of India will be found in Burma, also for the love of peace is common to most nations in Asia. Part of India still remains to be visited, and at Benares the Royal visitors will see what is not to be met with anywhere else in the world—a city dating back to the most hoary antiquity and as full of life as it was thousands of years ago, with the faith of the people unchanged, and a population wrapped up in their religion.

In the Review of Reviews Mr. W. T. Stead has made certain comments on the Royal tour in India, which, though somewhat caustic, are certainly useful. It is only once that the heir to the British Empire can be expected to pay a visit to the most important dependency of the Empire, and it is in the highest degree desirable that he should be permitted to see as much as possible of the real state of the country. It is undeniable that the programme as arranged by the authorities in this country excludes all chances of the future Emperor having first-hand information about the condition of the people and their feelings. The Prince himself cannot be charged with neglecting such opportunities as were presented to him. In Calcutta he granted a fairly long interview to the Hon'ble Mr. Gokhale, the President of the last Indian National Congress, and expressed himself interested in Mr. Gokhale's speech. We do not know what truth there is in the report that certain newspapers are not permitted to reach the Prince's table, but, if so, the fault lies with those who are in charge of the arrangement rather than to the Prince's lack of desire for information. The impression he has made upon every one who had the honour of coming in contact with him is a favourable one, and there is no doubt that, given the opportunity. His Royal Highness would have been glad to acquaint himself with the real condition of the people of India.

MYSORE, JANUARY 30TH.

Indian Daily News.—This morning the Prince of Wales laid the foundation-stone of the Chamarajendra Technical Institute which will house the industrial and Engineering Schools of the State which have been hitherto carried on in a rented building. The ceremony was brief but picturesque, and was largely attended. The Prince and Princess were received by the Maharaja, who after conducting Their Royal Highnesses to the dais, presented the Dewan Sir Krishna Murthi, who read an address describing the work of technical education in the Mysore State.

The work of the Indian artisans is doubtless familiar to Your Royal Highness, and I need not dilate on the skill to which they have attained in the arts that are peculiarly their own. Mysore can boast of hereditary craftsmen in wood, metal and ivory whose work will bear comparison with the masterpieces of Oriental art, but at the present time there is an ever increasing demand for workmen of another type equipped with a sound training in the elementary principles of practical mechanics that will enable a man to take his part in the industries of modern civilisation. To meet this need, the Mysore Industrial School was instituted in the year 1892 by the late revered ruler. Since that time drawing and modelling, carpentry, smith's work, pottery, and certain minor crafts have been taught to over two hundred. From modest beginnings, the expenditure on the school has risen to Rs. 33,000 in the current year, whilst the earnings of the students for the same year are estimated at Rs. 10,000. The Mysore Engineering School numbers 75 students and represents the development of what was known as the Masonry Class of the Industrial School intended for the training of petty overmen. Three years ago this branch of instruction was given a separate existence, whilst the standard of instruction raised—a step that has been justified not only by the success of the students in the Madras Technical Examinations, but also by the marked efficiency of students when put to practical work. The two schools have hitherto been housed in hired buildings of an unsuitable character. In spite, however, of the consequent difficulties, they have progressed and expanded to a point at which the provision of suitable accommodation could no longer be delayed. The two schools will now be located in a single building to be known as "The Chamarajendra Technical Institute." The local branch of the Government Press will also be transferred to the Institute, and printing will be included amongst the industries taught there. The building is estimated to cost more than a lakh of rupees and has been designed with a view to the present requirements of the schools and their reasonable growth in the future. The measure of success already attained, notwithstanding the lack of suitable accommodation, encourages the Government of His Highness to anticipate a still more prosperous future for the two institutions in their new habitation.

The Maharaja, addressing the Prince, said :—I now beg to request Your Royal Highness to be graciously pleased to lay the foundation-stone of the Chamarajendra Technical Institute. The gracious participation of Your Royal Highness in an event of the happiest augury, the memory of which will remain a perennial source of inspiration and encouragement to all connected with the schools. The building destined to rise upon this site will serve to perpetuate in a material shape, pleasing it is hoped, to Your Royal Highness, the recollection of the great honour which Your Royal Highness have conferred upon myself and upon my State by your visit to Mysore.

His Royal Highness said :—Your Highness, I am very glad to be associated with this industrial institution, and to have an opportunity of showing my sympathy with the artisans of Mysore and of India. The Princess of Wales and I have greatly admired their work at various places on our journey, and I am heartily in favour of any movement that may either tend to improve the handicrafts of India or raise the social position of the artisans. We have seen much of the arts in India, but have seen very little of the artisans, and I am especially delighted to take part in any ceremony which may lead towards and amelioration of one of the most deserving and most important classes of the Indian people. His Royal Highness then proceeded to lay the stone, which was finally declared well and truly laid.

The Princess, this morning, wore mourning, owing to the death of King Christian of Denmark.

Elaborate and excellent arrangements have been made for the period of the visit of Their Royal Highnesses to the capital of Mysore. Their Royal Highnesses are housed in Government House, in the grounds of which an admirably laid out and luxuriously appointed camp has been pitched for the accommodation of the numerous guests. The programme arranged for the Royal visit has been devised with a view of giving the Prince and Princess a quiet time, and the arrangements for the shooting camp at Karepur, 44 miles from Mysore, have been made with this object.

This afternoon, after 3 o'clock, Their Royal Highnesses proceeded by motor car to Seringapatam, which is about seven miles from Mysore. The road thither is overhung with splendid trees and is bordered by richly cultivated fields. After passing through Ganjam Their Royal Highnesses drove to the Mausoleum, where Haider Ali and Tippu Sultan lie buried. Enclosed within a charming garden and approached by an avenue, the tombs are covered by a building at once splendid and simple in design. Pillars of polished black stone support the outer hall which runs all round the place, and similar black stone is used in the main entrances. A pair of wooden doors beautifully inlaid with ivory are shown as the gift of Lord Dalhousie, the wife of Haider and to the tombs in 1855. Beside Haider Ali and his son, the "Tiger of Mysore," sleeps Fakarunessa Begum, the mother of Tippu, and over the repulchres of all three rich silk cloths are reverently laid. Since Lord Dalhousie paid his visit to Mysore over half a century ago, the mausoleum and the neighbouring garden house of Tippu Sultan, which afterwards became the residence of Wellington as Governor of Seringapatam, have been carefully preserved and repaired from time to time. Tippu's palace in the mausoleum garden ceased to exist, but the pleasure palace where Wellington resided is now restored to most of its pristine beauty. This is known as the Darial Dowlat Bagh, and Their Royal Highnesses drove thither after the inspection of the tombs. The outer walls of the garden house are covered with excellent paintings by native artists. The whole of the wall facing the gateway gives the story of the disaster at Pollilore, when Colonel Brille was obliged to surrender to the combined armies of Haider and Tippu, estimated at 25,000 horse and thirty battalions of infantry, besides Haider Ali's European troops.

Their Royal Highnesses, after leaving the Darial Dowlat Bagh, drove to the ruins of the Seringapatam defences. They passed the spot where Tippu met his death after having been first wounded by a chance shot from one of the storming party. When his body was discovered it bore four wounds. At the Sandal Koti the Prince and Princess were greeted by a bright gathering of children assembled in the pandal, and a song of welcome were sung. A number of leading townspeople here made obeisance.

Thereafter Their Royal Highnesses drove to the dungeon where the British prisoners who survived the battle of Pollilore were confined. They are said to have numbered 384, and were imprisoned in an underground vault 90 feet long, 37½ feet wide and 7 feet high. The prisoners are stated to have been chained to the walls. Some of the officers were imprisoned in a building 70 feet long.

The ruins of the Delhi Bridge across the Cauvery, now only a string of stones forming a ford, were also viewed by Their Royal Highnesses as well as the breach in the ramparts, where General Baird, after crossing the river, led the storming party to the capture of Seringapatam on the 4th May, more than a hundred years ago. The experimental masonry arch built by the ingenious French Engineer P. Haviland was also inspected by the Royal party. The arch has a span of 112 feet, and is so well balanced that the structure sways in an eric fashion when a person jumps on the keystone.

After having seen this study in engineering possibilities, Their Royal Highnesses returned to Mysore, reaching Government House shortly after 6 p.m. To-night a State banquet is being held, followed by a display of fireworks.

At the State banquet to-night the Maharaja, accompanied by the Dewan and members of the State Council, entered the hall. When the dessert was reached the Maharaja proposed the toast of the King-Emperor, which was loyally honoured. His Highness afterwards proposed the health of the Prince and Princess. He referred to the disappointment occasioned in Mysore thirty years ago when the King-Emperor was unable to include this State in his tour, but observed that that disappointment had been happily effaced by the visit of the Prince of Wales accompanied by his gracious consort. His Highness alluded to the visit of Their Royal Highnesses to the ramparts of Seringapatam, and in referring to the historic events which took place said that among the Imperial Service Troops who escorted Their Royal Highnesses yesterday and to-day were descendants of the Mysoreans who fought side by side with the British at Seringapatam, and should the troops of Mysore be called upon in the future they would not be found wanting. He requested His Royal Highness to convey to His Majesty the assurance of the deep loyalty to himself and his subjects. (Applause.) The toast was warmly honoured; the Prince replied, and concluded by proposing the health of the Maharaja.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The three weeks which, after leaving Bikaner, the Prince of Wales spent in the extreme North-West of India were especially characterized by the great variety of the experiences which he underwent, and of the surroundings in which he found himself. At Lahore he was in the capital of a thoroughly settled British province, where it is as safe for a visitor to wander through the back streets at midnight as it is to walk down Piccadilly, and a good deal safer than in many parts of London. The exertions demanded of the Royal visitors at the Punjab capital in the matter of functions and sightseeing of one kind and another were particularly severe. Amongst the duties to be got through, perhaps one of the pleasantest was the reception of a large number of the chiefs of the Punjab States, a group which has enjoyed for more than 50 years the highest reputation for active and enthusiastic adherence to the British Government. How nobly they behaved in 1857, and how large a part their support played in the successful suppression of the Mutiny, is well known. That their loyalty is still as great as it then was is evidenced by the 3,500 Imperial Service troops who appeared on parade as the contribution of the larger States. In proportion to their wealth and population, these States have given more than their fair share of the total force. The young Maharajah of Patiala, still a minor, the venerable Rajah of Nabha, and the Rajah of Jhind rode at the head of the cavalry contingents of the three Phulkian Sikh States which they rule. The Rajah of Kapurthala, almost better known in England and on the Continent than in India, also led his cavalry past the Prince and Princess; and of the smartness and efficient appearance of the troops, as well as of the camel and transport corps of the Nawab of Bahawalpur, the only Mahomedan chief in the Punjab, there seems to have been but one opinion.

When Peshawar was reached, on December 2nd, the scene was completely changed. From the great plain in which Lahore is situated it is a welcome change to Peshawar with its background of mountains. It, too, is a provincial capital, the youngest of all except Dacca; but it is the headquarters of an administration of a much rougher type than the cis-Indus districts from which it was separated only a few years ago. Even before their separation from the Punjab, the districts which now constitute the North-West Frontier Province required some special laws adapted to their conditions than the hard and fast rules of the Central and Eastern Punjab. Thirty years ago Peshawar was a very unsafe neighbourhood in which to indulge a propensity for wandering after dark. Though it is perhaps safer now, it is still very different from Lahore or Delhi. At Peshawar there were more chiefs to be received, but this time of a very different stamp from the civilized, polished rulers of the feudatory States of the Punjab. The names of the Mehtar of Chitral and of the Khans of Dir and Nawagai at once conjure up recollections of the Chitral campaign and of the contest against Umra Khan. Less than a year ago there were rumours of war in connection with Dir and Nawagai, necessitating the movement of the flying column which is kept ready for such emergencies. With these chiefs, and with the tribes in the zone between our own proper frontier and Afghanistan, the history of British relations has been very chequered, complicated always by the love of intrigue on the part of Afghan local officials, often not discouraged by higher authorities at Kabul itself. That these intrigues are still a constant source of trouble is evident from a recent report on the administration of his province by Colonel Deane, whose promotion to the rank of K. C. S. I. on January 1st, is a well merited reward of much useful frontier service. The official disapproval which, in some quarters greeted Lord Curzon's creation of the new province seems to have died away. Probably to most people outside the Punjab it never seemed doubtful that it was a good move to place frontier affairs, intimately connected as they are with a wide sphere of politics, directly under the Viceroy, without the intermediate authority of a provincial Government, more than sufficiently occupied with the administration of more settled territories.

From Peshawar the Prince and Princess were able to make an expedition which would have been quite out of the question in 1875, even if the difficulty of reaching Peshawar in those days be left out of consideration. The Khyber Pass was then no place for European visitors, and four years later Ali Musjid, in the middle of the route, as well as Lundi Kotal, where the drive of December 4th ended, had to be wrested by force of arms from the Afghans. So late as 1897 the whole pass was devastated by fire and sword; Lundi Kotal and Ali Musjid were sacked by Afridis maddened by the call to a religious war, and the flames of the burning Fort Maude, at the Indian entrance of the pass, were visible from Peshawar. Modern defences of stone and steel now render all three impregnable to assault by any tribal force. Even now, the neighbourhood of the pass is anything rather than a land of peace, and the road is only open to caravans passing between Afghanistan and India on two days in each week. Yet, when the Prince passed along it, the fact that was most noticeable to all was the complete sense of security under the protection of the pickets of the Khyber Rifles, which crowned every height within range of the road, and of the tribesmen standing on the hills beyond. On the return journey, at Ali Musjid, the headmen of the principal Afridi tribes peacefully and respectfully tendered their homage to the Heir-Apparent, with their offerings of sheep and honey. Yet these were the leaders of men who but the other day were cutting one another's throats, and, in all probability, will be at the same bloody work again.

After Peshawar the surroundings again changed to the manoeuvres, and the review at Rawalpindi of a force of some 55,000 of the flower of the Indian army, representing the front line of the force which would be called on to act in the event of serious war beyond the frontier. As a representation of war the manoeuvres were certainly disappointing, if only from the fact that the absence of smokeless blank ammunition for the artillery deprived them of one of the most characteristic features of modern battles. Still, the opportunity was taken to experiment with many other new appliances, and the mere gathering together of so considerable a force in the neighbourhood of the frontier was a testimony to the progress already made in shifting the military centre of gravity.

From Rawalpindi the next move was to Jammu, the lowland capital of the Maharajah of Kashmir. Only a few weeks before, the late Viceroy had formally invested that Prince with full powers in his State, from the exercise of which he had been for many years excluded. To an Indian chief a secondary position such as the Maharajah had so long occupied is peculiarly obnoxious, and in his address to his visitors there is a very clear ring of the satisfaction which he felt at his restoration to power. Before that restoration took place, there were rumours that it would be accompanied by conditions providing facilities for the settlement of Europeans in the valley of Kashmir. Those rumours were formally denied by the Government of India; and, whatever may be thought of the desirability of the importation of European experts in hop cultivation, sericulture, or viticulture, it would clearly have been most inexpedient to hamper the free gift by conditions such as those that were foreshadowed. The success of his future administration must depend on how far the Maharajah has taken to heart the lessons of the long period of his partial exclusion from government, and on his determination to carry on the work of improvement then initiated. There are many who believe that he has not failed to learn the lesson, and that his administration of his rich and beautiful territory will be a vast improvement on that of the period before his resignation of power in 1859. He expressed his regret that it had been found impossible for the Prince and Princess to visit the Kashmir Valley. It may be hoped that, long before the time arrives for a third Prince of Wales to visit India, the journey from the plains to Srinagar will be reduced to one of a few hours by the railway which is in contemplation. In concluding his welcome to his visitors, the Maharajah made an announcement of good omen for his future conduct of affairs, by intimating his intention to commemorate the occasion by the institution of a State College, open to all creeds and classes of his subjects. He, like the other great chiefs, contributes to the Imperial Service Corps, and of the 3,600 infantry, cavalry, and mountain artillery, which he commands many are decorated for active service on the extreme northern frontier where the outposts of the Empire face the Pamirs. Amritsar was the last place visited on the way to Delhi. At Lahore the Prince had seen the former capital of Ranjit Singh's kingdom; at Amritsar he was at the religious centre of the Sikh faith, the place which, to its votaries, fills the position of Mecca to the Mahomedan, or of Jerusalem to the Jew. The famous Golden Temple breathes the spirit of Nanak the reformer and of Tek Bahadur the martyr, to whom look up with reverence thousands of our best Indian soldiers. The only matter for regret is that the race from which these splendid soldiers are drawn, largely though it counts in Indian affairs, constitutes less than 1 per cent. of the whole population. Were it 10 per cent, we should be able to raise an army fit to go anywhere and do anything. On the other hand, had their numbers been so great, India might possibly have been to-day a Sikh instead of a British Empire.

Times of India.—We talk and write about the contrasts that India affords until everyone grows weary of the word. Yet sometimes they thrust themselves upon you with an insistence and abruptness that defy suppression. In Madras the native community organised an entertainment in honour of the Prince and Princess of Wales. Of the performance it is not necessary to speak: a more utterly puerile exhibition is inconceivable, and it would have bored a Sunday School treat. But it brought before their Royal Highnesses the leading native gentlemen of Madras—High Court Judges of distinction, successful lawyers and merchants, men with brains that would challenge comparison with the best intellects of Europe. It brought also a band of Khonds, aborigines from the Ganjam District, as far removed from the educated Madras as are the pygmies of Central Africa or the Tierra del Fuegians from the ford. Geographically the two races are only hundred miles or so apart: ethnologically mons divide them.

They came like a whiff of Darkest Africa into the rooms of the Royal Society. Barefooted and barelegged, with short accordion-pleated skirts like an Empire ballerina, and huge shields of leopard's skin on their backs. It is the back and not the honoured chest, that the Khond turns to meet the foemen's steel. Rude plumes of peacock's feathers rose from their shoulders and heads, catkins and amulets dangled from their necks and waists, and they brandished small battle axes locally known as tangis and waved tiny bows and arrows. Their dance can at once be pictured by turning up Samuel Baker's or Stanley's volumes of African travel and finding the woodcuts of African measures—a crude mimic combat punctuated by hoarse yells. It only had this to commend it that it induced a certain display of agility and was apparently enjoyed, in marked contrast to the ennui of the Burmese posturings. This check by jowl with a civilisation musty when our forefathers were elegantly clad in woad!

The Khonds carried us right back to pre-historic India. Their origin is obscure, for they must have been driven into the jungles of the eastern ghats by the Dravidians—who have not yet found a chronicler—before they in turn were pressed back by the Aryan invasion. Their isolation preserved them singularly intact, for their language bears no known resemblance to any Dravidian or Aryan tongue. When we look for linguistic affinities we cannot find them nearer than the aboriginal tribes in the hills of Assam and on the borders of Burma, who were no doubt ousted in a similar manner. Like the Bhils, they are described as a straightforward and truthful people: they are too simple-minded to tell a lie, and prefer veracity. They are loyal to their chiefs and their friends, brave, hospitable, and laborious, and of a humorous and cheerful disposition. Passionately addicted to the chase, they pursue it with intrepidity and ardour, rarely abandoning the quarry until they have run it down. Yet with qualities like these, some of them open and engaging, they combine the blackest superstition and the practice of human sacrifice.

Many years ago when punishing some rebellious zemindars in the Ganjam District, the Madras Government found that these were possessed of a sort of semi-detached subjects in the dense jungles above the ghats, and it gradually became known that the practice of offering human sacrifices, the victims for which were procured from the plains, was common amongst them. This barbarous rite was only suppressed after tedious exertions, during which hundreds of victims were rescued, some of whom are to the present day receiving a small subsistence allowance from the Madras Government. Great vigilance has to be exercised, even now to prevent a recurrence of the practice, for when the rains are deficient or the crops bad, the Khonds invariably put it down to the anger of the gods at not being propitiated in the orthodox manner. It was discovered by the Madras Police a year or two ago that the practice had by no means died out, and that several human victims had been offered in sacrifice by Khonds living beyond the borders and under the jurisdiction of the Bengal Government. It is the custom of the Khonds in the Madras Presidency to offer a buffalo in sacrifice in substitution for the human victim, but in doing so they make long apologies to the deity explaining that they themselves would willingly make the customary sacrifice, but are prevented by the British Government, on whose head they pray that any anger at their neglect of duty may be visited. With a certain grim sense of humour they plead that the British Government is strong enough to bear the anger of the gods, while they are not.

The Khonds' great hobbies are drunkenness and revenge. The flowing bowl is easily replenished, for the solapa or sago palm, which gives toddy for six months up to the rains and the mhowra tree abound in the jungles. But with a certain rude sense of the fitness of things the women do not join in the debauch. The instrument of revenge is never lacking, for the Khond is as inseparable from his tangi, or light battle-axe, as the Bhil from his bow and arrow. It was quite amusing when the Prince and Princess expressed a desire to examine one of the instruments and a specimen was presented to them, to note the childish anxiety betrayed by the owner lest his weapon should not be restored to him. The offence is speedily followed by the blow, and when the Khond comes into contact with the law the tangi is almost invariably the cause of offence. Indeed, although the evidence is frequently very scanty, the Khond rarely denies the charge, but he will explain why he struck the blow, which according to his simple code is sufficient. The tangi plays a considerable part in the social life of the Khonds. An injured husband will to mahawk the co-respondent on sight. The procedure is Draconian, but at any rate it is preferable to making immorality a mere matter of lucre. Or the owner of a toddy tree will send up an arrow "with intent" at a too thirsty neighbour making free with his toddy pots. In either case an explanation of the facts is considered a justification of the homicide.

Marriages are frequently attended with similar "accidents." When the preliminaries have been arranged and an auspicious day selected the bridegroom goes with a party to the house of the bride, where a large circle awaits them. The fiction of carrying off the bride with force is observed, and is accompanied with violent horse play during which it is nothing unusual for a tap of the tangi to give one of the supporters his quietus. Further south a quainter custom prevails. When the village maiden reaches a marriageable age a bonfire is lit, the maiden plucks a brand from it, and as the young men run the gauntlet before her she smites them on the bare buttock with the torch. The one who squeals the least is the chosen one. But the ordeal is fictitious, for the gentleness has made up her mind beforehand, and the favoured swain is kissed so lightly by the same that his pain is easily suppressed. Any who have offended the bride, however, receive a buss from the brand that they have cause to remember. Contrary to the custom of most Indian peoples, the Khond woman is not married until she reaches maturity, and she exercises the right of veto on her own disposal. In some remote places the woman wears no clothing until marriage, and the proposal of marriage takes the form of an offer to buy the lady a cloth. If she accepts she is expected to remain virtuous thereafter, and as a rule she does.

Formerly pitched battles between tribes, attended by all sorts of formalities, were common, but they have now been put down by British rule, and the mimic battle of the war dance is the only survival to remind them of the good old days. Even this is gradually dying out, and is probably kept alive more by the interest taken in it by the touring European officer than by anything else. The Khonds are fond of music, and in their songs there is to the European ear a more distinct melody than can be detected in the songs of other races in southern India. In their dancing too there are distinct steps, not contortions of the body and mere shuffling of the feet to provide a jingling accompaniment to the music. One trait the Khonds possess that was shared by a great Englishman—a passion for cutting down trees. But instead of bringing them notoriety it arouses the ire of the Forest Department.

1ST FEBRUARY 1906.

Civil and Military Gazette.—Mr. A. H. Diack, Chief Secretary to the Government of the Punjab, writes to Mr. R. E. Younghouseband, Commissioner, Lahore Division, "I am desired to convey to you and to the officers who assisted you, an expression of the Lieutenant-Governor's appreciation of the success of the arrangements made by you in connection with the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales to Lahore and Amritsar. Their Royal Highnesses have expressed to His Honour their satisfaction with the nature of the reception they met with in the Province and Sir Charles Rivaz thinks that all who had the honour of sharing in the preparations for the Royal visit are to be congratulated on the result of their labours. His Honour is well aware that these labours involved a considerable increase of work and responsibility and although this was in the circumstances borne cheerfully and with good will, the acknowledgments of Government are none the less due to you and your assistants.

"Among the latter His Honour desires his acknowledgments to be specially conveyed to Mr. Hallifax, Deputy Commissioner, Lahore; Mr. King, Deputy Commissioner, Amritsar; Captain Frizelle, First Assistant to the Deputy Commissioner of Lahore; Captain Coldstream, Assistant Commissioner in Charge of the Civil Camp; Lieutenant G. D. Ogilvie, Assistant Commissioner, and Kazi Ghulam Rabbani, Extra Assistant Commissioner."

Englishman.—The State dinner last night was brought to a close with the most brilliant display of fireworks that Their Royal Highnesses have seen in the course of their progress. For nearly an hour the sky was streaked with blazing rockets and lighted by the glare of their explosions. Set piece followed set piece, representing a mimic naval battles and waves of flame, while the air was filled with the hoarse cries of joy that rose from the great throng of natives that had gathered on the outskirts of the royal camp. Messrs. Brock reproduced here in Mysore the pyrotechnic splendours of the Crystal Palace.

This morning Their Royal Highnesses saw on the exercise ground a parade of the Imperial Service Lancers whose smart appearance on the day of the entry was the theme of such general comment. These are the lineal descendants of the famous Mysorean cavalry of the time of Haider and Tipu, long, lean, active men, born riders and splendidly horsed and equipped. These, too, are part of the force which the Maharaja, in tones which evidenced his earnestness, dedicated in his speech last night to the service of the Raj if ever the time comes when India will need the help of every good blade. The parade movements were faultlessly executed, and then a couple of dozen sowars gave an exhibition of the trick riding in which the Indian horse excel. Jumping in half sections and vaulting bars backed on to the horse as it cleared the obstacle, riding erect, standing on the bare back, and doing the lance exercise standing on the horse at the walk. The parade closed with the gallop in line and the Prince warmly complimented the Maharaja and the officers on the efficiency and smartness of the State's contribution to India's sword arm.

Soon afterwards the camp broke up and Their Royal Highnesses left for the shooting camp, forty miles away, where they will remain until Sunday when they proceed to Bangalore. The shikar will include an elephant drive.

Lady of fashion.—The Royal Special arrived in Bangalore City Station this morning at about 7-30 A. M., having been preceded by the staff special (or pilot train) at 6-15 A. M. A supplementary special for the luggage and some of the servants came in last night. As the Royal train has been in the Central Station, Madras, for some time, it is perhaps scarcely necessary to give a lengthy description of it. Two engines drew it and the Prince of Wales's feathers and the Royal Arms were conspicuous on the leading engine. Mr. Pilkington, Locomotive Superintendent, and Mr. Porteous, Assistant Locomotive Superintendent, travelled on engines, and Major Bonham-Carter, R. E., and Mr. Ross-Johnson, Traffic Manager, were also on the train. Mr. H. F. Wilkieson, District Superintendent of Police, took charge at Bowringpet. The City Station was tastefully decorated, and the platforms were kept clear by the City Police. Arrangements had been made for a flag-walled passage, by means of which Their Royal Highnesses and suite could pass from the Madras Special to the train which would convey them to Mysore, and amongst the flags which formed this passage, Union Jacks, and Royal Standards appeared in profusion. Both arrival and departure were absolutely private, but some few introductions did take place, amongst them being Colonel Burn-Murdoch, Major Bonham-Carter and other officers of the two Railways. Leaving the Madras Special shortly before 9 A. M., the Royal Party passed through the central passage into the train for Mysore. This, like the Madras Special, was drawn by two engines, and the three Royal Saloons were lent for the occasion by the South Indian Railway. Mr. Brock, Locomotive Superintendent, travelled on the engine, and Mr. F. E. C. Carr, Inspector-General of Police in Mysore, having taken over charge from Mr. H. E. Wilkieson, also accompanied the train. At 9-15 A. M. the train moved out of the Station en route to the Capital of the State. Notwithstanding the privacy of the arrival and departure and the impossibility of seeing Their Royal Highnesses, large crowds collected in the vicinity of the Station and along the side of the line.

The arrangements for the principal ceremony in connection with the Royal Visit to Bangalore are rapidly approaching completion, and Mr. W. McHutchin and Major Steele, are much to be congratulated upon them. The statue of the late Queen Empress will be veiled by four huge Union Jacks, controlled by a silken cord, and a clip specially devised for the occasion. A very light pull on the cord will cause all four flags to fall instantaneously, and the result cannot fail to be satisfactory.

The Royal Pandal is a beautiful structure erected by Tanjore workmen in the Hindu-Saracenic style, and the ornamental work is wonderfully effective. On the opposite side of the road is another pandal for the use of Indian ladies, and this, if more modest, is almost equally pretty. Chairs will be provided in this pandal, and three small steps provide for each rank of occupants being able to see the proceedings. The stands are very large, the seats arranged in tiers, and by a wise provision steps are constructed for the ascent, both from front and back, which will greatly facilitate the gaining of their seats by the holders of tickets.

Madras Mail.—Rajah Rangayya Appa Row Bahadur, of Nuzvid in honour of the visit of Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, has endowed a bed, to be known as "The Princess of Wales' Bed," in the Royal Victoria Caste and Gosha Hospital, Madras.

Madras Mail.—Bangalore, 31st Jan.—I learn, upon good authority, that Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales will not now attend the presentation of new Colours to the Carabiniers.

Preparations for the Flower Show are progressing rapidly, and the route by which the Prince and Princess will proceed from the unveiling of the Victoria Memorial Statue to the Lal Bagh is being decorated with bunting, whilst three arches appear between the Eye Infirmary and the Lal Bagh gates. Near the Fort is another arch and at the Central College gates an especially fine one, this being the road by which Their Royal Highnesses will return from the Flower Show. It will be near this arch that the school children will be gathered to welcome the Royal Visitors, and stands are being erected for their accommodation.

It is requested that ladies and gentlemen attending the Reception at the Residency on the 6th proximo will bring with them cards with their names legibly printed or written thereon.

Five hundred poor people were sumptuously fed by the Prince of Wales' Reception Committee, Madras, and clad by Rajah Sir Ramaswamy Moodelliar, C.I.E., in connection with the Royal visit to Madras at the Muthialpetta Annadhana Samaj. About 1,600 poor have been fed, under the auspices of the Annadhana Samajum, by the Rajah of Dharakota, and the Rajah of Nuzvid in honour of the Royal Visit.

Apart from the feeding of the poor by the Committee a good deal is being done by private effort to make the poor of the City happy during the sojourn of the Royal Visitors in Madras. A very large number of mendicants, numbering something like 3,500, were sumptuously fed on the 26th ultimo at Cook's Road, Perambore, by Mr. Hajee Mahomed Hussain Khan Sahib, principal of the firm of Messrs. Hajee Hyder Khan Sahib and Co., piece-goods merchants.

The celebration in British Tangacherri in honour of the Royal visit to Madras was a splendid success. At Talliparamba, an important village in North Malabar, the Royal visit was celebrated by the feeding of the poor and the offering of prayers in the local temples on behalf of our illustrious visitors. Mr. Vengayil Kunhi Raman Nayanar, the leading jenmi of the locality, gathered together the Vetturans, Mavilans, Pulayas and other Hill and jungle tribes and gave them a hearty meal. The people of Tellicherry celebrated the Royal Visit to Madras with great enthusiasm and observed the 24th instant as a day of great rejoicing. A large number of people assembled on the Maidan, and the decorations of the various buildings were both tasteful and imposing. The illuminated message of welcome on the hillside was also effective, and the fireworks on the hill itself very creditable. The boys of the various schools enjoyed their treats, and Sports were also indulged in. The streets and shops were almost everywhere illuminated in the evening.

On the 24th instant, the boys of the C. M. High and Board Lower Secondary Schools and the pupils of the Schools of Thottacud and Keralapuram and of the Mahomedan School were given a treat. In the morning alms were distributed to more than 3,000 poor, at noon a great treat was given by the Manjeri Karnamulpad to the school children in the Local Board Lower Secondary School. The Karnamulpad also distributed cloths to all the Panchama School students in the neighbouring Panchama School at Malapuram. In the evening a procession started from the Court House with due pomp and ceremony. There was a display of fireworks and other amusements throughout the procession.

An entertainment to the student population of Mangalore of all creeds and of both sexes was given by Mr. M. Pais, at the Coronation Gardens, on Friday evening, in honour of the Royal Visit to Madras, when the whole of the gardens were illuminated. There were over 2,000 boys and girls present with their teachers, as also the elite of the Indian and European communities. At 4-30 p.m. the hour of the Royal landing in Madras, a grand procession, headed by a richly caparisoned elephants, followed by a gorgeously decorated car containing the portraits of Their Royal Highnesses, started from the Rajah's School and went round the principal streets and made a long halt in the Palace compound, where there was a display of fireworks. The procession returned at 8 p.m., and the proceedings terminated with hearty cheers for Their Royal Highnesses. Kollengode.

The visit of Their Royal Highnesses to Madras was celebrated at Chittur (Palghat) on a grand scale on the 25th. The poor of the neighbourhood, Ezhuvas, Charamas and Nayadis, were fed, to the number of nearly 1,000. In the evening there was a large public Meeting in the Taluq School with Mr. Raghavan Nambiar, the Munsiff, in the Chair, at which a lecture in Malayalam was delivered by a Plender on "The Life and Doings of the Prince of Wales," and a few dramatic scenes were acted. Afterwards an interesting programme arranged by Mr. Govindarannadiar was gone through, viz., a procession from the Taluq School to the Edward Coronation Hall, with pictures of Their Royal Highnesses carried in a chapram, with torches a firework display, and a decorated elephant on which were carried the insignia of Royalty. The proceedings concluded with cheer, for their Imperial Majesties, Their Royal Highnesses, and the Rajah of Cochin.

The commemoration in Palghat deserves special mention, for the proceedings were really brilliant. Under the leadership of Mr. Moore, I.C.S., with Rao Bahadur Chinnaswamy Pillai as his right-hand man, and with Mr. Kunhiraman and others to help, things went with a swing, and a goodly subscription was raised. Two thousand poor people were fed. A large and gaily decorated pandal had been put up on the Fort Maidan and in this during the afternoon more than 2,000 school children were given a treat. The great event of the day, the procession, started from Messrs. Parry and Co.'s offices, where Mr. Choekalingam Pillai entertained a large party of European and Indian guests. Twelve gaily-caparisoned elephants led the way; and behind in carriages were the leading European and Indian residents of the station. Through close-packed crowds, to the roar of files and drums with red and blue lights blazing around and with rockets soaring overhead, the procession proceeded on its mile or more march to the Maidan. A beautiful sight awaited the arrival. Tippu's historic fort lying across the Maidan had been illuminated, and the grim walls and bastions, from which in olden times the canons had frowned upon the city, were peacefully twinkling now with fairy lights. But the lights were soon lost to sight, for a firework display such as Palghat had never seen before was let loose upon the sky. Fire balloons soared across the Maidan, and showers of rockets and Roman Candles and Catherine wheels made the darkness beautiful. It was a great day, not soon to be forgotten in the annals of Palghat.

The visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales was commemorated at Cannanore on the 24th instant on a grand scale. The boys of all the schools in the Municipality, numbering more than 1,500, assembled at the Municipal High School at 1 p.m. when refreshments were served to them. The girls were given treats in the Convent School and the Government Girls School. A grand procession headed by an elephant was formed and proceeded to the Fort Esplanade where a decorated pavilion had been erected for the accommodation of visitors. Each school carried a Union Jack and a banner bearing the name of the school, both of which were presented to the Head Masters to hang up in their schools as a permanent reminder of the memorable occasion. The Panchama boys were each given a cloth and doles of rice sufficient for a meal. The poor were also given doles of rice. The Esplanade presented an animated scene. Before the proceedings of the evening commenced a telegram was despatched wishing the Royal Visitors' happiness and long life. Sports began about 5 p.m., in which schoolboys, the 70th Carnatic Infantry and the Wing of the Cheshires took part. The Sports over, Colonel King, Commanding the Station, made a speech congratulating the Executive Committee on the success of the demonstration. He said that the occasion had brought the different races together, all animated by one feeling—loyalty to the British Throne. He then paid a compliment to the natives of Malabar, who were second to none in their loyalty. On behalf of the Executive Committee Mr. C. Kunhikannan thanked Colonel King for having placed the Esplanade and the Band of the Regiment at their disposal.

A public meeting of the citizens of Bodagara town was held in the afternoon of the 21st ultimo, in the Local Fund School under the presidency of the newly-joined District Munsiff, Mr. Narayanaswamy Iyer, to concert measures for celebrating the arrival of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales at Madras. The Chairman explained briefly but fully the object of the meeting. In doing so he emphasised the unique character of the Royal Visit in that it came only once in thirty or forty years, and further said that as it was impossible for the Emperor himself after he had assumed the sceptre to quit his capital for a long journey with a view to visit the distant parts of his vast empire—and just as in the same way as he was sent out by his mother in 1876 when he was Prince of Wales, it was only wise on his part that he should send out his heir-apparent and consort—our future Emperor and Empress—to become acquainted with the customs, manners, aspirations and ambitions of his innumerable subjects; that as a matter of feasibility the latter could visit only the capitals of the Presidencies and other important centres; and that with a view to impress on the present as well as the future generation the importance of the visits thus made, it was necessary to celebrate the occasion in a befitting manner. It was resolved therefore to distribute rice to the poor, to give a treat to the school children, to have a procession with elephants, to illuminate the town and the public buildings and to arrange for a display of fireworks on the return of the procession. A sum of Rs. 400 was raised by the Sub-Committee appointed at the Meeting. The programme settled at the Meeting was successfully carried out on the 24th instant, commencing at 4.30 P. M., to coincide with the hour of the landing of Their Royal Highnesses.

It having been decided that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales could not visit Aruvankad, something had to be done to appease a disappointed public. So, first of all, the newly formed Cinderella Club arranged for an opening dance yesterday, and then the Cordite Dramatic Club co-operated, and the thing was done. Miss Schmidt opened the proceedings with a brilliant pianoforte solo and then the curtain rose disclosing a scene representing a private room in the Star and Garter Hotel for A Richmond Dinner. Mrs. McCulloch, as "Miss Budd," gave another proof of the talent which has so long remained hidden. Mr. Adams as "Mr. Budd" was, as usual, extremely funny, and Mr. Bardell made an excellent, inquisitive, tip-expecting waiter. A Richmond Dinner was evidently only intended as a curtain raiser to whet our appetites for what was to follow. The only fault about the piece was its shortness. After a very short interval, which Miss Schmidt again kindly filled up for us, the curtain went up for the event of the evening, the musical absurdity Crazed, revealing the lodging house maid of all work "Sally" (Miss Warpell). "Sally's" make-up from cap to broom was excellent. Miss Wardell has indeed given us an idea of what acting should be. She sustained the assumed accent and the character of the slatternly lodging-house slavey right through. Her vivacious acting, posing and singing were much appreciated. Unfortunately her stay with us is very short but our loss will be some other place's gain. I hear that Ootacamund is to be that lucky place. "Mr. Smith," the author, Captain Tyrrell, was the next character to come, shortly followed by the composer, "Mr. Brown" (Corporal King), and then the fun waxed fast and furious to the end of the piece. When the curtain fell the audience wanted it all over again, and amidst shouts of applause the actors were called before the curtain. After light refreshments a dance followed. Crazed is sure to get a great reception at Wellington to-day and to-morrow where it is to follow a Concert.

Rajah Rangayya Apparow Bahadur, of Nuzvid, has, in honour of the Royal visit, granted holidays on the 24th, 25th and 26th instant to his Primary and High Schools at Nuzvid and to the Huzur and Tannah offices of his Estate. He has also instructed the Chennanpuri Annadana Samajum at Madras to feed 500 poor at his expense. He has also had prayers offered and poojah performed in the temples of his Nuzvid and Nidadavole Estates for the long life and prosperity of the Royal Family.

An inaugural meeting of officials and non-officials, numbering in all above 500, was held on the 24th ultimo, in the Durbar Hall of the recently constructed splendid palace of Rajah Venkata Rungiah Apparow Bahadur, the Zemindar of Kapileswarapuram estate, when the Rajah opened the proceedings with a short inaugural speech. The Rajah, while drawing attention to the august ceremonials and festivities that would be observed in Madras in honour of the Prince's visit, said as that loyal subjects of the Crown it behoved the people of the estate to celebrate the occasion in a fitting manner. As an auspicious beginning to the proceedings which are to continue throughout the week the Rajah called on the Samastanam Pundit to give a lecture on the life and teachings of that catholic founder of the Srivaishnava sect, Srimat Ramanuja. The Rajah observed that the philosophy of the great preacher was one of love and peace and acceptable to all without distinction of caste and creed. With a prayer to Almighty for the glory and long life of our future Emperor the Samastanam Pundit Sriman Kedambi Gopala Kristnama Charla Garu gave an interesting lecture about the life and philosophy of Sri Ramanuja Pundit Challapilla Venkatasastrulu Garu Sathagantavadhani gave a few extempore verses on the occasion that were highly applauded by all assembled. Mr. Y. Srinivasarow, Farm Superintendent, Telepole Estate, wound up the proceedings with interesting remarks, and thanked the Rajah for the happy proceedings and the meeting came to a close with three cheers proposed for Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales. On the 24th instant prayers were offered for Their Royal Highnesses' long life and prosperity. On the 25th the poor of the estate were fed and a treat was given to school children. On the 26th instant a garden party was held, and to-day a public meeting will be held to establish a Society to concert measures for improvement of industries and agriculture, and to-morrow there will be a procession.

Madras Mail.—The visit was celebrated in Arcot on a grand scale on the 28th instant. Over 1,200 poor were fed in the Talag office compound during the afternoon. In the evening the children attending the Local Fund and the Mahomedan Schools and of several pial schools were given a treat. It is in contemplation to erect a permanent memorial in the shape of a Town Hall.

The public of Kuthipuram fed the poor on the 24th instant and the Kuthipuram Nambidi gave a treat to the school children. The Sub-Registrar, in a short speech, dwelt on the love the Royal Family bore towards India, and on the kindness of the Emperor in sending the Heir-Apparent and his Consort to become personally acquainted with the feelings, wants and aspirations of his Indian subjects. Prayers were offered in the temples, which were brilliantly illuminated.

The visit was celebrated at Srivilliputtur on the 24th instant by feeding 1,500 poor, by giving a treat to the boys of all the local schools and by holding a meeting at 6 P.M., on the tennis court, which was decorated specially for the occasion with flags, festoons, etc. The meeting was presided over by Mr. G. H. B. Jackson, I. C. S., the Head Assistant Collector, who delivered an interesting address about the Royal Family. The meeting closed with the singing of the National Anthem. The celebration was continued on the evening of the 25th instant, when sports were held for the boys of the Hindu and C. M. S. High Schools. At their conclusion the prizes were distributed by the President.

On the 24th instant more than 500 poor were fed and clothes were distributed to the infirm at Aruppukotta. After the firing of a Royal salute of 31 guns and the distribution of pan supari, etc., the assembly dispersed. On the 25th, a grand procession, with the portraits of the Royal Family, garlanded and placed in an open carriage and escorted by all the officials and the public, started from the Deputy Tahsildar's office and went to the market tops with music, elephant, etc. The Boarding and all other schools took part. All Aruppukotta was present in and around the decorated pandal. Flowers, pan supari, sandal and fruit and sugarcandy were distributed and loyal speeches made by the Deputy Tahsildar, Sub-Registrar, and the Pastor of Aruppukotta, welcoming the Prince and Princess. There were about 1,600 school children and more than 5,000 people assembled. Packets of sweets were distributed to the children who then took part in the sports. A display of fireworks and the return of the procession by torchlight fittingly closed the second day's proceedings.

At Nettur, the arrival of Their Royal Highnesses was celebrated with great rejoicing. The students of the Theological Seminary, the Christian High School and the Parochial School were given treats in their respective school buildings. At the High School the Manager, the Rev. Mr. Scheuer, made a short speech explaining to the children the importance of the occasion. The Headmaster also spoke and then the boys were marched out in procession to the Maidan at Tellicherry, where they witnessed the sports.

On the 29th, at about 6 p.m., a grand torchlight procession with fire-works set out from Sri Rajah Venkata Rangayya Apparow Bahadur's palace at Nuzvid. The Rajah's elephants, specially caparisoned with ambhari and howdas on their backs, and the Union Jack flying at the top of the ambhari in front, formed an imposing sight. The portraits of Their Royal Highnesses were placed in front in the ambhari. Mr. E. S. Lloyd, I.C.S., Sub-Collector, with the Rajah's son sat in the ambhari in front, and behind sat the Rajah. The procession returned to the Rajah's palace at about 9 p.m.

The Tuticorin public sent the following telegram to Sir Walter Lawrence:—"Most humbly offer, with profoundest loyalty and heart-felt devotion, welcome to Their Royal Highnesses on their landing at Madras, the Capital of the Presidency, the visit whereto of our beloved Sovereign, His Majesty the King-Emperor, commenced in December, 1875, at this port, since which time it has grown in importance and reputation as the station for visitors from and to Europe and further East to the wide dominions of His Majesty, on which the sun never sets. Pray to Almighty God to shower choicest blessings on Their Royal Highnesses." The following reply was received:—"I am directed by the Prince and Princess of Wales to thank you for your kind telegram."

The preparations for the Royal Visit, which are being made in the neighbourhood of the Agram Barracks, are both appropriate and original. Near Holy Trinity Church, the R. A. have put up a triumphal arch which is being covered with a grey heather of sorts, which came, I believe, from the Nilgiris. This is intended to represent the grey colour of a mediæval castle gate. From this point to the Carabinier barracks, the road is being lined with crotons and ferns and edged with red tiles, until it actually resembles a drive through a private park, and at the barracks themselves the Carabiniers have erected a gate-way which is a really well-conceived imitation of the inner or postern gate to the fortress. Originality is always attractive, but in this case the ideas have been specially well conceived and executed. Details in the shape of guns, cannon-balls, etc., will not be missing, and near the Agram Hospital yet a third arch is in evidence for which the Officers of the R. A. M. C. are responsible. The arrangements for the unveiling of the Victoria Memorial were given in detail in yesterday's letter, and it is yet too early to comment upon the other parts of the Station decorations, as many of them are still unfinished.

Nothing is in progress—indeed there is room and time for nothing except the preparations for the Royal visit, and there is anxious speculation as to whether the lamented death of His Majesty the King of Denmark will cause changes in the programme of the Royal visitors which may affect Bangalore. A telegram from Mysore dated to-day says that there is no change in the programme as yet.

Writing from Madras, the Times of India's special correspondent with His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales remarked:—"Their Royal Highnesses' stay in the third Presidency City visited leaves none but the happiest memories. For this has been a real people's holiday. They flocked into Madras from all the surrounding districts; they assembled in their scores of thousands wherever the Prince and Princess were to be met; they rang with good humour and enjoyment on each and every occasion. Those who were unable to come to Madras kept high revel in their own towns and villages. The Prince and Princess brought every one together on terms of the most cordial amity. It was the Presidency as a whole which welcomed the Royal guests, and not any particular class. And, mingled with the Royal greeting, were genuine marks of affection for the Governor and Lady Amthill which deepened the joyous note. Then every arrangement was carried out with a care and exactness of detail of which any Government might be proud."

Happy the country that has no politics! In the fresh, lustful vigour of its youthful growth Burma has had no time to develop political issues. It has no history, save such as is decently immured with the forgotten King of Ratnagiri. All eyes, all hopes, all energies are bent on the future, and bent, too, with a serene confidence in her growing wealth and prosperity, for "it is a goodly sight to see what heaven hath done for this delicious land." Coming to Rangoon and from the old cities of India is like going from the whist room at the Athenæum to Hurlingham. So much of India lives in the past, although here and there the dry bones of the centuries are assembling for a new life under the quickening touch of gold; "the Silken East" lives for the years to come. Then with the buoyant exuberance springing from present well-being and certain pending greatness mingles the joyous note the Burman sounds wherever he goes. "The feast, the song, the revel here abounds." So the all too brief days the Prince and Princess of Wales spent in Burma will fill some of the happiest pages written in the book of the Royal progress.

"The East is East and the West is West," but the twin came nearer to meeting in Rangoon than in any other city in the world. The broad chessboard streets run right into the fields just as they did in the early days of the Western townships of America. Massive piles of business buildings alternative with Chinese huts and Indian hovels. But the purlieu hum with the rice mills and saw yards and oil refineries, which bring into the provincial capital a swelling stream of wealth, and wherever an old house is razed a commercial palace rises on its ruins. Nothing better illustrates the confidence of the Rangoon citizens in their destiny than the scale on which they are building. Webs of scaffolding spun over four and five story business-blocks meet the eye on every hand. Land is enormously valuable. The new Hospital looks as if it were being built for an Empire instead of a Province. The Port Commissioners are spending over a crore of rupees in wharfing the wayward bank of the Irrawaddy. They even hold out hopes of an electric car service in place of steam cars whose place is beside the "Rockett" in the Patent Museum. Touching the Hospital there is told a story much too good to escape repetition. The contractor was a long time getting his material on the ground, and, gentle hints being unavailing, a pointed remonstrance was made. Back came this reply:—"My contract specifies a particular form of frost-resisting pipes, and there has been some delay in getting them from England." Shades of these strenuous days, when with perspiration oozing from every pore and a silk suit a burden, you were informed that this was the coolest weather Rangoon ever had!

But is Rangoon, the youngest and most progressive of the six seaports British enterprise has given the Indian Empire, also to be the ugliest? When you survey the terracotta barrenness of the Secretariat and Government House, the bastard capitals and style of the commercial quarter, you fear that it is destined to be another architectural Sahara—like Calcutta, and without its opulent spaciousness. In these days of a revived taste in architecture there is no excuse for such artistic desolation. The citizens have shown rare skill in the development of their residential suburbs. Dalhousie Park and the Royal Lakes, the pretty houses that ring them and the new Victoria Park, are amongst the most graceful scenes in the modern East. The Shwè Dagon Pagoda, stripped of its latter day accretions, is an object lesson in what can be accomplished by simplicity of line and form. Can Rangoon find no Stephens to set a worthy standard to which all, by pressure of example, shall conform, and so avoid spreading the wilderness of ugliness which Englishmen are creating in Asia?

And yet, with all these evidences of wealth and contentment, of the joie de vivre which distinguishes the Burman from all other Eastern peoples, of the really gladsome welcome to the Royal visitors, there would obtrude a tinge of pessimism. The material prosperity of Burma must grow, for its foundations are built on a solid rock of agricultural and mineral wealth that has scarce begun to be quarried. Yes; but what is to be the place of the Burman in the new State? There is no room for him in Rangoon. British and German merchants, Madras Chetties and Chinese brokers, coolies and hawkers, gharrywallas and servants from Bengal, Madras and Goa, make a fat living. The British India steamers plying between Calcutta and Madras and Rangoon carry hordes of miscellaneous Indians, coming to the land of promise, returning with the present equivalents of corn and oil and honey. The Police is an alien Police and the Army a foreign Army. The Burman still numbers a third of the population, yet so little place has he in the social and economic life of the city that you can live a quarter of a century in it and barely come into contact with him, or walk down the main street for a quarter of a mile and not see half a dozen of his characteristic pink turbans.

If this applied only to Rangoon you could dismiss the subject with a sigh of regret at the scanty representation of such a cheerful and picturesque element in the population. Tempering the privileges of the Gateway City is the penalty of a heterogeneous and cosmopolitan population. The process of displacement, however, does not end there. Mandalay is commonly regarded as a purely Burmese city. In Mandalay the Burman is jostled by Sikh policemen and Indian soldiers. In the great buzzing market he is elbowed aside by Chinese, Mussalman and Hindu traders. If he embarks on any enterprise you may be sure that the capital is found by a Madras Chetty or a Chinese money-lender, and that but a meagre share of the profits finds its way into Burmese cash-boxes. Although the Burman is everywhere, it is not he who has the money. Of the rural districts it is more difficult to speak. If you inquire of those who know, however, you will invariably be told the same tale. That, despite the existence of great areas of untilled land, the Burman falls more deeply year by year into the toils of the Madras and Chinese money-lender. That where he is not actually expropriated by the foreigner, he is drifting into the position of the sower's serf. Why, the term "native" is never applied to the children of the soil, but only to the alien immigrants! In truth, the virtues as well as the vices of the Burman make him an easy prey to the spoiler. There is a strong strain of the lotus eater in his nature, for he hates sustained labour as much as my Lord the Elephant; loves sport, the play and his ease; and invariably puts off till to-morrow what must not be done to-day. Nothing better illustrates the cheerful irresponsibility of his character than the sequel to the fire that gutted the bazaar at Mandalay. The Commissioner, a kind, sympathetic officer, at once raised a fund for the relief of the sufferers. When he went to distribute it in the evening he found that they had improvised a theatre on the ashes of their homes and were wrapped in the enjoyment of a Pwè!

His religion, enjoining the widest tolerance and the duties of hospitality, deprives him of the protection of caste and the security of the watertight village community. "Brother, thou art welcome," says the Burmese ryot to the wandering Uria; "sit here at my board, and I will find you well-paid service in my fields." In a few years the Uria is the ryot and the Burman his hind. The acquisition of merit by the building of pagodas, the gilding of images and the feeding of monks, leads to the free spending rather than the hoarding of wealth. The merit of monastic life attracts to the profitless seclusion of the "Yellow Robe" much of the manhood of the race. And so in small ways the alien is creeping in. If the process is allowed to go unchecked, what will be the position of the Burman in his own country half a century hence?

Now here the economist steps in and says that the Burman must be judged by the law of evolution, the survival of the fittest. The Burman is a poor economic factor; therefore he must mend or end. That is a harsh and unlovely creed which is violated daily in our social life, and it is not for a moment applicable to the special conditions of "The Silken East." The British Government in Burma are an alien Government. They were forced into annexation by the misdeeds of the travesty of a Court, and not because of the shortcomings of the people. Their only excuse for remaining in possession is that they administer the country for the benefit of the people. We have swept aside the abuses and exactions of the Avan Sovereigns. We have established justice and order, developed communications, increased trade, and provided equal opportunity for all. But of what avail these boons if the Burman finds no room, under the new order, in the land of his fathers; if he is being superseded not by a strong, manly, homogeneous race, but by the sweepings of Calcutta, Madras and Canton? Well might the Burman sigh for the bad old days. Theebaw made his Palace at Mandalay a hell of murder; the city was built of bamboo and straw so that it might be burnt out if the populace proved fractious; not a soul willingly followed the deposed King into exile. But there was room and a future in Burma for the Burmans. Can we say the same now, after twenty years of British rule?

There are some who would coldly view as inevitable the overwhelming of the Burmese by the mixed low races which are pouring into the country, and the extinction of the only laughter-loving race in our Asiatic Empire. Happily they are few. But we have a bad habit in India of securely locking the stable door after the horse is gone—of waiting till a vast amount of land has passed out of his possession before we take measures to prevent the expropriation of the Punjab peasant, the Gujarat farmer and the Deccan ryot, by non-cultivating rack-renting capitalists. Are we going to wait till the Burman has been squeezed so tight that the process of saving him has become doubly difficult, if not impossible? The ousting forces at work have been noted these years past by men with a practical knowledge of the country; their tendency has also been clearly foreseen. Surely if on inquiry the premises is established the corollary should be special measures to protect the Burman from the rapacity of the money-lender and secure him in the possession of his land! The famine-immune Provinces of Lower Burma offer a promising field for the establishment of the greatest agency for scotching the sower—a Land Bank on the lines of the one which is saving the Egyptian fellah.

It also induced a pang of regret to note the decadence of Burmese art. The modern monstrosities in tin and tinsel, looking-glass and khaki, which are the latest additions to the tangle of shrines surrounding the Shwè Dagon Pagoda are an outrage in comparison with the perfect simplicity and symmetry of the central shaft. How is it that the people who could design the one, who could evolve and retain their charming national costume, have become so utterly blind to all form and line, to all sense of colour and proportion? Even the national dress is suffering. The women are giving up their dainty pinks, for dull monochromes, their parasols for Brummagen umbrellas. Short is the transition from umbrellas to French shoes and corsets.

1ST FEBRUARY 1906.

Mysore Herald.—On the 29th instant, Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales were expected at the Capital. Three months ago the decorations of the City in connection with the Royal visit commenced and they were completed just on the evening of the 28th instant.

The Reception Committee left no stone unturned to get the maximum of work done at the minimum cost. Rao Bahadur Mr. C. Madiah, Councillor and Mr. C. Venkata Rao, the Vice-President of the City Municipality, spared neither time nor labour to make the decorations as magnificent as possible. The pavilion on the Railway platform and the decorations of the Railway Station have been on a scale unprecedented even in the annals of this capital. The pavilion was a miniature representation of the old Palace of Mysore built by Mr. Purnayya in the days of the late Krishnaraja Wodeir. It was richly adorned with yellow and green and white. It was surmounted by a dome. It led to the passage leading out of the station. The pavilion was beautifully draped with yellow and blue cloth. It was fringed with a gold border. It was studded all over with brilliant clusters of flowers. Over the archway were placed the Royal arms of Mysore with the inscription "Long live the Shahzada." Outside the station were rows of men clothed in red and yellow bearing the Royal insignia of the State. The decorations of the platform were superintended by the nuns of the convent and the people connected with the Railway. They reflect great credit on them. The pavilion is an artistic structure, ornamented with a profusion of highly coloured tinzel which lent unparalleled brilliancy to the occasion. From the Railway Station to the square which connects the Sayaji Rao road with the Prince of Wales's road and from that to the Memorial Fountain and from the Memorial Fountain to the Tower Clock, from the Tower Clock to the Central Police Station and from the Central Police Station to the Government House, there was one continuous line of decorations on both sides of the road. Venetian posts surmounted by ornamental flags of all nationalities and festoons gave a brilliant appearance to the roads of the City. A number of pandals and a large number of arches were erected at appropriate intervals along the roads through which the Prince and Princess were expected to go. Some of these were very remarkable in appearance and originality. The one opposite the Mysore Siladar Lines was in red, green and yellow with a dome at the top, set off with drawn swords placed crosswise all over its front. There was on one side of it the inscription "Milites vos salutant." (We soldiers, salute you.)

From the gate of the Chamarajendra Technical Institute to the end of the Devaraj Market long galleries were erected and over 9,000 children were seated on them in their holiday dress. Near the square at the Chamarajendra Technical Institute gate and to the south of it were seated the students of the Industrial and Engineering schools and on the galleries to the south of these were seated the boys of the Primary schools of the City numbering in all about 4,000. To the west of the road in front of this school were seated the students and pundits of the Sanscrit schools and colleges. Lower down in front of Mr. Ahmedali's Technical Institute were the students of the English schools and college, and at the end, in front of the Victoria Girl's school, were seated the girls of the Wesleyan school on the east of the road and of the Maharani College on the west of it. From the Railway Station to the Government House on both sides of the road there was a surging crowd of sight-seers which in the estimation of modest calculators numbered at least one hundred thousand. Near the Clock Tower at the gate of the Doddapeta was the Municipal Pandal. It was entirely scarlet in colour and at the top of it was to be found a hearty welcome with the wish, "Ever may your fame endure." Near the Central Police Station there was a Grand Pandal. It consisted of framed pictures of all shapes and sizes representing the King Emperor, the Queen Empress, the Maharajah and Maharani of Mysore, and the pictures of several Hindu deities. From the Central Station to the Government House the decorations were brilliant.

The Prince and Princess of Wales reached Mysore at 3-30 p.m. There were present at the Station His Highness the Maharajah, His Highness the Yuvaraja, the Dewan, the Councillors, the Sirdars of the Palace, and the principal officers of the State. As soon as Their Royal Highnesses alighted from the train, the Hon'ble Mr. S. M. Fraser was introduced to Their Royal Highnesses and Mr. Fraser then introduced the Maharajah to Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales shook hands with His Highness the Maharajah in the warmest manner. His Royal Highness then shook hands with His Highness the Yuvaraja, and then with the Dewan, the Councillors and the Sirdars of the Palace. He then inspected the Mysore Imperial Service Troops arranged on the platform as a guard of honour, bowing to them as they saluted His Royal Highness. In the meantime Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales shook hands with His Highness the Maharajah, His Highness the Yuvaraja, the Dewan, the Councillors, the Sirdars of the Palace and spoke to every one of them for a minute or so. Their Royal Highnesses then left the Station in the State carriages. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and His Highness the Maharajah occupied the first State carriage. The second State carriage was occupied by Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, and some members of the Royal party. Their Royal Highnesses drove towards the Government House escorted by His Highnesses' body-guard, the Imperial Service Cavalry and the Local Regiment. The route was lined by spearmen and the Maharajah's Rachevar and Bhale Forces, by the Mysore Infantry and by the Sowars of the Mysore Horse. As soon as Their Highnesses reached the galleries the school children sang the National Anthem and cheered Their Royal Highnesses, the cheering being continued as the carriages passed on. Their Royal Highnesses passed the galleries bowing to the children. The Government House was reached by about 4 o'clock. At 4-30 p.m. His Highness the Maharajah with his Sirdars repaired to the Government House and paid a State visit to His Royal Highness. His Royal Highness paid a State visit to His Highness the Maharajah in the Juganmohan Palace at 5-30 p.m. Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales paid a private visit to Her Highness the Maharani, the late Regent, and Her Highness the Maharani, at the Juganmohan Palace and was with them at the Palace gallery witnessing the ceremonies of the State visit. There were at this visit a select number of officers and sirdars. His Highness the Maharajah and the Dewan received His Royal Highness at the steps of the Palace and conducted His Royal Highness to the state chair. His Highness the Maharajah himself placed the garland made of golden flowers over the shoulders of His Royal Highness and those of Sir Walter Lawrence and the Hon'ble Mr. S. M. Fraser and presented bouquets. The Dewan presented garlands and bouquets to the other members of the Royal party. His Highness the Maharajah spent about a quarter of an hour in speaking to His Royal Highness, when His Royal Highness and party left for the Government House.

Pioneer.—His Royal Highness before leaving Madras, presented His Excellency Lord Amphill with a magnificent silver pilgrim's bottle, nearly two feet in height, with the two Royal Coat-of-Arms engraved upon one side of the bowl and a suitable inscription upon the other. Two heads in high relief adorn the neck of the bottle. The shape is a reproduction of the well-known pilgrim's bottle.

The Hon'ble Mr. Hammick, Chief Secretary, was presented with a silver cup; while Mr. A. Y. G. Campbell, Mr. G. S. Harris and Captain Baugh all received handsome presents in recognition of the good work they had done.

2ND FEBRUARY 1906.

Pioneer.—The hunter of big game and those who take a general interest in "shikar" will no doubt be more or less familiar with the whole scheme of operations known as "Kheddah," but to the vast majority of the public the organisation which has to be thought out and the initial preparations which have to be made are probably a closed book. In a few days Their Royal Highnesses and Staff, and a few specially invited visitors, will witness the kheddah operations to be held in the Mysore forests of His Highness the Maharaja of Mysore, and a description of the preliminary arrangements will not therefore be inappropriate at the present moment.

The first difficulty which presents itself is the selection of a suitable site for the actual kheddah, and this selection is governed by a variety of conditions. The general position chosen must be one which lies on, or close to, the main tracks followed by the herds as they make their way at different seasons of the year from one jungle to another. The actual site of the kheddah, in the neighbourhood selected, is governed by the presence of water, requirements of forage, and the lie of the country, which affects to a very considerable degree the dangerous task of driving the herd from the open forest into the enclosure itself, and since the erection of the stockades and trench takes a considerable time to construct, the approximate date on which the proposed final operations are to take place must be fixed on months beforehand, so that the whole kheddah may be completed and all traces of the vicinity of human beings, as far as possible, removed before the actual drive commences. The health of an army of watchers who have to keep up an unceasing vigil both by day and by night is another detail, and a not unimportant one, which must not be overlooked. Then too over-abundance or a scarcity of fodder, or a sudden caprice on the part of the animals themselves, and the herds may altogether refuse to move from the neighbourhood where at the time fixed for the drive they may happen to be located, or if they do move they may take to some entirely unexpected track. All these factors have therefore to be duly considered and thought out, both separately and with regard to each other. It will thus be apparent that a kheddah is no mere haphazard undertaking to be entered upon in a perfunctory manner and with a light heart, but one which involves a great amount of forethought, vast, and at the same time minute, preparations, and even when all arrangements have been made, and everything possible done to ensure success, the result may end, through no fault of those engaged, in a complete and disappointing failure. On the present occasion, however, success has so far rewarded the efforts of those responsible for what may be termed the general "plan of the campaign" and of those who for months past have been engaged in carrying out the details of that plan. The whole of the operations were entrusted to the Mysore Forest Department, whose chief, Mr. Muttannah, planned the strategy of the campaign, while Mr. Srinavasaran, Mr. Muttiah, and the famous Oossu Miah—one of Mr. Sanderson's men, and frequently referred to by that sportsman in his well-known book Thirteen Years with the Wild Beasts of India—were the tactical generals and responsible for the details of the operations. His Highness the Maharaja of Mysore, and Sir Krishna Murti, Dewan, have throughout taken the greatest possible interest in everything that has been done, and have been in direct touch with those engaged in the actual undertaking. His Highness and the Dewan have both paid visits of inspection to the scene of operations, and have thereby not only satisfied themselves as to progress made but have encouraged the officials on the spot and those working under them in their arduous and wearisome duties.

As regards selection of a position for a kheddah Mysore is fortunate in that a favourable site, already proved, exists at Kakenkotah. Here previous successful operations have been held in the presence of Lords Landsdowne and Elgin, but those of 1900, when Lord Curzon was present, unfortunately proved a failure. At Kakenkotah two kheddahs known as No. 1 and No. 2 have been prepared, both on the left bank of the river Kabani, one on either side and bordering on the Mysore-Kakenkotah road. Kakenkotah itself is merely a collection of some half dozen huts and a small D.P.W. bungalow, situated on the road which leading from Mysore city, passes for some 12 miles through undulating and highly cultivated country; then entering some light scrub jungle conducts the traveller into the valley of the Kabani river, along the left bank of which the road continues till Kakenkotah is reached, 48 miles from Mysore. From Kakenkotah the road, passing through dense forest, enters the Wynad, and finally leads down to the coast of Malabar. Only those who have visited the jungles of Nepal and Assam, or the still virgin forests on the confines of Burma, can form any conception of the magnitude, the grandeur, and the solitude of these forests of Mysore, which extend for miles and miles, uninhabited by any human beings, the home only of the elephant, the bison and other denizens of the jungle. Here the very atmosphere feels different from that which one has previously experienced; the absolute stillness which prevails is both impressive and oppressive; the ordinary routine of life, its common and trivial details, and its greater interests alike seem far, far distant. Five miles before reaching Kakenkotah, on the left of the road and situated on a bluff overlooking the Kabani, is the Royal Camp—a few weeks ago a jungle, but now covered with spacious tents, suitably furnished, gardens, a lawn and every necessary adjunct for the comfort and entertainment of the distinguished visitors who will shortly for the space of a few days take up their residence therein.

Before entering into any details it may be as well to explain that the kheddah itself is composed of two stockades, an outer and big stockade, which varies in size from a couple to several acres in extent, and an inner or smaller stockade, sufficiently large to contain both the wild herd and the Koonkie, or trained elephants, which at a later stage of the proceedings are used for the "roping in" of the wild animals and dragging them thence by main force. The outer stockade is composed of fairly massive timber protected on the inner side by a rivetted trench. From the outer stockade, a narrow drive, also protected on both sides by stout beams, leads in to the smaller stockade, which is itself closed with rows of enormous logs strengthened by supports on the outer but with no trench on the inner side. The operation which Their Royal Highnesses will witness will be that of driving the captured herd from the outer into the inner stockade, and though this spectacle may not equal in interest that of driving a wild herd from the open jungle into the outer stockade, it always proves exciting, and the more quiet the animals in the outer stockade may have become, from being habituated to the presence of man, the more exciting and the more dangerous to those actually engaged in the drive is the task likely to prove. The captured herd once safely impounded in the smaller enclosure, the Prince will then see the "roping in" of the herd. Space forbids a detailed account of this phase of the proceedings, but shortly stated it consists of the entry of the Koonkie elephants—each with a mahout on its neck, and a rope-tier seated behind—into the smaller enclosure. The rope-tiers seizing their opportunity and protected by the tame elephants drop from their mounts and one by one rope-hobble the hind legs of the captured herd by a loose figure-of-eight knot. The hobbled elephant is then lassoed and assisted, some times forcibly enough, out of the enclosure by the Koonkie elephants: not very exciting perhaps when read as a bald statement of fact, but sufficiently full of dangerous and humorous episodes.

The decision to hold a kheddah was arrived at last June, and no time was lost in starting the necessary preliminary arrangements, Rs. 80,000 being sanctioned as the initial grant on account of expenses. In the beginning of August the building of two stockades on the left bank of the Kabani river, one on either side of the Mysore-Kakenkotah road, was commenced. In September, Mr. Muttiah was despatched to Assam and Hill Tipperah for the purpose of purchasing a few Koonkie elephants. This officer returned in December with seven well trained and staunch animals, and also brought back with him 60 experienced shikaris from Chittagong. In the meantime, some 800 beaters had been collected in the Mysore Forests for driving and watching purposes. In all approximately 1,000 men have been continuously employed merely for kheddah purposes. This number is exclusive of those engaged in the repairs of the road from Mysore to Kakenkotah, in the erection of the Royal Camp at Kharapur, and the men employed in providing for the supplies of the small army of watchers above alluded to.

Information that a herd had been marked down about 18 miles from Kakenkotah was received on the 7th December, and immediate steps were taken to drive the herd towards the kheddahs. To accomplish this, some 500 men were extended from the Kabani river right up to the herd guarding the south side of the track which the animals would take when driven in the required direction. To the north of the track the country being open and in parts cultivated, this side was practically safe and required little watching, a few stops at intervals being all that was necessary. The Kabani itself formed the western boundary of the drive, and along its left bank stops were placed to drive the elephants back should they attempt to rush the river and cross before the appointed time. On the 9th of December the long drive of 50 miles commenced, the herd being skilfully driven and shepherded towards the stockades, that is from east to west. When the herd had approached to within a few miles of the river and had entered the "drive" lines which had been previously prepared through the forest, the 300 beaters above alluded to joined in, and resting their flanks on the river, and using its course as the chord of an arc, a successful "round up" the whole herd was eventually accomplished. On the evening of the 14th December the animals voluntarily made their way towards the river, and so to the entrance of the enclosure, but refused actually to enter the gate. On both the 15th and 16th forcible measures were adopted by the firing of guns, the throwing of rockets, and the waving of torches, to drive the elephant in to the stockade, as the beaters were by this time completely worn out by their arduous duties and want of sufficient food and sleep of the previous five days, and could now scarcely be relied on to maintain a proper and efficient watch. Both efforts, in spite of all known means, proved futile. Worse still, during the very early hours of the 17th, a portion of the herd, consisting of about 25 animals, charged across the river, broke through the barricades and stops placed on the opposite bank, and climbing an almost inaccessible cliff managed to effect their escape into the open forest. This, as may be imagined, was most disheartening to all concerned, but energetic measures were at once taken to repair the misfortune. In spite of their previous exertions, volunteers were not lacking to track, follow up, and head the herd back again, while the weary beaters left behind, placing all thought of food and rest on one side, commenced a sacrificial service for the purpose of propitiating the jungle deities. Jungle men are always extraordinarily superstitious, and it may be remarked here that throughout the whole operations, a Maree had been installed in the permanent camp and regularly worshipped with all the rites and ceremonies proper to the occasion. On the evening of that day, the 17th, the original "surround" having been maintained intact, the unescaped portion of the herd, to the number of 18 animals, quietly and of their own accord entered Kheddah No. 2.

Returning to the escaped portion, it was discovered by the trackers about eight miles from Kakenkotah, stops were placed on all tracks leading into the forests up Coorg and Malabar, and a demand for assistance sent back. This was despatched the next day, the 18th, and by midnight of the 18th and 19th the herd was again surrounded, including an extra herd numbering some 15 animals. This surround was gradually contracted, and on the 21st and 22nd great efforts were made to drive the elephant into Kheddah No. 1. A few of the animals entered without much trouble, but the great majority absolutely refused to be trapped. In the meantime the Dewan of Mysore had arrived on the scene on a visit of inspection. Encouraged by Sir Krishna Murti's presence, special arrangements were made, by building temporary wings right into the forest and by lines of fires, to effect a capture. But the giants of the forest were stubborn and obstinate, and eventually the beaters had to approach within five yards, and at last by means of a fusillade of guns, the beasts at 8 p.m. on the 23rd were forced through the gates, the Dewan thus being an eye-witness of a very unique spectacle. The exact number of the herd thus entrapped has not as yet been ascertained, but is supposed to be between 40 and 50 animals including 22 tuskers. Here they are fed and watered from the Kabani river, the water necessary for the animals having to be raised from the river and forced into the stockade by means of a steam pump. The 18 elephants impounded in No. 2 Stockade, previously referred to, were 'roped in' in the presence of the Maharaja on the 8th January, and have since that date been under training, and it is hoped, if all goes well, to show these elephants to His Royal Highness.

A word of explanation is necessary regarding the two kheddahs. The original idea was to impound a herd in either one of the two kheddahs at the earliest opportunity, and keep it there. Should a second herd be marked down, it was hoped to bring off a drive of this herd into the empty stockade from the open forest in the presence of His Royal Highness. Owing to the events previously narrated, however, it became necessary to make use of both kheddahs. Mr. Mutannah nevertheless still adheres to his original idea, for a third herd has been surrounded in the open jungle on the right bank of the river facing No. 2 Kheddah. This surround, which extends to a distance of eight miles, was effected on the 18th January, and the elephants since that date have been watched day and night by some 800 men. The task of keeping a large herd for 15 days in the open jungle without the assistance of any stockades whatever has, it is believed, never been attempted before.

The herd consists approximately of some 30 animals, and the Chief of the Forest Department lives in hopes of driving them to the river bank, forcing them across the river, the bed of which measures some 300 yards from bank to bank, while the water is in some places 20 feet deep, so that it will be necessary for the herd to swim. This drive will, as can easily be imagined, be an operation of great delicacy. The timing of the drive is perhaps the chief difficulty. It is quite impossible to gauge the exact time which the drive will take. The animals may prove tractable or they may not, and if they do not, it may take hours or even days to bring the operation to a conclusion. One thing is certain, however, and that is that it will be impossible to force the herd across the river in open daylight. All arrangements will be made to drive the animals across at dusk at about 7 p.m. A site for the Prince is being erected on the left bank, from which His Highness will have a magnificent view of a long reach of the river and the passage of the elephants. Unfortun-nately there will be no moon, but should the drive come off as expected, and should all go well, His Royal Highness will indeed be witness of a sight which but few men living have ever seen. The scene will be one which, in anticipation, the most matter-of-fact individual, calling to aid what imaginative power he may be possessed of, should strive to form some conception of. The momentarily increasing darkness, the slow, silent river flowing between banks fringed to their very edges by dense jungle consisting for the most part of giant bamboos; on the near bank the hushed and expectant visitors; on the far bank the screaming, trumpeting herd refusing to cross, and this herd encircled by a mass of 800 half-naked, shouting, yelling beaters; added to the human voice, the racket and din of foghorns, bugles and tom-tom; the ranks of the beaters marked by a fusilade of guns, waving torches and rockets which light up the impenetrable depths of the forest. At last one beast bolder and more venturesome than his fellows, or may be a baby elephant, forced by pressure over the bank, may show a way of escape to the rest of the herd by attempting the passage of the river: then the herd, following the leader, at last make the passage wading and swimming with curled trunks till they gain the opposite shore; perhaps with an attempt to avoid the mouth of the stockade on the near bank by mad rushes to either side, but these attempts driven off, it is hoped, by hitherto silent watchmen placed there for this very purpose. Finally, every avenue of escape closed to them, the entrance of the animals into the stockade, and the clang of the gate as it drops on the last to enter. If the Prince and the distinguished company in his train witness a scene such as this it will be one which can never fade from the least retentive memory. Too much confidence, however, cannot be placed on a successful issue. To repeat, the drive cannot take place in daylight, but must be brought off during the evening or night, the former for choice, and the timing of the drive will prove the chief difficulty and cannot possibly be reckoned upon. Moreover, when the drive does take place, the herd will be accustomed to the sight of the human being and the hitherto quite unaccustomed sound of foghorns and guns in the jungle, as these extraneous aids have had necessarily to be employed to contain the herd in the "surround." The animals consequently will not be afraid of men: a strenuous resistance against being driven is expected; they are certain to attempt and may succeed in breaking through the beaters, the boldest and staunchest of whom have been specially selected for this dangerous duty.

Tribune.—The events of the past two months have brought about so healthy a change in the political atmosphere at the head-quarters of the Government of India, that no better subject could be found for introducing the readers of the Tribune to the doings and sayings of our little world in Calcutta. The visit of the Prince and Princess, coinciding as closely as it did with Lord Minto's assumption of office, has left the happiest impression behind it, and has done much to heal the soreness engendered by Lord Curzon's insistence upon carrying through the partition of Bengal, in spite of the indiscretions in which the local authorities in both parts of the divided province are still permitting themselves to indulge. It would be idle to ignore that fears were entertained in high quarters regarding the reception which might be offered to Their Royal Highnesses in Calcutta. But there was never at any time the smallest ground for such apprehensions. The grievance of the Bengalees is against Lord Curzon and Mr. Brodrick, and it cannot be said that their resentment is unjustifiable. Towards the Royal Family the universal sentiment is that of genuine loyalty and profound respect, and it is lamentably indicative of the signs of the times that responsible officials could have imagined it to be otherwise. Yet they are only carrying into effect the policy of the late Viceroy. "You must make your choice between the Government and the people; the two are drifting every year wider and wider apart." Such are the words in which the Indian nobility in Bengal are being apostrophized by their immediate rulers and it requires no depth or insight to realize that the Viceroyalty of Lord Curzon being dead, yet speaketh.

Lord Minto is happily proving himself to be an administrator of very different calibre. He has yet to seat himself firmly in the saddle and the dead-weight of officialism may prove too much for him, as it has done for more than one of his predecessors. But both socially and politically, he has already begun to make his mark. There is nothing showy or bombastic about him, and it is evident that conciliation and caution are to be the keynote of the new regime. History, in fact, seems to be at her favourite occupation of repeating herself. A hundred years ago Lord Wellesley had just laid down the reins of power. He had advanced the Company's frontiers and increased its expenditure, planned and executed schemes of conquest, and turned allied Powers into vassals, but, somehow, had failed to carry public opinion in India with him. "Lord Wellesley's ruling passion is fame, of which he is insatiable," wrote Colonel Palmer from Calcutta to his former chief, Warren Hastings, in his retirement at Daylesford, "and he carries it too often to ridiculous lengths, while this vanity almost surpasses conception." Hastings replied, foreseeing the Nemesis which was not far off. The Court of Directors, entirely unexpected by the magnificent Marquis, sent out Lord Cornwallis for the second time; and, beginning at Government House, such changes were made as "never were seen in so short a time." The Governor-General was merely to be addressed as "the Honourable," such terms as "Excellency" and "Most Noble" were forbidden, the bodyguard was abolished, many of the servants were dismissed, and the remainder ordered to "divest themselves of their appropriate turbans and badges." The elaboration of the parallel may be sought by those who will in the historical details contained in the admirable concluding chapter of "Sydney Grier's" recently published edition of the letters of Hastings to his wife. Lord Minto has, of course, neither disbanded the bodyguard nor weeded out his household and he is as much "His Excellency" as Lord Curzon was. But there is infinitely less formality and pageantry at Government House. The trappings of State are not always being paraded before the public eye. The Viceroy no longer sits in royal splendour while the State ball is in progress and gives audience to a select few while the unnoticed many dance and make merry. Lord Minto's ideas of dignity do not debar him from joining in a polka or a waltz as keenly as any subaltern, and the Viceroyal chair remains unoccupied, while the only man who may fill it mixes freely with his guests. At the weekly games of polo upon the maidan, at the races, at every official ceremony, there is the same bonhomie, the same want of affectation, the same absence of ostentation. But at the same time there is no mistaking which is the Lord Sahib. There are those who imagine that the modern ruler of the Indian Empire must follow the example of Akbar and Aurungzeb and dwell in isolated grandeur; yet neither Indians nor Englishmen are finding that their respect for their new Viceroy has suffered any diminution by the discovery that he is a human being. The revelation first dawned upon the Calcutta public when the various associations and local bodies offered their addresses of welcome; and upon the Indian section of the community the effect has been especially marked. Lord Minto has taken his new subjects in exactly the right way, and everything points towards a Viceroyalty as successful as it will be peaceful and wise. The advanced section of the Indian reform party has been conciliated at once by his invitation to two of its most prominent members to call upon him and place him in possession of their views upon public affairs. The step is one which Lord Curzon could never bring himself to take; and yet how much of his unpopularity might have been avoided if he had condescended to infuse a little sympathy and tact into his relations with the people of the country! Lord Minto has not committed himself to any course of policy by receiving the leaders of the Indian National Congress in audience; but he has enormously pleased the large and influential body of educated Indians throughout the country whom these gentlemen undoubtedly represent. And there is no disguising the importance of the results which are likely to follow an act which is so obviously dictated by commonsense that many an Englishman will marvel that it has not long since been made the rule.

And what of the Prince and Princess? Calcutta has been charmed by their graciousness and their affability. The Indian noblemen and gentlemen who have been honoured with interviews are loud in their expressions of gratification. "Here at last is the asal jat," the genuine caste; and the phrase upon the lips of an Indian means much. Their consideration, their courtesy, their evident pleasure at the welcome Calcutta had prepared for them, have won the hearts of every one. When the members of the Corporation presented their address at Prinsep's Ghat, upon Their Royal Highnesses' arrival, it was observed that the Prince made repeated efforts to indicate to the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, who was on his right, that he did not desire to see the gentlemen before him standing bareheaded in the blazing sun. And when the sign to cover was at length given by Sir Andrew Fraser, it was noticed that the Prince turned to the Princess as if to invite the appreciation from her which was promptly given. Still more happy and graceful was the kindly thought that prompted the Princess to place, of her own accord, around her neck the handsome necklace of coloured pearls (once the property of that connoisseur in pearls, the late Maharana of Dholepore), which was offered to Her Royal Highness as a token of the affection of the people of Calcutta. Small matters these, it may be said, but not therefore unworthy of record. There have been many similar incidents, and they have been widely talked about. They fall in so fitly with the attitude of Lord Minto, and are in such strange contrast to the happenings of the preceding year, that the rosiest dreams are being dreamed. Disappointment may be in store, but with Mr. John Morley and Mr. Ellis at the India Office, and a Liberal majority in the House, India may fairly look forward to a journey along a very different path from the one she has been wearily and despairingly treading of late.

Standard.—If you compare the Indian trooper or sepoy with Tommy of the Line, the advantages, I am afraid, are on the side of the former. He is drawn from, speaking relatively, a superior class of society; he respects himself more, and is, I think, also held in more respect by his officers. You will not often find a subaltern of an English regiment eager to assert that his men are the finest fellows in the world. But I have scarcely met an officer of the Indian Army who does not hold that opinion, or is reluctant to give audible expression to it. The ingenuous youth who is responsible for a double company of Gurkhas is an enthusiastic eulogist of the men of Nepal. The squadron-leader, who rides in front of a hundred hooded Afghans, assures you that there are no soldiers like his Pathans. I look back to a delightful hour on a sunny verandah spent with an officer of Madras Pioneers, who pointed out, at considerable length, the superiority of the sturdy, cheerful Tamils, unduly depreciated the military autocrats of the North, over-turbulent Mussulmans and uncomfortable high-caste Hindoos. The Indian officer has some reason to be proud of his native comrades in arms. Pir Bush or Ahmed Khan is, taking him all round, a reputable person, not without honour in his own country. He does not come from the residuum of the towns, but is, on the contrary, usually drawn from a sturdy population of yeomanry and peasants. Enlistment is for him not a final resource to avert starvation, but the entry to a dignified and recognised profession. It elevates rather than debases him in the social scale. When he goes back to his village, with a pension, after carrying a lance or rifle for a dozen years, he will be treated with a certain amount of deference by his neighbours, and will feel himself entitled to walk with a swagger for the remainder of his days. In the ranks his conduct is usually excellent. His discipline is good, he revels in his work, and is proud of it, he keeps his uniform and accoutrements spotless, and looks a soldier all over under his dashing lungi; he is extremely sober, temperate, and thrifty; he is often a married man, and when he takes leave he spends it in visiting his family and the paternal farm. If he is in the cavalry, he is commonly a sort of gentleman belonging to the class of small landed proprietors, with a hereditary predilection for the trade of arms.

Besides being one of the best of soldiers, he is also one of the cheapest. In the infantry, the private receives nine rupees—say, 12s.—a month, and out of that sum he feeds and clothes himself, finding all his equipment except his rifle. The sowar has 31 rupees per mensem, and he provides for his own clothing and maintenance, as well as for the keep of his horse, and half the wages of a syce, or camp-follower, and the food of a mule or pony, there being one attendant and one such animal for every two troopers. When on active service he receives his rations, and at other times a small allowance to supplement the cost of forage, if the price rises beyond a certain point. Otherwise, the Sirkar gets this excellent trooper, his horse, his clothing, his food, his half-mule, and his half-follower, at an inclusive charge of less than 24 guineas per annum, which does not seem excessive.

The cavalry regiments, except in Madras, are organised on what is called the Silladar system. Instead of bringing his own horse, the sowar pays 200 rupees into a common regimental fund, which buys the charger for him and other necessary equipment, repaying itself by deducting the amount from his monthly pay. If he loses his horse on active service, the Government supplies him with another; should the accident occur in peace time, an inquiry is held, and if it is proved to be due to any preventible cause the sowar obtains another animal from the Silladar, but has to repay it by monthly stoppages. This, of course, renders the troopers extremely careful of their mounts, and better horse-masters than the men of the Indian cavalry you will not find anywhere. They ride light, for their height, with no superfluous baggage, and they never miss a convenient opportunity of saving their horses by dismounting, when an English hussar would be sitting stolidly, all the twelve stone of him, in the saddle.

The Silladar organisation cares for the interests of the rank and file in various ways. Some regiments keep their own studfarms and remount establishments, under the charge of a non-com. or two and some pensioners of the corps. Nearly all buy grain and forage and clothing material in large quantities, and retail it to the men at a reasonable rate. The whole arrangement is under the superintendence of the European officers, which is one of the reasons why the regiment works together in a kind of family union. When the trooper takes his discharge from the colours, his horse, or what is left of it, goes back to the Silladar, and he receives the balance of his 200 rupees entrance money. Thus Pir Buksh goes home to his village with a small capital, as well as his pension, buys a small plot of land, if he has not inherited one, and lives in moderate prosperity, provided he keeps out of the hands of the money-lenders. He brings his old cavalry sabre with him, and sometimes he takes it down and cleans it carefully, regaling his sons with stories of the warlike exploits performed by him in the regiment under Captain Eshmitt or Captain Estewart, and of the singular and special notice which he, the said Pir Buksh, received from the Colonel, and even from the great "Lat Sahib" himself, when he was detailed to do duty as orderly to that Commander. Then in the fulness of time, perhaps, young Smith or young Stewart, now leader of his father's troop, despatches a native officer to the village, with an intimation that a few recruits would be welcome, and the veteran sells a bullock or two, scrapes together the necessary entrance-money, and sends off the likeliest of his boys, with his blessing, to become a soldier of the Emperor, like himself. There are rumours that it is proposed to abolish the Silladar system, and convert the sowars, as they indignantly protest, into mere paid servants, like any coolie or khansamah. But it seems incredible that any such mischievous project should be seriously entertained.

Good judges are convinced that it would be the ruin of the native cavalry. The sowar likes to think that he is serving the Sirkar in the old feudal fashion, which we did not invent, but only inherited, with some modifications, from our predecessors in the Government of India. He would deeply resent the idea of being turned, as he indignantly puts it, into a mere paid servant like any coolie or table-waiter.

Promotion in the Indian Army is from the ranks. The ambitious young native gentleman who aspires to a military career enlists as a private, perhaps bringing with him a welcome contribution of a dozen or twenty of his father's retainers and dependants. He is naturally marked out for promotion from the beginning, and if he is intelligent and attentive, and shows some aptitude for command, he soon rises. Presently he becomes a jemadar, and in due course havildar, subahdar, or risaldar-major. Even higher honours may await him. Dining with a general commanding one of the most important military districts in India, I found his Mahometan aide-de-camp at the table, and treated by everybody, the general himself, the ladies of his family, and his guests, on precisely the same footing as the English members of the staff. He was a young Border noble, of ancient descent and some fortune, but he had gone through the ranks and carried a rifle, like any peasant recruit from the mountain hamlet he owned.

But the Indian Army, like our own, has been suffering of late from a recruiting difficulty. In India we are drawing our contingent from a somewhat constricted circle. We depend more and more upon the "fighting races," and these form only a small fraction of the vast population of the Empire. And the proportion has been steadily diminishing of late years. The Mahrattas, once great warriors, now prefer intrigue and other civil pursuits, the Rajputs, a fine people but no longer quite what they were, do not now enter our armies as freely as in former times, the Brahmans and other high-caste Hindus, the "Pandies" who formed the staple of the old pre-Mutiny army, scarcely offer themselves at all. Thus we are relying mainly on the two hill-peoples beyond the frontier, the Pathans and the Gurkhas, who are not very numerous, and on the Sikhs and Punjab Mahometans. The Sikhs are brave and excellent soldiers, but they are also keen lovers of money, and they are finding many profitable avenues open to them as policemen, railway servants, and watchmen.

But there is another difficulty; of this one hears a good deal just now. The pay of the Indian soldier has not kept pace with the times, and with the increased demands made upon him. In this respect he suffers in company with his own officers, and with most other persons in official employment. Living in India, for native and European alike, is no longer so cheap as it once was. The cost of everything has increased, including that of food, and clothes, and lodgings. The native soldier is not now able to buy grain and condiments enough to keep him in health for two pence a day, he finds himself a badly-paid man in comparison with a mill-hand or a domestic servant. But he has also another special grievance. Military training, in every modern army, is and must be more exacting than it used to be. Under the new regime, the regiments are constantly at work, on parades, field exercises, practising night attacks, route marches, entrenching operations. This means more destruction of clothing and kit, more wear and tear of horses and shoe-leather, and more food for man and beast, for the Indian native, in his wisdom, adjusts his consumption of food to the amount of muscular energy he requires to produce. Thus he is put to greater expense in many ways, and instead of saving a few annas at the end of the month, he finds himself with a deficit. I am assured that there is great dissatisfaction throughout the Indian Army on this account, and that the shortage in recruiting is largely ascribable to the same cause. Happily the remedy is easy. The Indian Government must contrive to add another rupee or two to the monthly wages of its soldiers, even if, in doing so, it has to curtail its educational budget and postpone the completion of some of its strategic railways. And while it is so engaged, it might usefully add something to the pay and allowances of the hard-working corps of European officers, who have made its military establishment, with all its defects, one of the finest working armies in the world.

3RD FEBRUARY 1906.

Civil and Military Gazette.—A Muhammadan lady who was present gives in the Indian Ladies' Magazine, the following account of the two purdah functions at Bombay:—

Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, under an escort of the 33rd Cavalry, drove from the Crescent to Colaba and back, previous to attending the Reception organised by Indian ladies at the Town Hall.

The façade of the Town Hall was illuminated with coloured lamps and decorated with flags, while leading up the centre portion of the broad flight of steps was a wide strip of brocade, on each side of which were ranged Hindu, Mussalman and Parsi girls in their national costumes, strewing flowers at her feet as the Princess ascended the steps.

On reaching the steps, a pathway was laid of shining gold into the building and up to the platform. The old Town Hall, famous for its ugliness, was unrecognisable. All the walls were hung with the richest of embroideries and shawls, and the pillars were swathed in costly brocades and the whole building lit by massive chandeliers, shedding their soft light on the beautiful scene. The throne was gorgeously draped in golden stuffs and heavily fringed all round, and was about 20 feet high. The gigantic organ was completely hid from sight by an artistically draped screen of beautiful brocades and cloths of gold. The flooring was of exquisite Persian carpets, those on the platform being of silk. The dresses and jewels of the Indian ladies surpass description and so much beauty unveiled was a joy to look on.

Three ceremonies were performed on the steps leading up the Hall. The first was by Lady Petit, being of Parsi origin, called "Leethavi Leval." Sugar sweet was waved round the Princess's head three times, in order that her life may be filled with sweetness, then a coconut was broken at her feet to signify that all difficulties may fall away from her. The second ceremony was what the Hindu ladies called "Arti," which Mrs. Chandravarkar performed. A lamp, with other things in a tray, was passed over the Princess's head, so that a light might ever shine on her path. The third ceremony was by a group of pretty Muhammadan girls headed by Mrs. Nasrulla Khan, who threw gold and silver flowerets and gilded nuts on the Princess's head.

The Princess moved slowly, bowing on either side, down the Hall, stepped on to the platform and seated herself on the throne. The ladies of the Executive Committee were then presented, after which addresses were read, first by Her Highness the Lady Nazli Begum Saheba of Janjira, in Urdu, the second by the Lady Bhalechandra Krishna, in Marathi, and the third by Miss Jamshedjee, on behalf of her mother, Lady Jamshedjee, in Gujarati. At the end of these addresses Her Royal Highness rose and in a soft voice pronounced her thanks.

Then followed a presentation of the beautiful and interesting monochromes, their parasols for Brummagen umbrellas. Short is the transition from umbrellas to French shoes and corsets.

1ST FEBRUARY 1906.

Myore Herald.—On the 29th instant, Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales were expected at the Capital. Three months ago the decorations of the City in connection with the Royal visit commenced and they were completed just on the evening of the 28th instant.

The Reception Committee left no stone unturned to get the Reception done at the minimum cost. Rao Bahadur M. C. Venkata Rao, the Vice-President, neither time nor cesses the Prince and his entourage. Three months ago the Prince arrived in the capital. The Reception Committee left no stone unturned to get the completed just on the evening of the 28th instant.

The Reception Committee, spared neither time nor maximum of work done at the minimum cost. Rao Bahadur Mr. C. Madiah, Councillor and Mr. C. Venkata Rao, the Vice-President of the City Municipality, spared as possible. The labour to make the decorations as magnificent as possible. The pavilion on the Railway platform and the decorations of the Railway Station have been on a scale unprecedented even in the annals of this capital. The pavilion was a miniature representation of the old Palace of Mysore built by Mr. Purnayya in the days of the late Krishnaraja Wodeir. It was richly adorned with yellow and green and white. It was surmounted by a dome. It led to the passage leading out of the station. It was fringed beautifully draped with yellow and blue cloth. It was fringed with a gold border. It was studded all over with brilliant clusters of flowers. Over the archway were placed the Royal arms of Mysore with the inscription "Long live the Shahzada." Outside the station were rows of men clothed in red and yellow bearing the Royal insignia of the State. The decorations of the platform were superintended by the nuns of the convent and the people connected with the Railway. They reflect great credit on them. The pavilion is an artistic structure, ornamented with profusion of highly coloured tinsel which lent unparalleled brilliancy to the occasion. From the Railway Station to the square which connects the Sayaji Rao road with the Prince of Wales's road and from that to the Memorial Fountain and from the Memorial Fountain to the Tower Clock, from the Tower Clock to the Central Police Station and from the Central Police Station to the Government House, there was one continuous line of decorations on both sides of all nationalities and fountains gave a brilliant appearance to the roads of the City. A number of pendants and a large number of arches were erected at appropriate intervals along the roads through which the Prince and Princess were expected to go. Some of these were very remarkable in appearance and originality. The one opposite the Mysore Sindar Lines was in red, green and yellow with a dome at the top, set off with drawn swords placed crosswise all over its front. There was on one side of it the inscription "Milles vos salutant." (Wo soldiers, salute you.)

At the gate of the Channarayendra Technical Institute to the Market long galleries were erected and on them in their holiday dress.

From the gate of the Chamarajendra Technical Institute to the end of the Devanji Market long galleries were erected and over 9,000 children were seated on them in their holiday dress. Near the square at the Chamarajendra Technical Institute gate and to the south of it were seated the students of the Industrial and Engineering schools and on the galleries to the south of these were seated the boys of the Primary schools of the City numbering in all about 4,000. To the west of the road in front of this school were seated the students and pundits of the Sanscrit schools and colleges. Lower down in front of Mr. Ahmedali's Technical Institute were the students of the Victoria schools and college, and at the end, in front of the Victoria Girls' school, were seated the girls of the Wesleyan school on the east of the road and of the Maharani College on the west of it. From the Railway Station to the Government House on both sides of the road there was a surging crowd of sight-seers which in estimation of modest calculators numbered at least one hundred thousand. Near the Clock Tower at the gate of the Doddapeta was the Municipal Pandal. It was entirely scarlet in colour and at the top of it was to be found a hearty welcome with the wish, "Ever may your fame endure." Near the Central Police Station there was a Grand Pandal. It consisted of framed pictures of all shapes and sizes representing the King Emperor, the Queen Empress, the Maharajah and Maharani of Mysore, and the pictures of several Hindu deities. From the Central Station to the Government House the decorations were brilliant. The Prince and Princess of Wales reached Mysore at 3.30 p.m. They were met at the Station His Highness the Maharaja of Mysore, the Dewan, the Councillors, and the officers of the State.

The Prince and Princess of Wales reached Mysore at 11 a.m. There were present at the Station His Highness the Maharajah, His Highness the Yuvaraja, the Dewan, the Councillors, the Sirdars of the Palace, and the principal officers of the train. As soon as Their Royal Highnesses alighted from the train, Hon'ble Mr. S. M. Fraser then introduced the Maharajah to Their Highnesses and Mr. Fraser then introduced the Maharajah to Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales shook hands with His Highness the Maharajah in the warmest manner. His Royal Highness then shook hands with His Highness the Yuvaraja, and then with the Dewan, the Councillors and the Sirdars of the Palace. He then inspected the Mysore Imperial Service Troops arranged on the platform as a guard of honour, bowing to them as they saluted His Royal Highness. In the meantime Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales shook hands with His Highness the Councillors, the Sirdars of the Palace and spoke to every one of them for a minute or so. Their Royal Highnesses then left the Station in the State carriages. His Royal Highness occupied the first State carriage, and His Highness the Maharajah was occupied by Her Royal Highness. The second State carriage was occupied by the Government House. The Princess of Wales, and some members of the Imperial Service, Their Royal Highnesses' body-guard, the Government House Cavalry and the Maharajah's Ruchewar and Bhale Forces, by escorted by His Highness the Maharajah's school spear-men and by the Sowars of the Mysore Horse. As the Mysore Infantry and the Sirdars of the galleries reached Their Royal Highnesses reached the Maharajah's and cheered Their Royal Highnesses sang the National Anthem and cheered Their Royal Highnesses, the cheering being continued as the carriages passed on. Their Royal Highnesses passed the galleries bowing to the children. The Government House was reached by about 4 o'clock. At 4.30 p.m. His Highness the Maharajah with his Sirdars repaired to the Government House and paid a State visit to His Royal Highness. His Royal Highness paid a State visit to His Highness the Maharajah in the Jugannmohan Palace at 5.30 p.m. Her Royal Highness the Maharani, the late Regent, and was late visit to Her Highness the Maharani, at the Jugannmohan Palace and was with them at the Palace gallery witnessing the ceremonies of the State visit. There were at this visit a select number of officers and sirdars. His Highness the Maharajah and the Dewan received His Royal Highness at the steps of the Palace and conducted His Royal Highness to the state chair. His Highness the Maharajah himself placed the garland made of golden flowers over the shoulders of His Royal Highness and those of Sir Walter Lawrence. The Dewan presented garlands and bouquets to the other members of His Royal Highness and those of Sir Walter Lawrence. The Dewan presented garlands and bouquets to the other members of the Royal party. His Highness the Maharajah spent about a quarter of an hour in speaking to His Royal Highness, when His Royal Highness and party left for the Government House. Pioneer.—His Royal Highness before leaving Madras, presented His Excellency Lord Amthill with a magnificent silver pilgrim's bottle, nearly two feet in height, with the two Royal Coat-of-Arms engraved upon one side of the bowl and a suitable inscription upon the other. Two heads in high relief adorn the neck of the bottle. The shapo is a reproduction of the well-known pilgrim's bottle.

The Hon'ble Mr. Hammick, Chief Secretary, was presented

city of Pagan. They were too far away to be secured by the camera, which Her Royal Highness had in her hand at every hour of the day, but the mental image formed of the majestic shrines of a forgotten past will not soon fade from the memory. Lower down the stream the travellers passed close to the hot springs of mud which bear a fantastic resemblance to the geyser region of Iceland, save that here the wells shoot forth boiling oil instead of water, and there is a danger of toppling into a bottomless abyss of slime.

Still lower down, the hillside was seen to be covered with the towers of the pumps which extract the far-famed Rangoon oil. After this the travellers came to the boundary of the ancient Burmese kingdom, with its stirring memories of the days of the Annexation, when there were river fights between the troops afloat and the decrepit forts. And then the steamer reached the city of Prome, with its fascinating pagoda, second only in sanctity and beauty to the Shwe Dagon, the great Golden Pagoda of Rangoon.

The voyage of the Renown across the Bay of Bengal passed without incident. The course was too far north to permit of a glimpse of the Andamans, the archipelago which is reserved as a penal station for the scum of India's criminal population. The arrival at Madras introduced the touring party to a new phase of Eastern life, for this city of Southern India differs as completely from Calcutta as New Orleans does from New York. There is an old-world air about Fort St. George which Calcutta will never get. Its broad thoroughfares are bounded by stately homes, inhabited by an aristocratic race, who look down with Oriental disdain upon the upstart commercial spirit of the Bengali babus whose lot is cast upon the banks of the Hooghly. It was a new sensation, and the Prince and Princess were alive to all the quaint suggestiveness of a city which bears to this day the marks of antiquity, recalling the stirring days of many centuries past, when the Elizabethan rovers made Madras their goal of Eastern travel.

Queen.—Bangalore is usually considered the pleasantest residence for foreigners in the Madras Presidency. Owing to its delightful situation on a plateau 3,000 feet above the sea, and its healthy and comparatively temperate climate, it is one of the few cities in India where all-the-year-round residence is tolerable.

Like Madras, it is a city of magnificent distances, covering an area of some thirteen miles. But to the tourist it is singularly lacking in interest, indeed, the only sights are the Maharajah's palace (not often open to the public), the museum, and the fort. It has no history and no antiquities of any kind. It makes, however, a convenient centre for many famous excursions, the Falls of Cauvery, Tanjore, Trichinopoly, Conjeeveram, Belgolla, Madura, etc. The Prince of Wales will make it his official quarters for a couple of days before proceeding north to Hyderabad. The Royal tourists will not probably find time to visit Madura, the Benares of South India, but it is to be hoped that they will at all events, be able to see something of Tanjore. Its magnificent temple is one of the largest in India, and in some respects the most interesting of any Hindu temple that they will have seen in this comprehensive tour.

Bangalore has been aptly called a city of churches, and there are certainly more Christian places of worship—Anglican, Roman Catholic, and Nonconformist—in comparison to its population than in any city in the whole of India. It is also a great educational centre, and a great focus of missionary enterprise. Then its recreative resources are considerable, so that its popularity as a residential city is easily explained.

The great excursion is to the Falls of Cauvery and Seringapatam, the ancient but now deserted capital of Mysore. The falls in the rainy season are magnificent, and quite deserve the title of the "Indian Niagara," but when tourists see them in the cool season they are nothing extraordinary, and far inferior to the famous Gersoppa Falls, near Birri, Mysore. Like Niagara, Victoria Falls (Zambesi), and Tivoli, the water power is now utilised to generate electric energy, which is conveyed to the Kolar Gold Fields nearly 100 miles distant. The power works are extremely interesting and will readily be shown to any visitor on application to the engineer-in-charge. The water is conducted down steel shafts 400 feet deep to the six generators. The cost of the works was £350,000.

The most interesting sight easily accessible by rail is a remarkable Jain monument—a colossal statue of Gotama Swami, 70 feet high—at Shavara Belgolla, some sixty miles from Bangalore. This is of interest if only for its colossal proportions, for it is one of the largest statues in the world, exceeded in size only by the colossal recumbent Buddha in Burmah.

It is curious that this wonderful monolith is only incidentally referred to in the guide-books, and not mentioned at all in connection with Bangalore. No doubt its distance from a station (forty miles from Arsikere, a station on the main line from Bombay to Mysore city) accounts for this omission. If, however, the projected branch line from Arsikere to Mangalore on the coast eventually gets beyond the paper stage, the colossal image of Gotama will rank amongst the great sights of Southern India. The statue is nude, and the expression is the contemplative one usually seen in Buddhist statues.

The hair is curled in short spiral ringlets all over the head. The ears are long and large, the shoulders very broad, the arms hanging straight down with the thumbs outwards, the waist small. From the knees downwards the legs are unnaturally short, the feet rest on a lotus. Ant-hills are represented rising on either side, with a creeping plant springing from them, which twines round the thighs and arms, ending in a tendril with bunches of fruit. These are intended to symbolise the deep abstraction of the sage, so absorbed in meditation that the ants build and the plants climb around him unnoticed. Though certainly 1,000 years old, and probably 2,000, the stone looks as fresh as if newly quarried.—Murray's Guide.

The most interesting temples in all South India are, no doubt, those of Conjeeveram (the Golden City), Sri Rangam (Trichinopoly), Tanjore, and Madura, all easily reached from Madras by the South India Railway, but if the tourist is pressed for time he can visit Conjeeveram in a day, though Trichinopoly is an excursion of more varied and popular interest.

Conjeeveram is one of the seven sacred cities in India, and its great temple is one of the finest and largest Dravidian monuments in India. The principal gopura (gateway) is nearly 100 feet high. If we can imagine one of the ancient temple pylons of Egypt decorated with sculptures, we shall have a good idea of a gopura. The climb is worth taking on account of the magnificent bird's-eye view of the congeries of temples and shrines of this South Indian Benares, but the most interesting temple to architectural experts is the smaller one of Vishnu at Little Conjeeveram, some two miles distant. Here is a remarkable hall of pillars, carved to represent horses and hippogriffs. It is usual to show strangers the jewels and other treasures of the temple, but a fee of several rupees is expected.

Trichinopoly and its famous rock, the Gibraltar of South India, can be visited en route to Madura. The rock is a very striking natural feature, rising abruptly like a colossal boulder from the plain. From one point the rock crowned with its citadel bears some resemblance to Edinburgh Castle. Though the height is not more than 250 feet or so, so flat is the country round that a magnificent panoramic view is obtained from the summit.

The Madura temples are, no doubt, the finest Dravidian temples in India, but the superiority over those of Tanjore or Trichinopoly is more in degree than in kind. We have nothing in Europe to compare with these famous temples, and for parallels we must go to Thebes, Baalbek, Palmyra, or Jerusalem.

Madura Temple is in some respects the most remarkable architectural monument in all India, guarded by nine great gopuras (or gateways), any one of which is a monument worth the journey from Madras. These pyramidal gateways rise course upon course, every inch of stone covered with sculpture (most of it gilded) of gods and goddesses—apparently the whole Brahmin mythology being represented here. In wealth of symbolical ornament it exceeds even the most highly decorated pagodas of Burmah.

But the tourist, sated no doubt with temples and shrines, will perhaps be glad to devote a couple of days to a monument which is perhaps in grandeur of conception, immensity of bulk, and constructive skill almost as remarkable as any of the great Dravidian temples. This is the famous Periyar Dam, one of the greatest engineering enterprises in India, and the largest stone dam in the world. It is worthy to be compared with the Assouan Dam in Egypt, the Croton Dam in America, or the Vyrnwy Lake Dam in Wales.

The great scheme of the Periyar Waterworks is perhaps the most daring and original of any similar enterprise in the history of modern engineering. The waters of the Periyar river have been diverted to a new basin, so that the river now drains the arid regions of the east coast instead of the well-watered west coast country. This has been effected by (1) a huge reservoir 8,000 acres in area, formed by a dam 155 ft. high, closing up the valley of the Periyar, and (2) an aqueduct one and a quarter miles long driven through an intervening mountain.

Garjathasini.—The Garjathasini [Talcher] of the 26th January speaks emphatically of the meeting of the Indian ladies at Belvedere assembled together to pay their respects to Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, and observes that this purdah party has created a good impression all round.

Mahratta.—"How profoundly ignorant some people are about the sentiments of the Indian people! One writer seriously penned the following words for the pages of a prominent English journal:—'It is probable that no Imperial rescript that has ever been issued has given so much real and wholesome pleasure to so many millions of people as the message that announced the intended visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to India.' We could have given a direct contradiction to this statement if it were necessary. But we may generally remark that one of the most prominent results of the Royal tour is the number of wrong impressions and opinions that will be conveyed from India to England. The strangest thing is the misreading of some of the most unmistakable signs ever presented to the European observer about the meaning and sentiments of the Indian people. To take an illustration from some of the incidents of the Royal visit to Calcutta, the attitude of the Bengali people towards the Prince is a subject of likely inquisitiveness in England, and curiously enough on this particular matter we find the special correspondent of the London Times explaining away the sullenness of the Bengali crowds as 'respectful demeanour' and the want of cheering on the part of the natives, while the Europeans were doing their best in this respect, as the result of 'cheering not being an oriental custom, and the Bengalis being 'usually undemonstrative.'"

SELECTIONS FROM ENGLISH PAPERS OWNED BY NATIVES OF MADRAS AND FROM VERNACULAR PAPERS PUBLISHED IN MADRAS FOR THE WEEK ENDING 3RD FEBRUARY 1906.

Mukhbir-i-Dakhan.—The Mukhbir-i-Dakhan, of the 31st January, records that two of the Secretaries of the Reception Committee, Mr. H. C. King and the Hon'ble Mr. V. C. Desikachariyar, have been knighted on the memorable occasion of the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales to Madras, and observes, with great regret, that Safdar Husain Sahib Bahadur, Revenue officer of the Madras Corporation, and also an energetic and zealous Secretary of the Committee, has not been awarded even the title of "Khan Bahadur" though he richly deserves to be knighted.

Referring to the knighthood recently conferred upon Mr. V. C. Desikachariyar, one of the Secretaries to the Prince of Wales' Reception Committee, the same paper observes that while men like Sir Justice Subrahmanya Aiyar and Sir Bhashyam Aiyangar received this title in their advanced age, Mr. V. C. Desikachariyar has been knighted at a comparatively young age, and that it would have been more appropriate if any title of less distinction than a knighthood had been conferred on him.

Swadesi.—The Swadesi, of the 31st January, observes that the money, which was wasted on fire-works during the Prince of Wales's stay in Madras, might have been better spent towards the relief of the starving people; and that no substantial benefits have resulted from the Prince's present visit.

Swadesamitran.—The Swadesamitran, of the 31st January stating that the Prince of Wales readily gave his consent to "Black Town" being named after him "George-town," doubts whether he would have so readily consented, if he were asked to grant political privileges to the Indians, or to reduce the present heavy taxation. This paper differs from the view expressed by Mr. K. R. Guruswami Aiyar in the Madras Mail that the change of name should be celebrated in a grand manner and ironically remarks that this gentleman deserves a K.C.I.E. for his ingenious suggestion.

The Prapanchalarakai, of the 3rd February, is grateful to Mr. C. V. Swaminatha Aiyar and the Governor of Madras for the change of name, and considers Mr. Guruswami Aiyar's proposal to celebrate it publicly to be a good one.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE NEWSPAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE PUNJAB FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 3RD FEBRUARY 1906.

The Panjab-i-Paulad (Lahore), of the 28th January 1906, remarks that the Prince of Wales has undoubtedly been accorded a right royal reception in India, but that the question is beginning to be asked: "What has His Royal Highness done for the impoverished native of this country?" When touring about, the former rulers of India redressed grievances and granted jagirs, khillats, etc. Has, however, the Prince made any attempt to acquaint himself with the real condition of his future subjects, and has he granted interviews to any but highly-placed natives? The thing is, he is a mere puppet in the hands of Anglo-Indian (i.e. his) officials, who make him dance to any tune they may choose to play. It was the earnest desire of the people that His Royal Highness should have seen their condition with his own eyes and heard the tale of their suffering with his own ears, so as to be able to tell his august father the truth about them. What is it then which will serve to remind natives of the present visit of their future King-Emperor? Will it only be the black marks left by the hunting crops of Police officials on the bodies of those who went to see the receptions accorded to him? The people have not spared themselves to receive him in a befitting manner, but what has he done for them? Even no prisoners have been released in honour of his visit to the country. The Editor says that the Royal visits to places of worship have also revealed the fact that Government looks upon the Sikhs as a community separate from Hindus, for the reason that the Golden Temple was visited only on account of its being a sacred place of the Sikhs. Hindus are, therefore, complaining that the Heir-Apparent to the British Throne should have made no present to any of their temples. They should, however, rest satisfied that on the occasion of his visit to Benares, their most sacred place, the Prince will be certain to rectify the omission.

4TH FEBRUARY 1906.

Civil and Military Gazette.—With regard to the Prince of Wales's shooting trip to the Terai His Royal Highness will reach Bickna Thori on the Nepal border on the 21st instant. His departure on conclusion of the shoot will be on the 6th March. Aligarh will be reached on the 8th.

Madras Mail.—Kharapur, 2nd February.—His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales proceeded to the Kheddah at 10 o'clock to-day. The drive commenced from the stockade to the tying-up enclosure. This consisted of a large circular barricade on the lines of an amphitheatre, with a covered gallery, festooned with branches and similarly roofed fixed upon the stockade poles, which enabled the Prince of Wales and a numerous party to witness these most interesting proceedings, looking down upon the elephants. Commencing from one end the beaters with the usual din, supported by fifteen tame elephants, slowly drove the herd toward the inner enclosure under the personal direction of Mr. Sparkes and Mr. Muttanah who were untiring in their efforts to provide a realistic drive at considerable personal risk. All the elephants were driven into the passage leading to the inner enclosure, except a large unruly cow who, having previously dismounted a nervous mahout, without serious injury, proceeded to career up and down the outer stockade, causing a panic and a hasty retreat of the beaters and only the tuskers were willing to face her charges. Mr. Muttanah, mounting an elephant, continued to direct the affairs from this position of vantage. Mr. Oakley, of the motor staff, happened to be with the beaters in the centre of the stockade. Taking advantage of the nearest elephant, he took up a similar position. Eventually this chase was abandoned, and attention diverted to the tying-up enclosure, where the remaining elephants compressed themselves, trumpeting furiously and occasionally making the gallery shake with their charges. The door was then raised and the mass of writhing mammoths was swelled by the entrance of a dozen trained elephants and mahouts. Curiously enough, wild elephants seldom attack mahouts, when being tied up. Edging their elephants into the herd the mahouts isolate the largest tuskers, and, protected by the trained elephants, the men on foot slip into the enclosure, and after fitting the captives with heel ropes on a suitable scale hitch them to posts, and then leave the mahouts to noose the smaller elephants, whose antics and infantile rushes sometimes nearly overpower their captors and cause great amusement. So interested was the Royal Party in these Kheddah operations that they had luncheon there, remaining the whole day.

To-morrow the whole party purpose proceeding to the deferred tiger shoot, 24 miles on the Hunsur road by motor. Motor facilities are proving invaluable in the transport arrangements. The Earl of Shaftesbury's large car is here. Mr. Moriens, the Maharajah's chauffeur, drives the Prince in His Highness's splendid 40 horse power Flat, ably supported by Mr. Ragavendra Row, Assistant Private Secretary, who steers another powerful Flat, while Mr. Hardaker handles an Orleans. Mr. Hoare's powerful Diamler can always be counted on, and with the string of eleven small cars controlled by Mr. Oakley and his staff of European drivers, no matter the distance, the parties can always count on getting there without any delay.

So useful have the Bangalore motor cars proved that Hyderabad is considering the advisability of calling in their aid during the Prince's Visit.

So keenly interested was the Prince in the Kheddah operations that he remained eight consecutive hours there, returning only at dusk. At times he took a very active interest in affairs, and as the captives were drawn from the stockade, proceeded on foot, seeing them watered and tied up. Finally, the Prince has charmed the whole camp with his straight shooting and sportsmanlike qualities and has inspired the greatest enthusiasm and desire to provide the best sport possible. In spite of a desire to reach those fleeting bison a tiger-shoot at Hegadevenkotta, 20 miles out by motor, is the programme for to-morrow.

Observer.—Burma is a pleasant interlude. It introduces the Prince and Princess to new scenes and to a new people, who differ from the Hindoos as the Japanese differ from the Koreans. They are a delightful race, the Burmese, with frank smiling faces, exquisite manners, and beautiful dress. Pity that in Rangoon they should be a small and diminishing quantity. Commerce and industry have no sympathy with artistic temperament divorced from energy. Under the relentless wheels of this modern Juggernaut the Burmese are ground to powder while the insidious Bengali and the patient Madrassee wax fat and multiply. These gloomy invaders from the peninsula—clad in dirty cotton rags—swarm like ants on the wharves and in the warehouses that teem with the wealth of the land. With such competitors the Burmese has no chance. He has been described as the Irishman of the East, and certainly there are one or two points of resemblance to the Celt. The most striking perhaps is his instinct for religious observance. Every Irish peasant is ambitious to give a son to the Church. Every Burmese, rich or poor, must give not one but all his sons. It is an ancient and unbroken custom that the Burman must serve an apprenticeship to the priesthood. He must shave his head and don the yellow robe, it may be for seven days or for a lifetime.

We are invited to witness the initiation of two sons of a wealthy Burmese. The ceremony took place in a large public hall of aggressively European aspect, and a stranger entering might have imagined a music-hall entertainment of the last generation. On the unadorned stage strutted and postured a dark Lottie Collins, singing the songs of bygone days—"Tara Boom dehay!" This was a compliment to the visitors, and was prolonged until late in the afternoon, when a band of fifty priests appeared on the scene. Taking their places on the floor near a forest of paper flowers, they made ready for the ceremony. The two gentle youths submitted their dark hair to the razor, and stripped of their silken robes and jewels came forth shaven and shorn little monks in yellow sheets. "After seven days," explained the father, "they go back to school and the Church knows them no more." This initiation is costly, for it demands gifts and entertainment. To the monks and the temples given a sum of £170 in rupees, and to each of the thousand guests a shawl or an umbrella. If you look closely at the flowers which go to the priests you will see that each petal is a rupee, and there are 2,500 of these silver blossoms.

Rangoon has strong claim on the piety of the people, for here is the Golden Pagoda—the richest and one of the most beautiful of the temples of Buddhism. On a green mound stands a bell shaped tower,—a gigantic golden bell, about which cluster a host of shrines and pagodas crowded with images. The central pagoda is a solid masonry, with a small inner chamber in which was built the living body of a prince ordained by fate and a jealous king to be the guardian of the temple. The handle of the bell is plated with slabs of gold, while the lower part is covered with a gold leaf, which pious donors are slowly replacing with plates of the precious metal. When a rich Burman would "acquire merit" he builds a pagoda, or adds a few bricks of gold to the inner shrine. To these temples the people come to pray, bringing flowers for offering and candles to burn before the images.

It is one of the penalties of royalty that the Prince and Princess should see these historic places under conditions that rob them of their normal and picturesque aspect. The Golden Pagoda is a thing of beauty and therefore a joy for ever, but it is at its best when the people are there to pray. What shrine would not be more beautiful with these bevy of olive-complexioned maidens, whose slender and graceful figures are clothed in rose silk saris and snow-white bodices girdled with green, and whose raven tresses are adorned with a rose or a lily. Kneeling before a favourite shrine with bowed heads and clasped hands bearing flowers and incense for offerings, these gentle worshippers give life and grace and colour to the shrines. The Prince and Princess saw none of these. Their visit was formal, yet not without interest. They saw the stone inscriptions recording the origin of the temple in 1485 A. D., and heard the story of the two merchants who were directed by a fairy to the spot where the Buddha was meditating under a tree. Respectfully saluting the saint, they made offering of rice and honey cake. "Immediately four celestial beings brought four bowls made of stone, which the Buddha, by a miracle, converted into one. The two brothers then put their offering into the bowl, and the Buddha, after partaking of the repast, presented them with eight hairs, which they enshrined in the cavity of a pagoda, which they erected on their return to their native country."

They were shown also the famous wishing-stone that Burmese use every day. Express a wish and you have it or not, according to the lightness or heaviness of the stone as you replace it. They sounded the great bell which fell into the river when the British tried to remove it, and refused to return to earth until the Burmese obtained permission to retain it. The symbolical footprint, with the images that surround it, and many wonders beside, were displayed for the Prince and Princess, including the stuffed tiger that wandered out of the jungles and was discovered high on the pagoda.

Nor were the Burmans the only people who paid homage to the son and daughter of their Emperor. Among the visitors who came from afar were representatives of the Karens who inhabit the mountains of the Shan States. They are a strange people of whom little is known and who are rapidly disappearing under the pressure of China on the one side and Burma on the other. They are spirit worshippers and sacrifice to appease the wrath of evil spirits, deeming it superfluous to conciliate the good. In general appearance they resemble the Chinese more closely than the Burmese. The most striking group were the Padaungs, whose women wear neck-bands of brass rods, the number of which ranges from five to twenty-five coils, according to the age of the woman. The rods are one-third of an inch in diameter, and their object is to lengthen the neck as much as possible—a long neck being a mark of beauty. Needless to add, some have necks that make them look like giraffes, and when the rings are removed the head cannot be supported by the strained and atrophied muscles.

Another interesting group was that of the Banyangs, of whom it is said that there is no giving or taking in marriage except on compulsion. An official visits their villages and orders a couple to be married, and married they are willy-nilly. True, the men have occasionally to be carried by force to the bride's house; and divorce is not permitted. These confirmed bachelors are famous hunters, and are fonder of their dogs than their families. Once a year offerings are made to guardian spirits on behalf of the dogs, and, according to Mr. Carey, to whom I am indebted for these particulars, it is a very solemn ceremony from which women and strangers are rigorously excluded. The Bre women have enormous plugs in their ears, so that the lobes are enlarged and distorted.

On the whole, they are an unattractive people, these wild creatures from the Shan States. They have a certain taste in dress—their chiefs being gorgeously apparelled but they readily succumb to novelties, and Mr. Carey has been busy preventing some of the ladies discarding their native attire for bath towels, which they evidently consider the latest fashion in clothes. Some of them have journeyed on foot or on horse 500 miles before they could reach a railway, and many left their homes a month ago. One princess, who is seeking British protection for her province, lost her jewels in crossing a river. "But I don't mind," she exclaims, "I have shaken hands with the son and daughter of the Emperor."

Indian Daily News.—It is inevitable that Mysore should be described as a model State. It is prosperous and it is well administered, and if you want the proof of both facts you find it in the well-ordered capital city. It may be that the well-planned roads, the excellent water supply, the gardens, the sanitation and the public buildings have been designed primarily to please a ruler's eye; but in the East they fare well who live in the shadow of the palace, and if every prospect pleases as you look over the city from the galleries of the magnificent building now rising for the ruler of Mysore, you know the picture is built on prosperity, and is supported by much contentment. Educational advancement, industrial enterprises, gold mines, and new palaces all spell a condition of prosperity and progress here. Out of the ashes of the building burned down a few years ago has risen almost to completion a great splendid structure which will be the finest palace in India, and it is in no spirit of vain glory that a kingly residence of a grandeur unequalled in this country is being here erected. The pride which the people of Mysore have in the beauties of that palace is probably greater than that felt by the Maharaja, for whom it is being built. It is a pride in the power of craftsmanship, in the skill of their fellows and in the artistry which is creating new hope for Indian crafts. Daily the people wander through the palace halls, watching the builder, stone-cutter, wood carver, and the inlayer at work, and seeing wonders grow under the artisan's deft touch. Nobody says the people nay. In no other country would they be allowed to wander at will and see a building like this evolve and unfold. But this palace is to be the lesson of what Mysore can do, and its construction is a lesson as well as a pride to the people. The granites and porphyries, the soapstone and serpentine used in the building are from quarries within the State, and all these stones, except the serpentine, are found close to the capital. The serpentine comes from quarries sixty miles away. Some marble is used, and most of this is Indian, only a little foreign marble from Italy being introduced. The stones have been used in an exquisite combination of greys and greens and reds and State blues. The architectural design is Indo-Saracenic, and in distinction and grandeur it is the best work Mr. Irving, the architect of so many buildings in Madras, has done. The stone carvings which ornament the building are of most finished character, in grandeur and design they show there is still great hope for the Indian craftsman. Most of this work is wrought in soapstone which cut easily, and hardens by exposure. Rosettes of floral design, others of circles of peacocks, breast outwards, and others again of the sun surrounded by the signs of the zodiac form a very effective ornament. Throughout the building, in relief, are figures and beautiful leaf carvings. Most of the stone carving is the work of Madrasces, but the splendid carvings in teak for the woodwork of the palace are the product of Mysore craftsmanship.

One of the finest examples of this work is the ceiling of a corridor in the Hall of Audience. Leading to this hall is a portion of the old palace, with carved silver and ivory doors, priceless in value. The great Durbar hall, which is apart from the Hall of Audience, gives a magnificent vista of colonnaded arches wonderfully carved. Over the doors here marble inlaid work has been introduced, copied from buildings at Agra, men having been brought from Upper India to do this and to train Mysore artisans to the craft. Mysore is determined to do what it can to revive the industrial arts of the country. New designs have been introduced in the stone carvings of the palace, and patterns in woodwork have been adopted from the Japanese.

It is all a part of the policy begun by the late ruler whose name will be commemorated by the new Technical Institute, the foundation of which was laid by the Prince of Wales. The new palace for the young Maharaja has already cost twenty-four lakhs of rupees, and is now approaching completion. It will cost fully thirty lakhs before it is finished, but the money will be well spent. The building will be an evidence of the further resources of a State already known to be rich in minerals. It will have given an impetus to the art crafts of the province, and it will be a monument of the reconnaissance of industrial art in India.

It is understood that the Prince will visit the new palace on his return to Mysore from the shooting camp to-morrow.

The Prince and Princess returned to Mysore from the shooting camp this morning, motoring in about eleven o'clock. During the day the Princess inspected the State jewels and received a number of students of the Maharani's College for girls. Their Royal Highnesses this evening attended service at the Mysore Church, where the Bishop of Madras preached. The departure for Bangalore takes place at midnight.

The festivities in Mysore concluded to-night with another grand exhibition of pyrotechnics. On this occasion the heights of Chamundi overlooking the town were utilised. Bonfires were lit on most prominent points, whilst masses of coloured fire illuminated the country for miles around. The display of Brockite rockets was again magnificent, and the showers of fire of innumerable colours from shells and other fireworks were sublime in their grandeur. Here again Brooks of Crystal Palace renown, have scored another immense success.

Madras Mail.—While the rehearsal of the Divisional Parade for the 9th instant was going on at Secunderabad, a rehearsal of the procedure to be observed on the arrival of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales and the subsequent progress to Faluknama was carried out on the morning of the 2nd idem. The procession started from the Hyderabad Railway station at 8-15 A. M. First came a squad of the City Police, then a squadron of the 2nd Hyderabad Cavalry, followed by another of the Golconda Lancers, after whom came a battery of the R. H. A. followed by a squadron of the 13th Hussars, immediately preceding the Royal carriage, etc. The rear of the procession was closed by squadrons of the 13th Hussars, Imperial Service Lancers and another squad of the City Police. The entire route was kept clear by the City Police. The four horses destined to convey the Royal visitors to Faluknama are magnificent greys, which, I am told, is the most "spanking" team that Their Royal Highnesses are likely to see during their whole tour.

His Highness, who was struck by the splendour of the illuminations during the Jubilee festivities, has ordered that the illuminations during the stay of his Royal guest are to be thrice as magnificent, and the walls of the houses and streets in the city are literally covered with lamps already.

Mysore Herald.—Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales and His Highness the Maharaja and Party arrived at the Kheddahs at 5-30 last night. The drive was started at 3-15 and the elephants were brought down the river bank three times, but returned every time towards the forcing line. The cow leader of the herd charged and trumpeted each time, but was driven back by the fire of blank ammunition.

The herd, which consisted of about thirty elephants, eventually, at about 6-15, entered the river and swam towards the other bank, where the Kheddahs are. They were about striking the bank about 500 yards north of the Kheddah gate where the Prince and Party were watching the operations, and were turned towards the gate.

The Prince and Princess and Party walked along the bank following them, and when near the gate, the Prince and Princess and Maharaja and Mr. Muttanah ascended the muckas erected there. All but about nine elephants entered the Kheddah, and three proceeded to swim up stream when they were turned and were eventually driven into the Kheddah, and the Prince lowered the gate. The time was about 6-50 P. M. The river banks at about this time was ablaze with torches and the sight was very effective. The arrangements were perfect, but if it could have been arranged for an hour or half an hour earlier it would have been better. Mr. Muttanna and his lieutenants, Messrs. Sreenivasa Row and Muttiah, are to be congratulated on their success, the former for his organisation and the latter for the bravery displayed throughout the operations, to say nothing about the sleepless nights spent in patrolling the various lines surrounding the herd.

At the commencement of the drive the line of beaters extended to be about five miles and they gradually concentrated to half a mile when forcing operations began. I must also mention the names of two other officers who were the means of helping to make the drive a success. They were Messrs. Krishna Murti Naidu and Usoomiah.

The Royal Party returned to Karapur Camp at 7-15 P. M.

The Prince, the Maharaja, Mr. Sparks and Colonel Beatson are going bison-hunting to-day on elephants to a place about six miles from the Kheddahs.

The roping operations here will take place to-morrow, Friday, and the day after the Prince will go tiger-shooting.

His Royal Highness accompanied by His Highness the Maharaja, Colonel Beatson and Mr. Sparks left on an elephant yesterday after bison near Kakenkote, some distance off the Mysore-Manantoddy road. The road lay by the Kubai river for a considerable distance, and a fine sambhur was viewed early in the morning. The Prince had two rapid shots at it, both taking effect and bringing the stag down. Later on in the day the party threaded the dense bison jungle on foot, and after a fatiguing track sighted a herd, but they were entirely beyond range and far too shy to be stalked. The party returned to the Karapur camp late in the evening.

A large party, composed mainly of His Royal Highness's Staff, went out the same afternoon after tiger in the Hampapur jungle, but the beat resulted in nothing, although all the guns were well posted.

6TH FEBRUARY 1906.

Daily Chronicle.—The Prince and Princess of Wales arrived at Bangalore to-day from their camp in the Mysore jungles. Bangalore, though situated in the native State of Mysore, is the largest British cantonment of Southern India being to this portion of the peninsula what Mian Mir is to Northern India; but Mian Mir is some four miles distant from the native city of Lahore, while here the city and cantonment adjoin one another.

The main purpose of the visit here was to unveil the memorial statue of Queen Victoria, which the Prince did to-day, with an appropriate reference to "The noble Empress Victoria the Good."

The visit here closes the tour in Southern India, which has left behind it a dominating impression of the cheerfulness and contentment of these strong-featured dark people. It is unfortunate that no opportunity was found of paying a visit to the marvellous Dravidian temples of Madura, Trichinopoly and Conjeveram, which are essential to a full appreciation of Southern India, and form as distinctive a feature of Indian architecture as the Mogul buildings of Agra and Delhi.

The Prince's visit to the Mysore jungles unfortunately yielded a blank. The Kheddah operations were successful and picturesque, and the scene at night, when the yelling hordes of beaters with their flickering torches, pressed the frightened herd of elephants into the final approach, was unforgettable, but no tiger or bison was brought to the bag.

Nevertheless, the Royal party have seen something of the features which are making Mysore the model amongst native States for administrative efficiency, educational progress and abounding financial prosperity. In Bangalore itself the electric light and power installation remind them of the ambitious electric power works generated by the Conway Falls, which produce 8,000 horse-power, in the midst of the primeval jungle, in order to drive the mills of the Kolar Gold Fields and to illuminate the city of Bangalore. This enterprise is the precursor of other similar gigantic electric works in Kashmir and Bombay, which are playing an important part in the industrial development of modern India.

But in spite of these signs of advancement Mysore is in danger of living too much in the past. It seems inclined to be content with the start which it obtained under British Administration and its immediate successors, and in this country of invincible conservatism to stand still is to retrograde. Mysore needs another administrative genius like Sir Sheshadri Aiyar in order to keep in touch with the awakening of the country, which is apparent in so many directions. We arrive at Hyderabad on Thursday, in order to pay our visit to the Nizam.—(STANLEY REED).

Daily Mail.—Bangalore to-night twinkles with electric light, and its huge cotton mill hums with electrically-driven machinery. This is the local expression of the bold enterprise of harnessing the Cauvery River, forty miles away, and creating in the heart of the jungle cheap electrical power for driving the mills of the Kolar gold field, which has paid £1,000,000 in royalties to the State and £10,000,000 in dividends to shareholders.

The Cauvery enterprise is characteristic of the spirit which is making Mysore the model State of India. In education and administration it is in the van, and it is the only State courageous enough to start the beginnings of representative institutions by according influential bodies the right to interrogate the Government and present their claims. The Cauvery scheme is its greatest achievement, as it is the first great electrical enterprise in India. Its phenomenal success has inspired the initiation of similar projects in Kashmir and Bombay, and the stimulus given to the industrial advance of the country is incalculable.

That this has been accomplished under native rule is the truest proof of the wisdom of the great act of justice in giving the State back to the Hindu dynasty after half a century of British rule.

With the stay at Bangalore the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Southern India is concluded. Their Royal Highnesses have not seen the mighty monuments of past glories preserved at Madura, Trichinopoly, and Conjeveram, but they have been surrounded by unmistakable signs of the happiness and well-being of these dark-featured Southern peoples.

Indian Daily News.—The Indian Patriot writes:—Before he leaves the shores of India His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales will have formed many ties between himself and the inhabitants of India, ties of appreciation and sympathy on the one hand, and those of love, reverence and loyalty on the other. Of these ties none can be more important, more enduring, or more beneficial than those which will maintain a permanent relation of regard and friendship between His Royal Highness and the ruling Princes in India. The government of nearly one-third of the Indian Empire is entrusted to the latter: and on their wisdom, statesmanship and administrative capacity depend the well-being and happiness of many millions, and the future of India as a self-governing country. Theirs is a mighty task, and in the performance of it nothing can be more encouraging and stimulating to them than the knowledge that in their arduous labours they have the appreciative sympathy of their Emperor and Suzerain. To know their future Emperor, to have his constant sympathy and attention, to be able to merit his personal approbation of their work and achievements, these are advantages which they will highly value, and the assistance of which will stimulate them in their work and service. The visit of His Royal Highness, the personal knowledge he has gained, the personal relations he has formed, the recollection he will retain of the friends and acquaintances he has made, will conduce to the continuance of his interest in and attachment to this land particularly, to the States under the rule of Native Princes.

Madras Mail.—Bangalore, 6th February.—This afternoon it fell to His Royal Highness to perform a duty which he always fulfils with singular dignity and sympathy,—to unveil the statue erected by public subscription to commemorate in Mysore the reign of Victoria the Good. At Agra, Calcutta, Rangoon and Madras the Prince of Wales was intimately associated with memorials to the Empress beloved by all India, and his manner of doing it, as also the affection and respect which vibrate in any reference he may make to His Majesty the King-Emperor, helps to an understanding of the strength of the tie that knits the members of the Royal Family to each other. The statue is a fine work in marble by Brock and represents her late Majesty in flowing robes and with orb and sceptre. It stands on a commanding site, overlooking the high ground, and is a noble and gracious marble figure of the first Queen-Empress.

The ceremony, as upon all such occasions when their Royal Highnesses participate, was tinged with quiet reverence. The Prince and Princess arrived in full state, and, when they were seated in the pandal, the Dewan of Mysore, Sir Krishna Murti, read the following address:—

May it please Your Royal Highness,—With feelings of highest respect and deepest devotion, we venture to approach Your Royal Highness on the occasion of this fulfilment of the universal desire of Mysore for a local memorial of Her Majesty, our late Empress. While, therefore, the Maharaja and people of this country had the privilege of contributing largely towards the National Victoria Memorial of Calcutta, the happy conception of our late distinguished Viceroy Lord Curzon, they also, together with the residents of the Civil and Military Station, eagerly desired to commemorate the name and virtues of the Empress by an enduring local monument that would hand down to posterity a visible memorial of their veneration for Her Majesty and her glorious reign. Men in all walks of life, vied with one another in associating themselves with this movement, and the statue now before Your Royal Highness will reveal to the yet unborn generation of Mysore the features of one in whom "a thousand claims to reverence closed as mother, wife and queen." In selecting the site on which the statue now stands in preference to one in the capital of the State, it has been the special wish of His Highness the Maharajah to mark the common association of the rest of Mysore with the inhabitants of the Civil and Military Station in this perpetuation of our gratitude to the Great Empress. It is our exceptional good fortune that Your Royal Highness has graciously consented to unveil the statue of Your Royal Highness's most revered grandmother, and that Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales has also with great condescension accepted our request to be present on the occasion. It only remains for us to beg of Your Royal Highness, to unveil the statue of the noble Empress Victoria the Good, and thus gladden the hearts of the people of Mysore, whose one prayer is that the rulers of Her House may ever continue to reign over the Empire as nobly as she did.

His Royal Highness in reply said:—

Gentlemen:—I accept with the greatest pleasure your invitation to unveil this statue of our late Queen-Empress. The words which you have used make it almost superfluous for me, her grandson, to utter one word more of loving admiration. The Princess of Wales and myself have now travelled through a considerable portion of India, and nothing has given us greater pride and touched our hearts more than the universal love and veneration which is shown for the memory of her whom you aptly call "the noble Empress Victoria the Good." There is one thing about the statue which gives me especial pleasure. It is the association of the Maharajah of Mysore and his people with the inhabitants of the Civil and Military station of Bangalore. Nothing could be more in harmony with the wishes and sentiments of her to whom you have raised this statue than this comradeship and fellow-feeling.

The guns boomed out the Royal salute. The bands raised the strains of the National Anthem, and, after an appreciative examination of the monument the Prince and Princess drove off to the Lal Bagh to see the Flower Show and thence to the Residency.

The day closed with a State dinner in the Serapis Room of the Residency, followed by a Reception. The Serapis Room perhaps requires a word of explanation. It was built for the entertainment of His Majesty the King-Emperor, when he visited India, and was named after the vessel which bore him to the East, but, to the disappointment of all classes in the State, the Royal visit to Mysore had to be abandoned. In this apartment, however, King Edward's son and heir was loyally entertained, and all joined in drinking the health of the Sovereign for whose accommodation the walls were raised.

Bangalore, 5th February.—This evening the principal public ceremony in connection with the Royal Visit to Bangalore took place, and the statue of the late Queen-Empress was unveiled before a huge assemblage of the residents of all classes. The stands were crowded, and the gathering of the general public was immense. Nevertheless, excellent order was maintained, and the whole ceremony went off without the slightest hitch.

Having inspected the guard of honour furnished by the Kolar Gold Fields Rifle Volunteers at the Residency, Their Royal Highnesses left in the Royal carriage, accompanied by Sir Walter Lawrence and escorted by one squadron of Carabineers and the District Superintendent of Police, Civil Military Station. The route lay by Cubbon Road and ouse Road, the profuse decorations of which have already been described, whilst the troops in garrison lined the sides and kept the crowd in check. The President and members of the Executive Committee of the Victoria Memorial Fund occupied a position to the left of the Royal pandal, whilst the Press representatives were accommodated in the compound of the Cubbon Park Police Station. The other stands and pandal for native ladies have already been noticed.

The Royal carriage drew up at the pandal, the trumpeter sounding a flourish, and the guard of honour, furnished by the 69th Punjabis, remaining at the slope. The massed bands of all the infantry corps in garrison were drawn up in the rear of the guard of honour. The two bodies of troops of the escort preceding the Royal carriage moved along the road of departure, and formed a line on both sides of the road, facing inwards from the point where it was met by the public enclosure, whilst the two bodies of troops of the escort following the Royal carriage (also Carabineers), stood fast on the road, and formed line, facing the statue.

Their Royal Highnesses were met by the British Resident and Staff, the General Officer Commanding and Staff and the Dewan of Mysore, and having entered the Royal pandal, Sir Krishna Murti, K.C.I.R., Dewan of Mysore, read an address, requesting His Royal Highness to unveil the statue.

His Royal Highness, having replied, then stepped forward from the pandal, and pulled the silk cord. The four Union Jacks enveloping the statue dropped to the ground, and the magnificent statue of the late Queen-Empress Victoria was unveiled. The trumpeters instantly sounded a flourish, the guard of honour gave the Royal Salute and the massed bands played twelve bars of the National Anthem, every one present saluting or uncovering his head. The guard of honour then returned to the slope, and an artillery salute of 101 guns at intervals of five seconds was fired from the parade ground by the artillery in garrison. The scene was most impressive and will undoubtedly be remembered and described to their children's children for generations by those who witnessed it.

After a brief interval, Their Royal Highnesses, accompanied by Sir Walter Lawrence, and attended by the escort and a Durbar Superintendent of Police, left for the Lal Bagh, the carriages of their suite following. The route lay past the Sheshadri Memorial Hall and Survey Office to the Yellanka Gate, and thence through the City and Fort and Marabelli village, to the Lal Bagh Gardens. Arrived there, the Prince and Princess with their suite alighted at the glass-house, and were shown round the Flower Show by Mr. J. Cameron, Superintendent of the Lal Bagh. Much interest was shown by the Royal Party in the show of flowers, fruit, etc., which—always good in Bangalore—was especially so on this occasion. The return drive was by way of Mission Road, past the Cenotaph, Maternity Hospital and Survey Office, and on to the Residency by the Cubbon Park entrance. Throughout the route large crowds lined the roads and much applause was noticeable as Their Royal Highnesses passed. The people, however, were absolutely orderly, and gave the City Police, under whose supervision the roads and the Lal Bagh itself were placed, little or no trouble.

This notable ceremony was performed this morning in the presence of a huge crowd of people. The ground was roped in and kept clear by the men of the Essex Regiment, whilst the four squadrons of the Carabineers were formed up in line, with the band in rear of the centre. The old Standard, with an escort of a Squadron Sergeant-Major and two men, was formed up on the right of the line, whilst the new Standard, eased, and with a similar escort, was in rear of the centre of the line. The Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of Madras, with the choir behind him, faced the Regiment, the silver drums being on his right, and slightly to the front. On the arrival of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and Staff, the Royal Salute was given, and the escort with the old Standard advanced, and moved in slow time along the front of the Regiment, wheeling round the left of the line and forming up in rear of the centre. Until the old Standard had been halted, the Band continued to play "Auld Lang Syne," and this farewell to their old Colour by the Regiment was most impressive.

Three sides of a square were then formed, and the escort, with the new Standard, and Lieutenant P. M. Kerans, of the Carabiniers, who had been detailed to receive it, moved out from the centre, the Standard-bearer (the Squadron Sergeant-Major) advancing and handing the cased Standard to Major N. M. Smyth, v.c., Second-in-Command of the Carabiniers, who uncased it, and laid it against the drums. His Lordship the Bishop of Madras, moving to the silver drums, then conducted the consecration service, which opened with the hymn "Brightly Gleams our Banner." A prayer for the King's Majesty followed, and then the Bishop, laying his hands upon the Colours, uttered the words of consecration, which ran as follows:—"In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, we do dedicate and set apart these Colours, that they may be a sign of our duty towards our King and country in the sight of God." Another prayer for those who followed the Colours and the Benediction concluded the service, and Major Smyth then handed the Standard to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales who presented it to Lieutenant Kerans, that officer sinking on his right knee to receive it.

The illuminated scroll containing a short abstract of the history of the Carabiniers which was presented to His Royal Highness, ran as follows:—

1685.—"The Carabiniers" were raised in 1685 by Lord Lumley, and constituted a Regiment of Cuirassiers. They were distinguished by the title of "Queen Dowager's Regiment" and their original uniform was scarlet with green facings.

1690.—The Regiment fought at the Battle of the Boyne, at the Siege of Limerick, and at the Battle of Aghrim.

1692.—Campaign against the French in the Netherlands. Present at the Battle of Steinkirk.

1693.—At the Battle of Laden the Regiment covered the Bridge of Neerspecken, and enabled King William III to retreat.

1693.—Owing to the numerous occasions on which the Regiment distinguished itself King William III conferred upon it the title of "Carabiniers" to show his approbation of its services.

1704 to 1711.—In the reign of Queen Anne, it served under the great Duke of Marlborough and at Blenheim it overthrew the celebrated Gens d'Armes of France.

At Ramilies it beat the Spanish Horse Guards, and captured the Colours of the French Royal Regiment of Bombardiers, fought at Oudenarde, and at Malplaquet charged with success the renowned Household Cavalry of Louis XIV.

1760.—Took part in the campaign in Germany and distinguished itself at the Battle of Warbourg.

1789.—Was very highly complimented by His Royal Highness the Duke of York, at Tournay.

1806.—Took part in the expedition to South America with the force which occupied Buenos Ayres.

1851.—Her Majesty Queen Victoria was pleased to approve of the VI Dragoons Guards (The Carabiniers) being equipped as a Regiment of Light Cavalry.

1855.—The "Carabiniers" took part in the Crimea War, were present at the Battle of Tchernaya, and took part in the expedition to Eupatoria.

1857.—The Regiment served through the Indian Mutiny and was present at the following engagements:—Delhi, Hindun, Budlee, and Keserai. At Gungaree, one Squadron attacked the rebels, captured their guns and absolutely routed them, with a loss to themselves of three out of four officers killed.

1880.—The Regiment served through the Afghan War and was present at the affairs of Dakka, Ali, Baghan and Lughman Valley.

1899 to 1902.—The Regiment served continuously from the beginning to the end of the Boer War. First, under General French at Colesberg and afterwards—in the main advance to Kimberley. They took part in the following engagements:—Relief of Kimberley, Battle of Paardeburg, Battle of Poplar Grove, Battle of Driefontein, Capture of Bloemfontein, Battle of Karree Siding, Battle of Zandt River, Capture of Kronstadt, Battle of Johannesburg, Capture of Pretoria, Battle of Diamond Hill, Battle of Riet Vlei, Battle of Belfast, and the march on Barberton.

Also in the operations in the Eastern Transvaal and later, in the Magaliesburg, and under General Bruce Hamilton to the end of the war.

Reforming line, the Regiment greeted its new Standard with a general Salute, and the Standard, and its escort marched to their place in the line in slow time. The Royal Salute concluded the proceedings, and Their Royal Highnesses left the parade ground for the Agram Hospital where they were met by General J. Eccles Nixon, c.b., Colonel P. H. Benson, I.M.S., and the other Staff of Medical Officers.

Standard.—From the wild Northland, with its whisperings of the wars to come, the Prince of Wales passed down into the Punjab where almost every seemed and ravined plain and every devious spreading river carries a memory of triumphs and disasters in the past. The Indus, the Sutlej, the Jhelum, and Ravi, the Jumna the very names speak of "the drums and trappings of a thousand conquests." Afghans, Sikhs and Tartars, Rajputs, Mahrattas, and English have poured their blood into the sandy lagoons of the great water-courses. The Prince might have mused (if the crowded days of a Royal progress yield time for musing) on the strange fate which makes him heir to the thrones of Akbar and Aurengzeb. It is as if, in some distant century, a Mikado of Japan were to visit his subjects among the palaces and churches of Rome, as perhaps (who knows?) he may.

Rome herself has scarcely a stronger appeal to offer to the imagination than some of these storied cities of Northern India. The view over the Campagna, with its halting legions of broken arches and riven columns, is little more impressive than that which lies before the watcher from the minarets of the Jama Masjid at Delhi. The history of many ages is in that wide prospect. Close below is the splendid fort and palace, where the latter Mahomedan Emperors ruled, the noble halls of Shah Jehan, first of crowned builders and married lovers, and the maze of rose-red courts above the river bed, where the traditions of the race of Timur flared up again for a brief revel of murder and intrigue in the tragedy of 1857. To the south, amid the waste of grey sands, are the ruins of the older Delhi, mile after mile of remnants dropped as it were, by Hindu and Mahomedan kings in their transitory conquests of this much-conquered land. Out from Rome, along the Appian way, you are among the tombs of men and women; but here you come upon a very cemetery of cities, a graveyard stocked with the monuments of dynasties and nations.

It is a book of torn and fading records, that sheet of dusty earth beyond the Delhi Gate. Here and there is an entry that resists the touch of time. Nearly a thousand years ago a Hindu king laid an iron finger on the page, when he planted a famous pillar forged from a single bar of metal, with a vaunting inscription in Sanskrit: The founders of the first Mahomedan Delhi, three centuries later, did not think it worth while to alter the legend or deface its sitting. The little iron pillar stands; but hard by, the Moslem Kutab Minar, the Tower of the Faith, soars, two hundred and forty feet aloft, decked out for ever in a bannered pomp of red and orange and purple and creamy white. Vendome Columns and Nelson Memorials, and Teutonic Victory Denkmals, even St. Mark's Winged Lion ramping on his pole seem tame besides this cry of victory in coloured stone. Slender, graceful, defiant, the brilliant shaft rears itself skyward with all the triumphant symbolism of that Moslem art which had learnt to express by line and tint the passions and emotions it was forbidden to illustrate on the human face and form.

Between the Kutab Minar and the Delhi Gate lies the Tomb of Humayun, the second great Emperor of the Tartar line. Oriental potentates are careful of their last abiding places. It is perhaps one phase of that yearning for repose, which haunts the Eastern temperament, at once unquiet and indolent and makes it so easily at home with Death the Reconciler. "For now should I have lain still and been quiet I should have slept; then had I been at rest with kings and counsellors of the earth which built desolate places for themselves." The writer of the Book of Job had doubtless looked upon the Pyramids. But the tombs of the Moghul kings of Hindustan, and those of their queens, and ministers, and favourites, are by no means desolate places. On the contrary, they are among the most beautiful objects that the hand of man has created. The "kings and counsellors of the earth", who dwelt while alive at Delhi and Agra and Fatehpur Sikri, were epicures in graves. To erect a splendid monument for themselves and their wives was their hobby, their amusement, the occupation of their leisure. From the battle and the march, the angry struggle with intrigue and rival ambition, and fever of sensual pleasure, they turned to contemplate the long silences to come. Life was hurried and broken, full of weariness and travail, menaced by murderous enmities. For the fallen king or the fallen minister there was nothing to hope; all that he had, or could leave, would be at the mercy of his supplanter. But no Mahomedan would desecrate a tomb. There even the dethroned monarch, the disgraced and condemned minister, could sleep in peace. So all the resources of Moghul power and taste were lavished upon the mausoleum. It is the crowning achievement of Mahometanism in the domain of art, more beautiful and distinctive even than the splendid mosques and palaces with which the Tartar kings enriched Agra and Delhi.

Its site was laid in some delicious plot of garden-ground, where the dark spires of the cypress and the feathers of the nim are mirrored in the silvery gleam of shallow waters poured through marble cisterns, and where beds of flowering shrubs are set amid turf kept green even in the tropic summer. Round it was thrown a high wall, crenellated like that of a fortress, with a great red sandstone arch, itself a wonder of proportion and design, standing on guard over the treasure within. In the cool and silent space of verdure, behind the doors of ebony or bronze, the Sultan built his shrine. The cunning hands of Hindu workmen, whose fathers had wrought in stone through buried centuries, were his to command; the old Indian patterns of deeply carved balcony and incised bracket, and chased and fretted surface-wall, were before him. To the rich, but sternly limited Brahmanic schemes the Moghuls added all the refinements of later Saracenic art, in hovering domes and sumptuous cusped arches, and nobly aisled and vaulted halls, and delicate cupolas poised lightly in mid-air, like wind-flowers trembling on their stems. Skillful craftsmen were brought from Baghdad and Samarkand, from Persia and China and Arabia—perhaps even from Italy and France—to perform miracles in laying and mosaic and plaster-work and enamelling; and Asia was ransacked for rare marbles and jade, and turquoise and jasper, and lapis lazuli. About the shrine itself was no hint of funeral gloom: it was a casket shining in ivory, like the Taj Mahal, or set with jewellery, like the tomb of Itmad-ud-Dowla at Agra, or solemnly rich like that of Akbar at Sikandra. While he lived, the exquisite, empty chamber was its owner's garden-house and place of serene enjoyment; when he died, it became a sanctuary, where he could lie quiet through the ages, behind verses of the Koran traced in flawless blue down the lintels of the doorway.

But as we gaze upon the distant dome of Humayun's tomb, floating in the luminous haze of morning, or the amber and emerald of the sunset sky, we remember that once, at least, the sanctuary was violated. It was from these vaults, after Delhi had fallen, in September, 1557, that "Hodson of Hodson's Horse," that dashing, daring, reckless adventurer, dragged out the Last of the Moghuls, the puppet king, who had been made the nominal head of the rebellion. The coffin of his ancestor could not shield the trembling old intriguer from the arm of England and an English prison. Nor could it save his sons from a darker doom. It was at Humayun's Tomb that the princes were in hiding, when this same Hodson sought them out the following day. Tall and thin, with red hair and flaming blue eyes all alight with the concentrated wrath that was burning in English hearts in that grim autumn, a hundred of his wild horsemen at his heels, the great guerrilla chief burst into the crowd that beset the mausoleum. Before the spirit of Vengeance Moslem fanaticism quailed. With ten men he disarmed the clamorous mob in the garden of the tomb, and took a thousand swords and firearms from them. Then he brought the fugitives through the throng, and carried them on that famous and fatal drive to the Delhi gate, where he shot them with his own hand, while a host of Mahomedans looked on, paralysed with fear and horror. A bloody deed, but let us remember that it was the year of the Caspian massacres before we pass judgment upon it and its author.

The mention of this lurid episode reminds us that he who watches from the turrets of the great Delhi mosque is not left alone with the buried past and the long-forgotten dead. He can turn from the distant domes and straggling ruins to look down into the Chandni Chauk the main street of the bazaar, swarming with eager life. He can see the laden bullock-carts, the carriages, and the tongas, pushing their way through the broad, crowded street; he can catch faintly the hum of voices that issues from the chattering multi-coloured throng. And if he casts his eyes northward, he is confronted with other scenes which appeal to the imagination no less forcibly than the ruined cities and lonely fancies of the southern view, scenes indeed, on which few Englishmen can look for the first time without some quickening of the pulses. Beyond the city on that side are leafy glades and avenues, with white bungalows and spreading suburban parks. Here, among these gardens is the grave of John Nicholson; close by, in the compound of the building which is now a club, is the spot where the breaching batteries were placed for the final bombardment of the rebel town on September 11th and 12th in the Mutiny year. Two hundred yards away is the old wall, still showing the rents and gaps torn by the English guns; and not far off stands the Kashmir Gate, all shattered as it was left on the night of the 14th, when Lieutenant Home and his handful of unnoticed heroes scrambled into the ditch with their port-fires and fuses. That small, plain building, again, just inside the walls, near the yellow spire of St. John's Church, was once the Arsenal, which Willoughby and a dozen other English lads blew up over their own heads after holding it all night against a surging mob of mutineers.

Somewhat further round the wall is the site of the Lahore Gate, and there, if you poke about a little among the dusty by-streets, you will come upon the narrow lane, high houses on one side, the high rampart on the other (and marksmen swarming upon both on that 14th of September 1857), where Nicholson met his death. "Showers of grape tore their ranks open; bullets flew down upon them like hail from above; stones and round shot were pitched among them; two officers fell mortally wounded; five more were struck, and the shattered column, hurled back in confusion, stood covering under the storm. Then Nicholson himself strode forward, and, raising his sword, above his head, indignantly appealed to them to advance. In another moment he had fallen, shot through the chest." The actual spot you cannot make out from the minaret platform; but the Flagstaff Tower you can see, and all the length of the Ridge, where the avenging force of Britain, a mere skeleton of an army, hungry, fever-stricken, harassed by daily attacks, "stormed at by shot and shell," tormented by the heat, clung desperately all through that bitter summer of the Year Terrible. They were not five thousand British and native at the beginning, and never much more than eight thousand to the close, many of them sick; yet they pinioned, and finally they captured a city of two hundred thousand people, with a garrison of at last fifty thousand angry fanatics, armed like our own men, and drilled by our own officers. A hopeless enterprise it seemed; doomed to failure.

It did not fail. The Ridge is green and grown with waving trees to-day, and the curt record on the Mutiny Memorial is idly read by a generation which has forgotten the very names of the men who brought England and India through the long agony of 1857. But their work abides. Look from your lofty station, past their famous tumulus, and you discern the high roofs of factories and tall chimneys spouting the smoke of lignite coal in a black stream across the skyline. It is the ugly pennant of that peaceful industrial India, which toils and pushes under the strong rule for which the martyrs of 1857 died. So in Agra, from the Jasmine Tower of the Palace, itself a box of gems, on one side of the river you look down to the "White Wonder" of the Taj; and on the other to a monstrous railway bridge, strident, naked, unshamed, and past it to chimneys, trailing their oriflamme of mephitic vapour above the lovely heads of minaret and mosque. Here in Delhi we have an epitome of the three phases of Indian development that concern us most: the India of the older civilisations, to which it owes all it has inherited of grace, and beauty, and devotion; the India of the long struggle, in which we rescued it from a fast-devouring anarchy and gave it law and peace; and the India of the New Age, which is that of mechanical progress and modern industry. To reconcile the first with the last is the problem before the Nicholsons, the Lawrences, the Herbert Edwardes of the future, and as hard a one as any their fathers faced in the days of conquest and pacification.

7TH FEBRUARY 1906.

Englishman.—This morning the Prince of Wales presented new colours to the 6th Dragoon Guards, the famous regiment which is so much better known by the name of the Carabiniers conferred upon it by Dutch William two and a half centuries ago. He rode to the parade ground from the Residency in the pleasant freshness of the early morning, greeted by the whole population of the city and cantonment close-packed on the line of route. Bangalore folks are crying out against the heat. Good heavens, "what do they know of India who only Mysore know?" These mornings have the bracing crispness of an English Spring. The noon day sun is not an atom oppressive and the nights are delightful. Heat! The grumbler deserves to be consigned for a season or two to Madras or Rangoon. He would then speak with knowledge.

It was not a big military display. The Carabiniers were drawn up dismounted, a line of blue and white on the khaki parade ground flecked with glistening blades. The enclosure was kept clear by men of the Essex Regiment. The Moplahs, the Sappers and Miners and the Punjabis and Gordon's Horse furnished the travelling escort, but this modest muster was in its way a microcosm of the Indian Army of whose variety we are all talking but which so few of us understand. The British Cavalry could desire no better representatives than the Carabiniers. Dating from the middle of the seventeenth century they fought in the great Malbrough's principal actions, Blenheim, Ramillies, Oudenarde, and bloody Malplaquet. Again at Sevastopol and at Delhi in the Mutiny, in the Second Afghan War, in South Africa at the relief of Kimberley and Paardeberg. Bangalore has the reputation of being a healthy station, and when you see the Carabiniers on parade you believe it. A hard rugged well-fed regiment conspicuously well mounted even amongst the splendidly horsed Cavalry in India.

Then the Essex Regiment, the old Forty Fourth. Those who were there still speak with a kindling eye of the battle of Driefontein on Lord Robert's march to Bloemfontein, when the Essex with three other regiments of infantry stormed the Boer position. Swept by fire from the sheltered Boer rifleman the line did not waver for a moment. This, the last real battle of the war, was one of the very few occasions when we got into and charged over the Boers, and if the resourceful French had pushed his cavalry a little harder the beaten enemy should have been cut off with who knows what effect upon the campaign. But South Africa was only the last stage in a record of war service which embraces the Peninsula and Waterloo, the First Burmese War, Alma and Inkerman, China and the River war. The regimental badges—the Castle and Key superscribed Gibraltar, and the Sphinx superscribed Egypt—tell their own tale.

The little Moplahs in dark green and scarlet, the only regiment in India to wear the tarbush, and lean almost to the point of weediness, are notable examples of the policy of taming pugnacious races by making soldiers of them which began with the enlistment of the Highlanders in the Black Watch, and was continued to the disciplining of the Kachins whom the Prince and Princess saw at Mandalay. Descendants of the old Arab sailors who called off the west coast, Arab is still stamped indelibly on lineament and physique. In the old days their fanaticism and turbulence were the terror of the countryside. They were sportsmen with it all, for their cry always was "Send the Sahib Log against us—not the Sepoy." And many a weary tramp had John Company's troops from Bombay and Poona to punish the Moplahs who always took their gruel in good part. In the general overhauling of the Indian Army the fighting value of the Moplahs has come into question and the 78th Regiment is now at Dera Ismail Khan being measured against the crack regiment of the north. They marched past the Prince at Rawal Pindi, and so far as the test has been applied it goes to show that with judicious weeding the regiments should stand.

The 2nd Queen's Own Sappers and Miners are the survivors of the tragedy of the Madras Army, the Army that laid the foundations of the British Power in the East. But whatever was said of the purely combatant regiments, nothing but praise was ever offered to the Madras Sappers and Miners who have a record of war service, not surpassed by any Corps in the world, and were never in better mottle than they are to-day. Gordon's Horse and the Punjabis belong to the entirely modern Indian Army. The 30th Lancers were raised by Sir John Gordon in 1826 as part of the Nizam's Cavalry, and for half a century were the 4th Lancers of the Hyderabad Contingent. On the delocalisation of the Corps it assumed its present title. Of the four Squadrons only one is recruited from Hindustan, Mussalmans, two being Sikhs and one Jats. The 69th Punjabis, formerly the 9th Madras Infantry, raised at Madura a century and a half ago, but now recruited entirely from the Land of the Five Rivers, typified more strongly than any older force the recent improvements in the native army.

Amidst this military atmosphere the time-honoured ceremony of the presentation of the colours was performed, and the new standard, blessed by the Bishop of Madras, was committed to the custody of the regiment by His Royal Highness. In so doing he said:—

“Colonel Leander, Officers, Non-Commissioned Officers and Men of the Carabiniers.—It is the first time that I have presented a standard to a Cavalry regiment, and I am especially glad to do so to a regiment which as a history so distinguished as yours. It has served ten Sovereigns. Founded in 1675 its services were rewarded only eighty years later by King William the Third, who granted it the title of Carabiniers, by which name the regiment has ever since been known. It gained renown upon the battlefields of the great Duke of Marlborough, while in the past century it earned fresh laurels in the campaigns of the Crimea, Indian Mutiny and South Africa. On such an occasion as this it is only right that a regiment should recall with pride the deeds done by it in the past. I entrust this consecrated standard to your care, and I know that you will look up to it with those same feelings of loyalty to your King and country as have ever characterised the Carabiniers.”

The Prince and Princess visited the station hospital on their way back to the Residency.

This afternoon all the leading residents of Bangalore, English and Indian, including the Dewan Sir Krishna Murti, accepted the hospitable invitation of the Resident and Mrs. Stuart Fraser to a garden party in the pretty grounds of the Residency. There a pleasant hour was spent, the Prince and Princess receiving all the prominent and interesting people, coming into close contact with all who are associated with the good government of Mysore State, or who are connected with the local affairs of Bangalore civil station, the little “imperium in imperio” embracing twelve square miles, which is under British jurisdiction. This brought the visit officially to a close, as Their Royal Highnesses leave for Hyderabad at ten o'clock to-morrow.

8TH FEBRUARY 1906.

Madras Mail.—Messrs. Wiele and Klein have sent us a very interesting series of photographs, large and small, taken during the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Madras. The first shows H. E. the Governor proceeding to meet Their Royal Highnesses, and the last is an excellent group taken at Government House of Their Royal Highnesses, Their Excellencies Lord and Lady Amphilil and their little boys, and the members of the two Staffs. In the 50 odd other pictures all the incidents of the eventful five days during which Their Royal Highnesses remained in Madras are illustrated. Some of the views of the Procession from the Harbour to Government House on the arrival of the Royal Party are particularly good. A very complete set was taken of the scene on the occasion of the laying of the foundation stone of the Victoria Memorial Technical Institute. The Garden Party at Government House enabled the photographers to obtain some very effective pictures. The whole album makes a delightful souvenir of a very memorable time in the annals of Madras.

We have also received two large views from Mr. J. Athashtum Pillay, of 39, Murugappa Moodelly Street, Parasapakum, Madras. One shows the Royal Fleet in the Harbour with the Renown conspicuous in the centre, and the other the Royal Procession along the First Line Beach.

Mysore Herald.—Hours before the arrival of the Royal special from Mysore, the streets of the City and Station were thronged with an eager and enthusiastic crowd. The arrangements by the Police did not, of course, permit of the general public witnessing the actual arrival of the Royal train at the City Station, but thousand of anxious people crowded the thoroughfares and assembled along the line of route many hours before the arrival of the train. Both sides of the railway line, from about three miles beyond the station, were lined with gay crowds, all bent on catching an early glimpse of the Shahzada and his consort. The vicinity of the Station beyond the Police and Military cordon was gay with an animated but orderly crowd, anxious to see the Royal procession as it left the station, and followed the route to the Residency. The crowd represented all classes of the community, rich and poor, old and young, men, women and children, numerous of them rustics from distant parts of the Mysore Province, many of whom had undertaken long journeys to see a sight that was to be witnessed only once in a lifetime. One little incident that our representative was witness to needs to be related to testify to the motive that obviously attracted many of the people from the villages to witness the Royal arrival. The scene was the vicinity of the Dharmabudi tank, and here an aged rustic from some distant village had somehow broken through the police and military cordon. He was being unceremoniously hustled back. He was a typical “rude fore-father of the hamlet” and plaintively he complained: “why do you push me? I am old and feeble and can do no harm. In my village I have heard of our Maharajah and his goodness to us, but I have never seen him. I have heard also of the greatness of the White King of England and know that it is to him we owe peace and prosperity. His son and daughter-in-law are coming, let me stay here and see them with these old eyes, so that I can go home and tell my grand-children that I saw the Emperor and that he is a powerful King.” But the policeman could not let sentiment interfere with duty, so the man had to go back to a less prominent place. The rush was great everywhere and every point of vantage was eagerly seized upon by the expectant crowd.

In the meantime the troops had taken up their position, the roads had been lined and the various officials who had to be present to receive Their Royal Highnesses at the Railway Station had taken up their positions on the platform, the guard-of-honour was in position and the 12th Battery, R. F. A., were in action in the bed of the Dharmabudi tank. The supplementary special had arrived from Mysore at 6-35 in the morning, and this train had brought in all the baggage, the Royal servants, and the travelling Press correspondents. The Hon'ble Mr. S. M. Fraser the British Resident, and Sir P. N. Krishnamurti, the Dewan of Mysore, arrived by a special reaching Bangalore at 5 o'clock. A staff or pilot special arrived at 7-30 A.M. shortly after the ordinary train from the capital, and this brought in the Royal staff. These trains were shunted out, and the line and platform cleared well in advance of the time fixed for the arrival of the Royal special, and everybody was in his place and ready to receive the Royal visitors long before the scheduled time.

The city Railway Station presented a scene of beauty in honour of the Royal visit. The decorations were very effective and on a lavish scale. The special pavilion erected to accommodate Their Royal Highnesses on alighting from the train and while the various ceremonies attendant on the Royal reception were in progress is a structure of much beauty. It is of Moorish design, and rich in the beautiful forms by which Saracenic or Arabian architecture is best known. The structure springs from a rectangular base and is supported by 10 imitation masonry pillars of graceful proportions. The central part of the pavilion is surmounted by a dome which springs from a square base and is gathered into the usual circular form in very graceful lines. The external surface of the dome is decorated with diaper work, while the interior of this part of the edifice is decorated with intricate scroll work in green, gold and silver, flat in appearance on the surface but really in various planes and intertwining, and from the scrolls comes a sort of leaf-work, certainly like nothing in nature, but graceful and varied in its elegant curves. The interior ornamentation of the dome is a mass of colour formed of green, silver and gold stars. Flanking the central dome are two covered entrances, the flat roofs of these being decorated in much the same manner as the dome. The façade of the structure is very beautiful, being exceedingly graceful in outline and lavishly ornamented in diaper and scroll work, and above the cornice of the external face of the building is the inscription "a loyal welcome to Bangalore."

The decorations to the station premises itself were very effective, and these have been carried out by Messrs. Wrenn, Bennett & Co., under the personal supervision of Mr. Burghall, with remarkable taste. The pavilion above described stands at the foot of the overbridge and just outside the covered portion of the platform on its left.

That portion of the platform nearest the point at which the Royal party alighted, about a third of the whole length of the platform, was most handsomely decorated. The wall of the station was entirely concealed by a mass of sago palms picked out with touches of colour in the way of small flags. The roof was draped lengthways with art muslins in delicate shades of red, yellow, pink and green. The pillars were draped alternately red, and red, white and blue, and a pretty arrangement of flags, banners and streamers depending from the roof or pillars made the general effect of the decorations very fine. The effect was enhanced by a judicious arrangement of palms and plants in pots of all descriptions. The whole length of the platform was carpeted with crimson baize, and the floor of the pavilion was provided with a magnificent pile carpet.

The overbridge which the Prince and Princess had to cross to get into the carriage was also most effectively decorated, and over this Mr. Burghall spent an exceptional amount of time and labour. The whole length of the passage was carpeted in chocolate and gold overlaid with crimson baize about a yard in width. The roof of the overbridge was draped longitudinally with art muslin in alternate colours of primrose and light blue. A line of streamers ran down the centre and both sides throughout the whole length of the covered way, and across the roof under the drapery were hung at intervals of about a yard garlands of artificial roses which enhanced the beauty of the decoration. The sides of the overbridge formed a continuous mass of foliage and eucharis lilies interspersed with handsome flags and banners several hundreds of these adding to the general colour effect. Overhead the roof was one mass of bunting.

From the foot of the overbridge the street decorations commenced, and the immediate vicinity of the station formed a mass of colour with Venetian masts, streamers and flags. At the entrance to the station premises facing the Dharmabudi tank was the first triumphal arch, which, with the Royal pavilion already described, had been put up by the City Municipal Corporation. This arch is a handsome structure of a design that belongs to no particular style of architecture. The main arch is flanked by two smaller entrances, the prominent colouring being red, picked out in gold and silver tracery. The arch is of the scalloped variety, with a fringe of red and gold, and on either side of the space above the arch are silver representations of the double eagle, the insignia of the Mysore Government. A pointed gable springs from the top of the arch, and on the face of this is embellished the British Royal Arms, a Union Jack floating over the whole structure. The inscription over the arches on either side are "God bless the Prince and Princess."

The Royal special, consisting of two engines, the Royal saloons and eight other vehicles, steamed into the station exactly at 8-30 A.M. and was drawn up with the Royal saloon immediately in front of the special pavilion.

9TH FEBRUARY 1906.

Daily Chronicle.—The Prince and Princess of Wales arrived here (Hyderabad) early this morning, after the long and trying journey from Bangalore, and were received by the Nizam, the ruler of the premier native State in India, and the representative of the virile Mohamedan population, from whom he wrested the sovereignty of India.

Hyderabad itself preserves many of the characteristics of a feudal kingdom of the Middle Ages. It is a kind of modern Alsatia, where the native barons and their retainers swagger fully armed through the streets. Nowhere in modern India is life so little secure, or the law so little respected; but of recent years the Nizam has joined the Indian Government in its attempt to bring about a more orderly state of things.

Hawk-eyed, alert, spare to the point of leanness, the Nizam waited at the station to meet the Royal party, costumed with the studied restraint which he always affects, and surrounded by his nobles and Ministers in their state uniforms of sober navy-blue and gold. There was little in his appearance to suggest the traditional splendour of a native State. But the drive from the station to the palace reeked of Oriental contrasts. The Rohillas in their half-Turkish uniforms first saluted the procession; then came the pure negroes of the African Cavalry, the heterogeneous household troops who are not even fit to make food for cannon, and the linesmen of the Hyderabad contingent, who are a step higher in the scale of military efficiency. In the escort along with these rode the native troopers of the Madras Lancers and the faultless horse-gunners of the Nizam's Imperial Service Cavalry, comparing not unfavourably with the regulars.

The interesting Oriental character of Hyderabad was accentuated by the crowds which thronged its wide avenues. Hyderabad is a city of magnificent distances, the drive from the station to the Palace being over five miles in length. In the streets upon the way the prevailing element consisted of Mahomedans, petty landowners armed with lathis, or stout staves shod with iron, and lean hard Deccan peasantry. The fanatical leanings of the Mahomedan temperament and the hardness of the peasant's lot infected the crowd with the dourness notable in Northern India, and we missed the joyousness which characterised our progress through the tropical and more luxuriant lands of Southern India, although a respectful interest in the Prince and Princess was manifested by the people.

The old Palace, where the Prince paid his State visit to the Nizam this afternoon, is unworthy of the premier native State of India. It is an immense, rambling building, said to contain 7,000 persons, but it is mean in point of architecture, and poorly furnished. To-morrow the Princess will lay the foundation stone of the Victoria Zenana Hospital, and there will be a State banquet on Saturday. Afterwards the Royal party proceed to a shooting camp for several days' sport and we arrive at Benares on the 18th.

Englishman.—The Prince and Princess of Wales arrived at Hyderabad this morning. They were received with all pomp and circumstance. The Nizam's troops in their picturesque garb lined the streets and the people crowded on the housetops. The Nizam and his principal officers of State met Their Royal Highnesses at the station, and an imposing cavalcade escorted them through the streets to the new palace. Later the Nizam paid a State visit to the Prince, which was immediately returned and this closed the programme of the day.

The sun rose this morning in a blaze of crimson splendour. The wave of dawning day painted the eastern sky a glorious blood red, lighting ruby fires in the purple bosom of the lake. Shortly the crimson paled into a subtle salmon stifling the fading steel blue horizon with subtle pink, and almost before the retina had caught its beauties it fused into lemon and sapphire and then the harsh azure of the Indian day. The cold night air mellowed into a pellucid softness and then sprang up the zephyr which comes with the light. So were the Prince and Princess welcomed to Hyderabad.

At the station and in the city they were met with a greeting scarcely less splendid. His Highness the Nizam, spare, erect hawk-eyed, stood in front of his principal officers of State. He was attired with the dignified simplicity he always affects, a tunic of navy blue with sword and belt, and a conical turban of Hyderabad yellow. His ministers and officers were in the handsome state livery of blue and gold and yellow, and formed a varied and striking group. In this there was little of the picturesque irregularity and colour that are commonly associated with native rule in India. That was reserved for the intensely Oriental streets of the city where were vividly reproduced those characteristics that make Hyderabad one of the most fascinating centres in the Dependency.

Indeed on the drive from the station to the new palace the Prince and Princess passed through a series of pictures from the troublous history of Hyderabad. Baggy breeched and blue gaitered infantry, armed with old fashioned guns and equipped with brass ammunition boxes and curiously drooping turbans, saluted them as they left the station. These were Jumath Nizam Mehboob Rohillas to a man, who were gathered into a corps and disciplined by the late Sir Salar Jung as a means of keeping them under control. But they look strangely out of place in India. Their proper position is with the Turkish army in Yemen. Coal black African negroes with thick lips and curly hair, with red fez and uniforms of sky blue, represented the African cavalry which is such a distinctive feature of the Nizam's army. Then you could trace the improvement of the State troops step by step. On the lowest tier stood the household regiments tricked out in new uniforms but with obsolete guns and curved bayonets, which make them not even food for cannon. On the second the Hyderabad line regiments, incomparably better equipped, organised and armed with bored out Martinis. Then in the escort rode the Imperial Service Cavalry well armed and well turned out and comparing not unfavourably with the Madras regiments. We all know what a powerful part "izzat" plays in the East, but this notwithstanding, it is amazing that any keen native Prince can compare his Imperial Service Troops with his nondescript forces, without like the Maharaja Scindia laying plans for the maintenance of none but the former.

The cosmopolitan character of Hyderabad is just as deeply stamped on its people. It is the Mahomedan State par excellence not only in its dynasty and its administration, but in the inhabitants of its capital. You see more turbushes and strongly marked Mahomedan faces in Hyderabad in a day than in any other city in India in a week. You see also a type that has disappeared from British India, and which Their Royal Highnesses have not encountered since they left Rajputana, the squireen of perhaps a score of acres, poor as a Scotch crofter, yet with his belt as full of lethal weapons as a Montenegrin chieftain or a stage bandit, and a certain rustic dignity that he sucks from the soil. Nor are you ever permitted to forget that this is a Deccan State too, a State with a large proportion of those hardy lean ryots who win perhaps the most difficult and precarious subsistence of any peasantry in the world. The Mahomedan temperament and the Hindus' struggle with a churlish nature has tinged the Hyderabadis with some of the dourness of Northern India. There was eager interest and respectful salutation, but not the bubbling joyousness and lightness of heart that marked every stage of the Royal progress in Southern India.

For a comparatively modern Indian city Hyderabad maintains a remarkably Oriental atmosphere, and it was of the East Eastern this morning. Behind the line of miscellaneous soldiery sentinels who occasionally refreshed themselves by squatting on their heels or pulling at a biddee, there was the ceaseless hum and movement of the throng. From the upper stories of the houses, whose blistering whiteness was spotted with red and green and azure shutters, the women looked down on the scene half concealed behind their veils, yet with true feminine curiosity the purdah was never allowed to obstruct their view of the spectacle. The gold-tipped minarets of the Mosque carried the necessary

Up and down the cleared and watered roads and policemen, with no consideration for their horses' legs, confining the sowars to a decorous trot and jutkas with loads of belated baggage. His Highness the Nizam himself set an example of almost American hustle for his State carriage, of the most repressing lemon yellow, dashed past at a respectable gallop, his bodyguard with their canary uniforms and saddle cloths of leopard skins straining after its fast moving wheels. It was not long before the whole impressive cavalcade came trotting back, the African Horse, the Madras Lancers in electric blue, the Imperial Service Lancers in blue and silver, the faultless Horse Artillery, and the gallant 13th Hussars. In the midst of this pompous array came Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales with the Nizam, the Princess with the Resident, the Hon. Mr. Bayley, the cynosure of all eyes and the objects of the most respectful salutations.

Scarcely had the boom of the guns, which announced the arrival of Their Royal Highness at the Falaknama Palace, died away, than they spoke again for the departure of the Nizam on his State visit to the Prince. And yet again soon in the afternoon when His Royal Highness returned the visit at the Chau Mahalla palace. But the setting was not worthy of the scene the reception of the Heir to all the Britains by the first feudatory in Hindustan. The reception hall was frankly tawdry and vulgar. A poor apartment with jingling glass chandeliers and cheap decorations, opening on to a commonplace courtyard. Not all the dignity of official ceremony, the bold figures of the Nizam's officials and Sirdars and the interest attaching to a ceremony which has been performed only once before, the presentation to the Prince of the heir to the gadi, could remove the impression caused by this unsuitable venue.

Before leaving the experiences of the first day in Hyderabad a libation must be poured out to those who brought us here. Those whose good fortune it has been to accompany the Royal progress thus far have travelled on all the great Indian railways. They have journeyed in modest comfort on the Bombay, Baroda and the Rajputana Malwa-lines and a short season in acute discomfort on the four-wheeled boxes of the North-Western. They have sampled the convenience and spaciousness of the new East Indian rolling stock and experienced the efficiency of the Oudh and Rohilkhand, and the consideration and hospitality of the officers of the Burma Railway Company. The Madras Railway have shown how smoothly an Indian railway runs and the Southern Mahratta how slowly. The pilot train from Bangalore took nearly six hours to perform a journey which Mr. Arthur Hoare on his sixty horse-power Coventry Daimler motor car accomplished in two hours and forty-eight minutes! But the journey from Guntakal to Hyderabad provided an entirely novel experience in a train as satisfying to the eye as its arrangement was to the demand for comfort. Here was a train with two berth compartments as well as four, with electric light and fans, a commodious bathroom, a corridor that gave access to the dining car, the servants' and the luggage van.

at all hours, and with a telephone which summoned the bearer of the refreshment car whenever desired, a lofty dining car, wherein Messrs. Brandon and Co. served a dinner that would make some State banquets fret with envy. You blinked your eyes for a moment and wondered if you had strayed by chance into an improved Grand Oriental Express. Nothing of the sort: it was a train furnished by the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company.

Indian Daily News.—The Prince and Princess were brilliantly received by the Nizam on arrival at Hyderabad this morning. The gathering at the station included a number of the State nobles with a guard-of-honour of the British Infantry. After the ceremonial formalities, Their Royal Highnesses, accompanied by the Nizam and the Resident, drove through the city to the Falaknama Palace, a distance of five and a half miles. The Royal escort included the Madras Cavalry in French grey, the Nizam's Body Guard in bright yellow, the Nizam's African Cavalry in grey and white, and the 13th Hussars, the cavalcade being extremely brilliant. Their Royal Highnesses drove in the Nizam's State equipage of vivid yellow. The long route was lined by the Nizam's troops and police, the most picturesque unit being the Mysrum Regiment of Infantry which is composed of Arabs who wear an Arab head-dress of brilliant yellow and scarlet. Great numbers of people were gathered along the extensive route. The Falaknama Palace is a great white building on a rocky hill, and commands a magnificent panorama of the Deccan country for many miles. The view takes in the ruins of Golconda, the ancient capital of the State. Their Royal Highnesses have had no more extensive expanse of country before them from any of the residences they have occupied during the tour. At half-past eleven the Nizam paid a State visit to the Prince, and His Royal Highness returned the visit at 12-30.

Hyderabad is a city of wide distances, and nearly a quarter of it is occupied by the palace or palaces of His Highness the Nizam. The State visit which the Prince paid to His Highness to-day in exchange of the Nizam's visit to Falaknama Palace took place at the city, or Chan Mahalla Palace, where the Prince was received with impressive ceremonial. The Durbar Hall looked into a court-yard of gardens and fountains surrounded by brightly painted buildings. The audience hall had been freshly renovated in cream and gold and was hung with great chandeliers, and moved by the wind the lustres chimed musically; the chairs were upholstered in the Nizam's colour of mustard yellow. The Nizam's Imperial Service Troops formed a guard-of-honour in the court facing the hall of audience, and in the portico stood men of the Nizam's Nubian Guards in white and wearing the turbush and picturesquely armed with carbines, swords and daggers and carrying bandoliers. The Nizam wore a dark blue uniform with gold lace facings, and all the state nobles and officials were armed in similar fashion, the display in costume not going beyond gold lace. The Princess was present at the exchange visit, her arrival preceding that of the Prince, and Her Royal Highness being received by the Nizam in state. The Prince on arrival was received with the usual ceremonial honours and salutes. The state nobles and officials were presented by the Resident, the Hon. Mr. C. S. Bayley, and each tendered nuzzar. The Nizam afterwards presented attar and pan to the Prince and to the Resident and Sir Walter Lawrence, similar compliment being paid to the members of the Royal Staff by officials of the court. Their Royal Highnesses departed directly afterwards in state. The surroundings of this state visit were simpler than those of others which have taken place during the Royal tour, but the importance and significance of the exchange of courtesies seemed to be thereby emphasized.

The programme during the stay of Their Royal Highnesses in the Nizam's territories is not a taxing one. After a parade of troops to-morrow morning, the Prince at noon receives a private visit from His Highness. The Princess in the afternoon lays the foundation-stone of the Victoria Zenana Hospital, and a dinner and reception take place at the Residency. The programme on Saturday is confined to a visit to the Victoria Memorial Orphanage and a State Banquet at Chan Mahalla Palace, Their Royal Highnesses leaving the same night for a shooting expedition at Narsimpatt, where four days will be spent.

Standard.—He was a middle-class, middle-aged American, probably from Chicago, and quite possibly when at home in Pork. He was doing India rapidly, in a shiny black coat, and with no outward traces of sentiment. To all appearance the price of commodities interested him more than the customs of the East, and as a subject of conversation at the club he preferred the tariff to Indian art. No man could have been less readily suspected of yielding to the emotions. Yet when they took him to the Taj for the first time, on a night of moon and stars, he gazed in a blank silence for a space as he came through the entrance portal. Then he lifted up his voice and wept, disturbing the solemn stillness with audible sobs and ejaculations. So at least the story was told to me by a respectable resident in Agra, who was himself present and witnessed the phenomenon. I had no reason to suppose that he imagined this remarkable incident, and, for my own part, I believed his tale. But then I too had seen the Taj Mahal by moonlight.

There are some few things of this earth which cannot be vulgarized, and the Taj is one of them. Familiarity does not touch the edge of its charm, or sully its virginal freshness. One has seen it travestied a thousand times in feeble photograph, and libellous post-card, and clumsy "process" print, and utterly inadequate water-colour or oils. They cut it out of cardboard, or make a miserable forlorn toy of it, in alabaster, under a deplorable glass shade, so that it seems fit only for the lodging-house mantelpiece. It has been described to death, and the late Sir Edwin Arnold assailed it with blank verse. Tourists travel half round the globe to look at it, and go home to gush. If any object could awaken disillusion and resentment by being known too well, that object should be the Agra shrine. But it comes victoriously through all. There is no spoiling it, any more than by the same familiarity it is possible to spoil the Moonlight Sonata, or "Romeo and Juliet," or the Sistine Madonna.

A healthy critical intellect, when all men combine to praise, is inclined to question. Some people fortify themselves for a visit to the Taj by suspecting that much of the admiration lavished on it is mere conventional exaggeration, based on no definite conviction, and there is a moment when the rationalist may think he did well to be sceptical. The first view of the Taj, it is commonly said, is "disappointing." That is because of the conditions under which it is usually taken. The alert visitor, anxious to lose no time, makes for the tomb as soon as possible after his arrival in Agra. In the morning or early afternoon he drives out from his hotel in a hired carriage, which sets him down inside the outer courtyard, by the steps of the great entrance door. He has not noticed the beauty of the approaches, nor can he spare an eye for the quiet precincts, or the stone bells on their delicate stalks at the corners of the garden wall, or the mosques and chattris grouped about the central chapel; scarcely does he observe the noble gateway as he passes through it with a hasty, unilluminative glance. Then he stops, with probably a gasp of amazement. Is this the Wonder of the World, this smallish square building, with its four dumpy cupolas huddling under the dome, and its four cylindrical light house towers looking in the remorseless clearness of the atmosphere disproportionately distant from each other and the main edifice? The spectator, educated on soaring Gothic spires and massive towers and huge walls, opulent with flying buttress and springing arch, and intricate ornamentation, is apt to be taken aback by the restrained simplicity of the white fabric that perches on its platform in front of him. He is visited by the blasphemous thought that it is somewhat petty, that it is even (Heaven forgive him!) a little hard and cold. The flaring sunlight is flung full upon its gleaming surface, so that the shadows vanish, and the recesses are flattened, and the angles come out with unfaltering crudity. If he were to see it but once, and see it like that, he would go away vexed with the Taj Mahal, and smile derisively for ever after when he heard its praises sung.

Repentance comes speedily after that first full-faced, unsatisfying glance. It is born when you have crossed the terrace, and passed out of the noonday glare into the silent richness and sweet subdued glow of the interior. Here the golden sunlight strays wandering in, filtered through thread-like trellises of marble, till the whole chamber is full of a soft and luminous ether, free alike from the levity of day and the gloom of night. In this clear twilight dusk, all the lovely details of the decoration are "more expressed than hid," and it needs no peering into dark corners to reveal the flowers that grow in low relief on the mural tablets of the ante-chapels, and those that blossom in inlay of poppy red and turquoise blue and emerald green on the walls of the octagon shrine itself. Under the vault of the great dome (you see how large it is as you look upwards into its billowing depths) lies the tomb of Mumtaz Mahal, the fair and gentle lady for whom Shah Jehan, the Emperor, created this peerless monument, in the plenitude of his power and passion. When he died, old and broken, and a dethroned prisoner, they laid him beside her, with the same screen of laced and embroidered stone thrown round both to shelter their slumbers, and the same unfading flowers blooming by their graves.

But beautiful as is the interior of the Taj, its fullest charm is caught from the outside. You realise this when you abandon the front view, and wander about the gardens, finding exquisite glimpses of snowy structures, so light and graceful that they seem to rest on air, of buoyant cupola and climbing campanile. The Taj owes much to its surroundings. Perhaps it would not be beautiful in the Waterloo Bridge Road, or even in the Champs Elysées. But where it stands, amidst its trees and flower-beds and waters, rising serene from among the lesser tombs and temples clusterings at its knees, you cannot wish it otherwise. Go a little distance away, and you wonder that you ever deemed it trivial. You see that it is, in fact, spacious and lofty (the dome rises higher than the spire of many Cathedrals), and that it has grandeur as well as beauty. Fortunately you can now get sight of the masterpiece without approaching too close. The gardens have been restored to something more nearly resembling their original condition, and the results of many decades of neglect and carelessness have been cleared from the precincts. It is one item in that work of renewal and conservation which India owes to some of its recent administrators, and more particularly to the late Viceroy. Not the least of Lord Curzon's achievements is that he caused the masterpieces of Hindu and Mahomedan architecture to be treated with reverent and judicious attention. He has compelled the masters of India to appreciate the artistic heritage which has descended to them from the rulers they supplanted. If we cannot reproduce, we may at least preserve, the splendid works of the older conquerors, long regarded with barbarian indifference. It was a predecessor of Lord Curzon's on the viceregal throne who began to sell the materials of the palaces at Agra, and would have sold the Taj itself if he could have got a good price for the marble. And even so late as thirty years ago, when King Edward VII visited India, they could find nothing better to do with the Taj than to illuminate its dome with limelight. Let us be thankful that they forebore to embellish it with advertising placards.

In these days of slightly better perception, the Prince and Princess of Wales were spared the illuminations. They went to view the Taj by moonlight, which everybody should do who finds that the daytime aspect still leaves him with lingering doubts. For at night its seduction is irresistible. Criticism is mute, as you sit on the steps by the entrance gate, while the moon drifts above the trees, and the ring of silver light is stealing round the base of the dome and creeping gently upwards to the pinnacle. Here are none of the harsh contrasts familiar in such circumstances elsewhere. To talk of ebony and alabaster is to evoke ideas too rough for this intimate revelation of beauties withheld from the indiscreet and prying day. The shadows on the Taj are not black, but something between amber and violet; and the marble itself has lost its frozen pallor in the moonlight, and hints at the warmth and soft texture of life. You note the tender half-tones growing upon the smooth and rounded surfaces, as a young lover, sitting with his mistress by a moonlit window, might watch the faint shadows hovering over the creamy whiteness of ivory throat and satin shoulder.

It is this sensuous suggestiveness of the Taj which some critics disparage. They say it is feminine, it lacks strength and stern dignity. But of course it is feminine. One might as well make that a reproach against the Venus of the Capitol and the Virgins of Murillo. If Shah Jehan had been a Greek or an Italian the Lady of the Tomb would have stood in changeless marble, or smiled from breathing canvas. But Moslem art was forbidden to imitate the human figure. It could only symbolise; and the Taj is a symbol, like all the finest creations of the later Mahomedan architecture. The Kutab Minar symbolises warlike energy and passion, the Tomb of Akbar majesty and varied wisdom; the Hall of Audience at Delhi, the Diwan-i-Khas, with its famous inscription:

If the earth holds a heaven of bliss,

It is this, it is this, it is this!

symbolises the sumptuousness of ease and wealth and arbitrary power.

So also, the Taj Mahal is not merely a monument but a symbol, and even to some extent a representation. The meaning which its subtle and allusive art conveys is significantly revealed when you see it neither in full day nor by night, but at the moment after sunset, when most of the light has faded from the sky, and only a few flying streamers of rose and opal are left under a canopy of azure, paling swiftly into greyness. The dim shape, with its flowing curves all shrouded in white, might be the figure of some veiled Eastern Princess, walking with bowed head and rhythmical footstep in her gardens by the shining river. And the four watching minarets are the grave and kindly sentinels, keeping guard over the beauty and tenderness—the modesty and shrinking charm, that find shelter behind the purdah screen of Indian womanhood.

When you have time to spare from the Taj, you go to see the other Moghul monuments of Agra. The best of them were built by Shah Jehan, the founder of the Taj, in whose time the architecture and decorative art of the Indian Mahomedans flowered into its fullest luxuriance before it ran to seed. Shah Jehan's days were turbulent and chequered. He rebelled against his father Jehangir, and when he came to the throne he disposed of all disputes about the succession by murdering his brothers. He was self-indulgent and tyrannical, and in the end his son Aurangzeb headed a conspiracy against him, and deprived him of his crown. He married Mumtaz Mahal when he was twenty-one and she was nineteen. He had one wife already at the time: but his second marriage was a true love match, and Mumtaz Mahal, which, being interpreted, means "The Crown of the Palace," was famous for charity and mercifulness, as well as for her beauty and her wit. Eighteen years after the marriage she died, having borne her husband no fewer than fourteen children. The Emperor was inconsolable, or, rather, he consoled himself by sending for the most skilful architects and craftsmen he could find, and with their help and a lavish outpouring of treasure he built the tomb by the Jumna. He was a great artist as well as a great lover. The Palace Fort at Agra is full of gorgeous buildings, and the finest are those of Shah Jehan. He built the Pearl Mosque, a dream of delicacy and grace, by some thought lovelier than the Taj itself, and the Khas Mahal and Diwan-i-Khas at Agra, and that Hall of Audience at Delhi already referred to, all of which are miracles of proportion and design and ornamentation. When Aurangzeb had driven him from his throne, and taken his kingdom from him, Shah Jehan was kept in confinement in the exquisite pavilion called the Jasmine Tower, which stands in the Fort at Agra, hard by some of his own masterpieces, and in full view of the Taj. Seven years he lived there, the old, broken king, faithfully attended by his good and gentle daughter Jehanara, who voluntarily shared his captivity. He was seventy-five when the end came, and his last day he spent in gazing down the river to the tomb where Mumtaz Mahal lay. When sunset fell and darkness hid the domes and turrets from his sight, he died, bidding Jehanara be of good cheer and calling on the name of Allah, the Merciful. His sins be forgiven him. He shed blood and he broke troth. But he made the world more beautiful, and he loved much.

Times of India.—The visit which commenced yesterday of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and the Princess of Wales to the Nizam's Dominions has a deep historic interest and significance unsurpassed by any other part of the Royal tour. Almost exactly twenty-two years ago, the Marquis of Ripon invested His Highness the Nizam with full powers of sovereignty on behalf of the British Government, and, in the memorable speech which he made on that occasion, the Viceroy referred to his presence at Hyderabad—the first time that a Governor-General visited that city—as “a mark, not only of the close and intimate ties which unite the ruler of this great state to the Government of the Queen-Empress, but also of Her Majesty's deep interest in the welfare of the Nizam.” These words apply even more emphatically to the visit of Their Royal Highnesses to Hyderabad. When His Majesty the King-Emperor came to India thirty years ago, the great Sir Salar Jung represented the Nizam among the native Chiefs who received him on his arrival, the Nizam, then a minor, being too ill to bear the fatigue of the journey to Bombay. Since then the State has had the honour of welcoming members of the Royal family in the persons of the late Prince Albert Victor and the Duke and the Duchess of Connaught. But this is the first occasion that His Highness the Nizam and his subjects have the privilege of welcoming the Heir-Apparent to the Throne of England in their own territories. It is a fitting culmination to the cordial and unwavering friendship which has existed for over a century between the British Government and that of the Nizam and his ancestors. Originally Viceroy of the Moghul Emperor in the Deccan, an ancestor of the Nizam, set himself up as an independent ruler during the period of weakness and misrule which followed on the death of Aurangzeb. Up to the beginning of the last century, the authority of the Nizam was not seriously contested; but about that time the reconquest of India by the Hindus was in full swing, and the waves of that movement were lapping ominously on the outworks of the Nizam's kingdom. Several districts had either been parted with or had promised to render tribute to the Marhattas; and Hyderabad as a Mahomedan State was only saved from extinction by “England's greatest son” that far away

Against the myriads of Assaye
Clash'd with his fiery few and won.

The service then rendered was nobly repaid fifty years later, when, in the dark and dreadful days of the Mutiny, Hyderabad under the father of the present ruler, and his illustrious Minister

Sir Salar Jung, stood unflinching by the side of the British Power and saved the Deccan and Southern India from being drawn into the vortex of disloyalty. The Governor of Bombay telegraphed to the Resident, “If the Nizam goes, all is lost.” But the Nizam did not go; and by his side was his faithful and devoted Minister. “The unhesitating energy and promptitude with which the Nizam's Minister assisted the British Government,” said the Resident after the troubles were over, was beyond all praise. No Minister of the Deccan ever before showed himself so strenuously and truly the friend of the English and the British Government. From his open and avowed determination to assist us at all hazards, he became most unpopular and almost outlawed by the Mahomedans but no invectives, threats, or entreaties ever made him swerve from the truly faithful line of conduct he from the first adopted.” For thirty years, the State and its rulers had the inestimable advantage of the profound statesmanship of Sir Salar Jung, justly termed the great. During that time, he laboured hard to produce order out of chaos, system out of the negation of all system, and a reign of law out of rank lawlessness. In the words of a Mahomedan writer, when Sir Salar Jung came to power “the country was in a deplorable state of misgovernment. The rights of the people were ignored, the interests of the State were not understood; so that the subjects and the State suffered equally.” Sir Salar Jung's reforms extended to every department of the administration. He abolished the pernicious system of farming out the revenue, and organized an efficient revenue department to collect taxes; he resumed Jaghirs which had been allowed to remain in the occupation of unauthorised tenants, and redeemed talukas which had been mortgaged to the creditors of the State; he laid the foundations of a far-reaching scheme of judicial reforms; he improved the Police and brought about the disbandment of irregular bodies of armed retainers maintained by the nobles; he interested himself in the industrial development of the State, promoted irrigation, and initiated the policy of railway construction; under him the question of educating the subjects of His Highness on modern lines received a great impetus. This patriotic and high-minded statesman was, unfortunately for the State, cut off in the very height of his powers, and at a time when his guidance and counsel were most needed. And Hyderabad has had but too much reason to recall the words in which the Marquis of Ripon bewailed the hard fate which had deprived the Nizam of the great Minister “at the very moment when in some respects you most stand in need of such assistance as he could have given to you.”

More than eighty per cent. of the population is Hindu, but there can be no question about the loyalty and devotion with which the people of Hyderabad of all sects and creeds look upon their ruler. The Nizam enjoys the unstinted confidence of his subjects, and in the human panorama which is to be seen in the streets of the Capital and the principal cities there is only one feeling as regards the Chief of the State, and that is the feeling of infinite affection. In the Arabs, Sidis, Rohillas, Pathans, Marhattas, Turks, Sikhs, Persians, Punjabis, Parsis, Madrasis, Bengalis, and Europeans of nearly every nationality, that make up the motley throng of Hyderabad streets, the princely qualities of His Highness excite the deepest reverence and admiration. Yet it would be too much to say that the need is wholly past for the wise advice which successive Viceroys have tendered to the Nizam, and of effective improvements in the administration, especially in respect of finance. In the address, to which reference has already been made, in which Lord Ripon exhorted His Highness, then beginning his career as administrator, to the paths of good government, he accorded the first place to financial reforms. “Look to your finances,” said His Lordship. “Disordered finances are the ruin of States. It is so everywhere: it is very especially so in India. Carelessness and extravagance in financial matters mean—first, heavy taxation; then, gradual impoverishment and ruin of the people; subsequently, loans with increased interest, and, finally, bankruptcy. Reasonable economy and just and mindful taxation mean an ever-increasing prosperity and expanding wealth. A good revenue system is the foundation of good government in India, and without it the prince is embarrassed and the people miserable." Nearly ten years after these impressive words were uttered, the services of Mr. C. E. Crawley of the Indian Finance Department were lent to His Highness's Government in the capacity of Comptroller-General. He modelled the accounts system observed by the Hyderabad Government on British Indian lines. Without greater powers than he had, however, not much improvement could be effected, and such powers have been given to Mr. Casson Walker, who is now financial adviser to His Highness. Under the control and guidance of Mr. Walker various reforms, having for their object an effective control over expenditure, have been adopted, and recently one of the ablest native officers in the Indian Finance Department, Mr. Hydari, was appointed Accountant-General in the Nizam's Dominions. The outlook is extremely favourable for a steady improvement in the administration. The failure of the rains has tended to retard progress somewhat, the consequent scarcity being expected to involve a loss of 25 lakhs, 15 in revenue and 10 in relief expenditure. A steady effort is, nevertheless, being made to keep up the rate of progress. Mansabs and other monthly allowances are being rigidly scrutinised, and the rule of 25 per cent. deduction with each succession is being strictly enforced. The currency is being placed on a stable basis, the Halli Siccas being now practically 115: 100 British currency. Large sums are being spent to bring up the Mint to the standard of British Indian mints. The public buildings of the State are receiving attention. The provision of better roads and railway extension are among the subjects which are engaging the consideration of His Highness's administration. The knowledge that strenuous attempts are being made under the direct supervision of the Nizam to lighten the burden and to improve the administration of revenue will, we are sure, greatly add to the enjoyment by Their Royal Highnesses of the princely hospitality of His Highness and of the picturesque grandeur of his Court and Capital.

10TH FEBRUARY 1906.

Birmingham Daily Post.—By a curious coincidence, the shadow of death has fallen upon the work which, in the interest of the Empire, both the King and the Prince of Wales were to have engaged in to-day. The demise of the King of Denmark has not been allowed to interfere with the launch of H. M. S. Dreadnought, but it has naturally modified the ceremony. His Majesty arrived at Portsmouth yesterday evening, but, in view of the Royal bereavement, there was no ceremonial reception. At the launch of the battleship to-day no salutes will be fired, and there will be no playing of bands. When the religious service and christening ceremony have been performed, the King will launch the ship, and as she begins to move the band will play "God save the King"—the only occasion, it is said, when the band will be heard during the King's visit. The new battleship is thus about to begin her career with a solemnity and impressiveness not out of harmony with the occasion. While we, as an Imperial race, have reason to rejoice over every addition to the fighting strength and the efficiency of the British Navy, it is well also to be reminded now and again, as we are to-day, of the peculiarly solemn and grim idea inherently associated with the launching of a battleship. War is one of the most serious and searaching of ordeals, and happy is the nation that is permitted immunity from it for any lengthened period. Experience has taught the world that the safest and best way of avoiding war is to be prepared for it, and although the financial burden of that preparation may be exceedingly heavy—and it is owing to the policy of increasing armaments pursued by foreign countries—we must bear it cheerfully. It is in the nature of an insurance. The Navy, as everyone knows, is our first line of defence, and it is only a prudent policy which aims at preserving the predominant standard, enjoyed by our ships of war, in comparison with other countries. Hence we may echo the words of Longfellow: "Build up straight, O worthy master! Staunch and strong a goodly vessel. That shall laugh at all disaster, And with wave and whirlwind wrestle!" It is satisfactory to feel that the spirit underlying these lines has inspired the making of the Dreadnought. The "wooden walls of old England," with bellying sails, so highly prized in song and story, have gone for ever. Their places have been taken by floating fortresses of steel and iron, worked by steam and electricity. But there is no occasion to bemoan the fact. There is one beauty of the sun and another beauty of the moon, and both are perfect in their way. Of the special and peculiar merits of the Dreadnought we need say nothing here; they are noted elsewhere; but, in passing, we may be permitted to recall a quaint comparison once made by Mr. Rudyard Kipling when writing of a battleship. After pointing out that the days were over when men "piled baronial keeps, flat irons, candlesticks, and Dore towers on floating platforms," he observed: "The new Navy offers to the sea precisely as much to take hold of as the trim, level-headed women with generations of inherited experience offers to society." That is to say, the new ships are good sea-loads, and capable of working their guns in all weathers—an excellent quality.

Turning to the Prince of Wales's work in distant India, we note that His Royal Highness yesterday reviewed native and British troops at Hyderabad, presenting colours to the 2nd Queen's Own Rajput Light Infantry, a regiment with a distinguished record, and the Colonel-in-Chief of which is His Majesty the King-Emperor. Later the Prince laid the foundation-stone of the Victoria Zenana Hospital, as reported elsewhere. The General Election turmoil and the political situation arising therefrom have deflected public attention for a time from the progress of the Royal tour; but it is pleasing to find that the tour continues its successful course, with a praiseworthy adherence to the time-table, which must be rather bewildering to the poor Indians, to whom time is seldom of any consequence, and who believe that it is right and proper to draw up a time-table as a guide, but that there is no necessity to follow it faithfully when pleasure or interest suggests otherwise. The Prince and Princess are not even a day behind, according to the table of dates planned long prior to their tour. When last we reviewed their progress, they had passed from Bombay to the Rajput States, and thence on to Delhi, Agra, Gwalior, and Lucknow. Since then they have visited Calcutta, "the city of palaces" and the capital of our Indian Empire. From there they paid what may be called a flying visit to the hill station of Darjeeling, enjoyed glimpses of the Himalaya Mountains, and had the satisfaction of seeing the base of the famous expedition that under MacDonald and Younghusband penetrated into Tibet as far as the Forbidden City. Returning to Calcutta, Their Royal Highnesses left India for Burma, arriving at Rangoon about the middle of last month. Mandalay, the old capital, was visited, and then coming back to Rangoon, the return voyage to India was undertaken, Madras being the port of arrival.

After four days spent in that far-off city, the tour was resumed, and from Mysore and Bangalore the Royal tourists have now reached the city of the Nizam. Hyderabad is distant 389 miles north-west from Madras, 449 miles south-east from Bombay, and 962 south-west from Calcutta. The State is by far the largest of the feudatory kingdoms of India. It is 93,000 square miles, or three times as large as Bavaria, and more than twice as thickly populated. There is, perhaps, no city in India with a population so varied and warlike. There one may see any day the Arab, the Sidi, the Rohilla, the Pathan, the Mahra-tha, the Turk, the Sikh, Persians, Bokhariots, Parsis, Madrasis, and others; while every man goes about armed to the teeth. The scenery around the city of Hyderabad, which is the capital of the State of the same name, is wild and picturesque, but the street architecture is not very imposing, and there are few buildings with any great architectural pretensions. The Nizam, who is the ruler of this State, maintains a military force of 30,000 men, and is entitled to a salute of 28 guns. He was born in 1866, and is regarded as a progressive ruler, and one most loyal to the suzerain Power. In 1885, for instance, he offered to send to aid the Government in Egypt, and repeated the same generous offer later, when Russia threatened aggressive action on the Afghan Frontier. The Nizam, in fact, is fully appreciative of our Imperial responsibilities, and in the first Jubilee year of Queen Victoria—1887—he offered spontaneously to contribute from the Hyderabad State to the Imperial Government twenty lakhs of rupees annually for three years for the exclusive purpose of Indian frontier defence. We notice with regret that yesterday the Nizam was unable to be present at the foundation-stone laying ceremony, owing to the death which occurred at nine o'clock yesterday morning of one of his daughters. This sad event has, of course, led to the abandonment of the State banquet arranged for to-night in honour of the Prince and Princess, and in commemoration of the historic friendship existing between Hyderabad and the Indian Government.

Daily Telegraph.—The Prince and Princess of Wales's visit to Hyderabad has been dimmed by the death of the Nizam's daughter, which occurred this morning, whilst the Nizam was attending a review at Secunderabad. The deceased, who was described as an unusually accomplished lady, was twenty-three years of age, and had long suffered from phthisis. The Nizam was devoted to her, and all the State ceremonies have been abandoned.

At eight o'clock this morning the Prince of Wales held a highly successful and interesting review of about 8,000 British and native troops of various arms. The Princess and the Nizam were present.

After the review the Prince presented colours to the 2nd Queen's Own Rajput Light Infantry, and remarked that in doing so he became associated with a regiment whose career since its formation more than a century ago had been one continuous record of loyalty and gallantry in the field of battle, a regiment which was honoured in having the King-Emperor as its Colonel-in-Chief, and which received the title of "Queen's Own"; in commemoration of King Edward's visit to India as Prince of Wales in 1875, when His Majesty was made Honorary Colonel. He became associated, he repeated, with a regiment which for distinguished service at the storming of Aligarh, was permitted to bear a third colour, and for steadfast and memorable loyalty to the Crown during the trying days of 1857 was made a light infantry regiment, and which bore on its colours the names of no fewer than fourteen campaigns or battles.

Englishman.—The Prince this morning reviewed practically the whole garrison of Secunderabad on the big parade ground of the Cantonment. There were some eight thousand men on parade, and the ceremony occupied a couple of hours. First the troops were inspected, massed in brigades, and then they marched past. This was followed by a gallop of the Horse Gunners and the Cavalry, and the advance in review order. The movements were accurately carried out and the spectacle was impressive. Then the officers of the 26th Cavalry were presented and the Prince gave new colours to the 2nd Rajputs.

This afternoon the Princess lays the foundation stone of the Victoria Zenana Hospital.

It is only six miles from Hyderabad to Secunderabad, but the two centres are wide as the poles asunder. Hyderabad is of the East—a city of painted balconies and fretted fronts of glistening minerals and palaces with suggestions of eastern mystery in their by-ways. Secunderabad is a typical cantonment and is not ashamed of its concealed frankness. The life of the station is on the parade ground and in the streets, and there is no pretence of mystery more romantic than the ways of Government. From Hyderabad went the Prince and Princess of Wales this morning to a parade of all the troops in the station. They passed in the crisp bracing freshness immediately following the sunrise round the fringe of the lake bordering the road whose waters reflected the azure of the sky, and mirrored the showy buildings on its banks. Through the broad, straight streets of the cantonment with their air of middle class prosperity wedged with a crowd as dense if not denser than that which lined the streets of the capital on the day of the State entry. Through close-packed tiers of happy school children—whose presence proved that, although the military element predominates at Secunderabad, it is an active educational centre as well—and so to the parade ground where His Royal Highness rode up to the waiting line and the Princess viewed the ceremony from Lord Shaftesbury's Argyll motor car.

The Secunderabad parade ground is one of the largest in India. It is certainly the most pleasant. It is no mere prim oblong, but a bit of undulating country rising towards Bolarum dotted with trees and yet with plenty of level space for ceremonial movements. Nor is it a dusty desert like Mian Mir and Rawalpindi, but actually green even at this season of the year, so green that with judicious watering the possibility of dust had not to be gravely considered. Here were drawn up the regiments in the Secunderabad garrison, L. Battery of the Royal Horse Artillery on the right, the 13th Hussars, the 26th Prince of Wales' Own Light Cavalry, the 20th Cavalry, and the Hyderabad Imperial Service Lancers. Then the Field Artillery, three batteries, the first, sixteenth and forty-first. On the right of the infantry stood the 13th Company of the Queen's Own Sappers and Miners representing the gallant corps which carries on the best traditions of the Old Madras Army. The Infantry were drawn up in Brigade mass, the Lincolns, Royal Fusiliers, Manchester and Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders leading the Brigade and the Native Infantry in a compact wall behind them.

The review was the largest Their Royal Highnesses have seen since there passed before them the great display of armed might at Rawalpindi. On no occasion have they seen troops of the Indian Army better handled or better led, but the recollection of Rawalpindi leaves one dead to any fresh or new impressions of military parades. So it must suffice to say that the Prince, accompanied by Sir Charles Egerton, Commanding at Secunderabad, and His Highness the Nizam, and escorted by the Imperial Service Lancers, inspected the line. The Nizam rode a shapely milk white charger and wore his quite handsome uniform. Then the gleaming lance points and bayonets quivered for a moment as the columns turned and moved into position for the march past, and the stately procession began. The Horse Gunners were as usual perfection. Whatever other Powers may think of the British Army none of them can beat our Artillery even by the pick of millions. And again as the Cavalry walked past one could not help admiring the manner in which the mounted arm in India is horsed. There is nothing to equal it on the Continent. The Infantry were splendid and the marching and physique of all ranks were subjects of general comment. The gallop past was disappointing. The Horse Artillery swept by superbly, their guns leaping after them like things of life, but the Cavalry, except the Hussars, were ragged, and after them the Imperial Service Lancers easily took second place. One little incident is worth mentioning as showing what may happen to the wounded on the battle-field. One of the Hussars lost his helmet near the saluting point and although three regiments charged over the same ground the helmet was not touched. After the advance in review order His Royal Highness expressed to Sir Charles Egerton his warm appreciation of the appearance and discipline of the troops.

Two brief ceremonies remained. Some of the officers of the 26th Prince of Wales' Own Light Cavalry, whose electric blue uniforms gave a pleasant splash of colour to the scene, were presented to His Royal Highness. Afterwards the 2nd Queen's Own Rajputs received new colours from the Heir Apparent. As the Rajputs marched past as well set up and as well drilled a regiment as the native infantry can show the worn tatters of colours were marked and also that they carried three colours instead of the orthodox two. Thereby hangs a tale, the third colour was awarded for specially distinguished service at Delhi and Lashwari with Lake in 1803. It bears this motto "Lake and Victory." In 1878 some military precision of the worst type tried to have the third colour removed but his sterile mind received no support. So three brand new colours were received from the Prince whose Royal father is the Colonel-in-Chief of the regiment to-day, and three venerable and torn ones were enfolded in their honoured cases. Then addressing the regiment His Royal Highness said :—

Colonel Lampen, Officers, Non-Commissioned Officers, and men of the 2nd Queen's Own Rajput Light Infantry,—It gives me great pleasure to be present here to-day, and to give you these new colours, for in doing so I become associated with the regiment whose career since its formation more than a century ago has been one continuous record of loyalty and of gallantry on the field of battle; moreover you are honoured by having the King Emperor as your Colonel-in-Chief and received the title of Queen's Own, in commemoration of His Majesty's visit to India in 1875 when he was made its Honorary Colonel. For its distinguished service at the storming of Aligarh, the regiment was permitted to bear a third colour which you carry to-day for your steadfast and memorable loyalty to the Crown during the trying days of 1857. You were made a Light Infantry regiment, and you bear on your colours no less than 14 campaigns or battles, they are not only symbols of loyalty to the King-Emperor, but of loyalty to the grand tradition which has grown up through the gallant deeds of your predecessors. You very rightly venerate these sacred emblems, for when you look upon them you are reminded of those deeds of fame, and also of your oath of allegiance actually taken upon the colours when you first joined the regiment. You are reminded of that splendid page in your history how the regiment lost 200 men in the first unsuccessful siege of Bhurtpore, and 20 years later before the second siege strips of the colours borne at the first siege were produced by the men who swore on them to earn as high a reputation as their predecessors as the record says (they kept their oath). I know that whenever called upon you will equally keep the oath taken upon your colour and add fresh lustre to the noble tradition which you have inherited.

Whilst His Highness the Nizam was on parade this morning there occurred an event that has sadly dimmed the Royal visit. His eldest daughter, who was also his eldest child, died at eight o'clock. The deceased lady was about twenty-three years of age, not married though arrangements for the wedding had been made, and described by those who knew her as unusually accomplished for a Muhammadan. She had long suffered from phthisis which, four days ago, assumed a critical form. The Nizam, who was devotedly attached to her, was an almost continuous watcher by her sick couch and was debarred from giving that close personal supervision of the arrangements for the reception of His Royal visitors he had hoped to exercise.

It was noticed that at the State visit yesterday, and at Secunderabad this morning, His Highness looked worried and distraught and this is now explained. Of course, this grievous bereavement has completely overturned the ordered programme. The Nizam was unable to pay his private visit to the Prince of Wales this morning, to be present at the foundation stone laying this afternoon, or to dine at the Residency where a reception was held. The State dinner to-morrow has been countermanded and as far as His Highness is concerned all official ceremonies terminated with the review this morning. This afternoon the remains of the deceased lady were interred in the courtyard of the Mecca Mosque, where hitherto only the male members of the house have been buried. The Nizam attended the funeral prayers, and there was a great gathering of the State officials and of the ladies of his family.

In the absence of the Nizam and most of the principal State officials, the ceremony of laying the foundation stone of the Victoria Zenana Hospital, this afternoon, was quietly conducted. Colonel Gimlet, I.C.S., Residency Surgeon, and Director of the Nizam's Medical Department, read an address, describing how medical work to aid purdah women in Hyderabad was begun in 1880, by establishing a zenana department in the Atzulganj Hospital, and the number of lady doctors was gradually increased to twelve. From this beginning there developed, ten other dispensaries with purdah department for out-patients, a temporary maternity hospital and a training school for native midwives. But the existing accommodation for purdah patients is quite insufficient, hence the decision to build a new hospital, now made possible by the allocation as a site of the Aminbagh, formerly used by the Municipal offices. Here the new hospital will accommodate 60 in-patients, half of that for maternity cases, with ample accommodation for nurses, midwives, and servants built, furnished, and equipped in accordance with the most modern principles.

The Resident, the Hon'ble Mr. Bayley, then read the speech His Highness the Nizam was to have delivered. It was to this effect :—

"The provision of adequate medical aid for the women of Hyderabad is a matter which has long occupied my earnest consideration, and I had hoped so long ago as the jubilee of Her late Most Gracious Majesty to improve the existing arrangements by the erection of a really good Zenana Hospital. Unfortunately difficulties have, till recently, delayed the execution of my project. These have now been overcome, and it is my earnest desire that the hospital of which Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales has graciously consented to lay the foundation stone, should be a lasting monument to the people of my State of the good Queen-Empress, whose constant solitude for the sick and suffering and whose love for her Indian Empire will ever be remembered with grateful and affectionate reverence, and that it should commemorate in a fitting manner the honour which Your Royal Highnesses have conferred upon me and upon Hyderabad by your visit to my Capital. To this end I trust that Her Royal Highness will graciously permit the hospital to be named the Victoria Hospital for women, after herself and Her late Majesty, and will now be pleased to inaugurate the good work which the institution is intended to perform by laying the foundation stone."

In low but distinct tones the Princess of Wales said :—"I have much pleasure in laying the foundation stone of the Victoria Zenana Hospital, and I hope it will be of great advantage to the women of Hyderabad." Accompanied by the Prince Her Royal Highness laid the foundation stone, tested it, and declared it as well and truly laid, a procedure watched with absorbed interest by the purdah ladies, half hidden behind enormous chieks. Her Royal Highness visited the present hospital. There was a reception this evening at the Residency largely attended by the English community, who were presented to Their Royal Highnesses.

Madras Mail.—From the Residency to the Falaknuma Palace is close on three miles and it is right through the heart of the city. The Palace is a most imposing edifice situated on an eminence and reached by a road that winds gradually round a hill at least 1,000 feet above the city and river, and commanding a complete view of the city and plain below. The State rooms of the Palace are reached by a grand marble staircase got out complete from Italy. At the top of this, the landing is paved with marble and strewn with tiger-skins, and the walls are hung with oil paintings of the various rulers of the Nizam's Dominions up to the present occupant of the throne. Overlooking the city is a luxurious drawing room, to the left is the throne room floored with highly polished parquetry—it is used also as a ball room. On the opposite side are the billiard, smoke and card rooms and at the end is the dining room overlooking the keep. The rooms of the Prince and Princess are furnished on a most lavish scale and no pains, money or thought has been spared to make the palace a fitting residence for the Royal guests of India's premier Prince. The Nizam took the greatest personal interest in the arrangements for the Prince's reception. A pleasing and informal change was made in the programme, inasmuch as the Princess preceded the Prince and witnessed, as a spectator, the reception of the Prince by the Nizam. In the afternoon a small Gymkhana was held at which the Nizam and the Shalazada gave an exhibition of their shooting powers.

My former list of the recipients of Royal souvenirs was by no means complete. In addition to those who have already been mentioned in these Notes, the Hon'ble Mr. Fraser, C.I.E., Mrs. Fraser, General J. Eccles Nixon, Colonel Leader, Sir P. N. Krihnamurti, K.C.I.E., Colonel Desraj Urs, Mr. H. F. Wilkie and Mr. F. E. C. Carr were all remembered by His Royal Highness before his departure.

The Bangalore Rifle Volunteers have also benefited by the gracious favours of Their Royal Highnesses, for by order of His Royal Highness, Commander Sir Charles Cust has sent to Colonel P. L. Moore, the Commandant, signed copies of photographs of both the Prince and Princess of Wales. As in the case of the photograph of the Princess presented to the Lady Curzon Hospital, the pictures are greatly enlarged, and the B. R. V. may well be proud of this mark of Royal favour.

A Secunderabad correspondent states that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales would confer a great boon on Hyderabad people at large if he would suggest to His Highness the Nizam that the local currency should be placed on a staple basis by ordaining that 96 dubs should always be given in exchange for a Halli Sicea rupee which would make his coin equivalent to 14 annas. He adds:—"I have been noticing in your valuable columns the sympathy you have towards the suffering poor in this place as regards the exchange of Halli Sicea rupees into dubs, which makes the poorest of poor to lose about 3 annas and sometimes more than that."

Pioneer.—All Hyderabad was astir early this morning, for the Royal train was timed to arrive at 8 and this involved the closing of the principal thoroughfares to traffic an hour earlier. Long before light indeed the trample and rumble of troops on the move was audible along the Secunderabad road, denoting that horse, foot and guns were on their way to take up their appointed parts in the proceedings. With the dawn came chota hazri parties attended by ladies in Goodwood garments bound for this house or that, whose windows and balconies commanded a good view of the procession and whose hospitable owners had thrown them open for the occasion. The arrangements at the station and all along the route were excellent, and long before the hour of arrival all was in order for the reception. Punctually to the moment the first gun of the salute announced to the expectant crowds in the city the arrival of the Royal train. The Prince and Princess were received on alighting by His Highness the Nizam, with whom were Mr. Bayley, the Resident, Sir Kishon Pershad, the Minister, General Sir Charles Egerton, Commanding the Division, and all the principal officials of Hyderabad State who were duly introduced to Their Royal Highnesses. After this a move was made to the carriages, the Prince of Wales taking his seat with the Nizam and the Princess with Mr. Bayley. The procession was headed by the P. W. O. Cavalry, followed by the 13th Hussars, a half battery, R. H. A. and the Nizam's Body-Guard, and closed by the Hyderabad Imperial Service Lancers, while beside the Royal carriage rode General Hamilton, Commanding the Garrison, and General Franks, Commanding the Cavalry Brigade.

There is no such thing as a short drive in Hyderabad and that before the procession was in accordance with the local scale of distances. From the railway station through the suburbs past the British Residency in Chudderghat across the bed of the river Musi to the city gates must be a matter of a mile or so and the main street of the city up to the Falaknuma Palace is a stretch of about as much again. The first and more open portion of the distance was covered by the procession at a moderate trot, but when the city was reached it slackened down to a pace which would enable the Royal visitors to take in the remarkable scene before them, and the assembled thousands of Hyderabad to get a good view of the Royal visitors.

Hyderabad, like Peshawar and Benares, is a city with a character and an atmosphere of its own, and though old residents declare that it is losing its distinctive features it retains ample to make it on an occasion like this a striking and impressive spectacle. One may safely assume that this drive up the broad main street of Hyderabad city, lined with the Nizam's soldiery and picturesque crowds of the Nizam's subjects, past the palaces of the nobles, round the stately Char Minar, which marks the centre spot of the city, past the imposing Mecca Masjid where lie the Nizams of the past, then the exit from the city and the ascent to the magnificent site of the Falaknuma Palace, from whose terraces the whole vast extent of Hyderabad is seen laid out like a map, must have been an experience that is likely to leave vivid impressions on the minds of the Royal visitors, even now when the brilliant spectacles and oriental accessories have become familiar. For the crowds along the route the sight-seeing was by no means over with the procession. First the Nizam had to return in state from Falaknuma to his city palace. Half an hour later His Highness was on the road again to pay his visit of ceremony to the Prince and then came the return visit of the Prince to the Nizam. The last ceremony was varied in a very attractive and agreeable form by the presence of the Princess, who with Lady Shaftesbury and Lady Eva Dugdale drove down beforehand and taking seats apart witnessed the Durbar, which by this daring innovation was robbed of its formality, clearly, as it would seem to the appreciation and relief of all parties. This closed the public proceedings of the day, but in the afternoon the Minister was quietly "at Home" at Falaknuma and entertained the Prince and Princess with a display of tent pegging and horsemanship. To-morrow will be a full day with a parade in the morning, a foundation-stone laying in the afternoon and a banquet and reception at the Residency in the evening.

Queen.—Hyderabad is in some respects an anomalous State. Here we have a population mainly Hindu ruled by a Mohammedan Prince, while in Kashmir, in the far north-west, we have the reverse of this. The city, the most populous of any inland city in India, is, however, far more Mohammedan than the country.

It is curious in the census returns to read that Hyderabad State, with some 10,000,000 Hindus and over 1,000,000

Mohammedans, has three Buddhists and thirteen Jews gravely enumerated among its population. The census Blue Book, it may be remarked en passant, affords occasional unexpected gleams of humour. For instance, there is the classical example of the scrupulous Hindu who conscientiously set out his occupation in the census paper as "hereditary painter of horses with spots."

Then its army, known as the Hyderabad contingent, is somewhat anomalous. The Nizam's troops, some 30,000 strong, are made up largely of mercenaries. In the opinion of some alarmist statesmen the Nizam's army is not only unnecessary but is actually a potential menace to the British Raj, in spite of its being officered to a large extent by Englishmen. Indeed, Sir Charles Dilke, in his "Problems of Greater Britain," quotes the opinion of a foreign observer of note, Baron Von Hübnér, which, although exaggerated, gives one furiously to think.

"The Nizam," he declared, "could at any moment become the arbiter of destinies of the Indian Empire." If for "at any moment" we read "should India be seriously threatened by Russia," we should not, perhaps, be over-estimating the danger.

Hyderabad may be lacking in ancient monuments and antiquities, but it is certainly one of the most striking and picturesque cities in the whole of the Indian Empire. It may be modern compared to Benares or Allahabad, but it is free from the tawdry pinchbeck buildings of Lucknow or the architectural freaks of Jaipur, which excite the scorn of architectural purists.

It differs in its characteristics from every other native capital. Jaipur, Mysore, Baroda, or Indore are Hindu capitals with Hindu customs. Hyderabad is a survival of a dominant Islamism with Mussulman customs. It is a remnant of the gorgeous East, a page out of the Arabian Nights. Hyderabad has never been brought under the heel of England. There are no Babu clerks or college and high school students thronging the streets and bazaars, but good valiant swashbucklers, bristling with daggers and matchlocks. The Civil Service as well as the Military is manned in all its ranks by Mussulmans imported from Upper India, and the ever ubiquitous Bengali has no chance whatever.

Hyderabad is the premier native state of India, and if we exclude a dozen or so of the 600 odd native states, is to India what Bavaria is to the German Empire. Its capital, too, the fourth city in population in India, has about the same number of inhabitants as Munich.

The present dynasty takes its rise from a Turcoman adventurer who was appointed Viceroy (Nizam) by the Moghul Emperor. In short, the rulers of the Deccan bore a somewhat similar relation to the Moghul Emperors at Delhi than the Mayors of the Palace did to the Merovingian Kings. On the death of Aurungzeb, when the loosely-held Emperor began to fall to pieces, the Nizam seized the opportunity of asserting his independence. British troops having crushed the Maharatta Power, which threatened to engulf the State of Hyderabad, the Nizam was fain to accept the protection of the Government. The present ruler is the ninth Nizam, and the fourth in descent from the founder of the dynasty.

There are not many lions or specific sights in Hyderabad; the chief sights are the bazaars, the streets, and native life generally. There are, however, some interesting mosques and many fine palaces. The Nizam's palace is only shown to those furnished with a special order from the Resident. It is chiefly remarkable for its colossal proportions. It is divided up by several extensive quadrangles, so that it takes up a good deal of time which might be more profitably occupied. The great show palace, that belonging to the late Sir Salar Jang, G.C.S.I., is, however, well worth a visit. There is a very interesting armoury here. Sir Salar Jang was one of the most famous native prime ministers who perhaps did more than any other native statesman towards maintaining the British Raj during the troublous times of the Mutiny. Had the Deccan joined the rebel army it would probably have meant the rising of the whole of Southern India. During the minority of the present Nizam this Minister brought the State into a prosperous condition, put the army and police on a stable footing, carried out great structural improvements in the city, and checked the dangerous mob element of this once unruly and turbulent capital. Now it is as safe for foreigners as any of the great cities of India; but not many years ago Hyderabad, with Peshawar and Poona, were perhaps the only three cities where an European could not walk about alone after sunset with impunity.

One of the most striking monuments is the Char Minar (Four Towers), which occupies the centre of the city where the four main streets cross. Of the several mosques the most interesting is the Mecca Mosque, so called from its being a copy of the Mecca Kaaba. Here all the eight Nizams who successively ruled Hyderabad are buried.

The Chaddar Ghaut, where the Residency is situated, is the most attractive suburb of Hyderabad. Here are the race course, polo ground, and recreation grounds. As might be expected from a race of cavaliers, who, with one exception, have contributed a larger number of cavalry (four regiments) to the Indian army than any native state, the Hyderabad nobles excel at polo. Indeed, last year—1905—the Nizam's team carried off the championship of India.

The Residency has rather a striking history. It is an enormous building, with a frontage of some 200 yards, and stands in a park more than a mile in circumference, surrounded by a huge wall with fortified gateways. It was built by the famous Major Kirkpatrick, and seems more suitable for the palace of a viceroy than the official quarters of a mere political officer. Indeed, the building has proved rather a white elephant to some Residents who have preferred to use the building as an official residence only and to live in a smaller house in the park. In this park is the Residency Cemetery, where no less than thirty-three former Residents are buried.

It was mainly owing to the great influence of Kirkpatrick over the Nizam that Berar was ceded to the Government in 1833, in return for the establishment of a British garrison for the protection of the State at Secunderabad.

This is one of the largest military stations in India, and is now one of the nine divisional commands into which military India under the Kitchener regime has been divided, replacing the traditional "Presidency Commands."

In the churchyard of St. George's Church, which is large enough to hold a whole British regiment, is buried the famous banker, Mr. William Palmer (nicknamed King Palmer), the head of the great banking firm which financed the Nizam.

Some three miles from Secunderabad is a large entrenched camp, intended to serve as a place of refuge in emergency for the British garrison and residents. Here the traveller will notice a huge castellated building with a solid looking tower which has a curiously familiar appearance. This is the great military prison, and is, indeed, popularly, if quaintly, known as Windsor Castle.

It is a very interesting excursion to the deserted city of Golconda, some seven miles from Hyderabad. Golconda is to the Nizam's capital what Seringapatam is to Mysore city or Amber to Jaipur. Golconda was the ancient capital of the Deccan, but is mainly associated in the popular mind as embodying "riches beyond the dreams of avarice" in connection with its celebrated diamonds. As a matter of fact diamonds were never found here, though there were diamond fields in the Kistna Delta, which was included in that part of the Deccan once ruled by the Kings of Golconda. Their capital was formerly the chief depository of diamonds, and here they were cut and polished; indeed, in this respect Golconda appeared to be the Amsterdam of the East. Possibly, too, the fame of Golconda's diamonds is partly due to the legend of the

The sun rose this morning in a blaze of crimson splendour. The wave of dawning day painted the eastern sky a glorious blood red, lighting ruby fires in the purple bosom of the lake. Shortly the crimson paled into a subtle salmon stifling the fading steel blue horizon with subtle pink, and almost before the retina had caught its beauties it fused into lemon and sapphire and then the harsh azure of the Indian day. The cold night air mellowed into a pellucid softness and then sprang up the zephyr which comes with the light. So were the Prince and Princess welcomed to Hyderabad.

At the station and in the city they were met with a greeting scarcely less splendid. His Highness the Nizam, spare, erect hawk-eyed, stood in front of his principal officers of State. He was attired with the dignified simplicity he always affects, a tunic of navy blue with sword and belt, and a conical turban of Hyderabad yellow. His ministers and officers were in the handsome state livery of blue and gold and yellow, and formed a varied and striking group. In this there was little of the picturesque irregularity and colour that are commonly associated with native rule in India. That was reserved for the intensely Oriental streets of the city where were vividly reproduced those characteristics that make Hyderabad one of the most fascinating centres in the Dependency.

Indeed on the drive from the station to the new palace the Prince and Princess passed through a series of pictures from the troublous history of Hyderabad. Baggy breeched and blue gaitered infantry, armed with old fashioned guns and equipped with brass ammunition boxes and curiously drooping turbans, saluted them as they left the station. These were Jumath Nizam Mehboob Rohillas to a man, who were gathered into a corps and disciplined by the late Sir Salar Jung as a means of keeping them under control. But they look strangely out of place in India. Their proper position is with the Turkish army in Yemen. Coal black African negroes with thick lips and curly hair, with red fez and uniforms of sky blue, represented the African cavalry which is such a distinctive feature of the Nizam's army. Then you could trace the improvement of the State troops step by step. On the lowest tier stood the household regiments tricked out in new uniforms but with obsolete guns and curved bayonets, which make them not even food for cannon. On the second the Hyderabad line regiments, incomparably better equipped, organised and armed with bored out Martinis. Then in the escort rode the Imperial Service Cavalry well armed and well turned out and comparing not unfavourably with the Madras regiments. We all know what a powerful part "izzat" plays in the East, but this notwithstanding, it is amazing that any keen native Prince can compare his Imperial Service Troops with his nondescript forces, without like the Maharaja Scindia laying plans for the maintenance of none but the former.

The cosmopolitan character of Hyderabad is just as deeply stamped on its people. It is the Mahomedan State par excellence not only in its dynasty and its administration, but in the inhabitants of its capital. You see more turbushes and strongly marked Mahomedan faces in Hyderabad in a day than in any other city in India in a week. You see also a type that has disappeared from British India, and which Their Royal Highnesses have not encountered since they left Rajputana, the squireen of perhaps a score of acres, poorer a Scotch crofter, yet with his belt as full of lethal weapons as a Montenegrin chieftain or a stage bandit, and a certain rustic dignity that he sucks from the soil. Nor are you ever permitted to forget that this is a Deccan State too, a State with a large proportion of those hardy lean ryots who win perhaps the most difficult and precarious subsistence of any peasantry in the world. The Mahomedan temperament and the Hindus' struggle with a churlish nature has tinged the Hyderabadis with some of the dourness of Northern India. There was eager interest and respectful salutation, but not the bubbling joyousness and lightness of heart marked every stage of the Royal progress in Southern T.

For a comparatively modern Indian city Hyderabad ... tains a remarkably Oriental atmosphere, and it was of the Eastern this morning. Behind the line of miscellaneous goli. sentinels who occasionally refreshed themselves by squ... their heels or pulling at a biddee, there was the ceaseless and movement of the throng. From the upper stories of houses, whose blistering whiteness was spotted with red and azure shutters, the women looked down on the scene concealed behind their veils, yet with true feminine the purdah was never allowed to obstruct their view of spectacle. The gold-tipped pinacles of the Mosque carried necessary suggestion of Islam. Up and down the cleared watered road galloped orderlies and policemen, with no sideration for their horses' legs, confining the sowars to a d... ous trot and juktas with loads of belated baggage. His H... ness the Nizam himself set an example of almost a... hustle for his State carriage, of the most repressing yellow, dashed past at a respectable gallop, his bodyguard their canary uniforms and saddle cloths of leopard skins... ing after its fast moving wheels. It was not long before a whole impressive cavalcade came trotting back, the A... Horse, the Madras Lancers in electric blue, the Imperial... Lancers in blue and silver, the faultless Horse Artillery, the gallant 13th Hussars. In the midst of this pompous... came Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales with... Nizam, the Princess with the Resident, the Hon. Mr. Bayley the cynosure of all eyes and the objects of the most... salutations.

Scarcely had the boom of the guns, which announced arrival of Their Royal Highness at the Falaknama Palace, died away, than they spoke again for the departure of the Nizam on his State visit to the Prince. And yet again soon in the afternoon when His Royal Highness returned the visit at the Chau Mahalla palace. But the setting was not worthy of the scene the reception of the Heir to all the Britains by the first feudatory in Hindustan. The reception hall was frankly tawdry and vulgar. A poor apartment with jingling glass chandeliers and cheap decorations, opening on to a commonplace courtyard. Not all the dignity of official ceremony, the bold figures of the Nizam's officials and Sirdars and the interest attaching to a ceremony which has been performed only once before, the presentation to the Prince of the heir to the gadi, could remove the impression caused by this unsuitable venue.

Before leaving the experiences of the first day in Hyderabad a libation must be poured out to those who brought us here. Those whose good fortune it has been to accompany the Royal progress thus far have travelled on all the great Indian railways. They have journeyed in modest comfort on the Bombay, Baroda and the Rajputana Malwa-lines and a short season in acute discomfort on the four-wheeled boxes of the North-Western. They have sampled the convenience and spaciousness of the new East Indian rolling stock and experienced the efficiency of the Oudh and Rohilkhand, and the consideration and hospitality of the officers of the Burma Railway Company. The Madras Railway have shown how smoothly an Indian railway runs and the Southern Mahratta how slowly. The pilot train from Bangalore took nearly six hours to perform a journey which Mr. Arthur Hoare on his sixty horse-power Coventry Daimler motor car accomplished in two hours and forty-eight minutes! But the journey from Guntakul to Hyderabad provided an entirely novel experience in a train as satisfying to the eye as its arrangement was to the demand for comfort. Here was a train with two berth compartments as well as four, with electric light and fans, a commodious bathroom, a corridor that gave access to the dining car, the servants' and the luggage van.

people of India, says that in recognition of the enthusiasm and loyalty characterising their rejoicings and in commemoration of the Royal visit, some relief from taxation as was done in the case of salt and income-tax at the time of the Emperor's Coronation, should be conferred upon the people. But the article says that if any reduction in revenue is asked for, the officials in this country will not relish the request and it is also doubtful whether the Government of India would be willing to grant any reduction.

Andhraprakasika.—A correspondent (A. N. N.) to the Andhraprakasika, of the 7th February, is surprised at His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales honouring Mr. King and Mr. Desikachariyar with knighthood, simply because they chanced to be the Honorary Secretaries of the Royal Reception Committee. There is the venerable Diwan Bahadur Raghunatha Rao, who served Government with marked distinction, and administered as Diwan certain important Native States. There is again Lod Krihnadas Balamukundadas, who in addition to various charities, presented the statue of His Majesty to the Madras city. Were they not more worthy of Royal honours?

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE NEWSPAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE PUNJAB FOR THE WEEK ENDING 10TH FEBRUARY 1906.

Hamdard-i-Hind.—The Hamdard-i-Hind (Bhara), of the 27th January 1906, writing about the Royal visits, says that while out on tours the former rulers of India used to distribute large sums of money among the poor. Times have, however, undergone a complete change in this respect, and it is now considered madness on the part of the people to expect their Sovereign to behave in the above manner. The poverty-stricken natives of the country should not therefore hope for monetary gifts from the Prince of Wales, for such an expectation is fore-doomed to failure. They should pray that their poverty may excite sympathy in His Royal Highness's heart and lead to his conferring on the people the rights and privileges promised to them in Her late Majesty's Proclamation of 1858.

Indian People.—The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 21st January, says:—The following characteristic and suggestive remarks about the Royal tour in India appear in the Review of Reviews:—"Beyond a languid feeling of curiosity as to the contents of the Prince's daily bag, no one seems to concern himself about the Royal progress. Some day we may have an Heir Apparent to whom India will be something greater and better than a gigantic game preserve. But at present the barbarian instinct that loves to kill is too strong to be easily eradicated. If in the midst of his journeyings the Prince of Wales could be as much impressed by the extreme poverty of India as was the Tsar of Russia when he visited Hindustan, this tour might yield some valuable fruit for the Empire in days to come." The justice of these observations cannot be questioned. But it must be remembered that the Prince of Wales can only follow the programme that is marked out for him beforehand. His Royal Highness heard of the famine in Rajputana while he was passing through that part of the country, but the unlovely sights of suffering and poverty were carefully kept away from him. He sees a dressed-up and decorated India, arrayed in gala costume for his special benefit. The real India is to him as unknown as it was before he had set foot in this country. This is unavoidable in the present nature of things. The Tsar visited India when he was heir to the Russian Empire, but he came with his eyes open, and was much more the master of his time and his tour than the Prince of Wales is, and since he had heard of the extreme poverty of India he took care to verify it with his own eyes. The Prince of Wales has not got the same opportunities that the Tsar had, and consequently he has seen nothing of the real state of the country. Undoubtedly it is a pity, but it can only be remedied when Royalty in India can shake itself free from the official programme and see things for itself and judge the country with its own eyes.

Indian People.—The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 4th February, says,—One of the most graceful and considerate acts of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales during his Indian tour has been the changing of the name of a part of the city of Madras. The native portion of that city was hitherto known by the unsavoury name of Black Town. How the name came to be adopted, or who gave such a name would be now profitless to enquire, but it was undoubtedly a relic of old barbarism, when the natives of this country were called blacks and savages by recently civilised nations. To an outsider or a foreigner such a name as Black Town conveyed a repulsive and unwholesome idea. The matter was represented to His Royal Highness and he was asked whether he would be pleased to give his own name to this part of the city of Madras. The Prince of Wales graciously gave his permission at once and Black Town, Madras, will in future be known as George Town, after the future King-Emperor. If the former name was objectionable, the new name is one upon which the citizens of Madras may be warmly congratulated, and their gratitude to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales will be shared by the people of India. In his letter to Lord Amulthill the Prince of Wales specially thanks His Excellency for the opportunity given to him of meeting Indian leaders. We are not aware whether the other provincial rulers gave His Royal Highness similar opportunities, but no mention occurs in previous acknowledgments made by the Prince of Wales. Here is a point which may be well acted upon by the authorities elsewhere, though the better part of the Royal tour is over. It is now evident that the Prince desires to see Indian leaders and to exchange views with them, and the Local Governments should afford His Royal Highness an opportunity of coming in contact with the leaders of Indian society and Indian thought.

11TH FEBRUARY 1906.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—Messages of condolence on the subject of the death of His late Majesty the King of Denmark have been addressed by the Sheriff of Calcutta to the Private Secretary to the Viceroy, also to Sir Walter Lawrence, and by the President, Bengal Chamber of Commerce, to Sir Walter Lawrence. Replies are now published expressing the thanks of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales for the sympathy expressed. Colonel Dunlop Smith, in sending Lord Minto's thanks, states that the message of condolence from the citizens of Calcutta will be transmitted to Their Majesties.

12TH FEBRUARY 1906.

Daily Telegraph.—There is, after all, little in Hyderabad itself that is of interest other than that which clothes most capital towns in India. The fact that the Nizam is the premier native chief, and the widest landowner, is, of course, reflected on State occasions by a certain barbaric splendour. But the shortness of his princely pedigree, and the fact that, as a Mohammedan, his very presence is a little anomalous in Southern India, deprive him of that unquestioned deference which is the natural right of a Child of the Sun. The huge estate of Hyderabad is an enclave cut off by mere distance from those stirring regions of the North-West, with which the deepest ties of religion would otherwise connect him. There is perhaps no small advantage to ourselves in this fact. The remoteness of Southern India from the centres of interest to-day has deprived her of political significance, and the turbulent fascination of the Carnatic, that appealed so strongly to Macaulay, has long passed away—with it has passed away the last vestige of anxiety as to anything that the great Mohammedan vassal of the British Empire might find it in his mind or within his power to do.

So Hyderabad flourishes and waxes fat. The streets of her capital are filled with merchandise and busy traffickings, and the mere scratching of the ground of her sixty million acres provides a decent subsistence for her people and wealth for her ruler. A trace of the older régime still exists, a mockery of its former self. Still the Nizam hunts with the cheetah, still he slips the hawk at its victim; still he shoots at the gold mohur; and still his elephants thrust themselves in an orderly rank through the crowds at the palace gates, still waiting for the employment that in these days rarely or never comes. The glory is departed and the Nizam, the cleverest native in all India, and withal one of the most dignified, finds time hang heavy on his idle hands. He chooses his Ministers well. Now and then he descends upon them, and with a clear brain and unsparing vigilance tests their work, whether it be good or bad. So the work goes on, not over well, because His Highness cares little for domestic reforms and trivial administration; not over badly, because no man knows what the Nizam may chance unexpectedly to do from day to day. So the natural fertility of Hyderabad provides all that is necessary, though it be far from what it might. And so, too, the Nizam, chafing under the day of small things that interest him only as a means of asserting still the phantom of his autocracy, has to find other means of escaping from the ennui of his guaranteed prosperity.

It is said that he rarely goes to Golconda. Perhaps the sight of the great fortress—from which his predecessors' master drove out a race of real kings, men who played the great game on the world's stage—reminds him of the dead level of satisfactory mediocrity with which he must needs be contented in these piping times. Yet Golconda is worth many visits. It is true that diamonds are not found there—they never were—true that the halls and walls and battlements are overgrown with weeds and utterly deserted, but the charm of Golconda Rock remains. It lies to the west of the modern city of Hyderabad, some seven miles perhaps by road, but a good deal less by the only measurements that are true in India, for the road is level and smooth, and there is hardly an uninteresting furlong all the way. The dusty compounds of the European residents, garish with the transparent flames of rocketing purple bougainvillea, or the raw scarlet of cannaes, fall behind, and for a little the track crosses the unslaked prairie that will one day make Hyderabad a considerable factor in the world's grain market. Soon a corner is saved by a shortcut through His Highness's fruit gardens, and then the main road, which had gone half a mile about to the south, carried us again straight on to the outer city wall of Golconda town. The gateway is heavily fenced with timbered and spiked doors, but escaped from under it, the road runs again, a white and dusty ribbon, to the foot of the Rock. On either side are the ruins of Golconda's pleasant places, fallen fronts which once sheltered either richer or learning, dainty favourites or bronzed merchant-venturers; empty halls, where music or high deliberation once reigned; broken purdahs, which need no restoration now by the austere husband of Islam. The crawling vines of the yellow gourd and the feathers of rank nettle-beds do their best to hide the desolation, but Golconda, save where some group of playing children or the whirr of a turning hand-mill betray a poor home among the wreckage of Royalty, is one with Nineveh.

At the Bala Hissar gate a knot of the Nizam's men spring to attention and demand the pass without which the Rock may not be visited. It is an idle restriction for nothing more indefensible than Golconda exists, but it is an assertion of Royal rights, and of these the Nizam is rightly jealous. For though to our practical selves there may be little reason to forbid the freest inspection of such antiquated strongholds, the native in his heart associates a flash of arbitrary prohibition with the possession of power. You will find never a subject of his Highness's save a sentry or a mason on the slopes of Golconda Hill. Nothing, however, seems repaired except the lower café. A steep track of hacked-out stairs leads up from beside the old arsenal walls to the citadel. Green with moss, and clothed with weeds, except along a worn, narrow track, wherein the exposed ridges of rock at the turn of the treads show whitely above the reddish drifts of soil, the stairway climbs up. Trees spring out from crumbling battlements, and empty wells overhanging with mimosa and long lavender-tufted grasses, are barely recognisable beside the track. Every natural bastion of rock has been roughly shaved and worked into the scheme of fortification, sometimes so deftly that it is hard to distinguish the work of men's hands. It looks unfinished, and even in the heyday of its pride this mixture of Nature's and man's craft must have been untidy. Opposite the King's palace rises a huge unshaped pile of rock, where the chance visitor still daubs Ganesh in his niche with ruddle, and leaves a marigold blossom or two to rot upon the clumsy lap. From the King's throne on the top-most roof of the Palace there is a view over seven or eight hundred square miles of the Nizam's territory, and the justice of the hackneyed saying that calls these plains, strewn with misshapen crags, knolls, and mounds, confusedly hurled, the fragments of an earlier world is apparent.

To the north stood the famous Tombs of Golconda. Aurangzeb descended upon the place from Daulatabad, and extinguished the Shahi dynasty in the end of the seventeenth century. He carried back with him poor Thana, the last of his race and allowed him the Chini Mahal, on the slopes of that amaying fortress hill, as his prison. It was a useless annexation. Aurangzeb, like Alexander, did but prepare the spoil for his generals to divide, and the rise of the Nizams of Hyderabad and the Kings of Oude was at the cost of his wretched and weak-kneed successors upon the Peacock Throne. But the old dynasty was effectually driven out, and these tombs are the sole memorial that its individuals can claim. Every man, remembering his own impatience of his predecessor's vain-glory, took care to build his own tomb in his own lifetime, and even unhappy Thana's cenotaph, unfinished, and partly in ruins, can still be detected. Thana sleeps beside the rock-cut corkscrew tunnel that still is the only entrance to Daulatabad. Aurangzeb put him to death to simplify the pacification of Golconda, and probably thought himself uncommonly generous to have allowed his prisoner to live in his summer palace, and at his expense, for thirteen years. So a Nizam, or "Settlement Officer," was appointed, and then in the old way, the viceregent Mayor of the Palace became in due time the lord of the city also.

Looking down from the height one can trace easily enough the four minarets which stand where the main streets of Hyderabad meet. A little to the right is the huge, irregular block of the old palace; the Nizam lives elsewhere, but holds an annual banquet in his old quarters, whereto European visitors are not bidden. Perhaps some violent reaction from the wheels of unwelcome progress is then celebrated, but the next morning there, across at Secunderabad, are the guardians of India's peace. Not all the 20,000 men-at-arms upon whom the Nizam can call—some say the number is nearer a lakh—upsets the silent and invisible grasp that lies over every village of India, and three-fourths of the princes of India—Hyderabad included—owe their place, their fame, their wealth, their powers, their very succession, to that untrumpeted fact. Yet to a man of the type that holds Golconda and Daulatabad uneventful assurance and stability can never be worth that one crowded hour of glorious life that must still tempt the inheritor of part of the gorgeous empire of the Mogul. His Highness knows the situation from every side, and recognises that it is all to his own advantage, but he would scarcely be worthy of the precedence he enjoys over all other Chiefs of India if his other self did not sometimes yearn for a fair field among the clashing interests of Hindustan and no favour from his best friend, the British Government.

Madras Mail.—The Commissioner of Police, in communicating to the Officers and men of the City Police the telegram from Sir Walter Lawrence, Chief of the Staff of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, to His Excellency the Governor, remarked:—"The Commissioner takes this opportunity of expressing his own satisfaction with the manner in which his plans and arrangements were carried out. Officers and men never spared themselves, but cheerfully went from one function to another without food, having sometimes over 12 hours' continuous duty and this went on for five days and four nights. The work was excessively hard, and the Force is to be congratulated that, with hardly any exception, the arrangements made were carried out successfully. No body of men could have worked harder or more cheerfully than did the Madras City Police, and for this the Commissioner offers to every man of the Force his most sincere thanks."

We think that the public generally will heartily endorse all that the Commissioner says in this Order. Some amount of disappointment has been expressed because the good work done by the Madras Police during the Royal visit has not been recognised so fully as was the case in Bombay and Calcutta, where the Police arrangements, from all accounts, were not so efficient as they were here. The Police Commissioner in Bombay was rewarded with a C. V. O. and the Police Commissioner in Calcutta (an acting incumbent) with a M. V. O. It is, perhaps, a graceless thing to appear greedy of reward, but in this case the disappointment is felt chiefly amongst the body of the Madras City Police, who hoped that their services would be recognised and rewarded through their superiors at least as fully as was the case in each of the other Presidency towns.

Pioneer.—The subdued air of Hyderabad to-day is in melancholy contrast with the joyous aspect that the place has hitherto presented. It is evident that all feel deeply for the Nizam, who, besides the loss of a daughter to whom he was greatly attached, has suffered grievous disappointment in the matter of the Royal visit. For a whole year past His Highness has been looking forward to the entertainment of the Prince and Princess, and his officers, knowing his wishes, have laboured one and all in their respective spheres to ensure the perfection of every arrangement. The banquet at Chowmahalla Palace to-night would have been notable even in the records of Hyderabad State hospitality for its splendours, and now that these festivals have been turned into mourning the reaction is necessarily severe. Everything that can be done by the Prince and Princess to evince the sincerity of their sympathy has been done, but the difference of special usage is a certain bar to its manifestation. Their Royal Highnesses, for instance, would have wished to be represented by an officer of the Staff at the funeral, but it was felt that this mark of sympathy would be out of place here. The Prince of Wales, however, paid a purely private visit of condolence to the Nizam this afternoon, unattended by any escort or ceremony, and this simple act must have brought the best possible assurance to His Highness of the reality of his Royal visitors' sympathy.

Before leaving Hyderabad for his shooting camp the Prince invited the Minister, Colonel Gimlette, Nawab Faridoun Jung and one or two others who have been prominently associated with the arrangements for the visit and graciously presented them with souvenirs of the occasion. After dinner His Highness starts for his camp in the jungles, where it is hoped that the sport will be proportionate to the elaborate arrangements made for the comfort of the party, and it should then break all records. The Princess, untempted by the prospect of luxury under canvas, remains in the marble halls of the Faluknuma

Palace, and will thus have a few quiet days before the time comes for the next start.

A trooper of Native cavalry, who was thrown during the gallop past at the parade yesterday but was not supposed to be dangerously injured, has died to-day of concussion of the brain. The Prince, who noticed the accident and sent immediate inquiries and instructions as to his attendance, has been much concerned at hearing of the fatal result.

The following is the text of the speeches which would have been interchanged if the State banquet, fixed for to-night but subsequently cancelled, had taken place:—

"Your Royal Highness,—I give expression to no more compliment when I assure you of the intense pleasure which it has given me and my people to welcome Your Royal Highnesses as honoured guests in my dominions. When Your Royal Highness's revered father His Most Gracious Majesty the King-Emperor visited India as Prince of Wales nearly thirty years ago he was unable to include Hyderabad in his tour, and I, then a child, had no opportunity of offering the hearty and loyal greetings which it was subsequently my privilege to tender through his representative at the Coronation Durbar, and which I now rejoice to be able to renew to His Majesty in the persons of Your Royal Highnesses, his beloved children. To my people as to myself the days which Your Royal Highnesses have spent with us will remain red letter days that can never be effaced from our memories, being as they are the first occasion upon which the Heir of the Emperor of India and his illustrious consort have honoured Hyderabad with their presence. The recollection of them could not be other than precious to us, and it will be doubly precious now that we have had the privilege of seeing Your Royal Highnesses face to face. I am glad to think that a permanent memorial of them will remain for future generations in the Zenana Hospital, which will add for the women of my State and their children yet another to the many reasons which they have to bless the name of Victoria,—Victoria the great and good Empress, in connection with whose Jubilee the idea of the institution was first conceived, and Victoria Mary, the precious Princess by whom the foundation-stone has been laid. It was my privilege yesterday morning to show you, sir, that portion of my army which is specially set aside and trained to assist in the defence of His Majesty's Indian Empire. I trust that the day when their services will be needed for this purpose will never come, but I wish to assure Your Royal Highnesses whose visit is one more link and a very strong link in the long chain of most cordial associations which binds me and my House to the British Empire, that if the necessity for defence should ever arise, not those troops only, but my own sword and all the resources of my State would be placed unreservedly at His Majesty's disposal. I earnestly hope that Your Royal Highnesses will carry away agreeable and pleasant recollections of Hyderabad and I trust that on your return to England you will inform His Majesty of the sincere admiration and loyal devotion which the Princes and people of India entertain for the British Throne and Royal family and will not fail to add that His Majesty's faithful ally and the people of his State yield to none in that admiration and devotion. Ladies and gentlemen, it is with extreme pleasure that I ask you to fill your glasses to the brim and to drink with me to the health and prosperity of my Royal guests the Prince and Princess of Wales."

"Your Highness,—I thank you sincerely for the generous words which you have addressed to the Princess of Wales and myself in your eloquent speech. We are deeply grateful to you for the magnificence of our reception, for your kind hospitality, for your acts of courteous welcome and for your friendly consideration for our comfort. I will without delay inform my dear father of your loyal assurances. I hope to be able to describe to the King-Emperor in some measure the splendours of Hyderabad and the devotion of Your Highness and your people to the British Crown. It is especially gratifying to us that our visit should be the occasion of the founding of the Zenana Hospital, being both of us deeply interested in hospitals and their splendid work. On behalf of the Princess I thank Your Highness for your touching allusions to the name of the late beloved Queen-Empress and to her own in connection with that institution. I am much gratified by your stirring words regarding the Imperial Service troops, which form part of Your Highness's Army, and I know they will be highly appreciated by His Majesty. No one can speak with greater authority on this subject than our kind host, for we all know that it was the Nizam who was the first of Princes of India to come forward with a spontaneous offer of assistance for the common cause of Imperial defence. I have had opportunities of seeing your two fine regiments of Imperial Service Lancers and I congratulate Your Highness on their soldierly and workmanlike appearance. As this is possibly the last occasion on which we shall be the guests of an Indian Prince, I thank you most gratefully for the assurances which you have made not only for the important State over which you rule but for the Princess and people of India. Nothing will please His Majesty more than the concluding words of your speech, and they will be especially valued as coming from one who is pre-eminently qualified by position, experience and tradition to speak of the sentiments of the Princess and the people of India towards the British Throne. We shall always retain the warmest feelings of regard for Your Highness and the most pleasant recollections of our visit to Hyderabad. Before I sit down I will ask you, ladies and gentlemen, to join me in drinking to the health of our friend and faithful ally His Highness the Nizam."

13TH FEBRUARY 1906.

Indian Daily News.—This evening the Princess of Wales visited the Hyderabad Exhibition of arts, industries and manufactures which is being held in the public gardens. The exhibition is interesting, though not on a large scale, the well laid out gardens being mainly occupied by side shows which include a circus, a theatre, Alpine railway and other entertainments. The Princess spent about an hour in the exhibition building, where the arts and industries of the Nizam's dominions are well represented. There are also exhibits from the Aurangabad Industrial School, the jails, and the local schools, and a display of work by zenana ladies as well as exhibits by jewelers.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The Royal visit to Hyderabad has been unmistakably clouded by the death of the Nizam's daughter, the Sahebzadi Sahiba. Though there had been for long little hope of the recovery of the young Princess the mournful occurrence of her death, sad in all its circumstances, has struck everybody as poignantly deplorable. There is a feeling of deep sympathy with the Nizam, of sincere regret that this bereavement should have come upon him at this time. There were reasons why much was hoped from the Royal visit to the Nizam's dominions, and that the brilliance of the preparations made in honour of the Prince and Princess of Wales should have been clouded by so regrettable an occurrence is a stroke of fate more than ordinarily unfortunate.

In Hyderabad one hesitates to accept as truth all that one hears. Hyderabad has its own peculiar atmosphere against which even the European vainly struggles. Setting aside stories of intrigue in all its various forms of corruption and speculation, one encounters a slowness, mental and physical, which reacts in diverse ways. He who drives fat cattle must himself be fat, and those who wait upon the whim and nod of a ruler may not move till he commands. It is a system which produces confusion, and as its least evil, bad stage management. You see it at work in a Royal Darbar when the curtain is up, and the leading personages waiting to appear before it has been fully realised that the psychological moment has arrived. A Princess may be waiting on the steps before anybody is ready to receive her, and finally there is hurry and scurry in the endeavour to save the situation. The result is hardly satisfactory, and while one may not give ready credence to all that is said, one hears without much surprise that it was quite on the cards that the Royal visit to Hyderabad would have been among the things that were not. His Highness the Nizam is the victim of a system which is fortunately undergoing change, albeit slowly. He is too alert, and has too much natural ability not to be able to adapt himself to a better system, but it would be unwise to attempt to hasten reforms in his State.

Looking back over the events of Friday, one finds much to admire in the figure of the Nizam, sitting his horse beside the Prince at the review, while he knew that the battle of life and death was being fought out within the Palace. He was clearly gravely troubled. Unwitting of the real cause, those who noticed an occasional symptom of anxiety read it as a betrayal of nervousness. Later on the picture of the pale silent figure, richly uniformed, bestride a motionless milk-white horse, was recalled as a vision of deeply pathetic interest. From the brilliant display of military power, the potentate to whose word nearly twelve million subjects lend reverent ear turned heavy hearted to learn the news that fate had dealt him one of the hardest blows that man, great, or humble, is called upon to bear. From the parade ground the Nizam went to mourn and to pray. The funeral of the Sahebzadi on Friday afternoon was attended by three of the Prince of Wales's Mahomedan Orderly Officers. To-day the Prince of Wales, accompanied by Sir Walter Lawrence, paid an informal visit of condolence to the Nizam.

Standard.—It might almost have been the terrace of an English country house, as we stood there on the verandah that pleasant Sunday morning. In front of the stone steps was a gravelled sweep of carriage-drive, bordered by a bed of standard roses and pink and yellow chrysanthemums. On the other side of the low hedge was a smooth rectangle of turfed lawn tennis ground, with the court marked out and the nets standing. The eye ranged down an avenue of young tamarind trees to the swinging gate of the compound, and beyond that to a broad, high road. Not far away one saw the red walls of other bungalows, and in the distance the clustering roofs of a town, the sheds and signal-posts of a railway station, and a tall warehouse chimney. Round us the flat country lay green with fodder and the ripening winter crops; and at intervals small brown hamlets spotted the plain, which stretched away in an unbroken level to the foot of a purple line of aw-backed hills. Cattle grazed in the meadows, husbandmen were at work among the fields and trickling water-courses, laden carts moved slowly along the roads. It seemed a picture of order and tranquil prosperity.

But you are admonished to glance at a large patch of tawny yellow in the midst of the greenery, not far away. You see that this inset is bare and lifeless sand, with nothing growing upon it but a few stunted bushes. And you have to learn that as this space now is, so, some five years ago, was the whole wide champaign before you. It was all arid waste, without grass, or trees, or cultivation. There was no town, no road, no railway station, no agriculture. There were no cattle but the small and half-starved beasts belonging to the scattered nomads who roamed over the desert track. Now it yields food for nearly a million people, and sends its surplus coastwards to load the corn-ships which help to give Londoners their daily bread.

The miracle has been wrought by water—water and brains and well-directed energy to apply both. Four-fifths of the inhabitants of India cultivate the soil; but they serve a hard and fitful task-mistress. Under that burning sun, which crumbles dry earth to a powder or bakes it into fissured blocks, there can be no culture without abundant moisture. To the Indian peasant, the rainfall which comes, or should come, towards the close of the south-west monsoon, or in the early spring, is all in all. If it is plentiful, he may have a good crop and a prosperous year; if it drops below the average, he will be hardly pressed; if it fails altogether, his cattle will probably die, his home will be broken up, his wife and children and himself may become outcasts, and the whole family may perish miserably, unless there happens to be a Relief Camp accessible. No wonder the ryot, as he sits under a tree in the heat of a summer afternoon, watches the hard dome of polished azure above him with ravenous eyes. To the farmer in another country a bad season brings trouble and loss; here it is a matter of life and death for millions.

And, unhappily, the rains cannot be depended upon. Seas of water pour upon India from the clouds, or roll down into its plains from the melting snows of the Himalayas; but the flood is badly distributed and capricious. Over large tracts the normal rainfall is only just sufficient to feed the crops and grasslands; if there is a surplus one year, there may be drought the next. There is an area of a million square miles—say twenty times the size of England—"of which," says an official document, "in the absence of irrigation, no portion can be deemed absolutely secure against the uncertainties of the seasons and the scourge of famine." And there are other extensive districts in which the annual rainfall is so scanty that cultivation becomes practically impossible without irrigation. The greatest and most permanent of all the benefits that British rule has conferred upon India is that of regulating, improving, and equalising the supply of water for agricultural purposes. It is sometimes said that if we were to quit the Peninsula we should leave behind us nothing worthy to endure; only iron bridges, mostly hideous, and a few tasteless churches, museums, and town halls, no noble monuments such as those of some of the Hindu and Mahomedan kings. But our canals we should leave, and unless our successors were sheer barbarians, they could not allow these splendid public works to decay, or permit the provinces we have made habitable by them to go back to desert again.

India, for many centuries, has been supplementing its atmospheric water-supply in its own primitive fashion. The rain-water was stored in tanks, or it was tracked to its subterranean reservoirs, and drawn up to the surface. The ancient rulers of the land were great diggers of wells, and builders of cisterns, it was left for the English to amplify and develop the enterprise. For the last three-quarters of a century the engineers of the Indian Government and the Public Works Department have been engaged upon it. The result is a system of irrigation which, though still uncompleted, is unquestionably the most magnificent created by human effort in any modern country. The great rivers have been tapped in their upper ranges, and the surplus water that comes down in the rainy weather is drawn off into main feeder canals, which deliver their contents into branch canals, and there again fill a network of minor runlets, and finally discharge their fertilising streams into the channels and ditches by which the farmers keep their crops green.

The canals are officially classed under two heads: they are regarded either as Protective or Productive. The former are supposed to supplement the water-supply of districts which they furnish as a defence against famine, and all the loss and misery that evil word suggests. The Protective canals are not kept up mainly for profit, though as a matter of fact they mostly yield a very fair return on the capital expended. The Productive works are, however, intended to increase the yield of the soil, and in some cases to render cultivation practicable where otherwise it could not be attempted, owing to the scantiness of the rainfall. Millions of acres of good land have been turned into arable and pasture by this means. The earth is willing to yield up its abundance; but the heavens deny the Water of Life, and it has had to be brought in by the hand of man. The Productive works pay very well. In the Punjab they yield 10½ per cent. interest on the capital outlay, and for the whole of India the net revenue is over 7 per cent. The Government of India, after paying 4 per cent. interest on the capital cost, is nearly three-quarters of a million in pocket by its canals at the end of every year. So satisfactory a result abundantly justifies it in contemplating a further expenditure on canal construction of over three million pounds during the next few years. Some of the projects are daring even for the new school of engineers, who fear nothing. There is a talk of banking the snows of the Himalayas in a stupendous artificial lake in Kashmir, and spreading them by pipes and aqueducts half over Northern Hindustan. This may be visionary; but another proposal, almost equally striking, is considered quite feasible, and will probably be carried out. The Jhelum, one of the Punjab rivers, has rather more water than is needed, and the Chenab rather less; so the engineers are calmly devising a new conduit, by which they can connect up the two water-courses, and regulate the flow of both by turning on a tap. Nature is rough and unruly and frequently terrible in Southern Asia, but she is being slowly got into harness.

The most audaciously conceived and brilliantly successful of all the schemes are those monuments of engineering enterprise and administrative capacity, the "Canal Colonies," as they are called, of the Chenab and the Jhelum. These Colonies are vast tracts of land, which, owing to the want of water, were almost uninhabited, except by a few nomads and semi-civilised squatters and cattle thieves. The engineers constructed the artificial watercourses which rendered it possible to bring the soil under cultivation. Then the Government constituted each district an administrative unit, and placed it under the charge of a Deputy Commissioner, who was also appointed "Colonisation Officer," with special instructions to carry out a definite and systematic scheme of settlement.

The Sircar had the wisdom or good fortune to secure the services of officials of quite exceptional capacity for this important task. The Chenab Colony, which is the older and the larger, has been for five years past under the firm and successful rule of Mr. Leslie Jones, who has done great things with it. The district which he controls is nearly equal in extent to Kent, Surrey, and Sussex taken together, and the population is now well over a million. It has two hundred miles of railway, admirable roads, several prosperous little towns, and one, Lyallpur, which is rapidly growing to quite respectable proportions; and it yields a net revenue of more than 21 per cent. on its capital cost. But I preferred to visit the Jhelum Colony, which, though slightly smaller, is newer, for its canal was only opened in the autumn of 1901; and it was here that I spent some singularly agreeable and extremely instructive days. The Jhelum Colony has been watched over from its birth by Mr. W. M. Hailey, one of the ablest of the younger officials in the Civil Service of the Punjab—a man with just that force of character, clearness, insight, relentless industry, and restrained enthusiasm which are required for such work as this. Little more than four years before my visit the Colony was lifeless scrub and empty desert. To-day, like its neighbour the Chenab, it is covered with fields of grain, with orchards, gardens, grazing meadows, breeding-farms, and cattle-runs. It is studded with prosperous villages, and it includes a population of probably three-quarters of a million, of whom several thousands live in Mr. Hailey's rising capital of Sargodha, a model little town, with well-planned, straight streets, a granary, a municipal market, a busy bazaar, a cotton store, a factory, and an active group of traders and merchants who are on the high road to wealth.

These colonies are "plantations" in the old sense of the term. They have to be planted, not only with trees, but with men. The Colonisation Officer, as he settles down in his first camp or his newly-built bungalow, in the centre of what is afterwards to be the Civil Station of the cantonment, has a blank sheet before him: a million acres of bare waste, to be converted into townships, farms, and villages. To a large extent, he has a free hand; he is the mandator of a despotic Government, intended to act the part of a beneficent autocrat himself. There are not many vested rights to be considered in this wilderness, and few troubles about ancient titles or prescriptive boundaries. The Commissioner can mark out his domain accurately into square plots, so many for each farm and each hamlet; he can trace his highways and local roads on the most suitable lines with regard to topography and water-supply; he can lay out his town with broad avenues and intersecting cross-roads, and secluded, but airy, courts, according to the latest municipal ideas adopted to Oriental customs; he can put his finger on the map and decree, in consultation with the engineers, where men and women are to live and under what conditions.

The settlers come to the places allotted to them, with their wives and children, their buffaloes and cows, their brass pots and simple tools, and, presently, on the prescribed site, there arises a thatched brown village which is the counterpart, with certain sanitary improvements, of that which they have left behind—a village with its pond and well and mud-walled byres and farmsteads, its tiny mosque or temple. The Mahomedans are in one village, the Hindus in another. The Sikhs congregate in a third. And, besides the cultivators, people of other classes have to be encouraged or attracted; policemen, postmen, and Government messengers, traders, and lazzis to supply the markets and fill the bazaars, dealers to buy and sell the grain and cotton from the farms, artisans, and labourers. It is not a backwoods colony of isolated pioneers, slowly working towards cohesion, but an organised community, with its complex social gradations properly adjusted. And here the structure stands to-day, in its outlines and relative proportions, pretty much as it may be a century or two hence, barring some cataclysm of Nature or politics: a complete little province, a miniature State, busy and thriving, self-supporting and self-sustaining, and producing such a superfluity of food that it is helping to convert Karachi into a formidable rival to Bombay and changing the balance on the corn markets of the world.

A wonderful work, truly, to have been done in a few brief years sliced out of a young man's lifetime, a work assuredly not accomplished without heavy sacrifices, and an invincible endurance and determination. Before the Jhelum Colony had been many months in being, the plague broke out, and the people began to flee from their houses in panic. Mr. Hailey's chief native subordinate (he had no European assistant) fell ill and died; he himself, going in an out of the plague-stricken dwellings to superintend disinfecting operations, caught the epidemic and narrowly escaped with his life. The men at the head of these irrigation colonies must know the natives thoroughly, and love them; wisely, but not too well. They must have that combination of deep sympathy with equitable justice which was the strength of the great Anglo-Indian administrators in the past. If you ride with a colonisation officer on his daily rounds you begin to understand something of the meaning of paternal government. He is judge, governor, supreme adviser, tax-collector, chief magistrate, agricultural expert, and general admonisher of his subjects. When he enters the village, he has an eye for everything. Why is that heap of refuse allowed to encumber the road outside Abdul Karim's enclosure contrary to regulations? Let it be cleared away. The offender objects to the suggestion, and makes no sign of compliance. "Hookum hai—it is an order," says a voice, which is quite low and level; but Abdul knows the tone, and, with a sigh of resignation, he begins to remove the obstruction.

The head-man comes out with the village elders. They salame before the Burra Sahib, but they have a grievance. They collect round his horse, and pour out a billowy torrent of excited speech, in which you distinguish the word "Pani" (water), reiterated with sobbing passion. They are complaining that the engineers of the Public Works Department are stinting them of their lawful allowance of the fluid, or charging them unduly for that which they do receive. As the Head of the District moves slowly along, they follow him; the head-man with agitated staff sawing the air, keeps by his off stirrup-leather; a tall, black-bearded, sunburnt peasant, with his red mantle thrown round his right shoulder, raises an antistrophe from the other side; others behind and in front act as a voluble chorus; the village children grinning all over their brown faces, toddle gleefully in the wake of the procession. The pale-faced square shouldered gentleman, sitting erect in his saddle listens, asks a question now and again, and does not say much. He lets them chatter; it may be that their complaint is legitimate and must be looked into; in any case he knows that half their sense of injury will disappear if they are allowed to talk their fill upon it. And so on to another village and another, and then back to camp or bungalow, to make notes of what he has heard, to discuss it with the water officials, perhaps to begin a wearisome correspondence over it with the Public Works Department or the Provincial Government.

But years hence these orators of the hamlet will recollect their speeches and repeat them, and explain how they stood up before the Huzoor and patriotically spoke for the common weal; and sadly they will compare the Burra Sahib, the Protector of the Poor, who brought them to this good land, with the much inferior sahibs known to the younger generation. They will not have forgotten him, even after he has long left India and gone home for good, when such a scene as this may be no more than a dim memory, that will perhaps steal faintly back to his brain, as he turns over the evening papers in the smoking-room on some sunny afternoon. At the club they may have only a vague remembrance that So-and-So was once "something in India." Therein they are, indeed, not wrong. A man of this stamp is unquestionably Something in India.

14TH FEBRUARY 1906.

Bystander.—The rumour that the Prince and Princess of Wales will visit Japan before returning to England is still alive, and, if such a visit is considered to be in the interests of the nation, the Prince and Princess will assuredly not hesitate to undertake it. If, however, they consulted their own inclinations in the matter—a course seldom taken by the members of our Royal Family—the Prince and Princess would unhesitatingly return home at the earliest possible moment. Letters from Calcutta all remark how weary they both looked during their well-filled visit to that most loyal city. The Prince, evidently tired of sight-seeing, which, in India, after a time, resolves itself into a sort of kaleidoscopic procession of brilliant lights, and colours, seemed most keen on the polo, and, in fact, one day, when a game had been started, rent down word to have it stopped until he could get there, much to the annoyance of the players, whose ponies were just warming up to the game.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The question being asked now is whether the death of the King of Denmark will curtail the Royal tour out here in any way; we suppose that three months' court mourning will be ordered, but should the Prince and Princess of Wales keep to their original plan and visit us, this should not interfere with the State banquet and the few receptions which have been arranged.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The effect of a Royal visit is much the same at Singapore as in India judging by the following extract from a Straits paper:—"In view of the visit of Prince Arthur of Connaught, the unsightly mass of outhouses and woodyards that lie behind the Government offices are being boarded in so as to be invisible from the street, and tall poles are being erected for the purpose of bearing streamers and flags."

Madras Mail.—Preparations for the Prince and Princess of Wales's visit are proceeding, a Quetta correspondent writes, as all doubts which at one time existed about their coming here have now been removed. The Hon'ble Mr. Tucker, the Commissioner and Agent to the Governor-General, who had gone into camp at Sibi, is expected to return almost at once to enable him to personally superintend all necessary arrangements. Our roads are receiving more attention than they are used to, and our Amateur Dramatic Club is racking its brains to find a suitable piece to perform before the Royal visitors. The Royal visitors on leaving us go to Karachi, where they are to get a right Royal send-off. I hear that a statue of Queen Victoria, by Thomeycroft, is to be unveiled on this occasion by the Prince in the grounds of the Frere Hall, and that Rs. 12,000 is to be spent in giving the Gymkhana electric light at a cost of Rs. 400 monthly to maintain for the future. A photograph of the Karachi Gymkhana is also to be presented to Their Royal Highnesses as a souvenir of their visit. Whether a visit to Mangho Pir, which boasts of a tank famous for its collection of muggers and which is only eight miles from Karachi, is also contemplated, I have not heard, the father of all the muggers is reported to be 125 years old and when I saw him last he was, with the exception of suffering from great laziness, going strong. The place abounds with hot springs supposed to benefit leprosy, to treat which a Loper Asylum has been built.

Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales having expressed a wish to be present at a Soldiers' Church Service, it was arranged that she should attend Evensong at All Saints' Church, Trimulgherry, on Sunday, the 11th instant. At the request of the Lord Bishop of the Diocese, Her Royal Highness graciously consented to visit the Bishop Whitehead Soldiers' Institute at Trimulgherry. Accordingly as the Royal Party returned from the Bolarum Residency they stopped at the Institute, arriving there at 5-30 P.M. Her Royal Highness was accompanied by Mr. Bayley, the Resident, and Mrs. Bayley, the Countess of Shaftesbury, Mr. Frank Dugdale, Major Campbell and Captain MacNab, Aide-de-Camp to the Resident. By the express wish of Her Royal Highness the visit was kept quite private. The motor cars conveying the Royal party drew up at the main door of the large hall, and there Her Royal Highness was received by the Rev. H. N. Bridge, Chaplain of Trimulgherry and Secretary of the Soldiers' Institute, Sister Stella, Sister in Charge, and Miss Stoney. On her entrance into the hall Her Royal Highness presented large handsome autograph engravings of herself and the Prince of Wales to the Soldiers' Institute. These are to be placed in the large hall and will be much appreciated by the soldiers as a token of the honour done them by this long-to-be-remembered visit to their Institute.

Her Royal Highness was conducted to the supper room, and even behind the scenes to the stores, etc. She showed most kindly interest and amusement in some of the comic sketches done by a member of L. Battery which adorn the supper room. The games room and the billiard room were also visited, and from thence the party went to the reading room, where there is a small library and where the men can see many of the daily and illustrated papers. Her Royal Highness glanced at some of the papers, asking questions about what the men liked, etc., and then wrote her name and the date of her visit, etc., in the Institute Visitors' Book. Having seen the Chapel which adjoins the reading room, Her Royal Highness walked round the grounds of the Institute, saw the miniature rifle range, the bungalow occupied by the Sisters of the Church, and the Institute kitchen. When the time came to leave for church the soldiers who were at the Institute lined up by the drive and as Her Royal Highness passed in her motor they gave her three ringing cheers.

Her Royal Highness wore a most becoming heliotrope costume and motor coat of the same colour, and her toque was trimmed with pale violets to match. Lady Shaftesbury was dressed in white, with a white motor coat, and white toque and feather bon.

When Her Royal Highness arrived at the church she was received by Colonel Yourdi, P.M.O., who showed her into the front right hand pew, while the Resident and Mrs. Bayley occupied the corresponding pew on the left. Though the Service was not to be till 6-30, by 6 P.M. every available seat except those reserved for the Royal party and the soldiers who had been at the Institute was occupied. The Rev. H. N. Bridge took Evensong and chose for his text the 1st and 4th verses of the 21st Chapter of the Revelation of St. John. The Service was choral and the choir rose well to the occasion, especially in the last hymn, "Onward Christian Soldiers," which was heartily joined in by the congregation, largely composed of soldiers. The Service concluded with "God save the King." A large crowd of soldiers and natives collected outside the church and Her Royal Highness left amid loud and enthusiastic cheers.

The great act of condescension and favour on behalf of Her Royal Highness in visiting the Soldiers' Institute and the Garrison church will long be remembered gratefully by the soldiers who will look back with loyal enthusiasm to this visit of their future Queen.

Her Royal Highness, in addition to the favour done to the Institute on Sunday, evinced still further interest in it by sending on the following day a large parcel of newspapers and a donation of Rs. 100 with a letter from her Equerry expressing Her Royal Highness's interest in and good wishes for the success of the Institute.

On Saturday afternoon the Institute was visited by Lord and Lady Shaftesbury, Lord Crichton and Sir Charles Guest, who all signed the Visitors' Book and expressed much interest in the work which is being done there for the soldiers of the Queen.

15TH FEBRUARY 1906.

Englishman.—Seldom have the congratulations of an important public body been more sincere, or more well-merited, than those which have just been voted by the great landholders' society of Northern India, the British Indian Association, to their clever Honorary Secretary, the Maharaj Kumar Sir Prodyot Kumar Tagore, Kt., on the occasion of the honour conferred on him by the King-Emperor through His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. The Resolution of the British Indian Association runs as follows:—

"Resolved that the warm congratulations of the British Indian Association be conveyed to the Maharaj Kumar Sir Prodyot Kumar Tagore, Honorary Secretary of the British Indian Association, on the high honour of knighthood conferred on him by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, in appreciation of the arduous work done by him in connection with the Royal Reception, to the complete satisfaction of Their Royal Highnesses, of the landholders of the Province, and of the general public."

We are glad that this special recognition of the Maharaj Kumar's really splendid devotion to the task of making the Royal Reception the remarkable success it was, should be offered to him by the united voice of the territorial magnates of Northern India, of which order his distinguished father has always been one of the most conspicuous and most loyal members. With our contemporaries of the Indian Press, we can undertake to speak for the general public; and there has not been a single jarring note in the universal chorus in praise of the arrangements, which owed so much of their precision and their splendour to Sir Prodyot's tact and energy.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—Faluknama gleams white in its vivid freshness. Westward, across the plain which lies outspread before you as you look down from the hill, rises the ruined rock fortress of Golconda. The palace of Faluknama is new and bright. In age it has just entered its teens, and its historic record has but now begun. It has housed the son of the Emperor, the future Badshah of an Empire greater than Mughal ever conceived. Within its walls have rested the heirs to a world-wide sway come hither for the first and ever the memorable time from out the distant tiny island. The story of Faluknama will tell how they came in the splendour of Imperial state as guests of Hyderabad's ruler, how they were received and entertained in magnificence, and how Faluknama, still in its bright youth, put on the raiment of festival. The rest of Faluknama's story lies veiled. The purdah of the future may enshroud strange and notable happenings within its place, which overlooks the plain and city like an all-seeing sentinel. But the raising of the veil can disclose naught so stirring as the state which the ruins of Golconda unfold. There the embers of an ancient empire flickered out, there a kingdom sprang into being, and there a dynasty perished after a struggle Homeric in its greatness. The sons of an Emperor and an Emperor himself hammered at the gates of the fortress for months and months until treachery accomplished what valor alone failed to do. Golconda fell before Aurangzeb, after a resistance which must be classed among the greatest defences in history.

To-day Golconda is grand and majestic in its ruin. From the summit of the citadel, whence Abul Hasan, the last of the Qutb Shahi Kings, watched the progress made by Aurangzeb during the siege, you look down upon masses of masonry. Piled upon the rock, they rise welded and clustered in a fashion which still suggests impregnable strength. Looking beyond the wonderful picture of the crowded ruins of the city within the fort, beyond the great strong walls, and the ruins of the ditch encircling the rock, for miles you picture the plain peopled by the army of the besiegers. It is more than two hundred years since the Mughal threw his legions against this rock stronghold, and the greatness of the task which its capture involved may be still realised: Aurangzeb found it greater than he believed. Harassed in the rear by the field army of Golconda, with whom the Maratthas co-operated, and assailed by daily sorties from the fortress, the Delhi Emperor's army suffered heavily. Famine, pestilence and flood completed the dejection of the Imperial troops, but still Aurangzeb held on.

Rome was saved by the cackling of geese, and the barking of a dog led to the repulse of an attempt to escalate Golconda. But valorously as they might fight, the Dekhanis knew that the Emperor's resources must prevail: repulse after repulse only strengthened Aurangzeb's resolve to destroy the last kingdom that held out against him. Though his forces were beaten and disheartened, and many of his officers captured and returned to him, he would listen to no proposals from Abul Hasan. His doggedness told. The Golconda nobles began to desert their King and a cause that was plainly hopeless. Though the Musi might overflow its banks, it could not prevail against the relentness Mughal. And so the Amir of the Deccan grew weary and went over to the enemy. The time came when only two nobles remained by the side of the last of the Qutb Shah's King, and one of them betrayed him.

The story of the fall of Golconda is a tale of treachery relieved by the splendour of heroism. One of the two superior officers left to the King might lead the enemy into the fort, but the other, incorruptible to the end, would fall covered with wounds in a desperate attempt to redeem a lost cause. No tablet set forth the title of this Bayard to the honour of his countrymen, but history has enshrined his deed, and the fortress is the monument of his valor. From the mists of two centuries into the fort below springs the figure of Golconda's hero. The Mughals pour in by the main gate. Startled from sleep, Abdur Razzaq Khan seized his sword and buckler, and with horse unsaddled charges to battle. His cry to all who are true to their salt is answered by no more than twelve. "My life while it lasts is an offering to my master" he cries, as he strikes and strikes amid the press which bears him back to the citadel. There he falls and there he lies until the morrow, while the King for whom he fought is led captive to Aurangzeb. The eight months' siege is over: Golconda has fallen and a kingdom has been overthrown. Abdur Razzaq lives until he is found by the Mughal victors. They count more than seventy wounds on his body, yet this marvellous man lives. Romance does not require his death with his monarch's downfall. Treated by the Imperial Surgeons he recovers to take service with the Emperor after much persuasion, and after his fallen master has sanctioned the step. When the last of the Qutb Shahi dynasty fled from Hyderabad to the old fortress capital, hoping to avert the final disaster of all, he carried with him as much treasure as he could. Great spoil therefore fell into the hands of the Emperor.

To-day the wealth of Golconda is but a fable. The diamonds of which legends speak were brought here only to be cut and polished; the remains of former greatness are a picturesque ruin, redeemed from utter desolation by a Cantonment within the fort where a few of the Nizam's troops are quartered, and the State treasury is kept; but the outlook over the Deccan country is magnificent. The Musi river flows by the massive walls, lakes gleam silvery in the middle distance, the tombs of the Qutb Shahi Kings are close at hand, and Hyderabad lies outspread seven miles away. Best is the splendid old ruin seen as the sun flames westward and lights the battlements with the fires of eventide. The sun sinks behind the fortress rock and bastions and ramparts aglow with saffron splendour, the shadowed lake and opposite hills are pictures in purple and gold, and the enchantment grows until the last flame dies, the loopholes flash a last bright amber ray and the rock holds nought but ruin.

To-day the Princess of Wales visits Golconda and the neighbouring tombs and on the site of the ancient capital of the founders of Hyderabad hears the fascinating story of Golconda's fall.

Times of India.—A scheme has been set on foot through the initiative of His Highness the Aga Khan to start a Science School in connection with the Aligarh College with a view to commemorating the approaching visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales to that college, and as a token of regard in which they are held by the Indian Mahomedans. The fund was only recently started, His Highness the Aga Khan heading the list with a sum of Rs. 34,000. An informal meeting of the leading Mahomedans of this city was held last week at His Highness's bungalow at Walkeshwar with a view to adopting some practical measures to bring the matter ahead. It was then announced that the fund had reached a sum of one lakh of rupees in Northern India only. It was resolved to appoint a committee, composed of gentlemen representing the different sections of the Mahomedan community to collect the necessary funds. Among this committee are: His Highness the Aga Khan, President; Sir Currimbhoy Ebrahim, Kt.; Aga Mirza Mahomed Shiraji; Mr. Mahomedbhoy Currimbhoy; Mr. Sulleman Abdul Wahed; Mr. Haji Usuf Haji Ismail; Khan Bahadur Dawoodbhoy Moosabhoy; Khan Bahadur Hakim Mahomed Dayam; Mr. Saleh Mahomed Noorani; Mr. Nooroodin Ebrahim Nooroodin; Mr. Ismailji E. Kurwa; Khan Sahab Kazi Mahomed Ali Moorgay; Mr. Ahmed Dewji; Mr. Faiz B. Tyabji; Mr. Cassumali Jairajbhoy; Mr. Mahomedbhoy Rowji; Mr. Mahomedbhoy Adamji Peerbhoy; Mr. Ebrahim Adamji Peerbhoy; Mr. Raffiuddin Ahmed, Mr. Haji Ismail Gool Mahomed; Mr. Haji Sabu Sidik; Mr. Fazalbhoy J. Lalji; Mr. Ibrahim Hassam; Mr. Mahomed Hussien Makba; Mr. Alibhoy M. Jivanji; Mr. Ahmedbhoy Habibbhoy; Moulvi Abdulla Ahmed; and Mr. Kazi Kabiruddin. A meeting of the committee will be held at the offices of Sir Currimbhoy Ebrahim, Fort, at six o'clock this evening.

United India and Native States.—In our last issue we said that Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales was pleased to give audience to a number of widow pupils of the Maharani's College as well as to the graduate students. We are now enabled to give our readers a brief account of this memorable incident which is always remembered with pleasure.

In the first place, it must be stated that a proposal was made to make it convenient for Her Royal Highness to visit the College, and Her Royal Highness herself, as we afterwards learnt, was anxious to do so, but that wonderful person the Dewan of Mysore, who is all that enthusiasm and progress require, was a block in the way. He would not arrange for the visit on the ground that it was impracticable. Nevertheless, the Gods were favourable, and through the kind offices of the Hon'ble the British Resident and the earnest request, probably, of that devoted lady Miss Palethorpe, a private audience to a select number of pupils was arranged for on Sunday last. Miss Palethorpe, being requested to accompany them, selected the three lady teachers who were studying for their B. A. Degree, and five child-widows from the High School, the Pundita and the Middle School. These formed a very interesting group and represented the most orthodox and respected families. The B. A. students are well known as coming from the same family of the reputed poet of the time Krishnaraja Wodeyar III. The widow pupils also were clever and represented various stages of education. One of them had lost husband, father and brother—all within 9 days during the plague of 1903, and the rest did not even know when they lost their husbands. These were dressed becoming to their station and position.

All these first of all assembled at the Lady Superintendent's house where they were duly told how to observe etiquette in the presence of Royalty. After these hints were given all set out to the Government House and the Hon'ble Mr. Fraser led them up to Her Royal Highness. First of all, Miss Palethorpe was presented to the Princess and then the Lady Superintendent introduced, first the B. A. students and afterwards the widows. Her Royal Highness received them with a good deal of interest and first of all asked Miss Palethorpe where she had herself taken her degree. Miss Palethorpe said that it was from Newnham College. Whereupon the Princess remarked that she had herself visited it during Miss Gladstone's time. Her Royal Highness then began to ask various questions about the strength and work of the Maharani's College. She was interested in many of the important features of the College and asked how the supply of teachers was met, whether students came from out-stations, where and how they lived, and so forth. Her Royal Highness seemed surprised that there was no hostel provided for this model institution. She then approached the lady teachers and questioned them about their work. "Do you like it?" she asked; and was replied with an emphatic "Yes" accompanied by beaming smile. Her Royal Highness seemed to notice the advanced stage they had reached, and when informed that one of them had a family of children to look after, the Princess was considerably astonished. For she asked: "How do you find the time?" But this is just the remarkable feature of Mysore education which, without interfering with the orthodox forms of life and habits, yet gives the benefit of higher education to women. No doubt it must be trying but this is a necessary stage and has to be passed.

The Princess then turned to the young widows and Miss Palethorpe called her attention to the contrast between their plain attire and that of the well-dressed married ladies. This naturally led up to the sad position of widows which was rendered somewhat tolerable by the effect of education. The senior widow pupil, who is training herself in the Pundita line of Oriental education, was permitted to address Her Royal Highness in Sanskrit verses setting forth the gratitude felt by them for Her Royal Highness undertaking this great journey, leaving her children and home in order to personally acquaint herself with the people and conditions of this country. The stanzas at the end invoked a shower of blessings on the Princess from Yuvraj for this act of royal beneficence. This tribute was translated to her in English and Her Royal Highness seemed pleased with it.

The B. A. students then presented the Princess with a garland and the elder lady Srimathi K. D. Rukmanamma in a short and sweet speech thanked Her Royal Highness, while the two young widow pupils offered her bouquets. Her Royal Highness then shook hands with all with evident enthusiasm and expressed a wish that the little widows would get on well. Thus the audience ended.

In the course of the conversation Her Royal Highness repeated several times that she would have greatly liked to see the Girls' College herself. It is said she even remarked that she was very much interested in it and went so far as to ask how far the School was from there, whether it was on the way in the city and so forth, with evident anxiety to see it if possible even at that late occasion. But on being told it was Sunday and pupils could not be collected the idea was given up as hopeless. What a sad disappointment it is that the Dewan had not sufficient foresight in himself to arrange for a visit or give way when pressed by better heads. Her Royal Highness manifested so much interest that it would have been a very proud and ever memorable day in the History of the College to have had the honour of the Royal visit.

Her Royal Highness was throughout so gracious and so much interested in the progress of the students that the Hindu ladies were greatly delighted by the audience which they held as a great honour done to them and through them to the College. Not only the few students do so, but we are sure the whole country is proud of the honour and heartily thanks Her Royal Highness for it.

It is indeed a pity that a visit to the Mysore Maharani's College was not included in the programme arranged for the Royal visit. Whatever may be the shortcomings of the institution, no one will deny that it is an unique institution, unrivalled in all India. And we have no doubt that Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales would have carried away with her very pleasant recollections of the visit and the conviction that if time and opportunity are given to the women of India, they would by no means fall far short of European women. Next to a visit to the institution, however, we are glad to see that an idea was given to the Princess of the kind of work turned out by the College. In another column we publish from the "Mysore Standard" a detailed account of an informal meeting of select pupils and teachers of the College with our future Empress, from which it will be seen what a deep interest the Royal guest evinced in what she saw and heard among these, to whom she was all gracious and condescending. All the more pity, we say that Her Royal Highness could not visit the school while in working order.

We understand that His Highness the Maharajah of Travancore has abandoned the idea of meeting Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, and proposes recruiting his health at Cape Comorin.

16TH FEBRUARY 1906.

Indian Daily News.—The Royal visit to Hyderabad closes to-night, when the Prince and Princess begin their journey to Benares. The Prince does not come into Hyderabad from the shooting camp, going on from Nekonda to Wadi, where the Princess joins him. Reports from the Narsimpett camp show that His Royal Highness has had good sport. Though the first day was unproductive, the Prince's bag up to yesterday evening included three tigers and a panther, each despatched by a single shot. A panther and one tiger were the result of the same beat. The panther appeared first and directly after it was bowled over, the tiger sprang out. It rose to leap the dead beast and fell mortally wounded across the body of the panther. A fresh beat the same day yielded the second tiger, the third being secured yesterday. Hyderabad is the last of the Native States to be visited by Their Royal Highnesses. The preparations made in this, the premier among Indian States, have been extensive, and it will ever be regretted that the cloud of mourning which suddenly overhung the Nizam's capital came to stop the festivity.

The day of the review was an unhappy one. In sight of the Prince and Princess, an Imperial Service trooper was thrown from his horse, and when the charging cavalry had passed, he was somewhat unceremoniously and hurriedly hauled off the field. Later on he was more carefully carried away in a dhooly. But he appeared to have been seriously hurt, and the Prince and Princess were greatly anxious about him. It was a day of anxiety for everybody. The Nizam learned of the death of his favourite daughter, and upon this sad news the Prince and Princess were informed in the afternoon that the injured trooper had died from concussion of the brain. The distress of Their Royal Highnesses was naturally increased by this intelligence, but it has since appeared that the report was but an example of the exaggerated rumours which find currency in this city of many tongues. The report of the trooper's death has even been published abroad, but one is glad to be able to contradict it. The man was not so seriously injured as at first appeared. He was much shaken and bruised, but he was able to ride about by Tuesday. His life was probably saved by the courage of a comrade who having been dismounted at the same time, and finding the other man unable to rise stood near him holding his own horse, and signalled with his lance to each regiment of charging cavalry, as it advanced, to avoid them. In this way the prostrate man escaped any injuries beyond those suffered by the fall from his horse.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The United Provinces Light Horse are to form an escort for Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales during their visit to Benares. The escort will be composed of members of the Cawnpore, Oudh, Allahabad, Ghazipur, and Gorakhpur squadrons, and all are to arrive at the Royal Escort Camp at Benares by evening on the 16th instant, or early morning of the 17th, at latest. Their Royal Highnesses will arrive at Benares station at 8-30 A.M., on Sunday, the 18th instant, the arrival being private, the travelling escort being formed of the Ghazipur squadron. On Monday, 19th instant, the escort will turn out in full strength for the procession; and on the 20th, a travelling escort may be required for the drive to the railway station after the illuminations. Arrangements are being made for Regimental sports and competitions on the 21st instant.

The Princess of Wales with her suite will arrive in Lucknow on Wednesday next, the 21st instant, from Benares, and will probably remain for a week, going on from here to Dehra Dun. She will reside at Government House, which is now being arranged for her reception by Lady LaTouche, and will be placed entirely at her disposal during her stay.

Standard.—The voyager who comes down to Calcutta for the first time after a journey through the "mofussil" feels as if he had suddenly left India a long way behind. In the hot weather, it is true, the undesirable Indian sun and the feverish breath of the stewed, sodden land-breeze may convince him of his error. But in midwinter the climate is only just warm enough to be comfortable, and the air is clean, bright, and wholesome. In this invigorating season the stranger looks about him, and he sees people in European clothes and with European faces walking—positively walking, not driving or riding, or bicycling—even in the solid hours of the day, strolling across or beside a broad common which is neither brick-red nor dusty yellow, but a good northern green. He passes a line of shops, genuine shops, as they know them in the West, with counters and plate-glass windows. He perceives many imposing buildings, not Oriental in any sense, but stucco-classical, or pseudo-Gothic, or latter-day Renaissance. A further touch of homeliness is imparted by the frequent monuments which meet the vagrant gaze. Most of the Indian cities we have mercifully forborne to decorate with the masterpieces of modern British statuary. Our cantonments and Civil Stations are too impermanent and strictly utilitarian for such indulgences. But in Calcutta the statesman in trousers of changeless, if wrinkled, bronze stares gloomily from his pedestal, the hero curvets on a circus-horse of tormented marble. There is even a long stone cylinder, which resembles, if it does not consciously imitate, that painful column which rears itself unashamed over the steps at the bottom of Waterloo-place, S.W. The Duke of York was a sufficiently bad soldier to deserve a bad monument; but Sir David Ochterlony was a General of some distinction, and he should have been better treated.

Still one would not wish the Ochterlony column away from the Calcutta maidan, nor the other examples of modern British art which adorn that noble stretch of verdure. Nor would one care to see them denationalised or made much other than they are. It is a just instinct which has dictated that the new Memorial Hall, in honour of Queen Victoria, of which the Prince of Wales laid the foundation stone during his visit, shall be "classical" in its design, with no suggestion of Orientalism at all. It might look very splendid with domes and minarets of stainless white marble, of which material it is to be built; but it would not respond to the local tradition. Calcutta is an English city, the second of the Empire, and it does well to be conscious of the fact—a city which owes its very existence to English adventure, and its greatness to English rule. We are not here inheriting past stories or treading in the steps of fallen dynasties. But for the English, all that there now is of Calcutta would to-day be no more than a few villages scattered among the swamps of the Hooghly, as it was when Mr. Job Charnock bought the site for the East India Company, two hundred and seventy years ago. Charnock lies buried, with a legible inscription over his grave, in the old church of St. John's, with his native wife, not beside him; for the story is that the lady was a Hindoo widow, whom he rescued by force just as she was about to commit sati, and though she lived with him to the end, and bore him children, she was never converted to Christianity, and died a "pagan."

Charnock, however, was the first of the long line of great merchants, statesmen, administrators, and soldiers, who never wavered from the determination that Calcutta should be the Imperial centre of British power and commerce in the East.

From Charnock to Curzon—it is a long and notable succession—through Clive, Warren Hastings, Cornwallis, Wellesley, Bentinck, Dalhousie, Canning, Lawrence, Lytton. The history of Calcutta is a record of great names and great events, on which Englishmen might be excused for dwelling with much more self-satisfaction than they commonly exhibit. Thanks largely to the late Viceroy, the old memorials have been restored, and new ones erected. The streets are full of associations. In one corner of the maidan are the mounds and earthworks and bastions of Fort William, a name which ought to make our hearts beat higher when we think of Robert Clive, albeit it is not Clive's Fort William, but one of slightly later date in which Lord Kitchener rules the Indian Army to-day. Walking from the stately stairs of Government House we come upon Wellesley-place, which recalls one famous Proconsul, and Dalhousie-square, named after another. And when we have registered our letters at the post office we can shiver at the tablet on the corner wall, which tells us that a few yards distant was the Black Hole, that torture-chamber, 22 feet by 14, where 146 human beings spent the night of an Indian June; and we can walk across to the marble obelisk, renovated and restored by Lord Curzon, which one of the 23 survivors erected in memory of his fellow-sufferers. Hastings House, too, has been restored and acquired by the Imperial Government; and, if you like, you can drive out past the common, and the shops and offices and Chowringhee, along the line where the electric trams run, past the bungalows set back among the trees and gardens, past Belvedere, where the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal lives, and where Hastings fought his famous duel with the author of "Junius," to the leafy village-suburb of Alipore, where the great Proconsul himself resided, with the woman he adored, and whom he had made his own under such strangely romantic circumstances. But one need not tell the story again. That episode, at least, is familiar to some people who know little else of Anglo-Indian history; for in these gossip-loving days a great man's affairs of the heart are apt to be remembered when his deeds and works are forgotten.

The mention of Hastings and his Austrian Baroness and the Black Hole recalls Macaulay, the first writer who brought India into English literature. We can go back to Chowringhee, and pass through the hospitable portals of the Bengal Club—always open to any properly accredited visitor—and so be in the very house which Macaulay himself occupied when he was legal member of the Governor-General's Council. Here Macaulay spent the cold weather of four happy years, enjoying himself hugely, drafting the Penal Code, delighting in everything—in the society of the statesmen and civilians, he met on the Council, in the big salary he drew (the rupee was a rupee in those days), which made him independent for the rest of his life, in Orme and Tod and the other historians of India, and, above all, in the life and colour of the wonderful land which he rendered into his own animated prose, for the first time making people at home realise that India was something else besides a country whence a man returned possibly with a larger income; certainly with a larger liver.

But it is as a home of English trade even more than a seat of English statesmanship that Calcutta impresses one. The factors and merchants of the East India Company may have been founding an Empire, to use the late Sir John Seeley's phrase, in a fit of absence of mind. Perhaps they had no consciousness of the political results of their enterprise, and shrank from the dominion which their generals and viceregerents compelled them reluctantly to acquire. But they did intend that Calcutta should be a world-centre of trade, the British mart and emporium for the Eastern Continent. They laid their foundations broad and deep, and the building has endured, and waxed exceeding great. There is an air of solidity and permanence about European Calcutta which is wanting to most of the English settlements in India. Soldiers and civilians who are merely encamped on the soil for a term of years, and that broken by frequent flights homeward, need not be too particular about their accommodation. Soon the bungalow and the garden will be left to others, and the transient tenant will never care to look on them again. Naturally, under such conditions, people do not build and plant for posterity.

With the merchants and particularly the merchants of the days before fast steamers, it was otherwise. From the beginning they felt they were on the Hooghly to stay. The trader could not often be leaving his business to take holiday when the voyage to Europe occupied months, and there were no hill-stations. Calcutta was to be his home for perhaps the greater part of his life, and when he left, or died, the firm would go on, and there would be others to take his place. It was worth while to set up an office or warehouse that would endure, and a house in which a man might live in comfort even through the hot weather. So they built fine mansions, spacious and durable, planned with no more concession to Eastern ideas than was necessary for shelter against the sun. You see these stately old dwelling-houses, behind the masts and funnels, as you steam up the river along Garden Reach. Society has deserted this quarter now, but it has migrated to others nearer the centre of the city and the maidan, and here the manufacturers, the men of business, and the high officials live in handsome houses, behind white walls over which the bougainvillias droop their purple blossoms. In most of the Indian cities the members of the governing race are poor, and what wealth there is seems to be chiefly in native hands. But Calcutta is the seat of a highly affluent European community, which holds its own in commerce in spite of the Hindu baniyas, and the pushing Marwari dealer. The great jute mills, the cotton mills, the iron works, the shipping lines, are in Western hands. It is a thriving manufacturing centre, where England holds her own, though the Germans are active too—a haunt of comfortable people, who can afford to dress their wives in garments for which the "up-country" ladies sigh in vain to give resplendent dinner parties, to keep half a dozen excellent clubs in high prosperity and to make the Tollygunj racecourse on a Cup-day look rather like Ascot or Goodwood.

But there is a native town, too, and it is not one of which white Calcutta is too proud. It has the squalor of the East, without its picturesque colour—a nest of mean streets unpaved, dirty, and shabby, lined with dingy shops and malodorous hovels. The poorest bazaars of most Indian cities have a redeeming touch of local character; but in Calcutta they are Western or cosmopolitan. There are busy thoroughfares, which are as ugly as the working-class suburbs of an English seaport, there are rows of small houses, where the Chinese carpenter plies his trade, and there are back alleys which have the shiftless, untidy aspect of Southern Europe. Native Calcutta is like some of her own citizens: she has departed from the ways of the East only to produce a very poor, tattered vestry of the West.

Yet there is an Oriental Calcutta which is still primitive enough, and you need not go far to find it. You may see any morning close beside the great Howrah bridge, over which the clerks, and shop-assistants, and labourers are pouring in to their work in an endless stream like that which rolls across London Bridge or Blackfriars. A stone's throw distant the pile of steps leading down to the river, from which the people bathe in crowds, for the Hooghly is a branch of it.

Ganges, and its waters are credited with the virtues of that sacred stream. They come from remote inland districts of Bengal, from Bihar, and Orissa, and Sikkim, and Assam. It is a curious manifestation. The railway trundles its goods trucks close at hand, wagons laden with bales from the mills creak along the road behind them, the chains and mooring ropes of tramp steamers and iron lighters are before them. But the bathers care for none of these things. In the dust by the roadside, where the groaning wheels of the big trollies almost touch it as they pass, a little altar to Ganesh has been set up. A Brahmin crouches beside the hideous four-armed image, and a worshipper, naked to the waist, listens with joined hands and half-closed eyes while the holy man goes through his muttered incantations.

Or you may go any Tuesday morning to the shrine of Kali, at Kalighat, which is the original of Calcutta, where you may see Hinduism in one of its rampant phases. Through a rookery of reeking narrow lanes, leading up from a muddy creek, you come upon the black little courtyard, with its group of temple buildings, one of which holds the idol of the Destroying Goddess. The place is swarming with people, some still dripping from their bath, some holding moist and bleating lambs and kids which are to be offered up in sacrifice after being duly soused in the slimy canal. There is a sort of butcher's block in one corner, round which half-draped priests, wild-looking and dirty, congregate. One of them presses a wretched animal's neck into a hollowed cavity of the wooden frame; another swings a long, curved cleaver aloft, and with a single blow slices off the head, leaving a spout of blood to join the crimson pool on the slippery flag-stones. Then the palpitating little body is carried into the inner temple to be offered to the idol, round which an eager crowd is squeezing.

It is not a nice spectacle, and we quit it without reluctance. As we pass out of the squalid precincts our attention is directed to a square pool set back in a sort of hollow behind the temple and the priests' houses. A single white-robed female figure is bowing and prostrating itself at the water's edge, a figure whose attitude, even through the shrouding veil, is instinct with a sort of despairing pathos. For this is a childless woman, who is beseeching the goddess to lift from her the worst affliction but one that Indian womanhood can endure. Her prayers, at least, are genuine, whatever may be the case with the savage revellers in the temple slaughter-house. But the gongs of the electric tramcars are clinking merrily at the end of the road; and as we step into one to go back to Chowringhee we reflect that there is a good deal of unvarnished Indian Orientalism even in Europeanised and babu-ridden Calcutta.

17TH FEBRUARY 1906.

Englishman.—It has now been arranged that Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales is to leave the Prince's Camp at Benares on the 20th instant. She will be at Lucknow from 21st to 27th instant, and at Dehra Dun from 28th instant to 7th March, rejoining the Prince at Aligarh on the 8th March.

Queen.—The Prince of Wales is now free to devote himself to a couple of days' genuine sight-seeing, as this is the period allotted in the official itinerary for what are perhaps the most remarkable monuments in India. Daulatabad will be the headquarters—officially "Prince of Wales's camp"—during the visit to Ellora. This historic fort is well worth the attention of the tourist. In the inner defences can be seen a unique method of protection, which dates possibly from this great siege by the Moghul Emperor towards the end of the thirteenth century. It is a kind of portcullis, an iron shutter some 20 feet high, and 1 inch thick, which was heated red hot, and naturally proved a difficult defence to force. A deep furnace for creating a strong draft, on the principle of the modern crematorium, excavated in the solid rock can also be seen.

It will be best to ignore the advice of the guide-books which recommend that two whole days should be given up to the Ellora Temples. This is a counsel of perfection, except for architectural students. The ordinary tourist had better confine himself to a few of the more representative and better preserved of the thirty-two Buddhist, Jain, and Brahman Temples, and for this one day suffices.

Economy of construction was, no doubt, the raison d'être of the Indian cave temples. Indeed, Fergusson has estimated that the excavation of a rock temple would cost only about one-tenth of the sum required for building a similar temple. Then the Buddhist cave temples (Chaitya) would cost even less, as the rock was not completely cut away and the temple isolated, but a cave-like interior was merely excavated, as in the case of the Abou Simbel temples on the Upper Nile.

The Jains, on the other hand, were more builders than excavators. The most characteristic feature of a Jain temple is the horizontal archway, and this principle was even carried out in their domes, which were "built horizontally on eight pillars forming an octagon, with four external pillars at the angles to form a square." The employment of this method, instead of the Byzantine and Gothic radiating style, precluded, of course, the use of large domes.

Pierre Loti, who visited these wonderful temples at night, gives us in his travel book, L'Inde (which, by the way, is curiously indicative of the author's anglophobic tendency, for it was originally termed L'Inde sans les Anglais), one of the most vivid descriptions of these temples ever penned. Loti very graphically describes the obsession of Siva, the implacable god of death by which visitors of imaginative temperament seem possessed. I have ventured to attempt a free translation, which may give some idea of the wonderful vigour and picturesqueness of Loti's style.

At the very threshold of the temple the dread silence seems to assume a shape at once singular and terrible. On the rocks all round us we see human forms in petrified agonies—agonies in suspense for ten centuries; in another chamber the awful Siva, god of death, dominates everything. Siva adorned with necklaces or skulls, a Siva who fertilises and a Siva who destroys. Siva with ten-fold arms, so as to kill from ten sides at once. Siva who dances and shrieks with triumph over the gasping remains. Siva, overcome with joy and laughter, as he tramples out the life of young girls and dashes out their brains.

It will be seen, then, that the tourist must be prepared for a feast of sculptured horrors. Indeed, the whole of this quarried-out mountain, "right to its very heart, is filled with vague ghastly forms, all impregnated with lust and the rattle of death."

By far the finest of all the group of temples—Brahman, Buddhist, or Jain—is the Kylas (Kailasa), which Fergusson does not hesitate to call "the most wonderful and interesting monument of architectural art in India." To appreciate this most complete of Dravidian rock temples a couple of hours at least should be given. Indeed, the tourist should not attempt to visit more than three or four out of the whole congeries of temples. The whole temple is practically one vast monolith, a huge section of the rock having been quarried out of the hill-side; and this isolated mass has been hollowed into great chambers, courts, pinnacles, towers, etc., and the whole surface, inside and out, has been sculptured with reliefs depicting scenes from Indian mythology.

Kailasa is, indeed, one of the finest ex-voto offerings in the world. It was built by some eighth century Rajah out of gratitude for his restoration to health through drinking the waters of some neighbouring springs.

The design of Kailasa is elaborate and intricate but easy to follow with the help of the excellent diagram in Murray's Guide. It consists of three parts, a portico, a large central hall (corresponding to the cella of Greek temples), and an inner shrine. The temple court is some 270 feet long by 150 feet wide, while the end wall is over 100 feet high. The most striking features are the huge stone elephants projecting from the wall and forming a magnificent series of caryatides.

But the most "popular" temples are the Ravan Ka Khai Temple, and the temple of the Ten Incarnations (Das Avatara), these are ornamented (?) with an extraordinary series of grotesque and horrible sculptures showing the ferocious and cruel acts of Siva, the Destroyer—a kind of nightmare in stone, compared to which mediæval gargoyles are tame and insipid.

The Das Avatara is of some mythological interest, as all the incarnations (avatara) of Vishnu, one of the three manifestations of Brahma, are represented.

The Buddhist temples date from about 350 to 750 A.D. The best is the Mahawara (No. 5). This is a monastery (vihara) not a temple (chaitya), but, according to some authorities, it was used as a hall of assembly. The most striking of the five Jain caves, which are some distance away, is the Indra Sabha. The guide will probably show here two remarkable pillars which on being struck emit a musical sound.

To conclude with a little practical advice, tourists on the whole will find it preferable to leave the train at Aurangabad station, sixteen miles from the caves, instead of Daulatabad station (recommended in the guide books), unless, of course, they have been able to get a permit from the Resident from Hyderabad to use the Nizam's Dak Bungalow at Ellora. Daulatabad is nearer (ten miles), but there is no refreshment room as at Aurangabad.

But the tourist in India will soon learn that sight-seeing is not organized or systematised as in Europe, and that it is never safe to assume that sleeping accommodation, or even refreshments, are obtainable even at world-famous sights such as the Ellora Caves.

Times.—The visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Haidarabad has brought to a fitting close that side of the Royal tour which has been devoted to the Native States of India. Among all the Indian feudatories of the Crown the Nizam of Haidarabad justly claims the most considerable place. No other Indian Prince governs territories so large or wealthy. In mere area, the Nizam's dominions are equal to the whole extent of England, Scotland, and Wales—a fact which conveys some idea of the immense bulk of the Indian Empire, and of the singularly important place in it occupied by the feudatory States. The Nizam is also in possession of the fullest degree of sovereignty enjoyed by any native Prince. He has the rights of coinage and taxation, he may inflict capital punishment without appeal, and bestow titles of honour on his subjects. So fully is his independence recognized in the domestic affairs of his state that extradition treaties between the Nizam and the British Government still nominally exist. To these elements of material strength and important rights of sovereignty the Nizam adds yet another title of distinction. He is chief among the Mussulman princes of India, not only in wealth and power, but as tracing back his lineage to Abu Bakr, the first follower and immediate successor of Mahomed. It is not always easy for Englishmen to remember that the British Empire is numerically the greatest Mussulman Power in the world. Even so it is true that among the teeming millions of India's population the Mahomedans only count about one-fifth, and in the Nizam's own dominions the proportion of Mahomedans and Hindus is only one in ten. But the importance of the Nizam's influence, and the value of his tried loyalty, are not to be estimated by fractions. His magnificent offer of £600,000 in 1887 for the defence of the Indian frontier, his offers of military assistance to the British Government during the Egyptian war and the Penjdeh crisis, set a "splendid example"—to use our own words at the time—not merely to the martial Indian races of his own creed, but to all the native princes. The devotion of this great native ruler to the British Crown will have been cemented still further by the visit of the King-Emperor's son and Heir-Apparent to Haidarabad. A sudden domestic bereavement, in which the Nizam will have the sympathy of all Englishmen, cut short the festivities at Haidarabad on the eve of the State banquet, but the Nizam did not stand in need of this ceremonial to testify what he called at the Coronation Durbar his "historical friendship and loyalty."

The annals of Haidarabad are typical in many respects of the development of that steadily growing connexion between the British Raj and the feudatory Princes which has gone on all over India. It is a connexion which has passed through distinct phases, and kept a thread of continuity traceable through them all. When we think in vague outline of the native Princes of India, we are perhaps too apt to regard them as immemorial dynasties by the side of which British power appears as an intruding and possibly disturbing factor. That conception needs to be corrected by a knowledge of the conditions under which, in most cases, our connexion with the native States arose. It began in that period of chaos which attended the dissolution of the Moghul Empire. Amid the general anarchy, and more especially in view of Marhatta ambitions, the British power intervened for protection and maintenance. Few, if any, Native States could be survived if British power had not been exerted on their behalf. Thus in 1788 Lord Mornington could write that "it would be a wise policy for us to check the rapid declension of the Nizam's weight among the powers of Hindostan. Fifty years before that, our lot had been closely linked with Haidarabad in our historic duel with France for supremacy in India. It was there that the bold genius of Dupleix discerned an opportunity: and it was there afterwards that the quarrels of Bussy and Lally most fatally undermined the French position. The British connexion, first formally inaugurated by the treaty of 1765, has been developed and extended by successive arrangements, each of which has recorded some fresh advance in the British Government's conception of its relation to the feudatory States. Up to the beginning of the nineteenth century we were still striving to maintain our own position and unwilling to assume fresh responsibilities in the nature of alliances. Then came a phase, lasting up to the Mutiny, when we found ourselves obliged to go forward and undertake the protection of many hitherto fully Sovereign States, while isolating them politically from one another. Still the final solution remained undetermined, and general annexation might yet seem a possibility. But the closing period since the Mutiny has brought about a solution which is neither annexation nor absorption, but characteristically British in its scrupulous maintenance of existing legal forms. The continued existence of the Native States as a distinct element in the Indian Empire is, however, much more than an antiquarian survival. It means their partnership with the British Power in all tasks of peaceful development, and their admission to a future of progress with full preservation of their own individuality.

No one has given better expression to the new ideal before the Native States than the great Viceroy who left India last autumn, after a term of office in which British relations with the Indian feudatory Princes constantly occupied a chief place in his mind. "I believe in them," said Lord Curzon in his striking Guildhall speech, of which our Special Correspondent reminds us, "not as relics, but as rulers; not as puppets, but as living factors in the administration. I want them to share their responsibilities as well as the glories of the British rule." He himself worked unweariedly for the promotion of this ideal not merely by visiting States where no Viceroy had been seen before, but by opening up a career to the young Chiefs of India through his institution of the Imperial Service Corps, and by gratifying Indian loyalty through his acceptance of offers of troops and personal services outside the bounds of India. Measures like these, appealing to the spirit of enterprise in the Indian Princes, form the natural complement to those impressive displays of personal allegiance to the Crown which the native rulers gave on the occasion of Queen Victoria's Jubilee, Diamond Jubilee and the Coronation Durbar three years ago. Side by side with them is the more unobtrusive but even more important improvements in administration and works of public usefulness which have been carried on under the auspices of feudatory rulers. The British Government, on its part, has given unmistakable pledges to the Native Princes of its intention to maintain their separate States and sovereignty unimpaired, provided they in turn are ready to recognize their obligations. Perhaps the most signal of these pledges which has occurred in the last quarter of a century has been the "rendition of Mysore, the large and admirably governed State which the Prince and Princess of Wales visited on their way to Haidarabad. After a lapse of fifty years, during which circumstances had obliged us to take over the direct administration of Mysore, it was restored in 1881 with full sovereign powers to the Maharajah. The Royal visit to the Native States sets the seal on the wise policy of the Government. Important as have been many of its aspects, it is possible that none will exert a more abiding influence than this personal intercourse between the native feudatories and the Heir-Apparent to the Crown.

There must inevitably be a certain sameness about the spectacular side of the Royal progress, and the official function and ceremonial episodes of Their Royal Highnesses' visit to Haidarabad following practically the same lines as in other Native States would hardly have called for special comment even if their course had not been prematurely arrested by so melancholy an event as the death of the Nizam's daughter. But there are other aspects of the visit to which attention may be directed. At Haidarabad the Prince and Princess of Wales have brought to a close the series of Royal visits to the feudatory States which has been so important a feature of their tour, and thus they have not inappropriately brought it to a close in the capital of a great Ruling Chief whose position is in many ways one of unquestionable pre-eminence. For the Nizam not only prides himself upon being the Premier Prince of the Indian Empire as the ruler of the largest, wealthiest, and most populous of all the Native States, with an area equal to that of England, Scotland, and Wales, a gross revenue of over 46 crores, and a population of 12,000,000, but as a Mussalman potentate claiming descent from Abu Bakr, the immediate successor of the Prophet, he naturally stands forth as the most prominent representative of the sixty odd million Mahomedans who form more than one-fifth of the whole population of India.

As a reigning dynasty, the Nizams of Haidarabad cannot, it is true, vie in point of antiquity with the Hindu Princes of India. It is less than two centuries ago that the founder of its fortunes first appeared in the Deccan as the Viceroy of the Moghul Emperors with the title of Nizam-ul-Mulk Bahadur—i.e., Exalted Regulator of the State—which has been retained ever since by his successors. The story of the rise of the Nizams during the eighteenth century, first in nominal allegiance to and gradually in more and more open defiance of Delhi, of the part they played first on one side and then on the other in the Indian episodes of the great Anglo-French struggle, and of the straits to which they were in turn reduced by the growth of the Mahratta power, forms one of the most instructive chapters in the history of India. It illustrates perhaps more closely than any other the gradual evolution of British policy towards the Native States of Hindustan, of which Sir William Lee-Warner has admirably described the three phases. In the first place, nothing more was aimed at than the maintenance of a balance of power by opportunist alliances; in the second, we claimed the position of primus inter pares; and, in the third, we have achieved that of primus supra omnes. The treaty of Haidarabad of 1766 already marked the close of the first phase, and with the treaty of 1798, confirmed and extended by the Treaties of 1800 and of 1822, we actually entered upon the third phase. But it is only fair to ourselves to remember that in the case of Haidarabad, as in the case of so many other Native States, we only claimed a position of paramountcy in return for protection which had become indispensable to the preservation of the Nizam's own dominions. Lord Mornington advocated the conclusion of the Treaty of 1798 with the Nizam on the specific ground that, in view of the Mahratta peril, "it would be wise for us to check the rapid declension of the Nizam's weight among the powers of Hindosthan."

The Nizams of Haidarabad, it may be freely admitted, have never been unmindful of their obligations to the Paramount Power which protected them in their hour of need against Mahratta aggression. They have conducted their domestic administration, especially during the last half-century, on wisely progressive lines, to which the development of the material resources of the State and the general growth of prosperity bear witness no less eloquently than the marked improvements in the departments of justice, education, and sanitation. Their relations with the Government of India have always been dignified and honourable. Differences have from time to time arisen, even on important questions, and those connected with the so-called "Assigned Districts of Berar and the Hyderabad Contingent were finally solved to the mutual satisfaction of both parties only three years ago by a new agreement between the Government of India and the Nizam, which was by no means the least of the many statesmanlike achievements of Lord Curzon's Viceroyalty. But in spite of occasional friction the loyalty of the Nizams has never wavered, not even during the Mutiny. It was the present enlightened ruler of the Deccan, brought up under the influence of the great Haidarabad Prime Minister Sir Salar Jang, who in his famous letter to Lord Dufferin offered, on the occasion of Queen Victoria's first Jubilee in 1887, a sum of 60 lakhs for the exclusive purpose of Indian frontier defence. His offer initiated a movement for the more direct co-operation of the feudatory Princes of India in the defence of the Empire, in times both of peace and of war, which not only produced an immediate and deep impression both at home and abroad by proclaiming publicly an indissoluble community of interests between the Paramount Power and the Ruling Chiefs as against foreign aggression, but rapidly took concrete shape in the creation of that fine body of Imperial Service Troops which has become a permanent and valuable contribution from the Native States to the effective strength of our Indian forces.

It is indeed difficult to overestimate the services which the Nizams have thus rendered to the British Raj. It was, perhaps, an exaggeration, excusable enough in the circumstances, for the Governor of Bombay to telegraph as he did on the outbreak of the Mutiny to the Resident at Haidarabad, "If the Nizam goes, all is lost; but the gravity of the situation would have been enormously enhanced if the Nizam, yielding to the temptations of religious and racial affinities, had thrown his influence into the scale on the side of rebellion, and the Haidarabad Contingent had swelled the ranks of the mutineers instead of rendering effective service in the operations against them. Again the offers of military assistance made by the present Nizam at the time of the Egyptian campaign of 1882 and during the Penjdeh crisis on the Afghan frontier derived peculiar significance from the prestige which the Haidarabad ruler enjoys amongst Mussalmans all over India, who comprise some of the finest fighting races of the peninsula. That influence is indeed all the more valuable in that it is mainly a moral influence, for within the Nizam's dominions the proportion of Mahomedans to Hindus is barely one in ten, or less than one in sixty of the total Mahomedan population of India.

The Prince of Wales's visit to Haidarabad has been not merely a well-deserved compliment to a great ruling Chief whom the King-Emperor's Viceroy officially addresses as "My friend," but a final confirmation of the assurance which the Royal tour has once more personally conveyed to all the Native States that it is the settled policy of the Supreme Government to respect and maintain their territorial integrity and the sovereignty of their rulers, so long as the latter are willing to fulfil their duties both towards their own subjects and towards the Paramount Power. That policy has never been more clearly and more weightily expounded than by Lord Curzon in his great speech at the Guildhall on July 20, 1904:—

"I have always been a devoted believer in the continued existence of the Native States in India, and an ardent well-wisher of the Native Princes; but I believe in them not as relics but as rulers, not as puppets but as living factors in the administration. I want them to share the responsibilities as well as the glories of British rule."

Herein lies the significance of the Royal visits to the Native States, and it is clear from the published text of the speeches which would have been delivered at the State banquet last Saturday, had it not been necessarily abandoned owing to the Nizam's bereavement, that significance has been fully appreciated by His Highness, who, as Premier Prince of the Indian Empire, is "pre-eminently qualified by position, experience, and tradition to interpret the sentiments of the Princes and people of India towards the British Throne."

SELECTIONS FROM ENGLISH PAPERS OWNED BY NATIVES OF MADRAS AND ON VERNACULAR PAPERS PUBLISHED IN MADRAS FOR THE WEEK ENDING 17TH FEBRUARY 1906.

Aflab-i-Dakhan.—The Aflab-i-Dakhan of the 15th February writes that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has spoken very highly of the excellent management and discipline of the Madras Police Force, and observes with great regret that the Commissioner of Police, Madras, who has played an active part in the arrangement for the Royal Reception, received no share of any Royal honours and distinctions, though the Police Commissioners of Calcutta and Bombay were fortunate enough to get titles and honours.

Naiyar-i-Azam.—The Naiyar-i-Azam (Moradabad) of the 12th February says that some time ago it was rumoured that a member of the Royal family would in future be appointed as Viceroy of India, that though the proposal was not yet formally made, it had the approval of the King-Emperor; and that probably the first Viceroy of the Royal family would be the Duke of Connaught, or, according to some, the Duke of Teck. It matters little which member of the Royal family is selected for the Viceroyalty of India. An owner has always greater regard and love for his prosperity than his servant. Mercenary "Kings" (Viceroys) can hardly have true sympathy with Indians, whereas Viceroys appointed from the Royal family are sure to look upon Indians as their own subjects and treat them as such. Why, the Indians would much rather put up with bad measures that the latter class of Viceroys might adopt at any time, believing that these would "bear their burdens" too at another time. Such Viceroys will of course take pains to make themselves well acquainted with the true state of things in India, and the grievances of the people will, through them, sooner or later reach the ears of His Gracious Majesty. It is altogether proper that a "servant" should be installed in the place of such illustrious Indian sovereigns as Akbar, Shahjahan and Aurangzeb. Would that the day arrived soon when Royalty would sit again on the Indian gaddi!

18TH FEBRUARY 1906.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—According to the original programme of the Royal tour the Prince and Princess of Wales were to have paid a visit to the celebrated caves of Ellora on Saturday, on their way from Hyderabad to Benares. Elaborate preparations had been made for the reception, the Nizam's Government having sanctioned a sum of Rs. 50,000 for the purpose. The Aurangabad Correspondent of the Bombay Gazette says that the visit has fallen through, and the funds thus spent will be placed to the debit side of the famine relief works accounts.

19TH FEBRUARY 1906.

Englishman.—The long journey of the Prince and Princess of Wales, northwards, concluded this morning. They left Hyderabad on Thursday evening or rather in the small hours of Friday morning, and travelled by the broad-gauge route via Dhond and Manmad so as to avoid the inconvenience caused by a break of gauge involved in the Hyderabad-Godavari Line. In the route the halt at Itarsi was utilized to present to the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company's employees the shield given by the St. John's Ambulance Association for competition between all the railways in the country. This was won by the Great Indian Peninsula for the second year in succession, and Mr. Henry Wenden, C.I.E., the Agent to the Company, and closely identified with the enterprising policy pursued since he succeeded to the office, and Mr. George Lund, who has devoted himself heart and soul to the cause of furthering the work of the Association in India were present when the staff were thus honoured.

Benares has experienced the unusual phenomenon for this period of heavy fall of rain. For three days it poured. This sadly hampered the work of decorating the city and in other ways interfered with the arrangements to give Their Royal Highnesses a fitting reception, but it had this advantage—it made the weather delightfully cool and crisp. There was a snap in the air when the train steamed into the station this morning to which the Prince and Princess have been strangers since they left Lucknow and so crowded have been these weeks that Lucknow seems a very distant memory now. To-day being Sunday, in accordance with the rule laid down at the commencement of this progress there was no official ceremony of any description. The arrival at the station was quite informal and Their Royal Highnesses drove quietly to Nandesar House where they will be housed during their stay in Benares. This evening they attended Divine Service at St. Mary's Church.

Small as is the part that Benares has filled in what for want of a better term may be called Anglo-Indian history, Nandesar House and St. Mary's Church figure prominently in it. It was in Nandesar House that on January 14th, 1799, Mr. Davis, Judge and Magistrate of Benares, was attacked by the followers of Wazir Ali, the deposed Nawab of Oudh, who had first murdered the Resident, Mr. Cherry. Mr. Davis defended himself with a spear at the top of the staircase leading to the roof on which he had placed his family until rescued by a Cavalry Regiment. A score of years earlier, as commemorated on the Memorial Tablet visible from the river, Warren Hastings narrowly escaped with his life when the troops sent to keep the Raja Chet Singh in confinement were massacred. Then St. Mary's Church was consecrated by the saintly Bishop Heber. But it is not, of course, these associations that have brought the Prince and Princess of Wales to Benares. They have come because it is the Rome of the Hindus, beautiful in the splendour of its river front, fascinating in the life and character of its narrow tortuous streets, repulsive in the unredeemed coarseness that affronts you the moment you scratch the surface, and in the course of the next two days Their Royal Highnesses will see all that is picturesque in Benares and in its brightest guise.

The Princess of Wales will probably visit Agra during the absence of the Prince in Nepal. The precise date has not yet been fixed. The preparations for the shooting trip of the Prince in Nepal Terai are nearing completion. The first camp will be at Thori close to the border between Nepal and British Territory north of Bettiah. The party will proceed some forty miles into the Chitawn district of Nepal. All the elephants in Nepal have been collected for the shoot by the Prime Minister, and the principal landowners of the neighbouring British districts have also sent in their quota for transport work. The prospects of a fine bag of tiger and rhino are good, and some wild elephants are known to be in the shooting area if the time can be spared to attempt their capture.

Sir Chandra Shamsher, Prime Minister of Nepal, will reach his shooting camp at Thori to-morrow and will receive the Prince of Wales there on Wednesday.

Englishman.—The "Times," discussing the visit of the Prince of Wales to Hyderabad, which has fittingly closed the tour of the Native States, says that the continued existence of the Native States as a distinct element of the Indian Empire means their partnership with the British power in all tasks of peaceful development, and their admission to the future of progress with full preservation of their own individuality. The Royal visit sets the seal on the wise policy of the Government in giving unmistakable pledges to the Princes of its intention to maintain the separate States' sovereignty unimpaired, provided they recognize their obligations.

Madras Mail.—Circumstances have conspired sadly to upset the Prince of Wales's programme. According to the original arrangements, he was to have left Benares to-morrow evening and to have proceeded direct to Bettiah, in Nepal, as a base for the big shooting camp. Very elaborate plans had been made to give him the finest sport that India can show. Last night, however, came the news that cholera had broken out in the shooting camp to such an extent that it would be most undvisable for His Royal Highness to visit it. There was, therefore, only one course to pursue, namely, to abandon the projected shikar excursion to Nepal altogether.

This was done, and an alternative programme is now being worked out. This is a matter of some difficulty and cannot be hastily decided, and, at the time of writing, nothing definite has been fixed except this that Their Royal Highnesses will not leave Benares to-morrow, as was intended, but will prolong their stay until Wednesday.

This enforced change has been received with the greatest regret by His Royal Highness, who is the keenest of sportsmen and has naturally been anticipating with intense pleasure the complete rest and change of the shooting camp and the splendid sport that was in prospect. Still such uncertainties are the common-places of the east. It may be possible even now to make arrangements which will compensate for the disappointment of Nepal, though nowhere else in India can such lordly shikar be provided.

This afternoon there will be a great parade of elephants and the representation of scenes characteristic of the Hindu life of the City, and His Royal Highness will receive and reply to an address from the Benares Municipality.

Mysore Herald.—His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales was so highly pleased with His Highness the Yuvaraj that he presented a splendid album as a token of His Royal Highness's regard and esteem for him. His Royal Highness presented silver boxes, silver cigarette cases, silver cigarette lighters, etc., to Mr. E. Maconochie, Colonel Jones, Mr. Donne, Mr. Simpson and a few others on the 4th instant and graciously acknowledged the work done by them.

Times.—The arrival of the Prince and Princess of Wales this morning was private. To-morrow there will be an elephant procession through the city and the usual address from the municipality at the town-hall, and on Tuesday a visit to the Maharaja of Benares, who, although the family ceased to exercise ruling powers more than a century ago, is still a great personage here, and owns a fine palace just above the city opposite the bank of the Ganges. Nevertheless, ceremonial functions will play but a small part in the Royal visit to Benares. It would, indeed, be difficult to harmonise the State ceremonies of the West with the surroundings of such an intensely Eastern city as Benares. If any Indian city can in the broader sense of the word be called the capital of India, it is assuredly Benares. The normal population of Benares, it is true, barely exceeds 30,000 souls, and its area is confined within a shallow river frontage, scarcely four miles long, bounded on the north by the Barna and on the south by the Asi, two small tributaries of the Ganges. Yet this insignificant city has been from time immemorial the supreme sanctuary of Hinduism, the impregnable stronghold of the spiritual and social system that moulds the life of every Hindu from his birth to his grave with a compelling and abiding force which the mere, transient accidents of political revolutions are powerless to affect. No other spot on the earth's surface has been steeped for so many centuries in so fervid an atmosphere of religious mysticism, the effluvia as it were, of the countless generations of pilgrims who, in numbers which rarely fall short of one million in the year, have wended their way from all parts of India to the Sacred city on the Ganges in order to seek purification, not only for this life, but for the lives of future rebirths yet to come, in the waters of the Sacred River, nowhere quite so sacred as at Benares.

20TH FEBRUARY 1906.

Civil and Military Gazette.—Preparations for the shooting trip of the Prince of Wales in the Nepal Terai are nearing completion. The first camp will be at Thori, close to the border between Nepal and British territory north of Bettiah, to which place the extension of the Bengal and North-Western Railway has just been finished. The Royal special train visited Thori last week on a trial trip. As regards the programme a halt of one night will probably be made in the vicinity of Thori, and the route thereafter will be in the Chitawn district of Nepal for a distance of some forty miles as far as the junction of the Rapti and Naryan (Gousak) rivers. Chitawn is bordered by low hills, but the valleys contain traces of fairly level ground covered with dense sal forests and open stretches of high grass and reeds. All elephants in Nepal have been collected for the shoot by Mahajara Sir Chandra Shamshere, the Prime Minister, and the principal landowners of the neighbouring British districts have also sent in their quota for transport work. The total bids fair to exceed the large muster made when the present King-Emperor visited Nepal thirty years ago. The prospects of a fine bag of tiger and rhino are good, and some wild elephants are known to be in the shooting area if time can be spared to attempt captures. The nature of communications will necessitate return to Thori by the route first followed.

Civil and Military Gazette.—The following letter from the Chief of the Staff of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has been received by the General Officer Commanding, 1st (Peshawar) Division, in connection with the death by drowning of a Daffadar which occurred during manoeuvres last month, as described at the time by our Peshawar Correspondent:—"The Prince of Wales has read in the newspapers of the sad incident which occurred on the Kabul river when Duffadar Dilawar Khan of the 21st (P.A.V.O.) cavalry lost his life in the gallant endeavour to assist Lieutenant Robertson. This brave act of true comradeship has deeply interested His Royal Highness and he directs me to send you Rs. 500 in the hope that it may prove of some use to the Duffadar's widow and family."

Englishman.—Circumstances have conspired sadly to upset the Prince of Wales's programme. According to the original arrangements he was to have left Benares to-morrow evening and to have proceeded direct to Bettiah in Nepal, as a base for the big shooting camp. Very elaborate plans had been made to give him the finest sport that India can show. Last night, however, came the news that cholera had broken out in the shooting camp to such an extent that it would be most inadvisable for His Royal Highness to visit it. There was therefore only one course to pursue, to abandon the projected shikar excursion to Nepal altogether. This was done, and an alternative programme is now being worked out. This is a matter of some difficulty, and cannot be hastily decided, and at the time of writing nothing definite has been fixed except this, that Their Royal Highnesses will not leave Benares to-morrow as was intended, but will prolong their stay until Wednesday. This enforced change has been received with the greatest regret. His Royal Highness is the keenest of sportsmen, and has naturally been anticipating with intense pleasure the complete rest and change of the shooting camp, and the splendid sport that was in prospect. Still such uncertainties are the commonplaces of the East. It may be possible even now to make arrangements which will compensate for the disappointment of Nepal, though nowhere else in India can such lordly shikar be provided. This afternoon there will be a great parade of elephants, and the representation of scenes characteristic of the Hindu life of the city, and His Royal Highness will receive and reply to an address from the Benares Municipality.

In certain aspects the river front of the holy city enthralled you by a beauty not even surpassed by the fairy grace of Udampur. Those high walled, tortuous streets leading from the chowk to the river possess a charm, a character, an atmosphere of mystery found nowhere else outside eastern Italy.

Viewed in the pellucid freshness of the early morning or in the quick ebbing twilight that is the glory of the Indian day, who can forget the file of palace and temple ghat and minaret that binds the upper bank of Mother Ganga? The turquoise crescent of the night river now lazily lapping its tawny sandbanks, but which in spots climbs half way up these steps and walls and claims the miles of lowland to the distant fringe of boskage for her bed. The massy stepped ghats which plunge so boldly into the silent tide. Ghats from which arises the array of silent palaces, some warm with red standstone, others glistening with the whitewash, which only the Indian sun can make beautiful, generous in the bastion-like buttresses that hold the retaining walls grateful in the dainty towers and cupolas that suggest Agra and Fatehpur-Sikri. Over all stand sentinel the minarets of the mosques that the dour iconoclast Aurangzeb raised on the site of the temple of Vishnu to set the seat of Mahomedan conquest on the Rome of the Hindus. But far more marked than Moghul or Hindu influence is the stamp of the renaissance. So viewed Benares might have been built by the Venetians.

At sunset when the purple mist rising from the river embraces the smoke from the dying pyre in the early morn.

specially when the city has been washed as it was by last night's storm and the air is limpid beyond words the Italian atmosphere dominates all. It is not till the pilgrims descend in their myriads flocking the sandy red or ochreous yellow ghats with their reds and cobalts and salmon pinks that the East once more asserts her mystery.

As with the river, so it is with the city. The plunge into the astounding maze that shuts the chowk from the river and you are in the Venice that lies at the back of the grand canal that coursing with a life as strong as that which ran in the palmy days of the republic. But the moment you leave these high walled bazars with their patient vendors of hammered brass and brodered silk and get at handgrips with Benares, Hinduism and you are affronted by its materialism. The Cow Temple creeks like an ill-kept byre, and as you stand on the tiny corner set apart for those who are not of the elect you are pestered by importunate mendicants and no less importunate Brahmins. The stream of pilgrims is ceaseless, but what manner of devotion is it that drives them to do their "pujah" and pay their fees with the dull precision of a mercantile transaction. The Golden Temple, the well of knowledge, the footprints of Vishnu, do not all the sacred spots in Benares leave the same impression! There is the reek of Hinduism, the marigolds, the jasmine, the glue and rice, but the pilgrimage is a listless round, and at every corner stands the Brahmin with his itching for his ordu. Never was there a better machine than the pilgrim for extracting unearned toll from the credulous.

It was a happier side of Benares that the Prince and Princess saw to-day, when they made the formal progress which took the Prince, after the State entry, to the Benares of the bustling bazars and flourishing commerce. It was a side all the more striking because for the first time in their long tour through British India every phase of the reception was stamped with the spirit of the city and its Hinduism. Here were in the streets no rows of cheap bunting disfiguring them almost beyond recognition. In their stead were festoons of marigolds, glorious lemon and orange yellows, the flowers sacred to the Hindus, because it was beloved of Parvati, the wife of Shiva. And festoons of the leaves of the asok tree employed on all ceremonial occasions because it was as in its shade that Ram took his first refreshment on his wanderings. Here were triumphal arches, not mere things of canvas and bamboo affronting the eye, but having a definite relation to their surroundings. There was the shikar arch decked with the spoils of the chase and the vegetation of the jungle round, which were grouped in the forests of the Maharaja's dominions and aborigines from the South Mirzapur forests. The weavers' arch adorned with the products of their looms. The brass-makers' arches studded with examples of the famous Benares were in high relief in brass and white metal. There was the kinkob arch erected by the craftsmen, who vie with those of Surat and Ahmedabad, and the idol-makers' arch each niche occupied by figures from Hindu mythology.

The programme was simplicity itself, a drive to the municipal offices, where an address was presented, an elephant procession through the chowk and the return by carriage to Nandesar House, but each part of it was made to fit into the general scheme. The route took Their Royal Highnesses past the Queen's College, a handsome building in the Italian style, which must be amongst the oldest educational foundations in India, for it was in 1891 that Jonathan Dunace, then resident at Benares, suggested to Lord Cornwallis the establishment of a college for the preservation and cultivation of Sanskrit literature. The Prince of Wales Hospital, of which His Majesty the King-Emperor laid the foundation stone when he visited Benares thirty years ago, Madho Das Garden, where Warren Hastings was encamped when he put Raja Chet Singh under arrest in 1871, and whence he was forced to flee to Chunar five days later. And so to the Town Hall, which was opened by King Edward in 1876, and where now his heir received an address that was a model of terse expression and devoted loyalty.

In reply His Royal Highness said:—

Gentlemen,—The Princess of Wales and myself have been deeply touched by the affectionate greetings to us at the great centres of India and nowhere more than this historic city so dear and so sacred to the millions of the Hindu people, and I feel that I cannot do better than recall the words of my dear father, spoken thirty years ago, when he expressed the intense pleasure, which he felt in being received in the centre of all the nations and people of Hindu origin and as our time in India is rapidly drawing to an end, we feel an especial satisfaction that a visit to this important and interesting home of Hinduism should be one of the last of our impressions on the delightful tour, which we have been permitted to make in this portion of His Majesty's Empire. We look forward with keen interest to seeing all which makes your city so venerated by the Hindus and renowned throughout the world. I shall be much pleased to transmit to the King-Emperor your gratifying acknowledgment of those blessings of peace and safety, which you enjoy under his rule. We most sincerely reciprocate your kind wishes and we both hope that this great city, the second city in the United Provinces, may ever flourish and prosper.

This paved the way for the elephants' procession. First came two noble beasts bearing lustily beaten drums. Then the Prince and Princess of Wales on a superb animal, whose forehead was dyed imperial purple, whose trappings of gold swept the ground whilst a tiger rampant was poised on each side of the howdah of beaten gold. Followed a score or more of hathis caparisoned in scarlet and green. With the staff and the principal members of the Maharaja's suite the Maharaja and Sir James La Touche riding immediately behind the Royal elephant, which was preceded by priests from the various temples scattering flowers and blowing wailing conches.

The scenes in the streets were typical of every phase of Benares life. There were scores of fakirs with their ash-smeared bodies and coiled black brown hair. Hundreds of orange robed sungasis upon whom the tired eye rested gratefully. But entirely dominating this side of sacred Benares were the tens and tens of thousands of prosperous Hindus and Mussulmans enterprising merchants and keen traders, who regard pilgrims as rather an encumbrance.

Along the route were enacted scenes from the miracle plays of the Hindus. Here were temple mummings elaborately tricked out playing the coronation of Ram and Sita which is usually the last act of the Dasera festival. Next came the Krishna Lilla representing Krishna and the milkmaids, that very human episode in the life of the god that makes him so popular a deity. The pahlwans were ranged behind massive Indian clubs and enormous discs of stone but if the portly gentlemen standing behind these trophies were in reality the wrestlers of Benares then it was a long time since they had swung those clubs or moved those discs without the assistance of a hand cart. Through such scenes and through a lane of people quivering with pleasure and to the crash of oriental music Their Royal Highnesses moved at the stately pace of "my lord the elephant" to the circus where the chowk joins the Chetganj Road, where there was a final tableau. Here were massed the students of the Central Hindu College which owes its existence to the self-denying efforts of Mrs. Annie Besant, a wind ruffled pool of lilac azure lemon and rose coloured turbans.

To-day has been a day of disappointment. The Prince of Wales with his enthusiastic love of sport had naturally been anticipating with no little pleasure his fortnight in the Nepal

Terai. There quite free from office pomp and ceremony he would have enjoyed such shikar as is only given to Princes. The Maharaja of Nepal made arrangements on the most comprehensive scale. Camps were prepared at Thori, close to the border between Nepal and British India, north of Bettiah and then forty miles into the Chitawn District of Nepal. There were elephants by the hundred and beaters by the thousand and everything pointed to a record bag of tiger and rhinoceri with perhaps an elephant or two. Then last night came the news of an outbreak of cholera and when this was confirmed all idea of the shoot had to be abandoned. It was, of course, a very bitter disappointment and mingled with this is a sense of keen regret that the Maharaja of Nepal should have made these great preparations for nothing. But what was to be done during this fortnight. The wires were soon busy and the Maharaja of Scindia was delighted to welcome His Royal Highness, who with a very small staff will proceed to Gwalior on Thursday for a quiet shoot. Otherwise the programme will be adhered to. The Princess of Wales with Sir Walter Lawrence in attendance will spend the time between Lucknow and Dehra Dun and Their Royal Highnesses will then fulfil their engagements at Aligarh, Quetta and Karachi.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The proposed visit to Daulatabad and the Ellora Caves having been abandoned, the Prince and Princess of Wales with their arrival at Benares this morning from Hyderabad completed the longest continuous railway journey undertaken during their tour in India. The Royal train with the Princess left Hyderabad about midnight, on Thursday, and the Prince having travelled by special train from Nekonda, the station nearest the Narsimpet shooting camp, joined the Princess at Wadi, on Friday morning. The journey northward has been most interestingly varied. After leaving Dhond on Friday afternoon an arid stretch of country was encountered recalling to the mind that famine prevailed in certain unfortunate tracts. The country appears smiling, however, as Ahmednagar was approached.

At the city of Ahmed a halt was made long enough to recall its four hundred years of stirring history, its memories of Queen Chand and her heroic defence of the fort against Akbar three centuries ago, its later capture by the Mahrattas, and its final fall into the hands of him who became the victor of Waterloo. A century after Wellington had hoisted the British flag over the citadel of Ahmednagar, the fort which had seen a Deccan kingdom go down before the Moghul, had seen the Moghul overthrown by the Mahratta, who had in turn gone down before a greater power, housed, as prisoners of war, the Boer descendants of those Dutch who were among our earliest rivals in the East. This last incident in Ahmednagar's story carried a lesson in the growth of Empire during a wonderful century of which history has no parallel.

From Ahmednagar Their Royal Highnesses journeyed to Mampur, where the main line was joined on Friday night. Yesterday morning, cloudy skies told of the welcome rain which had fallen in parts of Upper India where it was much needed, and the grey skies continued all day. At Itarsi, which was reached about two o'clock, an address and a silver shield were presented to Their Royal Highnesses during the halt. Crossing the Nerbudda, some of the prettiest scenery in India was seen. As evening fell the line on to Jubulpore was marked by men with torches.

It was a grey co reached Benares, but the greyness and the rain were welcome, for they told of the rain, which had recently fallen upon parched lands. No more agreeable atmosphere for the return of the Prince and Princess to Upper India could have been wished for: it betokened that good fortune for a stricken area had preceded them.

Being Sunday, the reception of Their Royal Highnesses at the station, which the train reached punctually at 8-30, was private in character. A profusion of red cloth and flags decorated the platform, and the Prince and Princess were received by the Lieutenant-Governor, Sir James Digges LeTouche, the Maharaja of Benares, and a small number of officials. From the station Their Royal Highnesses drove to the Maharaja's guest house at Nadesar, where they reside during their stay in Benares. They were escorted by the United Provinces Light Horse. This evening the Prince and Princess attended service at St. Mary's Church.

To-morrow morning the Prince presents new colours to the South Staffordshire Regiment. In the afternoon an address will be presented to Their Royal Highnesses at the Town Hall by the Municipality, and thereafter the Prince and Princess, the Lieutenant-Governor, the Maharaja and Staffs will proceed to the city mounted on elephants. At night a banquet and reception will be held at Nadesar House. On Tuesday morning a visit will be paid to the Ghats, Their Royal Highnesses embarking at Assi ghat on the Maharaja's barge and proceeding down the river to Panchganga ghat and back to Dasasamede. The same evening they visit Ramnagar, witnessing the river illuminations as they return.

Standard.—The Bengali has the best brains of all the peoples in India and the readiest tongue. His memory is prodigious and his fertility in talk inexhaustible. He is something of an Irishman, something of an Italian, something of a Jew, if one can conceive an Irishman who would run away from a fight instead of running into it, an Italian without a sense of beauty, and a Jew who would not risk five pounds on the chance of making five hundred. He is very clever, but his cleverness does not lead him far on the road to achievement, for when it comes to doing, rather than talking, he is easily passed by people of far inferior ability. The wealth of Bengal is not exploited by him; the profits of the local industry are not his to reap. In Bombay, as I have pointed out in an earlier paper, the indigenous native is asserting himself successfully. The pushing Parsis, the shrewd Hindus of the Presidency and the Deccan, are getting the trade of the place into their hands, buying up the shares in the old cotton mills or starting new ones, elbowing the Europeans out of commercial and financial enterprise. The Bengalis have shown no such aptitude. The banks, the offices, the engineering works, the cotton mills, the jute mills, are still English. If the mercantile predominance of the ruling race is threatened it is not by the Bengalis, but by the Marwaris, from the other side of India, who carry on most of the trade and much of the finance. The babu orator perorates about Bengal for the Bengalis; but he allows the Marwari to come from the deserts of Rajputana and pluck away much of the most lucrative business from under his nose.

The reason, or part of it, was given to a friend of mine by a wealthy Marwari merchant with whom he was discussing the Svadeshi movement. "The Bengali," he said, "may talk about native industries as much as he pleases; but they will do no good to him. In all the larger kind of business he will not hold his own with us. And I will tell you why. The Bengalis have no power of initiative, and they have no mutual confidence. They will not take the risk of starting a new enterprise. They are afraid to strike out for themselves, and they do not trust one another. A Bengali would not care to hold shares in any joint stock concern run by another Bengali, and if the stock fell a point he would be half dead with anxiety until he had sold out—at a loss." "Now I," added the man from the west, "should not have grown as rich as I am if I had not known how to trust my fellow-countrymen. If a Marwari whom I have never seen before in my life comes to me and asks for goods on a three months' credit, I let him have them, even without a contract. I take his word for it that he will pay me when the time comes." The Bengali suspicion of the Marwari is, perhaps, not wholly without warrant; for if a deal goes against him the adventurous migrant may slip away to Bikaner, whither the small Calcutta tradesman cannot easily pursue him.

There are many other kinds of work in the capital city which the native of Lower Bengal does not perform. Policemen, postmen, messengers, tramcar-drivers are up-country men, from Bihar or Chota-Nagpur or the United Provinces; so, too, are many of the workers in the factories and mills. The managers are mostly Europeans, as also the foremen and inspectors. The owners would prefer the native article if they could get it of the right quality. For the imported overseer is expensive. The capable Scots mechanic, who might be earning thirty-five shillings a week in Dundee, will have to be provided with three or four hundred pounds a year, and perhaps a house as well, by the time he gets out to the banks of the Ganges. His native substitute is far cheaper, and may understand the work equally well. But the employers say that he cannot be depended upon, and that he is apt to lose his head and his nerve at moments of crisis. He makes a good sub, and does very well in quiet times and when things are running smoothly. But he is no daring pilot in extremity, and when the storm runs high he may forget his steering.

That, at least, is the English view in Bengal, which is not favourable to the children of the soil. In some other parts of India, in the Punjab, the North-West, and Rajputana, you may find plenty of Englishmen expressing real regard for the natives of their district. But you might be a long time in Bengal without hearing a good word spoken for the Bengali. The Englishman frankly does not like him, nor does he for his part entertain any profound affection for the English. The gap between the races here yawns very widely. Calcutta is full of natives who speak what they regard as the English language, wear the English dress, slightly modified, and read English newspapers. But I doubt if there is much more community of feeling between them and the gentlemen who frequent the Bengal Club and the United Services Club than there was between the cringing Orientals of the eighteenth century and the "nabobs" and merchant princes who lived sumptuously in the great mansions by the river-side which are the warehouses of to-day.

And it must be admitted that the Bengali, be he peasant or pleader, is not the kind of person who naturally wins his way to the Anglo-Saxon heart. He is not picturesque, like the wild man of the north, with his martial air and swashbuckling swagger, nor simple and manly, like the sunburnt cultivator of the central districts. In outward appearance he is not, in the lump, attractive. He is rather short, and so dark that the Anglo-Indians seem almost justified in describing him as a black man, he walks abroad with his round bullet head often bare of any covering at all, a mode which seems scarcely decent to an eye that has become habitual to the graceful folds of the many-coloured turban. If poor, he arrays himself in a scant drapery of dingy white; if well-to-do he shuffles along in a tweed coat, cotton drawers and socks, and cheap leather shoes. His diet rice and oily butter and sweetmeats induces corpulence; and the richer he is the more of this inflating food he eats, and the fatter he gets and flabbier. Of late years, the young men have taken to various athletic sports and pastimes, and the figures of the newer generation tend to be good deal less pronounced than those of their elders. But, except in the way of pastime, the civilized Bengali is not fond of muscular exertion; he prefers the sedentary labour of the bureau, and the security—and possible perquisites—of an official post. That is the object of his ambition, and in the hope of it he endures the stress of lectures and classes and examinations. To place his son within reach of this prospect the smaller landowners, the tradesman, even the farmer, sends him to school and college, and encourages him to take a degree, or at least to try for one.

With his memory, and his power of assimilation in a rapid superficial fashion, he accommodates himself easily to the examination system, and has a well grounded belief that he could beat most English youths of his own years at the game. That is why there is a demand for throwing open the coveted Civil Service to simultaneous competition in India and England, in which case a fair proportion of the posts would be sure to fall to "Indian gentlemen" from the Ganges delta. But it would not do. The babu makes an excellent minor official; indeed, all India ought to be grateful to him, for it would not be too much to say that the Indian administration of the country could hardly be run without him, so largely is he employed in doing the clerical work and filling the subordinate offices. Properly supervised, he does useful service, being industrious, adaptable, and intelligent, and having more capacity than most other natives for learning English. As we all know, he learns it rather too well, having a taste for ornate sentences and mellifluous phrases, mingled with fragments of idiomatic colloquialism. Much easy wit has been expended over Babu English, which is, indeed, a peculiar dialect. At a certain railway station a female milk-vendor caused some annoyance to the ticket-collector, who sat down and composed a letter to her employer in the following terms:—

"Honoured Sir,—I beg you will remove your hand-maiden of milk, as she is not good fellow, and we cannot stand her cheeks."

But everybody has in his own collection of Babuisms, even if he does not remember those which Mr. Anstey has ingeniously invented. We need not make too much of them. If English boys had to read the Chinese classics at school, and learn Chinese from masters who had never been nearer China than Dover beach, I dare say their literary style would cause amusement in Peking. We take young Hindus, teach them a little English grammar, under native instructors, and then feed them on Shakespeare and Addison, Sir Walter Scott, Dickens, and the Essays of Elia. No wonder the result is a little mixed.

Education—of a sort—has been spread widely in India, and the Bengali takes to it as a young duck takes to water. Colleges are numerous, and very cheap, and the ladder from the back bazaar to the University is easy to climb. But though the ascent is gentle, there are a good many tumbles. Yet even the failed B.A. has achieved something.

It is better (in Bengal) to have gone in for an examination and been plucked than never to have tried. The failed B.A. has a recognized status, and proudly mentions his qualifications when applying for a post. The head of a great establishment tells me that every week he is solicited by gentlemen who offer this singular testimonial of mitigated efficiency. One even sees advertisements: "Wanted a Failed B.A., with some knowledge of typewriting. As for the B.A. who has not failed, but arrived, he is, of course, eligible in various ways. His price in the marriage market is increased. A Bengali father expects to pay cash for the bridegroom before he can get his daughter off, and the value of a B.A., I am credibly informed, is assessed in some circles at 2,000 rupees, while a M.A. may be worth as much as four thousand. For a man of this higher academic standing may be expected not only to get a good situation himself, but to do something for his family, and, perhaps, even to put pickings in the way of a deserving father-in-law.

The college man, failed otherwise, who does not get a post in the Administration or in private employment sometimes fares badly. Bengal is full of, educated or semi-educated, hangers-on, waiting for something to turn up. It is this material of which, in every country, agitators are made, and in Bengal they are numerous and voluble. Some of them take to journalism, and write anti-administration articles in a swarm of vernacular newspapers. Many more gravitate to the law, and become pleaders, or attorneys, or barristers; for India is a litigious country, and there is some sort of a living to be made by a whole host of practitioners, from the Small Cause Court lawyer, who touts for clients at two rupees a case, to the leader in the Calcutta High Court, who earns an income which would be deemed handsome in Lincoln's Inn. The law is the one profession in which the Bengalis more than hold their own with Europeans. The "Black Bar" in Calcutta is pushing out the white, which has a pretty hard struggle for existence, for the native barrister is sometimes a man of real capacity, an able lawyer, a clever cross-examiner, and a first-rate forensic orator. The calling suits the Bengali, with his subtlety, his ingenuity, and his readiness of speech. And when promoted from the bar to the bench he often does very well, too. The High Courts and Chief Courts of the various Provinces are seldom without native judges, who earn the respect of their European colleagues, and much of the minor judicial work throughout the country is performed by Hindus and Mahomedans. It is for executive business that the Bengali, with some rare exceptions, is supposed to be unfitted. For that needs character and courage and firmness; and these are qualities in which he is commonly deficient, according to the received opinion of most Europeans and many natives of other parts of India.

When everybody says the same thing, that thing is usually true. But it is difficult to resist the consensus of testimony that the native of Lower Bengal is not, to put it gently a person of conspicuous valour. He is credited with being able to submit to physical violence without any sense of humiliation. One hears stories like that (perhaps apocryphal) anecdote of the Bengali, travelling in the train with his wife, who summoned a drunken sailor for kissing the lady. When asked why he made no attempt to prevent the outrage, he replied, "Your honour, I am a fearful man." I have seldom met a European who doubted that the inhabitant of this region was a "fearful man," though I have encountered an educated Hindu from another part of the Peninsula who flatly denied it. He put down the theory to Lord Macaulay and a famous passage in the Essays, which, he said, had given the Bengalis a false reputation for cowardice with the English reading public. Probably the thing has been exaggerated. The Bengalis used to be great faction fighters, and still are in some of the rural districts, where they will turn out and pummel each other with bamboos and staves in a vigorous and bloodthirsty fashion. The rule is that the fight stops when a man is killed, and it is said that the party which is getting the worst of the engagement will slay one of their own side. This serves a two-fold purpose. It brings the battle to an end, and it enables the vanquished combatants to lay a charge of murder against their opponents. Riots, indeed, of one kind, or another are not infrequent in Bengal. The Anglo-Indian view is that if a single unarmed individual falls among a body of Bengali rioters, he will be in great danger; but that a dozen policemen will subdue the largest and most turbulent mob. Some courage, at any rate, these people do display. They have taken to cricket and will stand up boldly, without pads or gloves, to the fastest bowling. They play football, too, in bare feet, and can make a good match with Tommy in his thickest boots.

But if the Bengalis are not all cowards, they are certainly unwarlike. There is no people in the world with less taste for martial glory. It is said that all the millions in the Lower Bengal do not contribute one single sepoy or sowar to the ranks of the British Indian Army.

His true vocation is that of the agriculturist. If you want to see him au naturel, you must leave the great cities and get away from the railways, and wander among the villages which cluster all over the rich alluvial plain. Very different are they from the bare brown mud-walled hamlets of the north. The tiny cottages, with their conical roofs of thatch, look like bee-hives; and like bees the people swarm in and out, and over the rice grounds, and among the lanes shadowed by palm-trees and bamboos. There is no solitude on this countryside, for it is such a breeding-ground of human animals as exists scarcely anywhere else on earth, even in China. Here, as he hoes and rakes his fields, with sedulous though slovenly labour, or lies under the spreading banyan tree during the heat of the day, or walks by his bullock-cart along the road, above all when he sits and gossips outside his shanty in the evening, with his brood about him, the Bengal peasant seems fairly content, in spite of malarial fever, the money lender, and the landlord. If he is poor enough in the world's goods, he is usually rich in sons and daughters and uncles and aunts and cousins and nephews; for he is a great family man, soft and kindly and philoprogenitive, and he esteems himself happiest when his quiver is fullest. Indeed, in the plenitude of his paternal bounty he does not limit his regard to his male offspring, but will sometimes even display a quiet demonstrative affection for a favourite little daughter; and he will mortgage his financial future for years in order that she may be suitably married, with all the honours of a ruinously expensive wedding feast, at the mature age of seven.—(SIDNEY LOW.)

21st FEBRUARY 1906.

Daily Telegraph.—The gods of Benares must have gone lacking their customary offerings of marigolds and garlands of Asok leaves during these last few days. The city is decorated almost wholly with long daisy chains of the former and festoons of the latter; millions must have been used, and the effect is both original and pleasing. Flags are almost entirely absent, a matter for sincerest congratulation, as most Indian cities have suffered from a kind of rash of these unnatural ornaments. The central square here is roofed with a spider's web of marigolds, and these, with white champak blossoms, are lavishly strewn before the Royal visitors as they pass the innumerable temples of Benares.

To-day Their Royal Highnesses visited the Maharaja at Ramnagar, and returned by boat at dusk, viewing the illumination of the "ghats" and buildings along the river front. Not the least striking effect of this most impressive of Indian cities is the utter desolation of the right bank of the river, which, though offering every advantage, has actually, not a house or a hovel upon it. This is due to the belief that it is accursed, and the decorations of the densely-built-upon sacred bank are thrown into uncanny relief by the flat, uninhabited, and untilled expanse across the narrow stream of the Ganges.

Benares is, without a doubt, the city of India which even the most casual visitor at ordinary times must remember longest, and it is pleasant now to record the entirely satisfactory nature of every incident of the long-looked-forward-to visit of the Shahzada.

Englishman.—To-day the Prince and Princess of Wales were brought into contact with another side of the life of Benares. Leaving Nadesar House early, they motored to the Assi Ghat, which is at the head of the buildings on the river front, and there embarked on the Maharaja's State barge. They were rowed down the Ganges past the splendid array of palaces and temples and ghats which wore their normal air, except that perhaps there was rather more bathers than usual. Their Royal Highnesses made the full circuit of the river rowing to the Panch Ganga and then back to the Dassanumed Ghat, where their motors were in waiting. On the way back to Nandesar House they visited the Queen's College, which was founded by Lord Cornwallis for the preservation and study of Sanscrit literature. This afternoon they motor to the Maharaja's palace at Ramnagar, calling en route at the Central Hindu College. After taking tea with the Maharaja they embark in the barge and again voyage down the river front which will be elaborately illuminated.

With the discretion that has characterised all the arrangements at Benares the Prince and Princess of Wales were able to see the chief glory of the city, the river front under its every day conditions. There was no bunting, no triumphal arch, and no red cloth, except a strip at the Assi Ghat. Their Royal Highnesses and Sir Walter Lawrence dropped quietly down the Ganges. Perhaps the bathing places were a little more crowded than usual, for now of the Shahzada's movements will get noised abroad, and where he goes there will the people flock, but beyond this there was no disturbance of the morning routine. When the Maharaja of Benares' State barge was pushed out from the ghat the superb panorama was unfolded in an atmosphere of exceptional brilliancy of the mighty flights of steps, the bastion bosomed walls, chatri and tower and fretted balcony, with the smooth mother of rivers crystallising under the beat of oar blades, and the verdant meadow which approaches the river's opposite bank. If some had specially come to bathe because this was the morning of the Shahzada's visit, they betrayed no sign as the barge slowly passed and the Prince and Princess saw the amazing scene so rich in its colour and its significance, when it was uninfluenced by any touch of the artificiality which must frequently surround a Royal progress.

In the course of the day Their Royal Highnesses came into close contact with the oldest and the newest educational foundations of Benares. On their way back from the river they halted at the Queen's College, the striking building in the familiar style of the fifties which owes its foundation to the Jonathan Duncan, who was Resident of Benares in 1791. Duncan's plan was to establish a Sanscrit College "for the preservation and cultivation of the Sanscrit literature and religion of the Hindu nation at the centre of their faith and common resort of their tribes." When in 1835 English became obligatory as a course of study, the Sanscrit College declined and was only saved from death and inanition by separating the English and Sanscrit courses, but continuing both under the same roof. In the Sanscrit College the discipline, the methods of teaching and examination, and the selection of pupils are all according to the Hindu shastras, and it is still recognized as the centre of India Sanscrit learning.

And in the afternoon on their way to take tea with the Maharaja of Benares at the Ramnagar Palace, the Prince and Princess called at the Central Hindu College, the work of six years, that is the creation of Mrs. Annie Besant's active brain and the foundation of the Maharaja of Benares, and a few wealthy Hindus. Mrs. Besant's end is familiar to all acquainted with the progress of Indian Education, she seeks to combine Eastern religion, philosophy and logic with Western education. Whilst teaching up to the Government Standards in the College and Schools, the day's work begins with a Hindu prayer and the reading out of the shastric precepts, followed by a religious lecture. The progress of the College has so far been rapid. When the report for 1905 was issued, there were 163 students in the College and 480 pupils in the School. The Trustees control a substantial endowment fund, the College and School buildings are expanding and the hostel works well. Whilst boys come from all parts of India, the very large majority belong to the United Provinces and Bengal. This is a remarkable record of progress for an educational institution that accepts no Government aid, but is still in its first youth and its future is one of absorbing interest to the thoughtful people of all classes.

immense and were of absorbing interest. Parda ladies peeped from screened baloon and the crowd below wore its new garb which was mainly white. Besides the various arches were grouped representatives of the trades who had erected them, the shikar arch being attended by forest guards in Lincoln green. There were other distinctive groups of a religious character. Among these were the Kabipanthes in white foolscaps, the member of a sect whose doctrines are said to have influenced the founder of the Sikh Fair. The Arya Samajists, the ascetic Bairagi Sikh representations of Ram Lila and Krishna Lila, and companies of wrestlers were also gathered among the crowd. There was even a theatre where a dance was being performed by a company of youthful artists. Priests from the various temples scattered flowers in front of the Royal elephant in the centre of the Chauk, where the floral arch threw its streamers over the road, the scene was vividly picturesque. The high buildings were crammed with people and in front of them was a stand hung with rich clothes of crimson and purple brodered with gold. Here the darbar were assembled and greeted Their Royal Highnesses. The procession moved onward to Godaulia Square, where the elephants came to a halt. Their Royal Highnesses dismounted and entering their carriage drove by the Chetgang Thana, the Queen's College and Andra Ka-Pul to Nadesar.

The reception which should have followed the dinner at Nadesar to-night has been abandoned, the shamiana in which it would have been held having become sodden with last night's rain.

Madras Mail.—Secunderabad, 18th February.—The Royal visit, to which everyone in every station of life had been looking forward with infinite interest, is now a thing of the past, and we have resumed the even tenour of our way. From all one hears, the Prince and Princess were very delighted with their visit and the only regret was that His Highness the Nizam should have been plunged into grief and mourning by the death of his dearly loved eldest daughter.

The arrival, which had been rehearsed carefully, amply repaid the trouble that had been taken, as everything went like clockwork. Everyone in Hyderabad who had houses on the route invited their friends to come and view the procession. There was a large gathering of ladies at the Residency, who had an excellent view from the Block House, and Mrs. Little and Mrs. Moberly were also entertaining guests. It was an exceptionally pleasant morning, bright but the sun not too hot. The procession started at a walk for a short distance and then broke into a trot, which pace was maintained until arrival at Faluknama Palace. Royal salutes were fired on arrival at Chudderghaut and Secunderabad. The Royal Fusiliers furnished a permanent Guard over Faluknama Palace during the Royal visit, also a Guard of Honour inside the Railway Station on arrival, His Highness the Nizam's troops furnishing a similar Guard outside. As far as onlookers were concerned the only drawback was that the pageant, which was most brilliant and imposing, was too soon over, so that one had hardly time to take in details. The two carriages for the Royal visitors were gorgeous, the prevailing colour being yellow. They were drawn by four horses ridden by postilions in the picturesque livery of His Highness the Nizam.

The grand Review on Friday, the 9th, elicited the following:—“The Lieutenant-General Commanding has much pleasure in communicating to the troops of the Secunderabad Garrison the following message from the Private Secretary to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales on the occasion of the Review Parádé on the 9th February 1906:—

“The Prince of Wales wishes to express to you his great pleasure and satisfaction at having had this morning an opportunity of inspecting the troops of your Division quartered in Secunderabad. His Royal Highness begs that you will express to all ranks his appreciation of the smart appearance of the troops and their steadiness on parade and in marching past. His Royal Highness was especially glad to see on parade the 2nd Battalion, Royal Fusiliers, and the 28th Light Cavalry, of both of which regiments he is Colonel-in-Chief, and also to present new Colours to such a distinguished Regiment as the 2nd Queen's Own Rajput Light Infantry.”

The above Order was well deserved as the Review could not have gone better. The ground being well watered, there was no dust, so that the gallop past was seen to great advantage. The arrangements were excellent, and it was remarkable the way in which the troops were handled in such a small area. After the Review Sir Charles Egerton had the honour of entertaining His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales at breakfast at the Club, to which all Commanding Officers were invited.

The Dinner party at the Residency on Friday, the 9th, was, comparatively speaking, a small one, as about 50-odd people sat down to dinner. The party consisted of Their Royal Highnesses The Prince and Princess of Wales, Sir Walter Lawrence, Sir Arthur Bigge, the Earl and Countess of Shaftesbury, Mr. and Lady Eva Dugdale, General Sir Charles and Miss Egerton, General Hamilton, General Francis, Colonel Herbert, Colonel and Mrs. Currey, Colonel and Mrs. Stokes, the Lord Bishop of Madras and Mrs. Whitehead, Mrs. Grant, Major and Mrs. Haig, Colonel and Mrs. Pedder, Colonel Gimlette, Colonel For, Mr. and Mrs. Hankin, Mr. and Mrs. Casson Walker, Major General Stuart Beaton, Commander Godfrey Fausset, Major Campbell, Captain Hutchinson, Commander Sir C. Cust, the Bishop of Hyderabad, Captain Viscount Crichton, Mr. Egerton, Major and Mrs. Mathews, Major and Mrs. Taylor, Mr. Macnab, Colonel Thomson, and others. Those dining had the honour of being presented to Their Royal Highnesses after dinner, after which there was a reception, which about 300 people attended and each of whom had the honour of being presented. The Residency was illuminated with thousands of little white glass lamps, which accentuated the very fine architectural lines on which the Residency is built, and inside also was a blaze of light and beauty. The Reception Room was hung with balls of lovely flowers which filled the spaces between the chandeliers. Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, the Countess of Shaftesbury and Lady Eva Dugdale were all dressed in white, while Mrs. Bayly wore a handsome black velvet gown.

On Saturday, the 10th, His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales left for the Shooting Camp, while the Princess remained at Faluknama. But during the few days Her Royal Highness managed to get through a certain amount of sight-seeing and do a lot of graceful and kind actions. She visited the celebrated tombs at Golconda, the Soldiers' Institute at Trimulgherry, the Maternity Hospital, paid a flying visit to the Bolarum Residency, and attended Evensong at Trimulgherry on Sunday. On Thursday afternoon Her Royal Highness was graciously pleased to have tea with Colonel Shewen and the Officers, Hyderabad Contingent, at the Mess and listen to the Band. Her Royal Highness and suite arrived in two motor cars about 5 P.M. The verandah giving on the ball room was charmingly arranged with flowers, while a beautiful basket of roses and a bowl of violets were placed on a table near the seat arranged for the Princess. After tea a photograph was taken and then the Princess walked through the rooms and showed much interest in the pictures and old standards and colours that adorn the walls. The wives of Commanding Officers belonging to-the

and the visit there was one paid to His Highness. Elephants, camels and the Maharaja's retainers lined the road to the palace. Their Royal Highnesses were ceremoniously received and were garlanded with golden bars. When Their Royal Highnesses re-embarked on their return, the river front was aglow with the splendour of the illuminations. The great semicircle of palaces, temples and ghats were picked out in lines of shimmering yellow, the distant views being superbly beautiful. Immense numbers of people thronged the ghats, and the air rang with the noise of conch horns, temple bells and confused cries. Many decorated and crowded barges and smaller craft floated on the water and the farther bank of the river. Fire balloons ascended and fireworks were set; the beginning of the fireworks was the signal that the Royal barge was on its way down stream. It reached Dassasummedh Ghat escorted by the police and other barges about half-past seven, and on landing, Their Royal Highnesses returned by motor to Nadesar. The steps at the landing place were lined by men holding staves hung with Chinese lanterns, and the entire route was effectively illuminated.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The following official communique has been issued:—Owing to an unfortunate outbreak of cholera in Nepal, His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales's visit to the Terai will be abandoned. He will stay an extra day at Benares and then proceed to Gwalior State. The remainder of the Tour programme from Aligarh to Karachi remains unaltered.

The scenes witnessed when Their Royal Highnesses proceeded through Benares this afternoon were among the most wonderful that have been seen during the Royal progress through India. With the State of Gwalior, Benares, though in British territory, enjoys the distinction of having given the Prince and Princess a real Indian welcome. In the decoration of the city and in the proceedings which have taken place this afternoon, the character of Benares as the centre of Hindustan has been emphasised, and in recording the fact acknowledgment must be made of the wisdom of the officials responsible for so ordering the nature of to-day's arrangements. Leaving Nadesar house at 4-30, Their Royal Highnesses, escorted by Native Cavalry and the United Provinces Light Horse, drove to the Town Hall, passing along crowded roads by the Nadesar Tank, the Queen's College and other public institutions. It was a very bright scene that awaited them at the Town Hall, a red building erected in pleasant grounds. Here bands of students were gathered, wearing bright yellow and green paggies, and here twenty-five richly caparisoned elephants waited to convey Their Royal Highnesses and those accompanying them through the city. The Prince and Princess were received at the Town Hall by the Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces, Sir J. D. LaTouche, the Maharaja of Benares, the Commissioner of Benares, Mr. Benn, the Collector, Mr. Radice, and the Members of the Municipality.

Upon a dais at the end of the Hall covered by a purple and gold fringed canopy, Their Royal Highnesses stood, while the Municipal address was read by Mr. Kalidas Mittra the Hindu Vice-President of the Municipality. The terms of the address were as follows:—

"May it please Your Royal Highnesses,—We your loyal and devoted servants are made bold by the kindness that all men recognize in you and the gracious Lady by your side to lay before you on behalf of the citizens of Benares this address of welcome. Under the sway of His Majesty King Edward the VII, your father, whom may God preserve, we enjoy the blessing of peace and safety in fuller measure than ever before fell to the lot of our forefathers. In you we welcome a son in whose support and assistance your Royal father may well rejoice. By travelling so far from your home to visit this land you and your Royal consort have proved to all your affection for India. Our fathers were honoured in the past by the visit of your Royal father; we their sons now share their honour, and once again Benares waits to show her loyalty. For many days we have rejoiced in the thought that Your Royal Highness would visit our city, and now that we are permitted to offer these expressions of our loyalty and devotion, the measure of our joy is full. That God may preserve you, may pour upon you and yours the blessings of health, long life and happiness, and that your progress through the land may be a triumph, your travels pleasant and your return prosperous, is the prayer of your humble and devoted servants."

The Prince in reply said:

"Gentlemen,—The Princess of Wales and myself have been deeply touched by the affectionate greetings accorded to us at the great centres of India, and nowhere more than at this historic city, so dear and so sacred to the millions of the Hindu people, and I feel that I cannot do better than recall the words of my dear father spoken thirty years ago, when he expressed the intense pleasure which he felt in being received in the centre of all the nations and the people of Hindu origin; and as our time in India is rapidly drawing to an end we feel an especial satisfaction that a visit to this important and interesting home of Hinduism should be one of the last of our impressions on the delightful tour which we have been permitted to make in this portion of His Majesty's Empire. We look forward with keen interest to seeing all which makes your city so venerated by the Hindus and renowned throughout the world. I shall be much pleased to transmit to the King-Emperor your gratifying acknowledgment of those blessings of peace and safety which you enjoy under his rule. We most sincerely reciprocate your kind wishes, and we both hope that this great city, the second city in the United Provinces, may ever flourish and prosper."

At the close of the Prince's speech the members of the Municipality were in turn presented by Mr. Radice.

Thereafter Their Royal Highnesses inspected the silver casket prepared for the address. The casket is a silver pillar representing the pillar which Asoka set up at Saranath to mark the place where Buddha preached his first sermon. The remains of the monument, which has been described by the Chinese traveller Hwen Tsang, were recently unearthed at Saranath. The silver base of the casket is chased with a view of Benares.

Leaving the Town Hall Their Royal Highnesses proceeded to mount an elephant, said to be the largest in India. It was covered with a jhul of gold cloth. It carried a richly chased silver howdah lined with purple and its head was adorned with a massive silver ornament. Its forehead was painted in bright blue and yellow, the centre design being the Prince of Wales's plume. As it waited to rise with its Royal riders the great beast trumpeted impatiently, but when permitted to start, moved off in a perfect docility. The Lieutenant-Governor and the Maharaja followed on the next elephant, the Staffs and local notables coming nearer in pairs. The Royal elephant was preceded by scarlet-robed men armed with battle-axes and match-locks, while scarlet-robed Chobdars with silver staves surrounded the beast and raised the cry of "Maharaj, Maharaj" as it strode forward. The path carried the procession in a semicircle past the bright companies of students, who cheered loudly and long as Their Royal Highnesses were borne by at a stately pace. A short distance along a broad road brought the procession to the narrow Chauk which is the heart of the city, and along this narrow street the elephants passed. The throngs which lined the paths and crowded windows and roofs were immense and were of absorbing interest. Parda ladies peeped from screened baloon and the crowd below wore its new garb which was mainly white. Besides the various arches were grouped representatives of the trades who had erected them, the skikar arch being attended by forest guards in Lincoln green. But what was to be done during this fortnight? The wives were soon busy and the Maharaja Scindia was delighted to welcome His Royal Highness, who with a very small staff, will proceed to Gwalior on Thursday for a quiet shoot. Otherwise the programme will be adhered to. The Princess of Wales, with Sir Walter Lawrence in attendance, will spend the time between Lucknow and Dehra Dun; and Their Royal Highnesses will then fulfil their engagements at Aligarh, Quetta and Karachi.

22ND FEBRUARY 1906.

Civil and Military, Gazette.—Mussorie, 17th February.—It has been definitely settled that the Princess of Wales will visit Mussorie early in March, by which time the weather will also be definitely settled. Her Royal Highness will stay at the Charleville Hotel, and will probably go round Landour, where in 1875 a tree was planted by the present King in the compound of St. Paul's Church. The station will, of course, be en fete in honour of the visit, and great endeavours are being made to get alterations and repairs finished. This work is at present being hindered by unfavourable weather. Three inches of snow fell here yesterday, just when all the world supposed there would be no more of it, while Landour was favoured with six or eight inches. The clouds have by no means cleared.

Indian Daily News.—Benares, 21st February.—The South Staffordshire Regiment, composed as it is of the old 38th and the 80th, has a record of distinction of which its officers and men are justly proud. The historian of the corps declares that it is unsurpassed in fame. The regimental colours of the two line battalions of the South Staffordshires are inscribed with the names of twenty-six battles and campaigns in all of which both battalions distinguished themselves greatly.

The Prince of Wales presented them the new colours this morning. The regiment was originally raised by Lord Paget at Lichfield in September, 1793, and the 80th Regiment took part in the campaign against the French in Egypt in 1801, being brought from India with the force under Sir David Baird. The regiment returned to India and earned distinction in the Sikh war of 1845, being present at Moodkee, the first battle fought against the Sikhs, and the storming of a battery a few days later at Ferozeshah. This exploit took place at night, the 80th spiking the guns. The gallantry and steadiness of the corps on this occasion were the subject of eulogism by Wellington in Parliament. With the 10th and 53rd, the 80th carried the entrenchments at Sobraon. The thirty-two regiments of the enemy occupied the trenches, which were flanked by strong redoubts, but led by the 80th with Sir R. Dick at their head, the British Infantry cleared the position. In the second Burmese war the regiment took part in the storming of Martaban, Rangoon and Prome. Despatched to India from the Cape on the outbreak of the Mutiny, the 80th was present at the capture of Howrah. Two companies participated as a Camel Corps in the capture of Calpee, and the regiment took part in the capture of Simree. The corps was also engaged in the fighting in Berar, at Dondekern and at Bessingpore. In 1878 the regiment had its head-quarters at Acreteria, and the next year shared gallantly in the Zulu war as well as in two expeditions against Sekukuni on the Northern Transvaal Border. A company was cut up by the Zulus near Luneberg, and the Regiment formed the front face of the square at Ulundi. General Wolseley in taking leave of the corps with which he had served as an ensign in Burma placed on record his high sense of soldier-like bearing and conduct in South Africa. With the formation of the South Staffordshire Regiments in 1881, the 80th became the 2nd Battalion. Besides a history of active service beginning with the campaign against the French in Flanders in 1796, the 80th has three times suffered shipwreck. Their gallant behaviour on one such occasion being commended in a general order by the Governor-General of India, and being brought to the notice of Queen Victoria by the Duke of Wellington. The presentation of the new Colours by the Prince took place on the parade ground in front of Nadesar House.

The colours were consecrated by the Chaplain of the Corps, the Reverend C. M. Mason. After the religious ceremony, the Prince addressed the Battalion as follows:—

Colonel Doubeney, Officers, Non-Commissioned Officers and men of the 2nd Battalion of the South Staffordshire Regiment,—Meeting here to perform the ceremony on Indian soil, we are reminded that during the 112 years that have elapsed since your Battalion was raised some of its most brilliant services have been achieved in this portion of the British Empire. With regard to its gallant conduct at Ferozshah in 1845, Lord Hardinge, the then Governor-General of India, described it as "that regiment which has earned immortal fame in the annals of the British Army;" and not only in the field of battle has your regiment gained renown, for no less than three times did it suffer shipwreck in Eastern waters. We know that there is no greater test of the discipline of a regiment than under such terrible experiences, and the conduct of the 80th Regiment in the last disaster of this nature in 1844 was brought to the notice of Queen Victoria and commended in a General Order by the Governor-General of India. It is indeed a grand tradition which surrounds the colours of your regiment, a tradition created by those who, in days gone by, fought and fell in their defence. I feel sure that they will ever inspire the same spirit of loyalty to your King, your country and your regiment, and that, if needs be, you will, like your predecessors, do and die in the defence of these sentiments. With such convictions I have great pleasure in entrusting to your care these consecrated colours.

Lieutenant-Colonel Doubeney, Commanding the Battalion, in replying to the address of the Prince said:—

Your Royal Highness,—On behalf of all ranks of the 2nd Battalion of the South Staffordshire Regiment, I beg to offer our heartfelt thanks for the great honour conferred upon the Battalion. We are deeply gratified by Your Royal Highness's references to the past services of the 80th Regiment, and we know that this feeling will be shared by the people of Staffordshire, with which country this Battalion has been closely connected throughout its history. To-day's ceremony will never be forgotten in the Battalion, and I feel assured that all who in future serve with these colours will do their utmost to show themselves worthy of the confidence reposed in them by Your Royal Highness.

The Prince presented to a number of Officers, Non-Commissioned Officers and men of the Gurkha Rifles medals of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, for gallantry in saving life on the occasion of the earthquake at Dharmasala last April. Lieutenant Colonel Tate, R. A. M. C., Honorary Secretary to the Central Committee in India of the St. John Ambulance Association read the following statement:—

Your Royal Highness,—The disastrous earthquake of the 4th April last was felt with the greatest severity at Dharmasala, in the Punjab. In ten seconds almost every building was a ruin. Twenty Europeans and over 150 native soldiers, besides several hundred natives in the bazaar, were killed outright. The work of rescue commenced directly the initial shock was over and continued unceasingly all day in spite of constantly recurring shocks which rendered the task of approaching the tottering ruins most hazardous. It is computed that some 150 persons were rescued from almost certain death from the large number of gallant workers. It has been difficult to select the party that paraded before Your Royal Highness. In the case of the rank and file it has mainly been done by the votes of their comrades. I am deputed to humbly request Your Royal Highness as the Grand Prior of the Order of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem in England, to present the medals awarded by the Order in appreciation of the gallantry displayed by twenty-two officers and men of the 1st-7th Gurkha Rifles.

The medals with which the Prince decorated officers and men of the Gurkha Rifles this morning for intrepidity at Dharmasala are invariably presented to the recipients by the Grand Prior of the Order, or, in his absence, by the King. The Prince is the Grand Prior of the Order, and it is a unique distinction for the Gurkhas that they should have received the medal from the hands of the Grand Prior in India. The distinction is the greater in that this is the first occasion on which the decoration has been conferred upon native soldiers in this country.

The Prince then in turn presented silver and bronze medals to the under-mentioned officers and men, pinning the medals upon the breast of each recipient:—

Silver medals.—Major Patrick Hehir, I.M.S.; Captain Cyril Grey Stansfield, 7th Gurkhas; Lieutenant Walter James Evans, 1st Gurkhas; Lieutenant Donald Stuart Orchard, 1st Gurkhas; Lieutenant Barry Hartwell, 7th Gurkhas; Subadar-Major Birbal Nagarkoty, 7th Gurkhas; Subadar Khial Singh Gurung, 1st Gurkhas; Subadar Abiram Gurung, 7th Gurkhas.

Bronze medals.—Colours Havildar Kishen Singh Kuki, 1st Gurkhas; Rifleman Simpati Gurung, 1st Gurkhas; Rifleman Churamons Thapa, Rifleman Dring Singh Gurung, Havildar Nar Singh Gurung, 7th Gurkhas; Havildar Kaman Singh Thapa, Naick Gokul Newar, Havildar Kaman Singh Thapa, 7th Gurkhas; Naick Gokul Newar, 7th Gurkhas; Naick Manbhadr Gurung, 7th Gurkhas; Naick Amar Singh Gurung, 7th Gurkhas; Rifleman Kaman Singh Gurung, 7th Gurkhas; Rifleman Basanti Rana, 7th Gurkhas; Rifleman Moti Thapa, 7th Gurkhas; Rifleman Navir Thapa, 7th Gurkhas; and Rifleman Tula Puna, 7th Gurkhas.

At the close of this interesting ceremony the Prince inspected the United Provinces Light Horse, who were drawn up along the main drive facing the parade ground.

The Princess of Wales will pay a few hours' visit to Cawnpore on her way between Lucknow and Agra, accompanied only by Sir Walter Lawrence and one or two members of the staff.

Yesterday evening while two of the English press correspondents were driving to the river to see the illuminations, their horses were frightened by a motor-car in which a member of the Royal staff was driving. The horses bolted, and before they could be pulled up, they knocked down an elderly native woman. The correspondents did all they could in the circumstances, great difficulty being experienced in obtaining assistance owing to the police being all engaged elsewhere. The injured woman was taken to the hospital, but unfortunately died on the way. The relatives of the woman were summoned and everything was done to minimise their grief. They expressed themselves grateful for the compensation given to them.

The Prince and Princess spent part of their last day in Benares sight-seeing in a quiet way. The Prince visited the city privately, accompanied by Colonel R. Havelock Charles, I.M.S., hitherto Their Royal Highnesses have seen India only in its regal and holiday aspects, but the visit to Benares has enabled them to see the people in their every-day life, and more especially to note how deep is the religious faith which animates the whole existence of Indians. Regarded in this aspect, the visit to Benares has been the most successful and interesting of the tour. The Prince and Princess have never been closer to the life and habits of the people than they were when they saw the crowded bathing ghats on the Ganges bank, and the impressions then received would be intensified by a tour through the city to-day. It was a day of religious festival, and the narrow, tortuous streets and allies leading to the Golden Temple were crowded with a constant stream of devotees. Their Royal Highnesses closed their visit to Benares to-night. They reach Lucknow to-morrow morning, when the Prince, accompanied by General Beatson and three other members of the staff, goes on to Gwalior.

The programme arranged for the Princess includes a visit to Cawnpore on the 23rd and a stay at Lucknow till the night of the 26th, when Her Royal Highness proceeds to Agra, arriving there at 8-30 on the morning of 27th. Then she goes to Dehra Dun from the 28th to March 4th, visiting Mussorie, on the 2nd. From Dehra Dun Her Royal Highness proceeds to Haridwar, where she visits the ghats and the canal head works. Rurki will be visited on the 7th, and the Princess reaches Hathras on the 8th.

Indian Daily News.—In commemoration of the visit of Their Royal Highnesses to the Queen's College, Benares, on Tuesday last, it has been decided to found a library to house valuable Sanscrit manuscripts now in the possession of the College. The library will be named after the Princess.

Madras Mail.—There was a final meeting of the Royal Reception Committee this morning, when Mr. P. L. Moore, I.C.S., occupied the Chair. The accounts were passed and showed between Rs. 400 and Rs. 500 surplus, and this was handed over to the Municipal President to be invested in the Savings Bank for possible reception needs in the future. When the sales of bunting, etc., have been completed there is likely to be a surplus of some additional hundreds.

The pleasurable excitement caused by the Royal visit has not quite died away, but one misses the alertness of the Moglai Police, who for the past week have been on duty almost all day, ready at a moment's notice to clear the road, either for the Royal Motor or for His Highness the Nizam, who made several visits to Faluknama. His Highness's last visit was paid at 2-30 p.m. on the 15th instant. His Highness has presented His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales with a Stamp Album specially filled in with all issues of Deccan stamps—a gift the value of which no one knows better than the Royal recipient, who is a famous philatelist.

A remarkable absence of news from the shooting camp makes many surmise that the shikar trip has not resulted in as heavy a bag as was anticipated.

Her Royal Highness the Princess paid a visit to the Industrial Exhibition on the 13th instant and made the hearts of those who are managing the jewellery exhibits of Messrs. Tawker and Sons rejoice by a purchase—trifling in value perhaps, but conferring honour and perhaps a claim to patronage upon the Firm.

Almost every day sees some new exhibits, all of which will no doubt compete for the prizes, which should by right be given only to such exhibitors as sent in their wares by the latest date fixed in the Prospectus that was issued in January. The rates for admission of visitors are too popular to be agreeable. Any native who can acquire two annas can purchase an admission ticket and enjoy the Band and other general forms of giving pleasure to the visitors generally, side by side with the ordinary "eight anna wallah," the ten rupee habitual season ticket-holder, or the lordly possessor of a silver passport in the form of a disc, for which he has paid Rs. 200 and which entitles him to invite, free of further expense, all his friends, whose carriages to any number may also enter the grounds, while others can only bring in a carriage on payment of a rupee each time—there being no season tickets for the latter. The number of respectable visitors within the Exhibition building is remarkably small compared with the crowds that used to come prior to the admission of the "great unwashed" on "popular terms." The 12th instant was observed as a Zenana day, when several European ladies gratified the Director by keeping the stalls, as all males had to be rigidly excluded.

When you glance at the map of India your gaze is arrested by the splotch or yellow overspreading the greater part of the Deccan that is labelled Hyderabad. The splotch represents an area as large as Italy and a population as numerous as that of a German State, both under the unfettered control, as far as his internal policy is concerned, of "Our Faithful Ally," the Nizam, Mir Mahabub Ali Khan Bahadur, Fath Jung Nizam-ud-Daula Nizam-i-Mulk. It occupies a position, as is patent in a moment, of remarkable strategic importance. Sir John Malcolm described it as the centre of gravity of the whole of the Indian Empire. The seat of power has moved north since that distinguished officer's day, but Hyderabad is still the natural breakwater between Northern and Southern India, and the most imposing and interesting administrative unit in the Dependency.

These eighty thousand miles of territory, with their population of ten millions, are an island of Old India in the Ocean of British India. This island is divided from its neighbours by its own Customs line, and it has its own Coinage, Army, and Administration. Within the frontier, if we except the little islands of British jurisdiction at the Residency, Secunderabad, Bolarum and Aurangabad, the will of the Nizam is supreme. His writ runs near five hundred miles north and south and east and west. The exterior relations of Hyderabad are defined by Treaties, and its military strength is fixed: and these limits are so well understood by the Government and their Ally that they do not come under discussion. But within these boundaries the order of the Nizam, short of a policy that would lead to civil war, is for all practicable purposes the law of the State. So decisively is it exercised that there is no more than a savour of Oriental hyperbole in the saying current—"Not a leaf falls in Hyderabad unless His Highness wills."

The occupant of this unique position was the last of the great Indian Princes to welcome Their Royal Highnesses. Until the distressing bereavement occurred which compelled his withdrawal from all State ceremonies, none shared with the Prince and Princess and their host the gaze of the multitude. When His Highness is present, you cannot forget for a moment that this is Hyderabad and that he is Nizam. And yet he owes none of this influence to physical advantage or the trappings of State. We are apt, most erroneously, to associate dignity with height. In this regard the Nizam shares the physical characteristics of Le Grand Monarque, except that he does not attempt to disguise it by high-heeled shoes and a towering peruke. In a country distinguished by splendour of attire, he is known by the unvarying simplicity of his dress. But from the hawk eyes, looking out from an aquiline nose set in a lean face, darkened by moustache and whiskers, there flashes the light of a man of character. Watch the speed with which that glance exacts attention, the submissive demeanour of the most powerful of his Ministers and Nobles, and you will be in no doubt as to who is the Ruler of Hyderabad.

Nor do the Nizam's princely qualities end with the power to exact obedience. A Mahomedan Ruler of a State, 80 per cent. of whose people are Hindus, and strictly orthodox himself, he is a man of wide tolerance and gives freely Christian, Hindu and Parsee religious foundations. His chief Minister is a Hindu, and that Minister's Secretary, a very able Parsee. He is most humane, and with infinite reluctance signs the warrant for the execution of the most abandoned criminal. He is a man of the strictest integrity, and, as Lord Curzon justly observed at a State banquet in Hyderabad, the Nizam has never been known to go back upon his pledged word. In receiving his Royal guests His Highness placed the obligations of hospitality above all other considerations. He left the bedside of a dearly-loved daughter, stricken unto death, to greet the Prince and Princess at the station, and to pay and receive the ceremonial visit. When he went to the Review at Secunderabad he knew that in all human probability he would never again see his daughter alive. Whilst he could not, naturally, entirely conceal his emotion, he never allowed it to affect his attitude of respectful loyalty to the Prince, or the fulfilment of his duties as host. He is, too, a keen sportsman and the best shot in India, and an accomplished horseman.

With these engaging qualities His Highness mingles one that is better known. Never did a Ruler possess less of the royal virtue of punctuality. But what conception of the value of time is a Prince likely to own who has been surrounded by the environment in which the heir to Hyderabad passes his early years? And touching this notorious peculiarity there is told a story in Hyderabad that is extremely characteristic. After having been kept waiting for an unusually long period—whether it was for hours or days is immaterial—a great Minister gently remonstrated with His Highness, remarking that these long delays seriously hampered their work for the State. Fixing him with that keen glance of his, the Nizam replied in these terms:—"When my subjects approach you with a petition, what do you do? It is, Wait! Then, come to-morrow. Then, come next week. So it is with you and your inferiors down to the pettiest officers. When my subjects have not this cause of complaint, then will it be meet for you to remonstrate." It reminds one of the experience of a trusted Political Officer who approached a conservative Prince in the famine year. "Maharaja Sahib," he said, "the overseer at the big tank relief work is robbing you most scandalously." "Eshmit Sahib," was the plaintive retort, "is there anyone, except yourself, in this State who is not robbing me?"

It is a happy coincidence that the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Hyderabad came at a time when the relations of the Government of India with their Ally were never more satisfactory. The stout loyalty of the Nizam's House, which barred the flowing of the Mutiny over Southern India, has never wavered. But the periods of tension have not been few. The knotty question of the Berars was settled by Lord Curzon and Sir David Barr in a manner honourable and advantageous to both parties. That fruitful cause of friction removed, there was nothing to obstruct the cementing of the cordial partnership that now exists. But the change in the governance of the State goes much deeper than this. The history of the administration of Hyderabad for the latter half of the nineteenth century is the history of Sir Salar Jung and his successors. Sometimes it was difficult to tell if he in authority was Minister or Mayor of the Palace. This was no doubt necessary to repair the inextricable confusion that Sir Salar Jung found existing. But it was not conducive to smooth working when a man of strong character was on the masnad. There is no Mayor of the Palace now. The Nizam is Nizam and the Minister is Minister. Sir Kishen Persad perfectly understands his role. Consequently there is none of the friction that has been known to divide Hyderabad into two camps, and drive the Nizam to imitate the example of Achilles.

The Nizam is genuinely interested in the governance of his State. He moves amongst his people, and his personality is better understood. In all the mixed races he governs—Hindus and Mahomedans, Negroes and Rohillas, Arabs and Pathans—he inspires unmixed respect. No one would say that the administration of Hyderabad is ideal. Every friend of the Native States would like to see the march of progress rapidly accelerated, so that Hyderabad might take its place worthily with those other Native States which illustrate so conspicuously the splendour of the opportunities inherited by each occupant of a gadi. Still it moves, and the Nizam is sincerely desirous that it should move faster. A systematic policy is pursued to induce that order in the finances that is the basis of all sound administration. The Financial Adviser, Mr. Casson Walker, whose term of office was extended, inspires the confidence even of those whose perquisites are curtailed by his economies; and an experienced officer, Mr. Hydari, recently arrived to take up the position of Accountant-General. Perhaps this improvement is nowhere more conspicuous than in the present condition of Hyderabad City. A few years ago not even the bazaars of Peshawar had a worse reputation. Besides an extraordinarily mixed, it shelters a low class and large criminal population. There are streets whose inhabitants seem to live by selling one another liquor. But if a personal experience is any guide, the Englishman is treated with as much respect in the bazaars of Hyderabad as in Bombay or Calcutta. In an hour's wandering through the side streets, when the way had to be enquired a score of times, nothing was encountered but the greatest courtesy and an earnest desire to help.

Madras is commonly called the city of distances, but it is cramped in comparison with Hyderabad. From the Faluknama Palace, where Their Royal Highnesses were staying, to the Residency is nearly six miles. From the Residency to Secunderabad is another four, and from Secunderabad the road stretches away to Bolarum, a further five miles distant. So each one of their engagements carried the Prince and Princess through many miles of characteristic Hyderabad scenery. But no scene—not even the pulsating bazaars teeming with all the races of India, where every petty transaction has to be worked out in Halli Sica and "John Company" rupees; where kohl-eyed purdah women peeped through yellow and red and blue shutters on the Shahzada and his consort; where African Horse, Rohilla Foot and Pathan riflemen stood to arms whilst the dashing Body-guard and smart Imperial Service Lancers swept by—vied in beauty with what they saw from the terrace of their stately abode.

There the city, with its half-million of people, lay stretched at their feet. A city lying in a shallow basin, lined with arborescence, wherein the glistening white houses were so hidden that they might have been scattered broadcast by some Titanic Sowar. In the heart of this town, where the four main roads meet, rose the graceful minarets of the Char Minar, with an adjacent quadrangular block; not a chimney, not a wreath of smoke, not a tower or a dome further broke the beauty of the scene. Then in the distance the snowy roofs and bleached roads of Secunderabad, to the left the bold citadel-crowned rock of Golconda marked the capital of the old Qutub dynasty and the scene of the stubborn defence that held the whole power of the Moghul Empire at bay for eight months. Golconda is set down in a valley of stones so gaunt and fantastic that nature must have created it in freak. It is as if the gods had played bowls with boulders and left in a huff. Tradition accounts for the tangle by the simple explanation that God, having finished the world, withdrew the rubbish in this corner. But even this desolation was made beautiful by the Mir Alum and Hussain Sagar Lakes, gigantic sapphires in the wilderness, each faced perfect and pure.

The visit to Hyderabad appropriately closed the long progress of the Prince and Princess of Wales through the Native

States of India. They met the Chiefs of the Central India States in Durbar and in frank social intercourse at Indore. They were the guests of the great Rajput Chieftains; of the Maharana of Mewar in his fairy capital of Udaipur; of the Maharajah of Jaipur in the famous Pink City; and of the Lord of the Desert, the Maharajah of Bikanir, in his sandy home. At Lahore they received the Punjab Princes whose houses are synonyms for courage and loyalty—Patiala, Jhind, Nabha, Bahawalpur and Kapurthala. In the far north the Maharajah of Jammu and Kashmir, a State with important frontier responsibilities, greeted them in the grey towns that cling to the southern spurs of the Himalayas, and retracing their steps to Central India, the high-minded and ardent Scindia welcomed them with all the pomp and circumstance the East can display. Then after a flying visit to Burma they passed to the bright and contented peoples of the flourishing State of Mysore, and thence to Hyderabad, the premier State and the sole survivor of the old Mahomedan Deccan kingdoms. Everywhere they were acclaimed with genuine enthusiasm and unbounded hospitality, and the Indian Princes have vied with one another in their desire to manifest usual marks of loyalty and devotion.

Pausing for a moment on the experiences of these crowded months, you cannot but be impressed with the unsurpassed opportunities for good that the Indian Prince enjoys. It is indeed hard to find any great situation in life which yields such remarkable opportunity with so little responsibility. He is protected from external aggression and internal disorder by the whole might of the British Empire. His own contribution towards the burden of Imperial defence, apart from the tribute fixed by treaty, is bounded by the Imperial Service forces he may loyally and patriotically maintain, and any military expenditure beyond that is entirely a personal and ceremonial matter. Excluding Mysore, where special circumstances connected with the Rendition induced a protective constitution, his revenues are as entirely at his disposal as those of a country gentleman. In the event of those revenues failing through seasonal irregularities, he can draw on the purse of the Government of India at most modest charges. Not only is he secure in his own territories, but he knows that his successor, whether by direct descent or by adoption, is equally sure of the protection of the Government and of the enjoyment of uncurtailed boundaries. He stands in absolutely paternal relation to a population which in the case of the Nizam of Hyderabad numbers ten millions, for the ruler of a Native State is his own law and is the only fount of authority. And he would not be where he is had not certain English adventurers turned their prows eastwards four centuries ago! With these privileges there are, of course, certain limitations. The external relations of the States, both in India and abroad, are entirely with the Government of India. A respectable standard of government is essential and it is the manifest obligation of the protecting authority to see that it is reached. There must also be restrictions on the strength of the military forces maintained and the importation of arms, but these are so obviously matters of high policy that with any honest and educated ruler they should never be in dispute. In the past, and to a lesser extent in the present, there have been just grounds of complaint as the manner in which the policy of Government has been declared, and the wishes of the central authority made known; but this cause of offence is decreasing. Even now, however, there are minor matters, costing the Government nothing but ministering materially to the Oriental conception of izzat, where the desires of the Ruling Houses should be met. And we may ask whether the increasing frontier and Asiatic responsibilities of the Government have not made them too busy to pay adequate attention to the affairs of the Native States, and whether their business should not be the care of a special department. But how small, you are almost tempted to say how petty, are these limitations in comparison with the magnificent privileges the Indian Princes inherit!

Out of an appreciation of these conditions has grown a new understanding between the Native States and their Suzerain. On the one hand the Princes are convinced that their position and their privileges are secure. On the other the members of the Government have come better to appreciate the very important part the Native States fill in the governance of India. It is not that the Native States are amongst us fixed and permanent factors in the Indian Empire,—factors to be fitted into the Imperial machine and not fretted into passive hostility though this is an aspect that might be considered by those Civilian for ever tilting at the “backwardness” of native rule; but they have distinct and important functions in the machine. One charge levelled against the rule of Britain in India is that it has taken the life and movement and romance out of the Government and substituted a rather uninspiring greyness. Or as it was put by the old Punjabi fire-eater in his conversation with the Lieutenant-Governor. The Punjabi was bewailing the good old days when every soldier of fortune carried a kingdom in his scabbard. “Why grumble?” said the satrap. “You might have been a Prince to-day and bowstrung to-morrow. Your life, your fortune, your honour depended on the whim of a despot.” “True, Huzoor,” was the response, “but we had our chance.” The Native States provide this chance for enterprising Indians. They afford a field for social and political experiment much safer than the huge expanse of British India, and they open a second outlet for those sentiments of personal loyalty which lie at the base of the Oriental character. With the vastly superior education of the younger generation of Indian Princes there have also risen administrative ideals in far closer harmony with those of the Government of India, and the old points of difference have narrowed. If we would see how they have narrowed we have only to recall those words of Henry Lawrence:—“If ever there was a device for ensuring maladministration, it was that of a native ruler backed up by British bayonets and directed by a British Resident”—and compare them with the condition of native ruled India to-day.

From this better understanding there grew the cordial partnership between the Government and the Native States that now exists. It was kindled by the spread of education and the defining of the policy that should govern the relations of the two partners. It burst into flame at Lord Curzon's clarion call to joint action in the splendid work of governing India. It flamed when fanned by the strong Imperial gale that swept over the Delhi Durbar. It has burnt strongly, brightly, confidently at every stage of the Royal progress. Nothing could be happier or more hopeful than to find that the pride and joy with which each Chief acclaimed the heir of his beloved King-Emperor, the grandson of his revered Queen-Empress, there mingled no doubts as to the Government policy, no suspicions as to the future, but the conviction that although atoms of dust may get into the machinery all the wheels are turning toward a common goal.

To those Chiefs the Prince and Princess of Wales came as a guarantee of the permanence, as far as we are permitted to see, of the conditions under which they hold their privileged position. Viceroy's come and go: Members of Council change with bewildering rapidity: and Politicals are here to-day and are gone to-morrow. But over the Government of India and its agents—“the impersonal power of an administrative abstraction”—stands the Royal House of England. That House, whilst keeping strictly within the boundaries set by the Constitution, has many means of greatly influencing both the Government of England and the Government of India. Its influence has always been wisely and sympathetically exercised for India's good: this country never had a truer friend than Queen Victoria. The presence of Their Royal Highnesses in the Dependency is the assurance that not only in this generation but in the next the Sovereign of all the Britains will be a Monarch who knows the Indian Princes, who appreciates their position, who has met them in the frank comradeship of the field as well as in Eastern ceremonial, and who will add to inherited tradition a warm personal care for their interests.

Madras Mail.—In the blazing sunshine of a late January after-noon the Maharaja of Mysore drove through the streets of his capital to meet the Prince and Princess of Wales. He left the new Palace, slowly completing at a cost of Rs. 30 lakhs—a place which is no extravagance because the serpentine carving in red and white porphyry and marble and granite, the lattices of soap-stone and the doors of ivory-inlaid teak, preserved from extinction the ancient arts of Southern India. He passed the statue erected to the memory of his late father, who deserved well of all patriotic Indians for this, that he justified, and more than justified, the policy of restoring Mysore to the old Hindu dynasty after half a century of British administration. He traversed the wide, well-kept streets of the city, buzzing with the chatter of a cheerful, prosperous, contented people, whose loyalty expressed itself in reverent salaams. At the age of 21, and after a most careful and judicious training, he finds himself before as fair a prospect as ever faced an Indian Prince. Twenty-nine thousand square miles of territory, as carefully conserved as an English estate, five millions of well-to-do subjects, an abundant treasury and an efficient Civil Service. And he looked worthy of it, calm, collected, and dignified, for the Ruler of Mysore is not of those Princes who think that enlightenment is best shown in an undue familiarity.

Circumstances have conspired in an altogether exceptional degree to make Mysore loom large on the horizon of Indian history, and for some time it will continue to hold its position there. In the early days of Fort St. George it was the hub of the Madras Government. We, with our later knowledge of the seats of decay in Hyder's and Tippu's kingdoms, which would soon have brought them toppling to the ground, and the sandy foundation of Napoleon's bid for power in the East, can afford to smile at the terror they inspired in the Eastern Presidency. Yet that those apprehensions were very real will be patent to any one who cares to read of Lord Mornington's relations with the Madras Administration, of the second Lord Clive, when he decided on a “policy of thorough” with the Mysorean “Tiger”. Then, after Lord Harris and Colonel Wellesley had done their work, there arose the thorny problems created by the misgovernment of the restored dynasty. It was easy to depose the incapable Sovereign, to put in efficient administrators, brace up the Civil Service, and see that the liberal policy of the Central Government was pursued. But it was not easy to decide the fate of a kingdom whose superseded Sovereign had no heir, and who refused to adopt one. As the year slipped by Mysore came to be regarded more and more as part of British India. It was not until forty-four years after the active intervention of the Government that the Rendition of Mysore was proclaimed, and half a century before it could be carried into effect. Then the natural anxiety to see how the new policy would operate was accentuated by the sequelae of the great Famine and the untimely death of the late Maharaja just when he had demonstrated his rare qualities.

Now now will question the wisdom of the policy that dictated the Rendition of Mysore. It has been called, and well called, the greatest act of justice in the history of India. It was all that and more: it was one of the greatest acts of statescraft. The Despatch of 1875 completed the work of the Proclamation in calming those doubts in the great feudatories inspired by the

Narayana Rao, B.A., Sub-Registrar, Browningpet, in honour of the visit to Mysore of His Royal Highness George Fredric Ernest Albert, Prince of Wales, K.G., K.P., K.T., G.C. M.G., G.C.V.O., etc., and Her Royal Highness Victoria Mary of Teck, Princess of Wales, on the 29th January 1906. —

I.

Hail! Gracious Prince, Great Britain's kingly heir,
With joy and loyal love doth Mysore greet
Your Royal Highness and thy Consort fair—
The Noble Princes of Wales, of such sweet
And gentle grace. And proud we feel to meet
This day right lordly guests within our state,
Whose cherished love led them, despite the heat
Or cold, to see these climes where ne'er abate
The charms of orient skies though be the sun irate.

II.

What time the great and valiant Rod'rickrose
To be the Chief of Wales, then sprang the line
Of Princes, the last of whom Llywelyn chose
To thwart the plans his mortal foe—the fine
Old warrior Edward—nursed to undermine
His rule; so dearly paid by being slain
And left his victor wear his crown and shine
Then Edward of fair Cernarvon was fain
The title of the English "Prince of Wales" to gain.

III.

On Crecy's battle-field the Black Prince won
Bohemia's golden feathers which he wore
With the "Ich Dion" his motto old. But none
Has earned yet richer prizes from the store
Of glory though a score and sixteen more
Have gone before thee—Lord of th' Isles. By right
Art thou an Earl, a Duke, and,—deep in lore—
A Baron, Scotland's Steward, and a Knight
E'er brave and prompt on land or sea to lead and fight.

IV.

A most eventful time has been the morn
When thou didst reach our shores in great Renown—
The stately man-of-war that doth adorn
The fleet which shields the ancient British Crown
Like her colossal sisters—that scare frown—
The Ophir and Scapis which the sway
Of Neptune mock as they go bearing down
The tide and tempest on the King's highway
O'er all the regions traversed by the god of day.

V.

So when the bright November Ninth had brought To India thee, the Princess and thy band

Of worthies, O! how much the people sought,—
With hearts too full of joy and hand-in-hand
As on the threshold hastened they to stand
With eagerness and pomp and high regard,—
To honour thee, to welcome to this land
The Prince whose martial race our welfare guard
And walk in virtue's path and wicked ways discard.

VI.

From Bombay's gate to palmy Burma's stand,
Or from Himal'ya's 'ternal peaks of snow
To where the sainted Comorin's Cape doth stand,
Where'er thy lordly foot is set, we know.
There homage waits you both from high and low
As it awaited thirty years ago
Thy Royal sire our Emperor. And so
Did India nothing spare her love to show
To thy late brother whose demise has been our woe.

VII.

This land which once surpassed the rest by far,— Forgotten home of Eastern faiths and lore—
This was the price which in the game of war,
Indeed, the gem, the laurel—and what more!—
The stern heroic Briton proudly bore
Away from where he fought his dauntless foes
Whose dream the wondrous wealth and precious store
Of India was. He healed our countless woes
By acts the ceaseless source whence all his goodness flows.

VIII.

The grace of God and fortune's favour too
Bless'd England's mighty arms and dashing sway.
How high yet soft her name resounds, how true
It is she is the proudest isle, and nay,
The question of seas the beryl set by gay
And sylvan fairies 'mid the wavy lawn,
The shining star that sheds resplendent ray
To worlds on either side, the flushing dawn
Where muses bloom by peace and plenty thither drawn

IX.

And over this unrivalled realm presides
King Edward, India's Lord, and England's pride,— Imprinted in our hearts his name abides,—
Whose care benign and mercy, rule and guide
This empire full of divers tribes allied,
Albeit, by no other tie than this—
They are the Emperor's subjects; thus aside
They set the racial scruples, and to bliss
Enjoy they seal their concord with a solemn kiss.

X.

The nurse is she, again, of art and all
 The sublime science, the pow'r that 'olds in awe
 Her conquests o'er the world whose freak or fall
 She checks withal; the guardian of our law,
 Our rights and faithstand who, quite free from flaw,
 Dispenses even justice—as did Rome
 Of old—but nobler far; who helped to draw Vile slav'ry to an end and in her home
 To sacred Freedom raised a lasting hall and dome.

XI.

Within the bounds of Ind has nature mapped
 The table-land of Mysore in its gay
 And lovely hues all round the seasons wrapped.
 Behold! the varied and meandering way
 Of many a river as they join the bay.
 The gentle Cauvery . . . whose unmeasured force
 By magic turns dead night to living day—
 Her might in mill-rooms in the Gold Field pours Enriching Mysore by her rare and rich resource.

XII.

There are then spicy spots and coffee tracts,
 And woods with mammoth beasts, and hills and dales
 Divided by ravines and cataracts,
 Then rises o'er these hills and dales and vales
 The sturdy giant teak that straight up scales
 By airy flights the blue and endless skies.
 The birds whose plumage-tint, the rainbow, pales
 In rapture sing their queries and replies,
 The while the sandalwood there breathes its fragrant sighs.

XIII.

And in the plains are dotted thick the towns
 With teeming millions mild as doses, and vills
 With happy homes and verdant fields and downs.
 And since our youthful Ruler nobly fills
 The throne his royal father graced, and wills
 His reign a blessing true should prove,—what doubt
 His peaceful subjects free are from the ills
 And share his generous love that renders stout.
 Our feeble hearts whose cares his clemency doth rout.

XIV.

Most wisely, Mysore seeks to follow close
 The foot-print England leaves, and so as learned
 To lead the van of states, and often throws
 Her sisters in the shade. Now if we turned To Chlo's Muse we see how Mysore burned—

A hundred years quite since have rolled away—
 The tyrants to disown, and then returned
 Uninjured by the short-lived Moslem sway
 To her old Hindu Raj to prosper day by day.

XV.

And look! what em'nent pilots grace the helm
 To steer the ship of state. There first is seen
 The Dow'ger Queen who firmly ruled the realm
 As Regent with success. It now has been
 Our fortune to possess a Resident keen
 And wise as Mentor, who our Ruler guides
 A Min'ster, too, sagacious and serene—
 The statesman whose high lin'age hist'ry prides
 To trace, and who our good advanced by rapid strides.

XVI.

And here we stop as Mysore once more greets
 The Princess and thee with profound esteem.
 With thankfulness her heart most fervent beats
 For all your acts of grace which she will deem
 An honour great awake or in her deem.
 To God Almighty she doth humbly pray
 That he may bless you, and His holy beam
 May shine on you. And when we farewell say
 We hope the light of Heav'n may safely guide your way.

XVII.

Though oceans wide, the seas, and lands divide
 Old England and her darling Mysore, still
 They seem as though they are set side by side,
 The one bound to the other by the skill
 Of Fate whose spell of union doth instill
 In them the sense of love as strong as vow.
 We meekly supplicate you kindly will Convey to our beloved Sov'reigns how
 To them and to their nation we with respect bow.

XVIII.

With gratefulness we treasure up the fact That for the first time Mysore honoured was
 By them who one day may the world attract
 As King and Queen of England. Here we pause
 To beg ye eye to aid our country's cause
 And watch our weal. "By grace of God you may"—
 We add as if it were a final clause
 To prayer before said,—and the King, our stay,
 Live long with health and strength"—is our most heartfelt lay.

PRINCE OF WALES'S CAMP, INDIA,
2nd February 1906.

Dear Sir,

I am directed by the Prince and Princess of Wales to thank you for the copies of your Ode which you have been so good as to send for the acceptance of Their Royal Highnesses.

Yours truly,

W. LAWRENCE.

Pioneer.—It is sincerely to be hoped that the cholera which has caused the postponement of the Prince's visit to Nepal may abate sufficiently to allow of His Royal Highness partaking of the hospitality of Maharaja Sir Chandra Shamsher at some later date. It would be a sore disappointment to all concerned if the trip has to be abandoned altogether after the great preparations that have been made for some time past to make the Prince's sojourn in the jungles a truly memorable period in an already memorable tour. It was in the Nepal Terai that His Majesty the King-Emperor in February 1876 enjoyed the best sport he can ever have had in his life, securing no less than six tigers in one day alone, and taking part in an elephant hunt of some fifty miles which, in the graphic language of our special correspondent on the occasion, left him "fresh and cheerful," but his party "at variance with their chairs for a week or ten days." The latter exploit was indeed a feat of endurance which a Royal personage is rarely if ever called upon to make, for the average rate of progress was not less than six miles an hour, and the pace was considerably increased by aid of bhala gadj in front and mallet behind when the scent grew hot. The normal speed of an elephant, as the same writer pathetically observed, "is 41 miles an hour." Any greater speed than this is unnatural, and Nature exacts her penalty in the form of dislocation of the rider's bones." As some indication of what a Royal tiger drive in the Nepal jungles is like we give on another page of this issue an account of the first of the beats organised by Maharaja Jung Bahadur in honour of Prince Edward thirty years ago.

As there was no official fixture on the programme this morning the Prince and Princess took the opportunity to make a trip by boat down the river face of Benares. After paying a short visit to Queen College en route they embarked at the upper end of the Ghats and went slowly down, pausing often to take in the unique scene. Though their trip was private and informal they were quickly recognised and greeted with acclamations by the crowds of early bathers. In the afternoon Their Royal Highnesses left Nandesar soon after four by motor for Ramnagar, paying a brief visit on the way to the Central Hindu College. They were received by the Maharaja at his picturesque palace fort with Oriental ceremony, no Europeans except the party being present. The approaches were lined by his elephants, camels, horse and foot retainers, all in their full-dress liveries, while His Highness's Body-guard that furnished the guard-of-honour inside the main gate is equipped in modern style up to the standard of an Imperial Service Corps in smartness of appearance.

After staying some time at the Palace, where they took tea, the party embarked on barges to descend to Benares. As they entered the boats the glare in the direction of the city showed that the illuminations had already commenced and every yard of the journey down the stream added to the interest and beauty of the sight till it culminated in the wonderful spectacle that met their view opposite the Ghats. Those who know the river front of Benares can well imagine that when its flights of steps, terraces and the huge masses of walls and buildings behind are outlined in every feature by myriads of lamps, the effect must have been unique. Those who have just returned from witnessing it feel it difficult to believe that any city in the world could show a similar sight. The crowds were enormous, but perfectly orderly and when the ceremony on the river bank was over the excitement was prolonged by the illuminations behind which lighted up the roads as if by day all the way from the river banks to the far off gates of Nandesar House.

23RD FEBRUARY 1906.

Indian Daily News.—The Benares Railway Station was prettily illuminated when Their Royal Highnesses left last night. The Royal train reached Lucknow shortly after eight this morning. The Prince and Princess breakfasted in the train, and after a halt of nearly two hours the Prince went on to Gwalior. The Princess drove to Government House where she resides during her stay in Lucknow. The arrival of Their Royal Highnesses at Lucknow was quite private, but among the few persons on the platform was the Maharaja of Jaipur with whom the Prince had a long conversation.

Pioneer.—Their Royal Highnesses honoured the Central Hindu College last evening with their presence. They alighted from the motor-car near the flagstaff and cordially shook hands with Mrs. Annie Besant. A group of boys stood round the flagstaff, representing the various castes and creeds of Hindus reading in the Institution. The Princess was garlanded by a girl of the Central Hindu Girls' School, the rest of the girls of that school encircled Her Royal Highness and showered flowers on her. Her Royal Highness was presented with a gold brooch with the College monogram "C. H. C." by Mrs. Annie Besant. The Prince received the casket with the address and expressed his cordial thanks, saying that he and the Princess were delighted with their reception. The Royal party then took their departure, receiving an ovation from the students, many of whom ran by the Royal motor cheering Their Royal Highnesses.

Until you have looked upon one of these tremendous gatherings of humanity, many aspects of Indian life and character must be hidden from you. At the Kumbh Mela, which occurs only at Allahabad and Hardwar, and in a minor form at two other places, you see Hinduism at its best and its worst; you begin to realise faintly the hold that this jumble of deities, metaphysics, and rank idolatry has upon the masses of the people; you observe Brahmanism working hand in hand with the crude and savage fetishworship; you have before you such multitudes of men and women as you may not meet twice in a life-time; and you know that this gigantic assemblage, built up on a framework of professional fanaticism, is kept in absolute control and perfect order by a few native policemen and a handful of Europeans, which is, perhaps, the greatest miracle of all. How we govern the peoples of India, and how it is that we can govern them—that too you understand better when you have been to the Twelve Years' Festival at the meeting of the Sacred Rivers.

India is a land of pilgrimages and pilgrim fairs. All over the country there are spots where some one of the vagrant gods of the populous Hindu Pantheon has sojourned on earth for a space and left behind an odour of special and undying sanctity. To these holy shrines the worshippers resort as eagerly as they did in that Merrie England of Chaucer's time, when men wandered forth the "ferne halwes for to seeke," and they do it with the same mixture of devotional zeal and pleasurable zest. To the pious Hindu the pilgrimage is a Church festival and a Bank Holiday in attractive combination. To wash in the sacred Ganges, to sacrifice a kid on the blood-stained shambles of Kali's Temple, to bathe in the beating surf before the Jagannath altars at Puri, will bring redemption of sin and a few moons of salvation. It will also provide an extremely agreeable outing. There is the great world to be seen, perhaps an unknown big city to be visited, temples, holy tombs, healing tanks, not to mention the marvels of the bazaar and the European shops to be inspected, and many "side-shows" and amusements to be tasted, in the enlivening company of a vast miscellaneous concourse.

To the Indian peasant and craftsman, and more particularly to their womankind, life is hard and monotonous. The pilgrimage is the treat of the year, perhaps of many years. In the old times the journey was made on foot, or in crazy native vehicles of one kind or another. In these days a large proportion of the pilgrims travel by railway, and opulent is the harvest that is reaped from them. Eight-and-twenty third-class trains, packed as one would imagine no cattle-trucks or sheep-pens could be packed, will be run into one of the great pilgrim centres in a single day. The platforms are jammed with squealing voyagers, the waiting enclosures swelter and flutter like chicken-coops.

The travellers are not all of this kind. Now and then even a ruling prince with his horde of followers will set up an encampment on the ground, though this happens seldom now-a-days, for religious zeal is not fashionable with the modern generation of rajas. But many well-to-do traders and banias come, and some even bring their women with them. The fair is the Hindu women's holiday, even more than the men's—the one brilliant fortnight in years of drudgery and seclusion. You see more women at these festivals, of a grade above that of the coolies and the sweepers, in a few hours than during weeks among the great cities; and your estimate of Hindu feminine beauty rises by leaps and bounds. A woman, in most countries, looks her best when she has got her nicest "things" on, and at the fair bright new robes and a lavish display of ornaments, bangles, anklets, nose-rings, and ear-rings are the mode. Moreover, the women, unlike most of those visible to the European connoisseur elsewhere, are not darkened by exposure and stunted by toil and hard living. At the festival one sees many pretty, soft oval faces, bright eyes, teeth unreddened by betel-nut, and complexions of almost European fairness. And all these ladies are smiling and cheerful and are treated with comparative politeness even by their own husbands, on these exceptional occasions.

Of all the festivals those connected with bathing in the sacred rivers are the most prized, and of all the rivers the Ganges is the holiest. That is why Allahabad, which in the Hindi language is called Prayag, the Place of Sacrifice, has been a goal of pilgrimage for many centuries. The festival is older than Mahomedanism, older than Christianity, perhaps older than Brahmanism itself. Just below the fort there is a triangular spit of sand, at the point of which the Jumna rolls into the Ganges; and according to popular belief, a line of ripples marks the junction of a third river which bubbles up from under the ground, and is visible to the eyes of the Enlightened, though not to those of the ordinary sin-laden spectator. This triangle, the sangam or meeting-place, is one of the most exalted bathing sites in all India, and great is the merit acquired by dipping in the waters at its apex. Every winter there is a much frequented mela at Allahabad in consequence.

But when the planet Jupiter enters the sign of the Kumbha, which is Aquarius, the water-carrier, then the sanctity of the place is increased tenfold, and more than tenfold are the numbers of the pilgrims, so that they are only exceeded by the tale of those who flock to Benares during a total eclipse of the sun. There were said to be two millions at the mela this year during the great processional days; and to the casual spectator, surveying the immense encampment and the moving crowds, the estimate did not seem exaggerated. The camp, indeed, should not be called by that name. It is a town, a temporary town, it is true, but while it lasts one of the great cities of the world, more populous than Peking or Berlin, with as many inhabitants as Liverpool, Manchester, and Glasgow rolled into one.

The fair is largely a money-making concern. It is run by associations of ascetics, who have their head-quarters in Allahabad and in some cases their branches all over India. They assume the Sadhu or fakir dress, or want of dress, and go about in public in rags, with matted hair, and faces daubed with the river clay. Some of them wear no clothes at all, and are regarded on this account with peculiar reverence. But these Akharas, or religious clans, are not too much absorbed in the things of the spirit to neglect earthly details. They own a good deal of property, and some of them are bankers and landholders, as well as mendicant friars; they are legally enrolled as corporations, and can sue and be sued; and they have their own superiors, or mahants, who manage their common affairs, and are treated with a considerable amount of respect by the British authorities, for they are important persons, who can give a good deal of help, or cause much trouble, during the processional periods. The various sects of the Akharas are active rivals, and some care has to be taken that they do not come into collision during the Allahabad mela. The most turbulent are the Bairagis, a large association worshipping Rama and Krishna, which has its adherents all over Northern India. The Bairagis are always a source of anxiety to the police officials during the Fair; for they are noisy and aggressive, and unlike the other bodies, they are not under the regular control of their mahants. All the Akharas are encamped upon the left bank of the Ganges, with the Bairagis separated by a broad road and a fence from the others.

From bank to bank, two temporary bridges of boats are laid during the mela. On the Allahabad side is the camp of the pilgrims. It is a town of many streets. The avenues and cross roads are laid out by the Government, which also builds straw huts of plaited straw, and allows them to be occupied at a very low rent by the visitors. A few hundred thousand are lodged in this way. Others make tiny sheds for themselves of logs and brushwood, or put up little shelters of canvas, or are content with the bare ground, and it may be an umbrella. They can please themselves as to this; but certain limited sanitary rules are laid down and strictly enforced. The Kumbh Mela is an affair of the priests and the fakirs. They keep it going, mainly for their own benefit; and in essentials it probably does not differ greatly from what it was three centuries or ten centuries ago. The Government does not interfere with this. Hinduism, even in its ridiculous and offensive manifestations, is given a free hand. But we do for its votaries what they would never do for themselves; we watch over their health, we keep the peace among them, we humbly go about to see that they are properly policed and scavenged and disinfected. We make the place about as safe as Piccadilly, and nearly as healthy. A little cholera there will always be, in this immense concourse of folks from the four corners of India; of whom many will bathe in the cold waters of the river in the morning, eat unwholesome food, lie in the sun all day, and expose themselves with no sufficient covering to the chills of night. There was a case or two while I was there, and I saw one brown figure with knees drawn up, eyes closed, and rigid jaw, lying in a state of collapse outside his shanty. But he was not jolted down to the river to die, as he would have been before we took the fair in hand. There are proper segregation huts provided with native doctors and attendants, and a body of trained inspectors to see that the cholera patients are promptly dealt with, and the sanitary regulations carried out.

To go his rounds with a Police Officer at the mela is an interesting experience. Strange scenes and figures are met at every turn. There is a separate enclosure for the barbers, a whole village of them, for no less than 2,800 of this useful caste are needed to perform the offices of the toilet for the pilgrims. The main street of the camp is a seething bazaar, where traders and merchants of all kinds have set up shops. Brass pots and pans, clothing, provisions, toys, jewellery, native shoes and Austrian kid boots, books, perfumes, cheap haberdashery, and sewing machines, and numberless other things are on sale. The booths of the sweetmeat-sellers are surrounded by struggling crowds from morning to night; for every Hindu eats sweetstuff. There are shows and performances of all kinds. A native, with a false moustache, a straw hat, and check trousers, is beating a drum at the entrance of the tent, where a vermacular adaptation of "Faust" is to be given. Next to him is a mart for the sale of devotional literature. The customers can buy religious tracts, or if they prefer ancient chronicles of King Edward VII, as Prince of Wales, in the costume of the seventies, a remnant, perhaps, of the last Royal tour.

Religion, and trade, and amusement go hand in hand everywhere. The ground is dotted with tiny shrines and makeshift temples, which are an excuse for the faithful to make an offering. Dust-strewn fakirs sit under big umbrellas, wrapped in meditation, but with an ear for the clinking of coppers in the begging bowl beside them. Some of them rest immovable, hour after hour, on wooden bedsteads studded with iron nails, the points upwards. Others exhibit hideous deformities: a leper, with both legs swollen into horrible grey trunks; a man with one arm withered to a loose tendril, which he wugs endearingly at the passers-by. In an open vault, at the bottom of the flight of steps, is a huge recumbent figure of Hanuman, the monkey god. The idol is smeared all over with red paint, and in the dim light one can see the priest picking from its monstrous limbs the rupees and annas thrown upon them by the worshippers, who stand upon the steps with bowed heads and supplicating palms.

The Sikhs are much in evidence at the mela. We go into one of their large open pavilions, where a sort of prayer meeting is being held. There is an altar at one end, before which black-bearded men sit solemnly in rows, while a reader recites passages from the Granth, the sacred volume of the Khalsa, in a monotonous sing-song. There is an instrumental accompaniment; one man beats a small tom-tom, another performs on a kind of concertina, and the brass bell-mouth of a gramophone yawns beside him. The mahant, Mehr Singh, a splendid old Sikh, six feet two at least, with a chest like a bull elephant, courteously invites us to a place where we can have a good view of the proceedings. He thinks we might like to hear the gramophone. So the reader stops his chant, and the machine, a very bad one, grinds out what I presently discover to be an English lyric, painfully familiar. "Wow'n't you come home, Bill Bailey?" asks the wheezy gramophone in a Cockney accent, while the old mahant leans on his stick, and beams with pride, and the black-bearded worshippers look on with unrelaxed features. Perhaps they thought they were listening to a devotional melody.

My companion has various calls to make. One of them is on the mahant of a group which dispenses with clothes at this season, with whom he has to discuss some details of the great procession; for these men, as I have said, are influential, and can keep things in order. They made an unusual pair, the tall young Englishman, in his neat khaki uniform, with belt and shoulder straps, and the little drab fakir, without a rag or stitch upon him. But the mahant was an intelligent man, with a shrewd eye and a courteous manner, and the interview went smoothly. There were many other duties to fill the police officer's well-spent day—precautions to be enforced against fire, the route of the great processions to be arranged, the outlying police posts to be visited, the daily charge-sheet to be examined. In due respect, his task is made easier than it could be in some other countries. Sectarian rivalries may give trouble, but there is hardly any ordinary crime. As we went back to the police headquarters, a constable was holding by a cord a miserable outcast lad, who had been caught pilfering small coins; but the charge-sheet was almost blank, and the wooden cages, intended as a lock-up for prisoners, were empty. In this vast assemblage, swept up from a Continent, there was a complete absence of violence, of drunkenness, of disorder.—(SIDNEY LOW.)

Englishman.—Sir Walter Lawrence has addressed the following letter to Mr. Baillie, Commissioner of Benares:—

"The Prince of Wales directs me to convey to you and through you to your colleagues, official and non-official, his warmest thanks for the splendid reception which the citizens of Benares have accorded to Her Royal Highness and himself during their stay in this beautiful and interesting city. Everything was most perfectly arranged, and Their Royal Highnesses have not failed to recognise that every detail of a delightful programme must have caused endless labour and anxious thought to all who have worked so hard to make the visit so successful. The rain must have added to their labour and anxiety, but it did not in any way mar the beautiful scenes which have been witnessed by Their Royal Highnesses. They will never forget the procession through the streets and the illumination of the river and Ghats, and above all they will remember the affectionate and enthusiastic welcome of the people. Will you kindly let all concerned know how thoroughly Their Royal Highnesses appreciate their good will and their most successful labour."

The Princess of Wales with suite arrived from Lucknow at one o'clock this afternoon. Detraining at the level crossing in Mill Road the party drove out to visit Cooper Allen Company's Army Boot Factory and presumably to see some of the places of interest. Mr. C. T. Allen of that firm was in attendance, as also the Collector, Mr. J. McCallum Wright.

Her Highness conferred on Mr. and Mrs. C. T. Allen the honour of taking luncheon at their house and thereafter walked round the famous boot factory. Her Highness then paid a short visit to the woollen mills, proceeding thence to our beautiful memorial church where she spent quite 20 minutes. The party returned to Lucknow about 6 p.m. Everyone was charmed with the Princess's gracious demeanour. So raw and uninviting was the weather when the Prince passed through that he did not leave the railway carriage, although His Highness, it was understood, intended making two hours' stay. Fortunately to-day was clear and bracing.

Ladies' Field.—The Prince and Princess of Wales reached Benares on Sunday, and the end of their Indian tour is now well within sight, this being the last of the great cities which they will visit. It is understood that the Prince had some really remarkable sport last week while in shooting camp. Good accounts of the health of the Royal couple reach England, but in recent letters the Princess has admitted to being a little homesick and anxious to see her children again.

Queen.—With His Visit to Benares, the greatest of the seven sacred cities of India, the Prince of Wales enters upon the last stage in his historic journey through the Indian Empire.

After a much needed recreation afforded by a few days' big game shooting in the Nepal Terai, the only important engagements left in the itinerary are a visit to Aligarh, the Moslem Eton, and Quetta, the Key of India.

Benares might be described as a kind of religious palimpsest, for though the holiest of cities to Hindus and one of the oldest in India, before it was the Brahmin Mecca it was in turn a centre of Vedic, Buddhist, and, in a less degree, Moslem influence. Then, more recently, Benares has become an important centre of Christian influence. It is the Alma Mater of Brahminism, and is in a sense even a more sacred city than Mecca is to Moslems, or Jerusalem to Christians, for Benares among Hindus is considered to be deified in its whole material mass. All those who die within the boundaries of the city (50 miles) "be they Brahmins, or low caste Muslims or Christians, be they liars, thieves, or murderers, are sure of admittance into Siva's heaven."

Then, of all the great cities of India, Benares is one of the most typical. Here Europeans seem almost non-existent except during the cool season, when the great "show city" of India is crowded with foreign tourists.

This "strange and fascinating piety-hive" possesses a peculiar attraction to those of artistic and imaginative temperament. Indeed, if we leave the crowded streets and bazaars, and the swarming temples and shrines, and wander through the picturesque alleys away from the main thoroughfares, we shall begin to understand the saying of a famous traveller, "that no city in India has about it such an atmosphere of immemorial antiquity as Benares." All aspects are melancholy and depressing. The huge city, if you could ignore the crowds of fakirs and pilgrims thronging the purlieus of the innumerable temples, seems moribund. Perhaps the one city of Western Europe which gives such an impression of old age and decrepitude is Cordova.

While to the tourist Benares is the religious capital, and one of the oldest and most picturesque cities in India, to the Anglo-Indian it is apt to be regarded merely as an important civil and military station. In connection with the somewhat self-centred attitude which tourists are apt to attribute to "civilians," a friend sends me the following amusing example: At this hotel in Calcutta our friend—a new arrival—happened at table d'hôte so sit next the wife of a leading official. Having broken the ice by remarking that he had just come from Benares, the lady asked him "how he liked the station." Not quite knowing whether she alluded to the railway station or the police station, he made some non-committal reply, and not till the end of the repast did it dawn upon him that by this somewhat inadequate epithet she was referring to the holy city of Benares.

The one great sight of Benares is the river front, the banks one series of picturesque palaces, temples, shrines, and mosques, a magnificent jumble of massive alternating with filigree architecture. These buildings are diversified by the famous ghats—massive platforms and lofty steps of crumbling masonry.

To appreciate this wonderful sight, intensified by the human interest afforded by the thousands of pilgrims, fakirs, and other worshippers who crowd the ghats, especially in the early morning, the stranger must take a boat and be rowed slowly up and down the river. This is far more enjoyable than attempting to explore the malodorous streets and alleys and taking a hurried glimpse of the half-dozen regulation "show temples" affected by the guides.

It would probably occur to the tourist watching the thousands and thousands of apparently verminous and germ laden pilgrims and fakirs collected here from all parts of India, and drinking the holy water quite indifferent to the proximity of a half-burnt corpse or a sewer outfall, that only a miracle prevents Benares from being the greatest plague spot in the Indian Empire.

Possibly a startling chemical discovery, made within recent years, offers a solution of this mystery. This certainly seems to show that there is a scientific basis for the universal faith—usually called superstition—among Hindus in the cleansing qualities of the Ganges, as well as in its peculiar sanctity. Careful experiments have shown that the river possesses extraordinary and inexplicable antiseptic properties. A Government analyst took water from the main sewer of Benares, which contained millions of cholera germs. When emptied into a receptacle of Ganges water in six hours they were all dead. He took undeniably pure water and threw a few cholera germs in; they propagated and swarmed. These tests were tried repeatedly, with the same results. Does this explain the comparative immunity of Benares from cholera epidemics on a large scale in a city which seems to offer the most favourable conditions for their propagation? Some travellers, however, offer a simpler explanation, namely, the powerful sunshine which for months on end beats on the waters, for it is well known that the sun has a distinctly deodorising and purifying influence.

I have only space to notice briefly the most important or the most sacred ghats. Starting from the southern end, and rowing down the river, we soon reach the Shivala Ghat, which is chiefly frequented by fakirs.

The Smashan Ghat is usually known as the Burning Ghat, though the Jal Sain Ghat is the principal one. On the sides of this ghat are stones resembling tombstones. These are the monuments to widows who performed suttee, till this horrible practice was suppressed by the Government.

The Kedar Ghat is one of the finest ghats from an architectural point of view. The Mansorava Ghat was built by Raja Man Singh. Here tourists generally land to see the famous Mansarava Stone, which is believed to have the property of increasing a millet seed measure in height every day.

The Munshi Ghat is one of the most picturesque on the river. It was built by the Raja of Nagpore. Next to this is the Rana Ghat, built by the Maharana of Udaipur. It is the only ghat frequented by Muslims.

The Dasaswamed Ghat is one of the five sacred ghats: it is so called because Brahma is said to have sacrificed (Medh) ten (das) horses (aswe) at this spot. The Panchganga Ghat is familiar to all tourists from photographs, with the slender and singularly graceful minarets of Aurunzeb's mosque towering above it. The Mogul Emperor built this mosque on the site of the temple of Siva to insult and mortify the conquered Hindus. This accounts for the anomaly of a Muhammadan temple being the most prominent architectural feature in this sacred city of Brahminism. Near to this ghat is one which is naturally, if illogically, avoided by timid tourists, as it is generally known as Small-pox Ghat, being dedicated to Sitala, the goddess of small-pox. In some guides this is called Sittah Ghat.

"Perhaps there is some confusion with Sita, the most exquisite and charming figure in Hindu mythology, a satini whose like does not exist in Greek or Roman literature. But the cult of Sita and Ram has no place at Benares. It is a cult which interests scholars at present, since there are good grounds for believing it to be a modification of Christian ideas. For there were Christian churches in India long before we gave up the worship of Eastr, the Northern Vasanta, and when we were still sacrificing pigs to our Northern Venus Freya (Friday-Vendredi) at Yule, the season when the sun wheels or 'yules' at the winter solstice."

The ghats are the great sights of Benares, and instead of attempting to do many of the innumerable temples, it would be wiser for the tourist to devote most of his time to repeated rows up and down the river front, if possible at sunrise and at sunset.

The temples most usually visited by tourists are the Golden Temple and the Durga Temple, often called the monkey temple, not, as might be naturally supposed, from it being dedicated to Hanuman, the monkey god, but simply because its precincts are much infested by monkeys.

The Golden Temple is the chief shrine of Siva in Benares.

None but Hindus can, of course, enter the actual temple, but visitors are allowed in the quadrangle from which a view of the interior is to be obtained. The famous Well of Knowledge in the centre of the quadrangle can, however, be seen by the curious, who do not mind being jostled by the crowds of worshippers, and are indifferent to the malodorous surroundings. Pilgrims, after giving an offering to the priests—an indispensable ceremony in all Hindu ritual—drink a ladle full of the putrid water from the well, which apparently has never been cleaned out since it was excavated.

The Monkey Temple requires the greater part of a morning, and tourists pressed for time would find a visit to Sarnath, which is, in fact, the cradle of Benares, far more interesting. Here is that remarkable Buddhist monument, the Tope erected by Asoka, which marks the spot where Buddha first preached his gospel. Archaeologists wrangle considerably over the date, but it is attributed by Fergusson to the seventh century A.D. At a distance it has some resemblance to the False Pyramid of Meidum near Cairo.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE PAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE BOMBAY PRESIDENCY FOR THE WEEK ENDING 24TH FEBRUARY 1906.

Phaniz, 21st, FEBRUARY 1906.—We hear that a very limited number of cards is to be issued on occasion of the unveiling ceremony of the statue of the late Queen Victoria, the accommodation at Frere Hall being insufficient. On occasions like this all the subjects of the King-Emperor should have free access, especially as the ceremony is to be performed by the Queen's grandson, our future Sovereign, whom all people alike have a right to see. Royal visits do not come off every day, but only once in the life-time of individuals, and to invite people only of the higher classes, or, as the rumour says, only Government servants who draw Rs. 150 or upwards, is most uncharitable. If the accommodation is insufficient, why not provide more? Surely there is enough of space in the Frere Hall compound to accommodate about 7 or 8 thousand people. Cards should be freely issued to Government servants without any distinction of pay. We would also request the authorities to instruct the Police, and the European Constables in particular, to treat with consideration the crowds that will assemble on public roads to see the Royal party and not to handle them roughly. The Collector of Karachi has invited the clubs and the general public to illuminate their buildings in honour of the Royal visit, and as we trust that all subjects of the King will do so and observe the day as a gala day, it is but fair that Mr. Mules should likewise afford an opportunity to the people to see their future King in whose honour such illuminations are to take place.

SELECTIONS FROM ENGLISH PAPERS OWNED BY NATIVES OF MADRAS AND FROM VERNACULAR PAPERS PUBLISHED IN MADRAS FOR THE WEEK ENDING 24TH FEBRUARY 1906.

The special correspondent that accompanied His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales to Mysore writes to the Statesman that the total cost of the Mysore Palace would be 30 lakhs, and condemns the expenditure of such a large sum on it. The editor, however, justifies the expenditure on the ground that such a magnificent building is necessary as befitting the position of the Maharaja, and that the construction of it has been useful in training the artisans of Mysore in ornamental working. The Government of India has been guilty of much greater extravagance than this in the matter of buildings.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE NEWSPAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE UNITED PROVINCES FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 24TH FEBRUARY 1906.

Indian People.—The Indian People (Allahabad) of the 18th February, says:—Allahabad has been omitted from the Royal tour, although Their Royal Highnesses have already visited Agra and Lucknow, and will yet honour Benares and even Aligarh with a visit. To include other cities in the programme while excluding the capital is a singularly ill-advised arrangement. Excluding Bombay, which could not have been left out, what would the people of the Punjab have thought if Delhi, Amritsar and Peshawar had been put down on the programme of the Royal tour and Lahore omitted? Or, again, if other cities in Bengal had been visited and Calcutta left out? Finally, if the Madras Presidency had been honoured by the Royal tourists and the city of Madras were dropped out? The most poignant and sincere disappointment is felt at Allahabad at the arrangement by which this city has been studiously excluded from the Royal tour. The Local Government should have been the first to protest against such an arrangement, but we doubt whether Allahabad holds a large place in the estimation of that Government. Is Allahabad less interesting or less important than even Aligarh, which is merely the head-quarters of a district? There is an important public function waiting to be performed in Allahabad, and no one could have performed it more appropriately than His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales—we mean the unveiling of Queen Victoria's Statue in Alfred Park. It is one of the two provincial memorials erected to Her late Majesty, and we are quite sure that it would have given the Prince of Wales great pleasure to unveil the statue if invited to do so. The Lucknow Medical College was a much later conception, and yet the Prince of Wales was invited to lay the foundation stone. Was any proposal ever submitted to the Government of India by the Local Government to invite the Prince of Wales to unveil the statue in Alfred Park? His Royal Highness would have accepted to the proposal at once. The programme of the Royal tour in India was not prepared by the Government of India without consultation with the Local Governments. There was plenty of time, and if the Local Government had suggested that the Prince of Wales should be requested to unveil the Queen's statue at Allahabad—the first public statue in this city—no difficulty would have been made. We doubt, however, whether the Local Government made any effort to have Allahabad placed on the programme. This is the kind of treatment meted out to what is supposed to be the capital of the United Provinces. No consideration whatever is shown for the claims of this city, nor are its citizens deemed of any account. Is it any wonder that rumours about shearing Allahabad of the little importance it has left are easily believed, and cause so much heart-burning?

Express.—The Express (Lucknow) of the 22nd February says:—The latest suggestion of Mr. Theodore Morison in the pages of the North American Review will be read with interest.

He contends that there can be no longer any doubt that the concession of merely political privileges will not allay the rising tide of disaffection in India; for the shortcomings of the Government are not the real causes of the discontent, but the ignominy of being a conquered people.

He says the only possible alternative to the existing State machinery in this country is to find a true basis of Imperial rule in India; and this he finds in the fact that loyalty to an individual is congenial to the temper of all natives of India of every creed, and that this is a trait which spares them the humiliation that must attach to the domination of one race over another. He, therefore, suggests that the Prince of Wales or some Royal Prince should be appointed Viceroy, the present Governor General in Council, who is commonly called Viceroy, being relegated to do the work of Government, while the Prince does the business of attracting loyalty by strengthening the personal ascendancy, and the ties of loyalty to the Crown by generating sentiments which would counteract the secessionist tendency. There is undoubtedly some truth in what is said here; and the wave of enthusiastic loyalty, which is passing over the country wherever the Prince of Wales goes, would lend great support to the opinion of the late Principal of the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College, Aligarh. But the question is whether he is not absolutely ignoring the signs of the times, whether he does not forget that the spread of education and an awakening sense of political life are enabling the Indian mind to appreciate a rule which is not personal. Are not the natives of India showing some advance, however little it may be, in the domain of politics, and can they be satisfied with a system of government which savours more of one man's rule of olden days than representative government by the ablest intellects and the most experienced hands of the day?

Mr. Morison further points out that at present the Viceroy in India is a dual person, firstly a representative of the sovereign, and secondly a hard-worked Minister, who exercises an active supervision over all the departments of Government. "I submit," he says, "that these two functions might in future be separated." The Prince of Wales, or some other member of the Royal Family, might be created Viceroy of India to act as the representative of the King-Emperor; and the duties of the Governor-General might then be discharged by a private person, who would be the first Minister of the Crown; in Indian phraseology the Prince-Viceroy would be Raja, and the Governor-General his Diwan. The functions to be assigned to the Governor-General present no difficulty to Mr. Morison, for he would keep them substantially the same as at present, simply relieving the Governor-General of the duty of representing the Sovereign and thus giving him leisure and quiet in which to devote himself to the business of the State. The position of the Prince-Viceroy in the Government is more precisely defined. Substantially he would play the same part in India as is played in Europe by a constitutional monarch. He would stand aloof from politics and not interfere personally in the administration, but on public occasions he would appear as the representative of the Emperor. "In British India, investitures, reviews and entertainments of foreign notables constitute a considerable tale of work; and in addition to these there is the enormously important duty of receiving the Feudatory Chiefs, who between them govern as much as one-third of the Indian continent. These are functions which are at present discharged by the head of the Indian Government though necessarily in a somewhat perfunctory manner. It would be a public gain that they should be transferred to a Royal Prince who would bring to them greater leisure and long familiarity with courtly ceremonial." But in ensuring these advantages, asks the Observer, did the writer give a moment's thought to the loss in dignity which the Governor-General would suffer, and how such lowering of the position of the practical head of the Government would be to the disadvantage of the prestige of British rule in India?

Nor does Mr. Morison pause to consider the question of the cost of Government that will go up materially on this duplication of State machinery; for in certain respects his proposals are tantamount to such duplication. We further find Mr. Morison to seriously emphasise a fantastic reason as embodying an important point in favour of his idea. He says that in addition to the duties referred to above, there is great work to be accomplished which can only be undertaken by an official head of society. Ever since the English took over the government of the country, Indian society has been deprived of its natural leaders: there has never been properly speaking a Court at Simla or Calcutta, and the heads of Government in the district capitals have been hard-worked English officials who have had neither leisure nor aptitude to take the lead in Indian society. But the need of a recognised head of society is every year being more keenly felt, as Indians are reconstructing their social life upon European lines. The most vitally important questions of the day in India are not political but social; and it is in the solution of these great problems that the most important duties of the Prince-Viceroy would lie, and in regard to which he would be able to exercise a far greater and beneficial influence than any Minister who is necessarily associated with controversial politics.

To ask us to suppose for a moment that the Viceroy or any foreigner can or would take an active part in moulding or changing our social system is to demand too much even of Indian credulity, and we refuse to believe that a costly or complicated addition to our constitution is necessary.

25TH FEBRUARY 1906.

Pioneer.—It was a happy thought that pitched upon an elephant procession as one of the main attractions of the festivities at Benares. To make a display of this kind effective two things are essential, first the elephants, and secondly a theatre appropriate for the performance. As to the elephants the Maharaja of Benares has one of the finest collections in India, all of them selected animals approved for their grandeur of outline and nobility of disposition, who can be trusted to do themselves and their owner credit on any State occasion. For the rest what city in the world could provide a better setting for such a pageant than Benares. The very narrowness of its ways was for this an advantage. The elephants in their magnificence seemed doubly large in the confined space of the roadway: from their proximity the spectators along the route could mark every detail in their decorations, and there were some points where those on first floor balconies could have almost shaken hands with the occupants of the howdahs. To the crowds that clustered on the roofs of the houses and filled windows and balconies high up in the walls the grandest carriage procession would have been lost in the depths below—a mere succession of head-dresses. An elephant procession can be seen and appreciated by all; both those on high and those who sit or stand in the back ranks of the spectators on the pavement. One would not necessarily recommend it, say, for the Thames embankment, but it is emphatically the things for Benares.

The show was conspicuously favoured by the weather. The clouds of the morning had given way to an afternoon of bright sunshine, yet cool and fresh. Every symptom of dust had been laid by the recent rain, which had refreshed the foliage and the grass to such an extent that one was persuaded to forget the all pervading drought. Nature in a word had been caught at her kindest, and the people on their side had done their utmost to deserve this good fortune. It was difficult to believe on entering the decorated quarter that this gay festival scene was the busy, swarming hive of life that we know as Benares, wonderful always and its way attractive, yet unkempt and squalid. The crowds were there, but one and all in holiday attire, while the houses on either hand were half hidden under their decorations. Along the main road a lady might have walked in a ball-dress, while even the alleys and lanes, those Benares lanes that look more like accidental rents in the solid mass of buildings than routes for the traffic of a great city, appeared to have been swept and garnished. Private enterprise had clearly worked willingly to second the efforts of the Municipality. From the elaborate decorations with which the great business houses had adorned their premises to the string of marigolds and strip of bunting over the door of the humble potter, at every step the same impulse came into evidence. The decorations culminated at the Chowk, where a huge crown suspended over the centre of the place carried ropes of flowers attached in a circle to the different buildings around. One side of this space is occupied by the house of Balbhuddar Dass, the famous firm whose productions go all over Asia, and the long balustrade of the first story was entirely draped with brocade and embroidered velvets from the stocks within. At the gate was a richly draped platform, upon which, under a canopy of yellow satin, were two little children, the son and daughter of the hereditary high priest of Benares, who in their gorgeous robes regarded the whole proceedings with a quiet seriousness befitting their station in life. Opposite was a stand allotted to European spectators and to native gentlemen not included in the proceedings at the Town Hall. A hearty cheer from this corner greeted the Maharaja of Benares, on his way up to join the Royal party with the Kunwar Sahib, and it was pleasant to hear the applause taken up by the crowd as the carriage passed on, a spontaneous tribute to His Highness's personal popularity, which meant much coming from a crowd essentially undemonstrative. Presently signals announced that the Royal Party had reached the Town Hall, and then that they were again leaving it, and a rustle of expectation passed all down the great multitude lining the route. On the green lawn outside the Municipal Office the elephants were mounted and the procession formed. It was no mere progress down an unusually crowded street that was in store for them. The stage managers had arranged better than that, and at every turn in the road some particular and characteristic feature had been provided. The first arch, the special care of Mr. Bramley, the District Superintendent of Police (if ought could be called the special care of an officer who looks to everything), was a display of shikar trophies furnished by the Benares Division. It was appropriately guarded by a couple of leafy machans and surrounded by a posse of green clad forest guards, shikaris and jungle folk. The next arch was entirely decorated with Benares brass-ware on a groundwork of crimson. Here there was a group of ascetics in robes of yellow, there a group of ascetics in ashes, then a company of students in gaily coloured caps or turbans, at another point Sikh sangat composed of grave majestic looking elders stood out in distinction to the miscellaneous crowd. And suddenly that crowd which had been waiting quietly seated three and four deep on the pavement and deeper wherever space allowed, sprung up simultaneously to their feet, and even purdah ladies craned out of the windows high up on the walls or drew back balcony chicks with less than their usual precaution, for a trampling of horsemen announced the coming of the procession.

It was headed by a small party of mounted police followed by a couple of elephants carrying a small Hindu band with a very vigorous drum. Then followed half the bodyguard of the Maharaja, a serviceable looking set of men, in handsome red tunics, faced with yellow, and regulation puggies, very different from the quaint sowari of a few years back. Evidently Army reform has been a reality with the administration at Ramnagar. Then came a troop of the United Provinces Light Horse, handsome in appearance in their blue and silver, excellently mounted, and as steady as the Household Cavalry—no small demand on an amateur body brought together from a number of different stations to take part in a procession like this down a narrow track, with shouting crowds, bands, elephants, everything to upset the unaccustomed horses. But the Light Horse kept their ranks and distances as if they had been in the habit of marching through Benares daily. Next came a cloud of pujaries in bright robes strewing the way with flowers, and then the Prince and Princess in their silver gilt howdah. The elephant who carried them, Jaggat Guj, is the same who bore Lord Curzon at the Delhi Durbar, and he was followed by one scarcely inferior to him in grandeur, Bisheshwar by name, to whom the Lieutenant-Governor and the Maharaja had been entrusted. Their immense frames were completely covered with sheets of cloth of gold and silver, while their trunks dyed purple were ornamented with all kinds of brilliant devices. But they bore their finery with composure, and seemed to understand so thoroughly what was expected of them that it is my belief that they would have gone through the performance perfectly without any mahout. After them came some twenty-five others carrying the staff and officials, and the members of the Municipality in carriages. The procession was closed by the second troop of the Light Horse and the remainder of the Maharaja's bodyguard. Like most good things it was too soon over for the spectators at any rate; but for those who took part in it it should have lasted just long enough, leaving no sense of exhaustion or satiety. Even those accustomed to such pageants speak of it as a wonderful half-hour, and there is every reason to believe that the Prince and Princess after all their sight-seeing in India found this ride through Benares something new and singularly impressive.

In admirable contrast to the brilliancy and colour of this display was the principal and still more striking entertainment reserved for Tuesday evening—the illumination of the river face. Probably not even in any Native State have the Royal visitors spent so entirely an Indian day as one may call it. In the morning they took boat and quietly dropped down the river seeing the ghats as nearly as possible in their everyday aspect; and surely if there is a sight in India that brings home to the mind the immensity of the distance between East and West, it is this. It is not only the difference of customs, costumes, complexes and other outward accidents that we gradually come to take for granted that meet us here, it is the recognition of the profounder moral chasm that the scene at the Ghats suddenly forces upon us. The insular Englishman passes a single ascetic upon the road squatted in paint and ashes upon his mat with vacancy seated upon his face and regards him merely as a harmless fanatic. The sight of tens of thousands of people engaged in similarly preposterous practices is not to be dismissed, and bears in upon one the conviction that there is a vast population whose behaviour as we see them not out of perversity or any double portion of original sin, but simply because they are entirely different from ourselves—different in their ideals of life, different in their anticipations of death. It is this impression doubtless that makes the fascination of the place, but no mere crowd of bathers and worshippers would give it the power that it exercises here. For that we have to thank the unique background, so unlike the other wonders of the world in that, unconscious almost as the work of ants or bees, it owes so little to individual aspiration or genius, yet expresses so faithfully the genius of a whole civilisation. It may be conjectured that the place threw its spell over the Royal Party as much as over the every day visitor, for they made their way down the ghats slowly and returned late. The afternoon brought another characteristic experience in the visit to Fort Ramnagar on the opposite side of the river, one of those places that like Benares itself would seem to have grown into its present proportions without plan or design. From the remnant of the original walls beside the water gate to the last pavilion added to catch the breeze in summer, no two portions of the pile appear to be of the same date or plan, but the effect of the whole is delightful. Here the Maharaja alone with his people received his guests. His State barges brought them across the rivers, his men at arms and retainers lined the way up the bank, camelry with huge carbines in bore equal to small cannon, antique infantry with bows and arrows, and mail clad sowars representing the looti horse of Cheyt Singh's day and the days before him. The gate was guarded by Jagat Guj and Bisheshwar, Surju Pershad (another giant, but of unprocessional disposition), and their solemn fellows, who waved trunks in a general salute. Within were the bodyguard drawn up as guard of honour, and silver coaches, howdahs, palankeens and other Oriental appointments were on display inviting inspection. As a contrast to Badminton, Petworth or Stowe, it certainly should have been sufficiently effective.

The light was dying out of the evening sky as the party re-embarked for the trip down the river, while heavy clouds rising in the direction of the city brought out a suitable background for the illuminations. At first appearing as a mere glare of light above the dark surface of the water, on nearer approach this became defined as consisting of myriads of detached lights, agitated by a faint breeze just sufficiently to give them sparkle and animation. By the time the boats were off the Assi Ghat the scene was revealed in all its beauty. From the waterworks to the Dufferin Bridge the whole of the vast frontage stood outlined in rows and streams of light. There had been no stinting of the little lamps that collectively made up this great effect. They glittered literally in millions and delineated each feature of the scene, at one point rising steeply to the lofty heights of the Oodeypore mansion, then widening out in long lines to embrace some broader structure such as the house of Indore. The platforms of the principal ghats stood out more clearly than by day with their rows upon rows of lamps, marking the tiers of steps, while cubes and cones of fire revealed the shapes of the river-side temples and chapels, and again here and there some narrow pyramid of steps running up between the dark walls appeared like a cascade of gold rushing down to meet the river. And far over all twinkled two lights marking the summits of the two minarets of Aurangzeb. Assuredly a sight that it will be very difficult to forget, but beautiful as it was not one that produced its effect by the idle delight of the eye like a display of fireworks. One was conscious always that it was no mere collection of heaped up buildings that was delineating itself, but this inscrutable city whose life a European must indeed be born again to enter into and comprehend. And then, here and there where a cresset flared or a Bengal light penetrated the darkness round the illuminations, it became suddenly evident that the banks were everywhere alive with an enormous crowd of people, in numbers beyond calculation. In other countries the presence of such a multitude would have betrayed itself by a continuous roar of sound. Here one might be within a few yards of the bank and not guess the existence of these vast throngs, so still and yet so intensely absorbed in what was proceeding. The shrill cheers of a company of European children at the fireworks on the opposite bank made themselves heard far over the river, but from the massed crowds, though Hindus usually do not fail for noise, there came nothing but the sounds of horns and pipes and the thud of the drum. As the culminating moment approached the fireworks came into full activity, the boats and barges became brilliant with Roman candles and coloured lights; and between them the Royal galley with all lights down, the better to appreciate the sight on land and water, glided quietly down to the steps at Dasamedh, the party landed and all was over.

When it came to the turn of the general public to follow, it looked as if a good part of the night would have to be spent in getting way. Reaching the landing place one became aware for the first time of the huge size of the crowd that thronged the ascent on either hand. Had it burst the barriers the confusion must have been tremendous. But the people to-night are patient and good humoured and the police understand their business thoroughly. Arrived at the roadway the carriages emerge from somewhere just as their respective owners appear on the scene, and in a few minutes the whole carriage company is started on its homeward way without the smallest noise or confusion. It was the crowning achievement of the admirable management that had been manifest throughout, upon which the officials from Mr. Baillie, the Commissioner, downwards are to be heartily congratulated. Benares is not the easiest place in the world to manage, and the perfect smoothness with which every arrangement went speaks to those who know of foresight, long preparation, tact, and infinite trouble about details. But all concerned were aware that this was to be the last great public display that India would offer to Their Royal Highnesses, and they were all determined that it should not be the least notable. From what one hears of the impressions produced upon the party they need not fear comparisons. The sights that India can produce are many and varied, and this may appeal more to one mind and that to another; but it is difficult to think that the great vision of the glowing riverside as seen to-night with all its associations and contrasts can be ever effaced from the mind of anyone who was there to behold it.

Daily Mirror.—We have had a great day, writes our special correspondent, with the Prince of Wales, from Kururump, witnessing perhaps the most tremendously exciting and interesting spectacle that India can afford—a great elephant drive.

It was done on a truly Royal scale, the ring of beaters covering a space of ground several miles in circumference, and herding some scores of the affrighted pachyderms into the narrow opening leading to the 'keddah', or corral, as it would be called on an American cattle-ranch.

This was constructed of stout logs of timber, and surrounded by leaf-covered compartments arranged somewhat like the boxes which surround the dress circle of a theatre. The Prince and the Royal party occupied the space nearest to the huge iron gate which was suspended by chains and pulleys at the entrance of the keddah.

At a prearranged signal the beaters suddenly narrowed in, uttering fiendish cries, and the elephants dashed in a compact, serging mass into the narrow opening. The iron gate fell with a resounding clang, and the great beasts recognised that they were trapped.

The sight they presented, plunging about the enclosure of search of an outlet, suggested the waves of a tempestuous sea and their frightened, angry trumpetings might have been heard for miles.

Wearied by their fruitless efforts to escape, they gathered, sullen and silent, in a vast knot at the centre of the keddah. Some score of tame elephants, each bearing a mahout on his neck and followed by a man on foot laden with coils of rope, entered the arena, and were received by their wild brethren with apparent indifference.

The newly-made captives seemed to take no overt notice whatever of their human riders and followers, who set to work quickly and dexterously to get their thongs round the legs of the prisoners. It looked ticklish work, and one's heart beat quickly in watching it.

The restlessness of the great beasts seem to be in ratio with their youth. The elder ones, for the most part, submitted with an air of sulky dignity, the younger ones curvetted, or stuck their toes in the ground, and squealed like pigs under the knife of the butcher.

Rather to the surprise of the novice at this kind of sport, they offered no violence. One baby elephant, in the near neighbourhood of the box which contained the Royal party, seemed to have a dash of the low comedian in his nature, and performed a variety of clumsy gambols in his endeavours to elude his captors which were loudly applauded by everybody present, and made the Prince fairly shake with laughter.

Pioneer.—The Princess of Wales this morning paid a visit to the Chowk and this afternoon attended the 8th Division Assault-at-Arms, journeying from Government House in a motor-car and accompanied by Lady Eva Dugdale, Sir Walter Lawrence, Major Campbell and Captain Ashburner. She reached the ground about 4-30 and was received by General Sir Alfred Gaselee and General Sir Edward and Lady Elliot. After witnessing the officers' jumping section, tent pegging by British and Native officers and the musical ride by the 6th Cavalry, the Princess left the ground. About 6 o'clock this evening she attends the circus of the Royal Dragoons.

Times of India.—Lucknow, 24th February His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has given a sum of Rs. 1,500 for distribution among the Hindu public religious institutions in Benares. This is in furtherance of the precedent set at the early stage of tour when His Royal Highness gave similar donations to Muhammadan and Sikh religious institutions.

27TH FEBRUARY 1906.

Englishman.—The Princess of Wales on Saturday afternoon attended the 8th Division Assault-at-Arms at Lucknow. Yesterday evening Her Royal Highness witnessed the first of the Mohurram processions in Lucknow. The procession was more imposing than usual, including elephants and camels. The Princess, who was accompanied by Lady Eva Dugdale, Sir Walter Lawrence and Mr. Davis, Commissioner of Lucknow, saw the procession from a balcony near the Chauk Gate and was greatly interested. The tazzies were conveyed to Husainabad. Large numbers of people lined the road, less to see the procession than to see Her Royal Highness. The Princess returned to Government House by motor-car.

In connection with the Royal visit to Bangalore, the Municipality to-day resolved to change the name of the Ice House Road to Queen's Road. This is the road their Royal Highnesses took from the Residency to Cubbon Park, on the occasion of unveiling the Queen's statue. The proposal to call it Prince's Road fell through.

The Hon'ble Mr. Tucker returned to Quetta yesterday, for the express purpose of seeing to everything necessary being done for the reception and entertainment, while here of the Prince and Princess of Wales, who are timed to arrive on the 10th March at 3 p.m.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—As noted in our issue of 16th instant the United Provinces Light Horse provided the Escorts for the Prince and Princess of Wales, and also for His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, during the Royal visit to Benares. The Cawnpore, Oudh, Allahabad, Ghazipur and Gorakhpur squadrons supplied Volunteers to the number of 140, but Colonel Newcomen took only 105, with six officers riding in the ranks as troopers—the escort to the Royal Carriage was composed entirely of officers—and eight officers, as such. The Light Horse took part in the ceremony of presenting the new colours to the Staffordshire Regiment, and furnished all the escorts to their Royal Highnesses both "Royal and travelling". Their appearance in their full dress (blue) review order was very smart and handsome, and quite justified the decision to turn out, on such a special ceremonial occasion, in full dress instead of in khaki. Nearly all the Volunteers went at considerable personal inconvenience, which showed not only their loyalty but their keenness as Volunteers. The Prince expressed himself pleased with both men and horses and the smart appearance of the corps generally.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—On Saturday afternoon, the Princess of Wales attended the 8th Division Assault at Arms, accompanied by Lady Eva Dugdale, Sir Walter Lawrence, Major Campbell and Captain Ashburner. Her Royal Highness was received by General Sir Alfred Gaselee and General Sir E. Locke Elliott and Lady Elliott. The Princess witnessed the officers' jumping section, tent pegging by British and Native officers, and a musical ride by the 6th Cavalry.

In the evening the Princess attended the Royal Dragoons' circus.

On Sunday morning Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, accompanied by General Sir Edward and Lady Locke Elliott and Lady Eva Dugdale, visited the Station Hospital here. She was received by Lieutenant-Colonel Rowney, Major Le Quesne, V.C., and the Officers of the R. A. M. C. On her arrival, Nursing Sisters Kelly, Truman, Quinn and Hickie were presented to Her Royal Highness. She then visited the wards, asking many interested questions about the patients, and showing much sympathy with their sufferings. On leaving she gave each patient a bunch of flowers which they greatly appreciated. Her Royal Highness then visited the women's hospital. And on her departure expressed herself pleased with all she had seen.

On Sunday evening, Her Royal Highness witnessed the first of the Moharram processions in Lucknow, accompanied by Lady Eva Dugdale, Sir Walter Lawrence, and Mr. J. S. Davis, Commissioner of Lucknow. Her Royal Highness viewed the procession from the premises owned by Mr. Hari Kishen Dhson, Vakil, at Gol Dawaza or the Chauk Gate, where she arrived by motor car about five o'clock. The procession was more imposing than usual and included elephants and camels with two tazzies and the usual weird music. The Princess was greatly interested. Large numbers of people lined the road to Husainabad where the procession ended. Her Royal Highness returned to Government House from the Gol Darwaza by motor car. Her Royal Highness leaves Lucknow for Agra this evening.

Indian Daily News.—The Amrita Bazar Patrika writes:—We received the following from our Benares correspondent just after the Prince with his noble consort had reached that most holy city of the Hindus:—

"The Prince of Wales has come to Benares. The people are full of joy, they wish to get a glimpse of His Royal Highness and run after his trains and cortege to adore him and pay their homage to him. But the all-wise officialdom will not only not permit this but will positively distrust them. Will you believe me when I say that Benares has for a week past been full of detectives: they have been imported from other districts, the Police and the military force have been increased and these men are going into the lanes and bye-lanes hearing what two men in any one place are talking and if the talk is not about Her Royal Highness to put questions to them and raise that talk.

The officials think that they are very wise and far-sighted, but there is now scarcely any man in Benares who does not know that detectives are abroad, and they have themselves been detected. This revelation has very much chilled the hearts of the people.

28TH FEBRUARY 1906.

Indian Daily News.—Reports from Gwalior state that the Prince of Wales has had good sport there. His Royal Highness secured a tiger, a panther and a sambhur as a result of one beat. The Prince's shooting camp is now at Sipri.

Yesterday the Princess of Wales visited the Government Dairy Farm, Lucknow, accompanied by General Sir Edward Locke Elliott. Later in the day Her Royal Highness paid a second visit to the Residency. The Princess left Lucknow for Agra at 10-30 last night.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—It was very fitting that the Consort of the Royal Prince who aroused the British manufacturer and merchant a few years ago with his clear tongued message "Wake up, John Bull!" should embrace the opportunity which Cawnpore affords of witnessing the progress achieved by the very wide-awake sons of Empire who are responsible for the commercial activity of these Provinces; and it was with a warm glow of loyalty and pride that the conductors of the two principal concerns in Cawnpore on Thursday afternoon received a message to the effect that Her Royal Highness graciously purposed seeing their Factories at work on Friday. The Princess arrived at Cawnpore shortly after 1 p.m., the arrival being quite private, and left immediately for the Memorial Gardens. After reverent inspection of the Well and other sacred mementoes there, the party drove to "Fairlawn," the residence of Mr. C. T. Allen, partner of the firm of Messrs. Cooper, Allen and Co. Her Royal Highness was received here by Mrs. C. T. Allen, and after lunch proceeded with her party to view the interesting Factory where the boots for the Indian Army are produced by the aid of the very latest machinery and a large staff of experts.

The Princess displayed great interest in the work, and paid particular attention to the handsome show of crocodile leather work, including a beautiful Ladies' silver-mounted dressing case which had been laid out for inspection. In the short time available wonders had been accomplished, for the manner in which the work was displayed was worthy of a first-rate exhibition. Before leaving Her Royal Highness graciously intimated her desire to purchase some of the leather work which had been exhibited.

From there the Royal party left for the Woollen Mills, and Her Royal Highness was avowedly much attracted by the varied processes which are necessary to the production of the finished fabric. Here again a gallant show was made, for in the few hours at their disposal the Factory had been brightened up with a brave display of coloured cloths, the Royal Party from the time they entered the Mills until they left, traversing the various departments upon crimson cloth carpeting. Her Royal Highness was much interested in the numerous productions of the Mill, comprising "everything made of wool," and graciously accepted on her departure a copy of the "Lalimili" English-Urdu Dictionary, bound in morocco, besides purchasing some of the shawls made by the Company. To commemorate the occasion the Management of the Woollen Mills presented each of their workers with a bright new rupee (thus distributing some Rs. 2,000), as was done on the occasion of the Diamond Jubilee of Her Majesty the late Queen-Empress, and there is no doubt that the visit of Her Royal Highness will long be remembered by the workers of that Company. It was a matter of regret that time could not be spared to visit the Workmen's Settlements which have been provided by the two concerns visited, for the benefit of their native workmen, for the lively interest exhibited by Her Royal Highness in the conditions under which workers are housed is world-known. The genuine affability displayed by the Princess was truly Royal, and the pleasure which her visit occasioned to the responsible heads of the Mills and Factory was such that its memory will be ineffaceable.

After leaving the Cawnpore Woollen Mills to the accompaniment of hearty cheers from the assembled staff, the Royal Party paid visits to the Memorial Church, where the names of the heroes who perished in the Mutiny at Cawnpore are immortalised, and to the Massacre Ghat, the last scene of that dread tragedy which even now Europeans remember with a shudder. The party then left for the Railway Station and shortly after five the train steamed out bearing a Royal Princess whose gracious visit to Cawnpore will ever be remembered by those who had the great pleasure of seeing her while here.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales visited the Government Dairy Farm at noon yesterday. Her Royal Highness arrived by motor accompanied by the

G. O. C., Sir E. Locke Elliot. After inspecting the Dairy where butter-making was in progress, the Princess was shown some pigs on the lawn and Her Royal Highness then inspected the large herd of cows and buffaloes. After writing her name in the visitors' book she very graciously accepted a bouquet of Marechal Niel roses which was presented by the little daughter of the Farm Manager, Mr. Higgins. Yesterday afternoon the Princess visited the Residency for the second time. Her Royal Highness was accompanied by Sir Walter Lawrence, Mr. Davis, the Commissioner, and Mr. Hilton, who explained the siege positions to Her Royal Highness. The visit lasted for about two hours, during which all the principal positions were visited. Her Royal Highness was deeply interested in all she saw and heard, eliciting from Mr. Hilton the fullest details regarding every post.

Her Royal Highness left Lucknow for Agra at half past ten last night. The entrance to the Station was prettily illuminated with Japanese lanterns.

Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales has expressed her pleasure at the arrangement made during her stay in Lucknow to enable her to see the various sights for which this historic city is renowned, quietly and without obtrusion of the public on her privacy, and has tendered her thanks to the Commissioner, the Superintendent of Police, and to all others who have enabled her to quietly enjoy her visit here without any parade or ceremony or demonstrations of enthusiasm.

Pioneer.—For some time before the Prince's visit active preparations had been made to ensure good sport. The camp, a very extensive one, had been pitched about twelve miles from the railway station of Narkonda, and was situated in the Pakhal forests, which are specially reserved for His Highness. From time immemorial this has been the site of a primeval forest and contains the last vestiges of the great forest which once covered this part of India, the Daudakai, from which some hold that "Deccan" is derived. Within it lies the large Pakhal Lake, an artificial reservoir which dates back from the days of the Hindu Kingdom of Warangal, but which in the last 500 years has been allowed to fall greatly into disrepair. But, although the water from this lake is not so much utilised for agricultural purposes as it could be, the drainage from it serves to keep the forest alive which is so thick that the native saying runs that a monkey can travel a hundred coss by jumping from tree to tree. This is an exaggeration of course, but there are probably quite fifty square miles of jungle uninhabited except by wild animals and a jungle tribe who constitute His Highness's game-keepers. The villagers who live in the neighbourhood of this preserve are all trained as beaters, and when a great shoot takes place they know exactly what to do. On such an occasion as this, or when His Highness goes out to shoot, a small army of from 1,500 to 1,800 coolies is organised, divided into three lines, the front, the middle, and the rear line. Each line is divided into three sections, the centre, the left and the right, with an officer of the Nizam's Army on an elephant in command of each section. Command is given by bugle calls, two, one, or three G's giving the necessary instructions to the different sections to advance or to halt.

As tigers have no respect for persons, even for Royalties, they cannot be depended upon to wait until they are locked up, and hence for weeks beforehand special scouts had been employed to locate them. As a rule February is somewhat early for big game shooting, but fortunately this year the hot weather has set in earlier than is usual. The trees have almost all lost their leaves and as there has been a scanty North-East monsoon the water is not too plentiful. His Royal Highness left Hyderabad on Saturday night, and arrived at his camp on Sunday before noon. Monday was a blank day, but on Tuesday he started from camp about 11 a.m. and got into his machan about 11-30, his companion being the well known sportsman Colonel Afsur-ul-Mulk, C.I.E., His Highness's Commandant of Troops and the organiser of the arrangements. The machan was on the left bank of the river formed by the overflow of the Pakhal Lake, and about ten minutes after the beat had commenced a tiger came out on the right bank and crossed the river where he entered some thick undergrowth and drove out a herd of wild pigs. From thence he emerged again making towards the Royal machan, but stopped to roll in the sand. The centre line of beaters then fired off a volley, and he at first made as if he would charge through the centre. He was however met by other volleys, and turned towards the left line, to the right of the Prince. The right section of the front line then wheeled round, and the bugle sounded "Left line forward," thus driving the tiger towards the Royal machan. Some spotted deer with a fine stag, followed by a herd of big wild boar, were allowed to pass, and then a panther showed his head just outside the undergrowth, but was dropped by a bullet from His Royal Highness between the ears and fell stone dead, a very pretty shot. The beaters were now well up to the machan, but no tiger had appeared and it was feared he had broken back. He was however crouching in the undergrowth and would not move until the beaters came quite close. Then with a growl he made for the same spot as the panther, and in fact jumped over the latter's body straight towards the machan. Here he met with the same fate. The Prince was about fifty yards off, and one shot behind the left shoulder killed him dead. Length, 9 feet 1 inch; height, 3 feet 6 inches; girth round shoulder 3 feet 10½ inches; round head, 2 feet 9 inches; a fine well marked tiger with his winter coat on.

His Royal Highness was, as might be expected, highly pleased with this double event, brought off in so workmanlike a manner, and after lunch started off for another beat at a distance of about one and half miles, reaching his machan about 4-30 p.m. For the first half hour nothing was seen except a number of monkeys, but about 5 o'clock a growl came from the left bank of the nalla, and a large tiger with tail erect sprang into the bed and crossed into a clump of bamboos just opposite the Royal machan. The beaters followed close at his heels, in their excitement jumping the bed of the nalla, although they had been warned not to do so. And now the jungle was in a state of excitement. The monkeys began jumping about in fright, peafowl screamed from a distance, and stripes crouched along the fringe of the undergrowth without venturing to break. He was however just visible, and by bending considerably over to the right the Prince got a snapshot between two forked branches, and hit him hard in the shoulder. The beast then rolled over and dragged himself to the nalla, which he crossed with difficulty. His Royal Highness then had two more long shots, at him, the second of which rolled him over. He had been mortally wounded by the first shot, and it was just as well for some of the beaters that this was so, for they had come dangerously close, and had the wound been a slight one, would most certainly have run the risk of mauling. When they were asked why they had ventured to come so near, they said that they thought it was their duty to drive the tiger up as close as possible to the son of the King. This beast's measurement was: length, 9 feet 8 inches; height, 3 feet 6 inches; girth, 4 feet 1 inch; round head, 2 feet 9 inches. This was a real good day's sport, and His Royal Highness got back to camp soon after dusk, highly pleased.

On the 14th the Prince went out with some of his staff after small game, and got a good bag of duck and snipe. He came back to lunch, and then started in a motor car for a tiger beat. The beat was arranged for the thickest part of the forest close under the old Pakhal Lake and commenced at 4 p.m. At this part the jungle was almost impenetrable from the undergrowth. The three lines, consisting of 500 men each and two elephants, could only advance very slowly, whilst the scouts, of whom there were sixteen posted on trees in advance of the beaters, signalled by means of flags when any game was aloft and the direction in which it was proceeding, thus, a red flag is used for a tiger, and a white one for bear, panther, spotted deer, etc., special signs show the direction, and each variety is distinguished by a special code of dots and dashes.

Before long a tiger appeared, and he move, and the direction was . . . the monkeys and the rising of peafowl. The beast was trying to break off to the left, but was baulked by flags and dummies, and so turned again and made straight for the machan. Here he took up a position in a thicket, just opposite the Royal post, and for a quarter of an hour kept moving about, keeping well out of sight and seeking for some outlet to escape, but the beaters gradually drawing in on all sides he had no resource left but to break cover opposite the machan. At first he kept behind some bushes, and the Prince not wishing to risk an uncertain shot withheld his fire. At last, however, she—it turned out to be a tigress—came clear out into the open, and the Prince at once shot her in the neck with a 400 Cordite express. She fell, but attempting to rise was finished by a Paradox bullet so as to prevent any accident to the beaters, who were now close by. She measured 8ft. 5in. in length, 2 ft. 5in. in height, 3ft. 5in. in girth and 2ft. 4in. round the head. From what the shikaris said it appeared that the tigress, together with the two tigers (shot on the previous day), had been in the jungle for some days previously and had alarmed the villagers by savagely fighting with each other. This was subsequently borne out by the marks of fresh scars on the skins of the male tigers. His Royal Highness expressed himself greatly pleased with the result of the day's report, and especially with the skill with which the beat had been managed, and the plucky manner in which the beaters had hung on to the tiger up to the last minute. Before leaving the camp the Prince presented the chief shikari with a gold watch and a hunting knife, and another hunting knife to the second shikari.

On Thursday there was a "Europe morning" in camp, and then a late breakfast, the Prince and his suite shot their way back to the station, getting a very fair bag of snipe and duck. Thus ended a very good four days' sport, and the Prince when bidding goodbye to Colonel Afsur-ul-Mulk presented him with a diamond pin and the M.V.O., at the same time thanking him for the admirable arrangements made. On the way back the Prince made no stop at Hyderabad, which he passed in his special train during the night, and joined Her Royal Highness at Wadi.

Certainly very considerable credit is due to that admirable sportsman, Colonel Afsur-ul-Mulk, and no little trouble must have been taken by him and his officers in drilling so large band of beaters. In recognition of this trouble several of the officers were also presented by His Royal Highness with scarf-pins. It must also be a satisfaction to them and to His Highness the Nizam to think that all this trouble has not been thrown away, and that the Prince should have shown himself so cool and so un-erring a shot. It is to be hoped that he will carry away with him a pleasant recollection of the Hyderabad jungles and Hyderabad sportsmen.

Pioneer.—On Saturday evening Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales attended the circus of the Royal Dragoons, and on Sunday morning, accompanied by General and Lady Elliott and Lady Eva Dugdale visited the Station Hospital and was received by Colonel Rowney and the medical officers, the nursing sisters being presented. The Princess after inspecting the various wards and showing much sympathy, gave the patients a bunch of flowers. In the afternoon, she witnessed the elephant procession of the first day of the Moharram from Wakil Hari Kishen Dhanon's house at the Chauk gate. Crowds lined the roads to Hussainabad. Her Royal Highness returned to Government House by motor this morning. The Princess was taken round Lucknow in a motor this afternoon. She paid a visit to the 6th Cavalry lines, witnessing private sports and being shown round the lines and inspecting one of the quarters.

In commemoration of the visit of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales to the Shwe Dagon Pagoda the Trustees have decided to place a gold memorial tablet on the prominent part of the Pagoda, purchased with the Rs. 1,500 presented by His Royal Highness to the Pagoda funds.

1ST MARCH 1906.

Birmingham Daily Post and Journal.—We publish this morning some account of the impressions derived from a study of the Indian tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales. The Royal visit to the greatest dependency of the British Crown may be regarded as practically over so far as official ceremonies are concerned. It is, therefore, opportune, while reviewing briefly the more prominent episodes in this significant epoch in the life of the Heir-Apparent to indicate certain phases which stand out prominently in any attempt to estimate the social and political importance attaching to the tour. To those, who, no matter what their party predilection may be from the point of view of home politics, have on broader issues a natural inclination to "think imperially," the assurance of our correspondent that the success of the Royal visit has exceeded the most sanguine expectations will afford the liveliest gratification. The long and arduous programme has been carried out without a hitch. In normal circumstances, to refer to the "gorgeous East" is but to resort to a hackneyed phrase. However, there are occasions when adjectival indulgence is not only permissible, but justified. The tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales suggests itself as being such an opportunity. It has been "a triumphal Imperial progress, attended by scenes of unsurpassed splendour." Even the surroundings of the memorable visit of King Edward must apparently "pale their ineffectual fires" when contrasted with the achievements of his son and heir, upon whom the remarkable demonstrations of affectionate loyalty everywhere encountered have made a profound impression. The people of India have differentiated between the son of their Emperor and his official representative the Viceroy. This distinction can only adequately be appreciated by perceiving and recognising the importance that the teeming millions of India attach to caste and symbols. The Viceroy is to them the symbol of power; whereas a Royal personage typifies in direct and unmistakable fashion the close relationship that exists between India and Imperial sovereignty. The acts of homage rendered by native Princes, rulers in their own right, to the Prince of Wales would never have been accorded any Viceroy. There is no prouder, nor more exclusive, man on earth than the pure-blooded Indian potentate. According to his own standard he judges those set in authority over him. It was King Edward who breached the barrier of Oriental exclusiveness, but the whole fortress was captured by Queen Victoria. Veneration for the late Queen-Empress has been the most striking feature of the Royal tour. Her gracious influence, wise diplomacy, and womanly kindness are, in the words of Tom Moore, green spots in memory's waste. The Heir-Apparent had the advantage of this affectionate recollection. There is no reason, therefore, to wonder that, when he himself showed a keen and sympathetic interest in everything that affected the people, his visit produced a profound impression among his future lieges.

The fact that India to-day is not as it was during the time of the previous Royal visit thirty years ago imparts greater significance to this popular verdict. Our greatest dependency has undergone a veritable revolution since King Edward made his memorable tour. The development witnessed in regard to education is perhaps one of the most noteworthy attempts put forth to re-create India. Curiously enough, it has given rise to another problem which sooner or later will have to be tackled. British policy with regard to the Indian Princes has been to instil into them grit and character by the English system of education. We are told that the Prince of Wales expressed his approval of the admirable colleges in India for the purpose of providing a sound English education for the scions of nobility. This is an admirable—perhaps the most desirable—feature of social work in India. The tendency on the part of those natives who are sufficiently wealthy to send their sons to England for educational purposes has its advantages. The young Princes or the sons of the well-to-do, as the case may be, return home only to find that there are limited facilities for the utilisation of the new ideas they have derived. At the same time, they have got out of sympathy with the tendencies of their race, and as a natural consequence they lose their grip on Indian affairs while not finding recompense in other directions. This is not good for the administration of the native States. What is wanted, and what is desirable, is a modification of Indian polity by which might be instilled truthfulness and straightforwardness. The system of education for India is that of equity and justice between man and man. Lord Curzon deprecated the notion of Indian Princes aping English ways to the detriment of their own people, and in this he foresaw a danger which has been anticipated by those who know India best. If the colleges eulogised by the Heir-Apparent succeed in grafting upon Indian ideas and harmonising English administration with Indian education we can wish for nothing better. Certainly it says much for Lord Curzon's insight and common sense that the Indian Princes are showing a decided disposition to carry out his suggestions. Towards this, as in every departure calculated to benefit India, we must necessarily adopt a sympathetic and supporting attitude. It is not merely a matter of sentiment. India presents practical considerations. By developing the methods which have mitigated famine and plague, extended railways and works of irrigation, and ended internecine strife, we have it in our power to make India one of the most productive countries, owing fealty to the British Crown, which can, in combination with other colonies, render us independent of outside sources of food supply.

Bristol Times and Mirror.—The tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales in India is nearing its close. The work of months of wandering—for it has been work as well as pleasure—may now be summarised and its visible results computed. A special correspondent does this to-day in the interesting despatch which we print from Lucknow—name of sad and glorious memories in Anglo-Indian annals. The tone of the message is throughout one of satisfaction. The relations of Prince, native rulers, and people have been mutually of the happiest. "The Royal pair are gratified and delighted, and the rulers and people retain no less pleasing and grateful a recollection of the visit which, as the Prince declared on landing at Bombay, has become a tradition of the Royal House." The moving panorama of Eastern scenes and peoples and ceremonies which has passed before the Prince and Princess is such as no other Empire in the world could offer to its Heir-Apparent. "East is East, and West is West," and while many things change in Indian life, many more go on unchanged from generation to generation of slumberous tradition. The Prince of Wales has, during a few crowded months, gained more vivid and lasting impressions of the actualities of Indian social and religious life, than he could possibly have acquired at second-hand. He and the Princess have been welcomed by native Princes, and obtained glimpses of their way of life and rule among their own people. They have been met everywhere, as the Lucknow correspondent assures us, with "remarkable demonstrations of affectionate loyalty." Controversies over the great problems which ever rise up for discussion in our Eastern Dependency have been for the moment laid aside in the common desire to do honour to the son of the Emperor-King.

To Indians of all races and creeds the beneficence of the British rule, which cares impartially for all, has again appeared in a clearer light, as it did on the occasion of King Edward's visit, thirty years ago. The Oriental mind can distinguish readily between the loyal attachment due to the Sovereign and his son and the respect due to the Sovereign's representative in the Viceroy, who holds his office for a few years only, to give place to another. The little acts of courtesy and obeisance by native rulers recorded by the correspondent—such as the laying of a sword at the Prince's feet instead of merely presenting the hilt—all have their meaning to races whose minds are steeped in symbolism. The Prince of Wales shares much of the personal tact and frank friendliness which have distinguished King Edward both as Heir-Apparent and Sovereign. In his intercourse with the masses and classes of India the Prince has had constant opportunities of displaying these qualities. He has been admirably seconded by the Princess, in whose honour some of the reserve and seclusion which surrounds the women of the Orient has been broken through. The college education of the sons of native Chiefs and the progress of the new Imperial Cadet movement have been objects of special interest to the Prince. Higher education in India has not been altogether an unmixed blessing. A mere facility in passing examinations and acquiring English—of a kind—come readily to the supple minds of Southern Indian races. A shallow culture too often leads only to material discontent and mental unrest. But it can hardly be doubted that a replacement of the old Oriental by modern Western methods of education in the case of the native ruling classes must tend to more enlightened rule in the future, and to a still closer bond of sympathy between the populations of India and the traditions of the Empire as a whole.

Daily Telegraph.—Now that the Royal tour is practically over so far as official acts are concerned, it is possible to form some estimate of the effects produced and the results attained politically.

I may say at once that I have the highest warrant for stating that from this standpoint the success of the visit has exceeded the most sanguine expectations. The long and arduous programme has been carried out without a single hitch, excepting only in regard to one item, affecting the Prince's private aspirations as a sportsman—the abandonment of the Nepal shoot, which was organised on a scale even greater than in the case of the King thirty years ago. The outbreak of cholera, however, in the camp, where over 10,000 beaters and other followers were massed, rendered the abandonment imperative.

Setting aside this disappointment to a keen sportsman, the tour has been a triumphal Imperial progress, attended by scenes of unsurpassed splendour, and the remarkable demonstrations of affectionate loyalty everywhere encountered have made a profound impression on the Prince and Princess, and all privileged to accompany them. The most striking of all was the ever-present evidence of the enduring veneration of the Indian people for Queen Victoria the Good.

The same sentiment of personal affection for the reigning House was delicately indicated by the ruling Chiefs, through many little, but none the less significant things, such as the resigning of small prerogatives and the rendering of special acts of homage never accorded to any Viceroy. On the other hand, those who have had the most intimate opportunities of observation know that the Prince in his personal converse with the chiefs, by the simple directness of his manner, and his keen and sympathetic interest in everything affecting them and their peoples, has produced the happiest possible impression. Many proofs of this statement might be quoted. To take a single instance, a matter in which the Prince on every occasion showed particular solicitude was the education of the chiefs' sons. The smart cadet corps which formed part of the Royal escort in Calcutta and elsewhere are the immediate outcome of the Chiefs' colleges in question. Both movements have undoubtedly been much stimulated and encouraged by the notice and favour which they have received.

Politically, one of the most important acts of the Prince's tour was his drive up the Khyber Pass, without any guard except an escort composed of Afridis, so recently at war with the British Power. It is an open secret that many regarded the excursion as rash, and would have dissuaded His Royal Highness from it, but its happy accomplishment has produced an excellent impression, showing, as it did, the implicit confidence of the King's son in the honour and chivalry of the Pathan and his regard for the Sikh nation.

While the Prince's private intercourse with the Chiefs cannot fail to prove reciprocally useful in the future, almost equally valuable feelings have been stirred and gratification has been given to many millions of the populace, who have seen and acclaimed the Heir-Apparent and his consort, who throughout the tour have lived constantly in the popular eye, fulfilling unsparingly the most exacting public engagements, showing themselves as much as possible to the people, ever smiling and gracious. Almost daily, moreover, opportunities have presented themselves for individual acts of kindness. Many small accidents, inseparable from immense gatherings such as the Imperial progress brought together, have occurred from time to time, and in every case kindly inquiries have been made and sympathy has been conveyed. Similarly, the Princess, when visiting hospitals and schools, would converse with the native ladies, and won all hearts by her simple and tactful graciousness.

To sum up, if the Royal pair are gratified and delighted with the success of the tour on their side, as undoubtedly they are, it may be said with equal truth that the rulers and people of India retain no less pleasing and grateful a recollection of the visit, which, as the Prince declared on landing at Bombay, has become a tradition of the Royal house.

Indian Daily News.—The Pioneer's London correspondent wires that the King, replying to an address from the Convocation of Canterbury, trusts that the Prince of Wales' visits to the Colonies and India may contribute to the maintenance of concord throughout his dominions, and strengthen the bonds of loyalty and affection uniting the people of the Empire.

Pioneer.—During the Royal visit to Quetta this month the Khan of Khelat, the Jam of Las Beyla and the Baluch Sardars will attend to do honour to the Prince of Wales. His Royal Highness will proceed to New Chaman on the 15th instant to present colours to the 27th Baluch Light Infantry.

2ND MARCH 1906.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The Agent, Southern Mahratta Railway, has received the following telegram from Sir Walter Lawrence, Chief of the Prince of Wales's Staff:—"I am directed by the Prince of Wales to convey to you and the members of your staff his appreciation of the arrangements made for his journey over the Southern Mahratta Railway." In circulating this telegram the Agent has directed that all the subordinate staff of all Departments employed between Bangalore and Mysore (including the staff of the Royal trains between Bangalore and Guntakal on the 7th February) shall receive a gratuity of 20 per cent. of a month's pay limited to a maximum of Rs 25, and in addition to this, he promises himself to present the Loco-Foremen, Drivers, and Guards who had the honour of manning the Royal trains with commemorative silver medals.

Commenting on the preparations at Karachi for the Royal Visit, the Phoenix says:—We hear that a very limited number of cards is to be issued on the occasion of the unveiling ceremony of the statue of the late Queen Victoria, the accommodation at the Frere Hall being insufficient. On occasions like this all the subjects of the King should have free access, especially as the ceremony is to be performed by the Queen's grandson, our future King, whom all people alike have a right to see. Such Royal visits do not take place every day, only once in a lifetime, and to invite people only of higher classes or, the rumour says, only those Government servants who draw Rs. 150 or upwards, is most uncharitable. If the accommodation is insufficient why not provide more. Surely there is enough of space in the Frere Hall compound to accommodate about 7 or 8 thousand people. Cards should be freely given to Government servants without any distinction of pay, as they have a special claim. We would also request the authorities to instruct the Police and the European Constables in particular to treat with consideration the crowd that will assemble on public roads to see the Royal suite, and not to handle them roughly.

The Collector of Karachi has invited the clubs and the general public to illuminate their buildings in honour of the Royal visit, and as we trust all subjects of the King will do so and make it a holiday, it is but fair that Mr. Mules should likewise afford an opportunity to the people to see their future King, in whose honour such illuminations are to take place.

By SYDNEY LOW.

Standard.—When Tompkins Sahib is at Home he is apt to assume the airs of a martyr. He may succeed in persuading others, and honestly tries to persuade himself, that he does not like India. He will speak of it as the Land of Regrets and justify himself by referring to the poets:—

“What far-reaching Nemesis steered him,
From his home by the cool of the sea?
When he left the fair country that reared him,
When he left her, his mother, for thee,
That restless, disconsolate worker,
Who strains now in vain at thy nets.
O sultry and sombre Noverca,
O Land of Regrets!

He asks for sympathy on the ground that he is a forlorn exile, living afar from his native land, in a deplorable climate, among an alien, semi-barbarous people. He contrasts the amenities of life in London with the conditions of an existence, where work has to be done with Babu clerks and the temperature in the nineties for eight months out of the twelve. The intellectual poverty of a society, without theatres or even a music-hall furnishes him with a subject for indignant comment. All the time he is in India he makes a serious effort to imagine that he is counting the hours till his next trip to Europe, and that the one really agreeable moment of his joyless sojourn in the East is that in which he sets foot on the tender while the P. and O. liner is getting up steam for the homeward voyage in Bombay harbour. And when the time comes for him to leave the foggy skies and mud-draggled pavements of his native-land, Tompkins is heartily sorry for himself and disappointed if he does not obtain a reasonable allowance of condolence; especially from the feminine members of his circle.

Yet, if he will allow himself to think so, he has some compensations. Tompkins is only a chota sahib, a minor mercantile personage, neither the Collector of a District nor the Colonel of a Regiment. If he were at home, he would be in a bank or an export house in the City, as his younger brother actually is. He would probably live in a middle-class suburb and go up into the City every morning by the omnibus or the District Railway, instead of driving down to his office in a neat dog-coat, behind a smart country-bred pony, with a sycamore in a green turban, behind him. Young Tompkins, as a matter of fact, resides in Putney, where he occupies a bed room and a sitting-room, with a somewhat overworked lodging-house housemaid to minister to his wants. This lady leaves a can of lukewarm water at his door in the morning, and Young Tompkins pours it himself into the tin pan in which he performs his ablutions. She dumps an egg or a rasher of bacon in front of him before he catches the 8-45 up; and if he is not dining out she is able to furnish him with a steak and some potatoes in the evening. Young Tompkins is not without his relaxations. A few people ask him to dances; he practises the violin in his rooms and joins a quartette party; on Sunday he plays his round or two of golf. He is at work five days and a half out of seven, and has few extra holidays, beyond his annual three weeks, when he goes to Scotland for a little fishing or perhaps takes an economical trip to the Continent.

A perfectly wholesome, and not unsatisfactory existence, but it cannot be called brilliant. When Tompkins Sahib is more than usually inclined to “grouse,” it may strike him that this would have been his situation if he had remained in London instead of getting an appointment in the country he aspires. As it is, he has at least certain material advantage, which otherwise might have been denied him. He lives, not in modest lodgings or a cramped little London house, but in a roomy bungalow. He shares this abode, it is true, with two other young men; but each tenant of the chummery has his own spacious apartment, and there is a sitting-room twenty feet square and twenty feet high, with a punkah depending from the ceiling, and a dining-room in which a dinner can be, and sometimes is, given to a dozen guests. The windows of Young Tompkins abut upon a minute back-yard and the cisterns of the next street. But the dwelling of Tompkins Sahib is in a “compound,” which is, in fact, a small estate such as Young Tompkins is not likely to occupy, down Putney way, until some time after he has become married and moneyed and middle-aged.

When Tompkins Sahib steps through the lattice of his sleeping-room, in the early morning, stumbling over the punkah-man asleep by the sill, he comes out upon a half-acre of lawn, set with flower-beds. In the height of the hot season it is baked into grey dust; but for a large part of the year the theccitis keep the turf green by constant outpourings from leather goat-skins and great earthen pots, and the gardeners, impelled by much tuition and objurgation, contrive to make the place gay with asters and chrysanthemums, and sunflowers and bougainvillas, and other blossoms, English and Indian. You sit with Tompkins, under the shade of his deep verandah, fringed with the tassels of the wisteria and the hibiscus, and from your reposable arm-chair you look out upon his palms, and cactus-plants and the arcades of a mighty banyan or the spreading arms of a great mango-tree, all covered by the orange and purple trumpets of the climbing bignonia, and you are disposed to sympathise with the sahib less cordially than when you listened to his lamentations At Home.

Nobody takes any particular notice of Young Tompkins, who is but an inconspicuous unit in a crowd of persons no more distinguished or important than himself. Nor is there any real distinction attaching to Tompkins Sahib. Still he is an aristocrat—one of, perhaps, a hundred and fifty members of the ruling race in a community of a hundred and fifty thousand. He moves and has his being, conscious that the vast majority of the people about him are, and know themselves to be, socially his inferiors. Young Tompkins would be greatly surprised if he were respectfully saluted by policemen and officials and the general public when he walked or drove in the streets; Tompkins Sahib is not at all astonished at these tributes, and is even a little indignant at the "internal cheek" of the native who withholds them, a native, perhaps, as well educated as himself, not less intelligent, and probably ten times as rich. He lives, too, not too comfortably, but yet with a certain assumption and style, which Young Tompkins would deem quite unsuitable for his station in life. Across the lawn of his compound, beyond the path and the hedge of prickly pear, you catch sight of certain whitewashed low buildings, which are the abodes of the servants and the stables of the horses. Of the limited establishment of Young Tompkins something has been said. His brother, though a bachelor, requires, nevertheless, the services of a considerable number of attendants. Some sixteen or eighteen adult males constitute the regular domestic staff of the chummary, not to mention auxiliaries like the washerman and the barber. Each gentleman has his own "boy," or personal valet, and there is a butler, a cook, and his assistant, table servants, water-carriers, a sweeper, and others. Tompkins Sahib begs you to observe that all these menials do no more work than a quarter of their number in England. But if he were in England he would not have even that quota, but, on the contrary, would be probably dependent like Young Tompkins, on a single unwilling female, and he would take off his own boots, and put the studs in his own shirt, and do various things for himself which now involve no more exertion than a brief command in the vernacular to somebody lurking within parshot outside a partition or behind a curtain.

Tompkins Sahib keeps his own horse, with its own special groom. He rides every morning, before driving to his office in his pony-cart, and occasionally he can get out to hunt the jackal. He is also proposing to buy another pony to serve him in the game of polo. Young Tompkins, when he rides anything rides a bicycle; he cannot afford to keep a horse, and he would as soon think of playing polo as of entering for the Grand National. But all Tompkins Sahib's friends have horses, as they all have several servants, and his "living wage" is calculated in accordance with this circumstance. And the office arrangements are planned with due regard to the exigencies of a climate in which an European cannot maintain his full health and vigour without many and frequent holidays. So every three or four years Tompkins Sahib is allowed to leave the work to his colleagues, and to take a six months' or eight months' vacation. Young Tompkins, who has never had six months' holiday in his life, is inclined to envy his brother these prolonged periods of repose, and sometimes wonders whether even a spell of Indian hot seasons would be too heavy a price to pay for them.

It is a cheerful society to which Tompkins Sahib belongs, a society of which a large proportion of the members are young. The old people have gone home, and if they are wise and fortunate they went before age had begun to lay a heavy finger upon them. India is not a good place to grow old in; even late middle-age feels that it would be better elsewhere. To enjoy it, you should be as Tompkins Sahib is full of the animal spirits of youth and its delight in physical exertion. You should be blithe and lively and easily amused, and whatever underlying earnestness you may possess it should be compatible with a certain tolerance of frivolity, a capacity for enjoyment, not exclusively intellectual, and that lightness of heart which is proof against disturbing shock and depressing incidents. A good reserve of recuperative buoyancy is needed, such as men possess who pass their lives on shipboard and in other situations where a shadow of sudden danger and possible tragedy lurks always in the background. The day's work must be done, and even the day's play got through though your partner of the night before is down with fever in the morning and the man you jested with at breakfast is dead of cholera before dinner. It is a life of hasty friendships hastily broken by death, by absence, by separation, a life in which nothing seems very permanent, in which new faces drift into your sphere and drift out, in which the rosebud must be gathered before it fades upon the bough, and the passing hour snatched swiftly because it passes so soon. The melancholic, reflective temperament is not suited to the Englishman in India. He seems sometimes afraid to think too much, lest he should unfit himself for the duties cast upon him and the relaxation which render them tolerable.

Tompkins Sahib is in no peril of being sicklied o'er by the pale cast of thought. He is otherwise occupied. He can put in seven hours of busy labour in his office, in the hot season, when the place is like a furnace, though all the shutters are closed and the fans humming, and even the Eurasian clerks are in a state of collapse as they pant and perspire over their typewriters. He is not too tired for a rattling game of polo or a few hard sets of tennis, under the mitigated, but still scorching, blaze of the afternoon sun. Then a change and a bath, and a saunter and cool drinks at the club, or perhaps an hour of bridge before dinner. And after that meal there may be a dance, into which Tompkins throws himself with zest; and though he dances every dance except those which he sits out, and though he does full justice to the supper and the champagne cup somewhere after midnight, he is able to be up and taking his morning canter at daylight. To then, who has health and energy and vigour to work and flirt and dance and ride and shoot and play indoor and outdoor games, all with equal zeal and enjoyment India has a good deal to give in return for all she takes away. So Tompkins really feels, and when he is at home he misses the spacious freedom, the easy society, and the open air amusements of his banishment, and is not sorry, when all is said, to find himself on board the liner heading down the Mediterranean for the Red Sea and the "Land of Regrets" once more.

But the sensation tends to grow weaker with each successive holiday; and as the years pass by, and Tompkins Sahib floats into middle age, his complaints become less voluble but more sincere. He can no longer take it out of himself, night and day, with the old impunity. The games and sports, and even the dances, have lost much of their attraction he goes on with them steadily but it is with an effort; the gossip of the station, the clatter of the club, bore him, and the burden of his work weighs heavier. He begins to develop nerves and a temper, scolds his subordinates, and bullies his servants, and is sick of the sight of anything "native." The wet lanes of England, the pale sunlight, the whistling rains, are calling him. He would give his tropical garden, his bungalow, his verandahs, his horses and carriages and many servants, for a brick box in a suburban street. It is time he left his place to some younger man, who will come out with a gay heart and stout limbs, and fling himself into the life of India, and find it all delightful, as he did once. So Tompkins Sahib goes home, and settles down again among his kindred, and the East sees him no more. He has few good words to say of India, and yet he cannot forget it. He wonders why people are somehow so different from what they were when he left them a quarter of a century ago, and why England has grown so much duller, and, above all, why he seems so much older than his stay-at-home brother, who is in the full flush of a vigorous middle-age, full of work and interests, and with no thought of retirement for years to come. So it may be Young Tompkins has not had so much the worst of it after all.

Englishman.—The ceremonial of reception of the Prince and Princess of Wales on the 10th instant was rehearsed here this morning, all the troops of the garrison being out and lining the route of the Royal procession from the railway station to the Residency, about two miles. The troops were in full strength and comprised the men of three batteries Royal Garrison Artillery, two British and four native infantry regiments. A Guard of Honour of the Royal Warwick Regiment with band and colours was placed at the railway station in propinquity, whereto were massed two mountain batteries with guns, which will fire the Royal salute at the proper time. The arrangements made at the railway station on the day of arrival include separate enclosures for civil and military officers and press representatives, for Municipal Commissioners, for Sardars and notables, for European townspeople and non-commissioned officers, for Maliks and Motabirs and for non-gazetted Government officers, admission to first and second enclosures being without tickets. The Hon'ble the Agent to the Governor-General, the Officer Commanding the Division with their respective staffs, heads of departments and other civil and military officers are invited to attend. His Highness the Khan of Kalat and the Jam of Las Bela will receive Their Royal Highnesses in the centre of the platform. Their Royal Highnesses will be escorted from the railway station by a detachment of Cavalry and a Guard of Honour of the Baluchistan Volunteers with band, will be formed up at the Residency. The Municipal address will, if the weather permits, be presented at the railway station, otherwise in the hall of the Residency after the arrival there of Their Royal Highnesses.

The rest of the day of Their Royal Highnesses' arrival at Quetta will be spent quietly. On Sunday at 10.45 A.M., Their Royal Highnesses will attend Divine Service at the Church of Saint Mary of Bethany. On Monday the Prince of Wales will receive the visit of His Highness the Khan of Kalat at 12 noon, and of the Jam of Las Bela at 12.20 P.M. There will be a reception of the Sardars of Baluchistan at 3.30 P.M. the same day in the Sandeman Memorial Hall. His Royal Highness will be escorted from the Residency by a Field officers' escort and a Guard of Honour of British Infantry will attend at the Memorial Hall. On Tuesday His Royal Highness will return the visit of the Khan of Kalat. The State Dinner will be served in the Residency Hall, at 8 P.M., and will be attended by the principal civil and military officers serving at Quetta. After dinner a reception will be held by Their Royal Highnesses in the Durbar Room of the Residency Office. This will be attended by the officers of the civil and military services at Quetta and the European residents on the Residency list. On Wednesday, at 11 A.M., Their Royal Highnesses will drive to Badeli, eight miles northward, whence military operations will be witnessed. After dinner Their Royal Highnesses will drive to the station and leave by train for Chaman, alighting there at 9.30 A.M. next morning, alighting from train at 10 A.M., and being received at the station by a Guard of Honour, as also by the Political and Assistant Political Agents and the Achakzai Maliks and Motabirs.

The presentation of colours to the 127th Baluch Light Infantry will take place at Chaman about 11 A.M., on Tuesday, the 15th March, whereafter Their Royal Highnesses will drive up the main road, past Chaman towards the fort and thence to the railway station, entraining at 12 noon, and arriving at Quetta at 6 P.M. privately. The Agent to the Governor-General and the General Officer Commanding the Division will accompany the Royal train to Chaman. On Friday, March 16th, the Prince and Princess of Wales will leave Quetta for Karachi at 10 A.M. A Royal salute will be fired as the train moves off, but otherwise the departure will be private.

In reference to the Royal visit to Quetta a correspondent writes that the railway line from Sibi to Quetta is to be guarded and patrolled by gangmen as a necessary precaution, considering the Pathans' playful habit of placing boulders on the rails. The programme includes a visit of a couple of hours by the Prince to Chaman, where he presents the new colours to the 127th Baluch Light Infantry. This portion of the journey which passes through the famous Khojak tunnel has to be watched entirely. The Prince arrives here by the Mach route and leaves via Harnai in order to see the Chupper rift tunnels and bridge, the latter route being the most interesting from an engineering point of view. The correspondent adds it is possible the visit to Quetta may be abandoned owing to several cases of small-pox having occurred in the station.

Graphic.—The interesting part of Their Royal Highnesses' visit to Mysore was the witnessing of a capture of wild elephants in the Kakankote forest. A luxuriously appointed camp had been made by the Maharaja's orders, about forty-five miles out from Mysore, in the jungle. The camp was on a breezy knoll, above a bend in the river, which half-encircled it, reminding one very much of a spot on Exmoor, near Dulverton, on the Exe; woods of bamboo and teak surrounded us.

The evening of our arrival was appointed for the final drive of the wild elephants, getting them, if possible, into a large piece of forest, which had been enclosed by stout palisades and a ditch. Five hundred beaters had been for two months slowly driving up and surrounding the beasts from a radius of some thirty or one hundred miles, and beyond a few that had broken through the cordon, they were all now collected on a hill on the opposite side of the river, about five miles up the river from the camp. Here were three fords well known and used by wild elephants. Two of these were blocked by stockades and beaters, while concealed among the trees at the third ford was the gate which, at a touch, was to fall behind the last of the herd and enclose them within the ring-fence, or keddah.

Perfect silence was necessary, as we all crept to the cleared space on the bank up above the river, and hid behind a screen of boughs. The setting sun lit up the wooded hillside across the stream, where the great beasts were hidden. Then the noise of beaters, guns and even motor-horns began in a din from behind the hill, gradually getting nearer and driving the elephants slowly forward to be forced across the stream and into the trap. They hung reluctant a long time, no doubt scenting us on the opposite bank. It was quite dusk when they suddenly emerged from the forest and began slowly feeling their way across the ford, the light of the beaters' torches glimmering among the trees in their rear.

I was down at the ford, which was guarded, hiding behind the stockade, and as the great gray bodies splashing through the stream in the dusk loomed up above me and found no passage, with grunts and bellows of disgust they slowly turned up along the bank immediately beneath the onlookers' hiding-place. Unsuspecting, they turned up the next dark avenue from the river, and soon the Prince's hand had drawn a wire rope, releasing the gate, and the elephants were keddahed.

Two days later there was the roping and tying up of another herd, which had been enclosed a month ago in another keddah not far off. Here a small circular stockade of stout posts had been built, leading off from the larger enclosure, to which it opened by a gateway and hanging gate concealed by boughs. Round this stockade was a gallery for the onlookers, with arched roof of boughs. Leading to the gateway, a funnel-shaped passage of strong posts had been constructed in the larger enclosure. The herd were a long time being driven and frightened up to this passage-way, particularly as an enraged cow elephant, whose calf had been lost, kept turning and charging the beaters (wild jungle people), who had sometimes a narrow escape of being caught before they could jump across the deep trench and reach the stockade; in fact, one man was badly hurt by her, but crawled into a thick bamboo clump, where she could not find him to give the finishing touches. At last they were driven in, the gate was released and fell, and half a dozen tame elephants and mahouts were let in to begin the roping up of the beasts.

A large "kusker" was the first to be secured. Four female tame elephants surrounded him, squeezing him tightly between them, while men on foot crawled beneath their bodies and made fast large new white hawsers to his hindlegs, belaying him securely to a big stump deep buried in the ground. When he found what had happened, he made violent efforts to get loose and bellowed piteously. Then the roping and lassoing became general.

It took the whole day to secure them all, under a scorching sun, hard and exhausting work for men and elephants. In the evening most of them allowed themselves to be quietly led away to drink in the river. The enraged "cow" was not driven into the smaller enclosure, but was finally secured late in the afternoon by four tame elephants and their riders after a long and dangerous struggle.

Independent.—With the social aspects of the Royal tour in India, now practically concluded, we are all familiar. It has been a round of brilliant hospitality, a gorgeous panorama wherein Oriental potentates have vied with each other in doing honour to their future Emperor. In the splendour of the passing show the political objects of the tour have to some extent been obscured. They are most gratifying. The Prince has created a most favourable impression on the Rajas and lesser Chiefs with whom he has come in personal contact. They see in him the counterpart of his illustrious father, whose memorable expedition to the East was conducted with equal pomp and circumstance. The Prince, whose aptitude as a speaker and keen business insight are universally recognised, has cultivated a practical and useful acquaintance with this great dependency. The knowledge he has acquired from personal observation on the spot will stand him in excellent stead, and he may be expected to deal with India, when his time comes, in a tactful and sympathetic manner. He prodded John Bull from his apathy on his return from the Colonies. Perhaps he will have some equally pertinent comments to make about our Eastern dependency. The reception which has been accorded His Royal Highness on the present occasion was quite Oriental in its enthusiasm and completeness. At the same time it sprang from feelings of the deepest loyalty. In India, more than in any other part of the British dominions, the presence of Royalty is revered as a sign that the interests of even the humblest subject are a matter of kingly concern. Happily both King Edward VII and his son appreciate the nature of Indian loyalty and the methods by which it can be maintained.

Lady's Pictorial.—The Prince and Princess of Wales reached Lucknow last Thursday, and the Princess remained at Government House, the Prince going on to Gwalior for a three days' shoot. Their Royal Highnesses, on their return voyage from India, are to pay a visit to the Earl and Countess of Cromer at Cairo. It is understood, though not officially announced, that Their Royal Highnesses on leaving Egypt will visit Corfu, and will afterwards go to Algiers for two or three days before continuing the voyage home.

The lengthening of the tour will, in spite of the interest of the scenes she will visit, be somewhat a disappointment to the Princess of Wales, who must be longing to see her bonny children again, but meanwhile Princess Victoria is remaining at Sandringham with the children, where she has been during the Queen's absence. Her Royal Highness is much attached to her nephews and nieces, and delights in having them with her.

Pioneer.—The following is officially published:—

The tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales, now officially complete, has been politically most gratifying, and marked by continual demonstrations of affectionate loyalty both on the part of the Chiefs and people, while the Prince's intercourse with the Chiefs has everywhere produced the happiest impressions.

3RD MARCH 1906.

Standard.—When you pass from the north of India to the south you realise once again the greatness and the diversity of the vast territory. The traveller who has been spending some weeks or months in Rajputana, the Punjab, the United Provinces, and Bengal, may begin to presume that he has got his orientation with some approach to correctness, and may even be rashly inclined to believe that he is coming to know something about India. But he will find that a good many of his bearings have to be taken afresh when he gets into the Southland. The aspect of the country is changed, its scenery, its peoples, its architecture, its flora and fauna, its languages. The little colloquial Hindustani he has laboriously acquired is of small use to him. That extraordinary dialect, which was made up in the camps of the Northern invaders, and is more or less understood by two hundred millions of people, is nearly unknown to the majority of the remaining hundred. The servant the voyager has brought with him from Bombay or Calcutta, finds himself almost as much at a loss as his master when talking to Telugu-speaking coolie or a Tamil tonga driver, and he often has to fall back on English as a common medium of communication.

That, by the way, is one of the points that first attracts attention. In the North and West, English is the language of the sahibs and the Eurasians, and of them almost alone. Even in Bombay and Calcutta, with their English shops and business houses, and a European population several thousands strong, you cannot make yourself understood without some slight smattering of the vernacular. But in Madras, if you address a porter, a policeman, an hotel waiter, or any casual native, in your own tongue the chances are that he will answer you in fairly correct and grammatical English. In the southern Presidency it is not at all unusual for ladies and gentlemen to talk to their servants habitually in English, and I have met residents of some years' standing who know next to nothing of the vernacular. I do not say that the mem sahiba of the other Provinces is always an accomplished linguist; but she has to pick up a little colloquial Hindustani, or Bengali, or Guzerati, since, otherwise, she would hardly be able to convey her wishes to her domestics at all.

The fact is indicative of a whole chapter of history. It reminds us that we have been in Madras longer than anywhere else. When you stand by the earthworks of Fort St. George and look out upon the line of surf breaking upon the shore, you are at the seat of our Empire in the East. In a large part of the north we are but newcomers. It is only the other day so to speak, that we annexed Oude: I met old men, and at least one old lady, in Lucknow who were living there when the Mahometan kings still misruled in that noble city. In the Punjab we have not been settled much longer; in the Frontier Province we are hardly settled yet. But in Madras the English have been at home for not far short of three hundred years. The agents of the East India Company planted themselves upon that coast, by the old Portuguese settlement of San Thomé, while Charles the First was still King of England; and there they stayed, trading, working, and fighting hard at times with the "Moors" and the French, but constantly expanding the extent of their territories and the number of their subjects. Madras, like Calcutta, is a town mainly of English creation, and, though it has been outpaced by its later rivals, it was a city of three hundred thousand inhabitants when both Bombay and Calcutta were small and struggling. Thus the traders and the officials have had more time to teach the people English; and, perhaps, because they are of more malleable fibre than the men of the north, and because they have no such massive literature as that of the Sanskrit to fortify them, they have yielded more easily to the speech of the conqueror, and use it with a readiness for which the tourist would bless them, if he came.

But he does not come. Madras is outside his radius, together with all the Southern states, including, even, picturesque and barbaric Hyderabad. Anglo-Indians themselves, unless business or officialdom places them there, know little of Madras, and are accustomed to speak of it with a certain contemptuous patronage. It is the benighted Presidency, left outside the main sweep of Indian life, rather backward and deficient in enterprise, with an inferior administrative record and a degenerate people. The "best men" of the Anglo-Indian service always go to the Punjab, the second best to the United Provinces and Bengal; Madras puts up with the leavings. So one is told in the superior North, and warned further that there is nothing to see and nothing to do in this hot and comfortable abode of the unworthier black races, persons of low stature, who cannot even fight. He is prepared to expect little that will furnish him with interest and entertainment in the South Country, and looks forward to enduring it with resignation and leaving it without regret.

And he is agreeably disappointed. It is one of the many illusions and disillusion of his Indian experiences. When he was in the Punjab he saw reasons for doubting whether the administration of that important and self-conscious province is so remarkably able and successful as it professes to be; or whether the Punjab official himself has not been a little overpraised. And, conversely, when he comes to Madras and its daughter states and dependencies, he will seek in vain for evidence of inefficiency or stagnation. He will find, on the contrary, all the signs of a Government which understands its business, and studies the interests of its subjects, and watches over them with a vigilant care. If he enters the Presidency by train from the north he will reach a certain frontier station at which he and his fellow-passengers, including the screaming horde from the third-class vans, are turned out for plague inspection purposes. A doctor, with his native assistants, proceeds to take the dossier of the whole complement, ascertains where everybody comes from, makes a medical examination in cases of doubt, and finally issues an elaborate certificate, testifying that the incomer is to remain under observation and report himself during the first ten days after his arrival. It is a little annoying and the aggrieved European grumbles freely; but Madras has kept itself almost clear of plague, while Bombay, with a very similar climate, has been decimated by the disease.

Madras has a flourishing educational system, and more persons per thousand who can read and write than any other province. Its roads seem excellent, and its railways not below the ordinary Indian standard. Its Public Works Department may fairly challenge comparison with that of the very best of its rivals. I have said something already of the Punjab irrigation schemes and colonies. Magnificent as these are, they do not surpass, in boldness of conception and brilliancy of execution, the great dams of the south, by which the fitful rivers, rushing wildly at one season from their mountain reservoirs, and trickling weakly along their parched channels at another, have been tamed and rendered subservient to the uses of man. And it is in Mysore which is a geographical adjunct to Madras, that the most serious and successful effort has been made to develop the mineral resources and the natural agencies of India. Some of the richest mines in the world are being worked on the Kolar gold fields; and the Sivasamudran power station, where the falls of the Cauvery are used to develop electrical energy, is on a scale which is not to be met with until we get across the Atlantic. A visit to the Sivasamudran works and then to the Mysore mines does not leave on the mind the impression that Southern India is effete.

Nor is it, as the supercilious northerner will sometimes aver, a repellent, a disagreeable, or a forbidding land. Quite the contrary. It is a commonplace to observe that the south is the India of the picture-books; but one cannot help repeating the saying, for its truth is self-evident. Here at last you find that for which you have been searching, with expectant and baffled gaze, for many weeks. The brown deserts of Central India, the stony hills of the Borderland, the rock walls and snow-capped pyramids of the Himalayas, the bare rifted plains of the Ganges valley, the rice-fields of Lower Bengal, the forts and tombs and palaces of the royal cities—all these are interesting enough. But they are not the India of tradition, the India of our youth; and in the midst of them we are sometimes impelled to ask when India—the real India—is going to begin.

It begins when the night mail from Calcutta has carried you clear of Orissa, and you wake in the morning to find yourself, among "the palms and temples of the South," amid villages set deep in broad-leaved tropical plants, cactus and aloe. Here are the true Indians, that we have all known; not the gaunt, bearded peasants of the upper regions, nor the bullet-headed, stout Bengali, but the brown half-naked folks, with large, gentle eyes, and vestments of red and blue, such as the Apostles wear in the old coloured nursery Bibles.

These Canarese and Telugu and Tamils command no great amount of respect either from Europeans or from the natives of the other provinces. They are not among the fighting races; they furnish a very small contingent to the armies of the King-Emperor, and the headquarters staff thinks so poorly of them that it has practically abolished Madras as a recruiting ground. Yet all the virtues of the world are not military, and these southerners seem to me a rather attractive people. They have the reputation of being ill-looking, except the high-caste Brahmins, among whom, indeed, you will find faces not easily beaten for perfection of feature and intellectual distinction. I have seen a Brahmin lawyer of Madras who could have sat for the model of Giotto's "Dante," and another who might have passed for Phœbus Apollo in cream-coloured marble.

It needs no ethnological expertness to select the "Aryan" strain of this aristocracy of birth from the Dravidian masses. These same Dravidians are dark and low of stature, and sometimes negroid in type; but they seem healthy and sturdy, their chocolate skins are sleek and clear. They are a lively, good-tempered lot; very poor, I am told; extremely lazy, I make no doubt, but kindly humorous, and placable, except when they are roused into frenzy by fanaticism. They have the southern insouciance, and some touch of southern artistry in their selection of bright colours, that go unerringly with their dusky tones of skin, and in the classic grace with which they loop their scanty drapery over one shoulder, leaving the other bare as the Greek often did. For picturesqueness I have seen no fester crowds in India to beat those which assembled to greet the Prince of Wales on his entry into Madras and Mysore. Some of the groups of women, in glowing robes of orange or magenta or deep blue, made splendid clumps of colour, as they lined the roofs or were framed in the recesses of verandahs and arched windows.

Madras itself seemed to me one of the most desirable of the larger Indian cities. I did not see anything which struck me as resembling the attitude or demeanour of—

"A withered beldame now, Dreaming of ancient fame."

Madras seems more like a matronly beauty than a faded old hag. She may be dreaming of ancient fame, but she has some present amenities to comfort her. It is a city of "magnificent distances," far ampler even than those of Washington. Her 500,000 inhabitants are spread out over an area almost comparable to that occupied by the five millions of Londoners. And, like London, the capital of the South is not so much a town as an agglomeration of villages. They are linked together by wide, open, tree-shaded roads, flanked by gardens and meadows. For in Madras, the compounds are the largest in India, so that quite insignificant official personages or private individuals have their three or four acres of ground, and many have small estates, like little parks, with lawns and groves and handsome roomy bungalows, such as people, built in the spacious old Anglo-Indian days, before they began to be cramped by rising prices and a falling rupee. Space is treated with a kind of lavish disdain in Madras, where you come upon a great grassy meadow, a sort of Hampstead Heath or Putney Common, in the middle of the municipal area, upon public offices surrounded by leafy glades and flower beds, upon watercourses and river channels, and native hamlets and plantations of palm trees.

Social life, too, seems to glide along with a certain Southern ease and freedom in Madras, untroubled either by over-important officialdom or great wealth, as in the other two capitals. There are no jute or cotton magnates or Parsi millionaires, and no Viceregal Court, too dignified to be quite accessible. Everybody knows everybody else—within the limits of the knowable and the clubbable, of course; there is much meeting and tea drinking at the Adyar Club, where you can sit on the pleasant lawns by the riverside, and watch the fairs swinging along and pairs and skiffs putting off from the adjacent Boat Club, and almost fancy yourself by the reaches of the upper Thames, on some warm summer afternoon.

But Madras is not too much lapped in ease, nor does it all confirm the impression which you may have brought with you that it is drifting behind the world. The fine harbour, a purely artificial creation, in which ships like the Renown and the Terrible can moor alongside the wharves, is a proof that the city, even though she may be a little out of the main stream of commerce, does not despair of her future, nor has lost the energy which made a great port and world-famous trade centre of this strip of surf-beaten sand. As you drive along the Marina, and watch the famous catamarans—the boats whose name you have known, and whose picture you have seen, all your life—skimming their way across the breaking waves, you wonder anew at the vigour and the genius which turned this strand into the seat of an Empire. And you look again at the mounds of Fort St. George, and also you marvel why Madras thinks so little of her one immortal name. In common with the rest of India, she seems to have forgotten Robert Clive. She has a statue of Neill, the man of Cawnpore and Lucknow, one of the gallant soldiers of the Mutiny. But of a far greater than Neill and the other Mutiny heroes she has, I think, no memorial at all. I am not sure that there is a single monument to Clive in the whole of India. We have yet to do justice to the man to whom, more than any other human being, we owe our Empire of the East.—(SIDNE, LOW.)

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE NEWSPAPERS PUBLISHED IN BENGAL,
FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 3RD MARCH 1906.

Hitvarta.—The Hitvarta [Calcutta] of the 25th February is glad to hear that His Highness the Prince of Wales has given

Rs. 500 to the widow of the Dafadar who was drowned when trying to rescue an European officer who fell into the Kahl river, and finds in it a clear indication of His Royal Highness's noble and generous mind.

Moda Vratta.—Commenting upon the King-Emperor's speech from the Throne at the opening of the new Parliament the Moda Vratta observes:—Who denies that India is attached to England? Who will not also desire like His Majesty that the ties of that attachment should be drawn closer? But as England's desire to promote the interests of India has not yet assumed a practical shape, we cannot help demurring to the King-Emperor's assertion that the Prince of Wales's visit to India will tend to strengthen the bonds of attachment between the two countries. We think that England's conduct towards India will be more instrumental in promoting good-will between the two countries than the Prince's visit. We feel sure that genuine devotion to England will spring up in the Indian mind when Englishmen are able to show that they are really striving for India's good. Just as it is thought desirable to give Responsible Government to the Transvaal and to govern Ireland in a spirit regardless of the wishes and sentiments of the Irish, similarly it is essential in the interests of India that she should be governed in consonance with the wishes of the Indians. So long as this is not done, we do not think India's love for England will increase. It is impossible for the Prince and Princess to obtain a true insight into the condition of the people by simply touring through India. Nor we do think that the attachment between the two countries would be promoted as long as the condition of the people is not known to the rulers. As regards loyalty of the Indian people to the British Crown, it may be observed that it has reached the highest pitch and cannot possibly rise higher.

Chikitsak.—In his speech at the opening of Parliament the King-Emperor said that the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to India was likely to increase the loyalty of the Indians. This strikes us as rather strange. How is the mere visit of Their Royal Highnesses to this country to remove our grievances or increase our happiness? Had the money wasted on grand receptions to Their Royal Highnesses been utilised in relieving the famine-stricken people, or had the visit put some check on the high-handedness of British officers in this country, or had any right been conferred on the Indians in commemoration of the Prince's visit, the loyalty of the Indians would no doubt have been increased. If the Prince and Princess of Wales had mixed with the people and obtained direct information from them about their condition, their hearts would have melted with pity, and the people, too, might have had an opportunity of laying their grievances before their future ruler. But nothing of the kind has taken place. Under these circumstances, we are at a loss to understand how the Royal visit will tend to increase our happiness. From the King-Emperor's speech it also appears that political rights are to be conferred on the Transvaal, Orange and Ireland. It is remarkable that while the Ministry deem it expedient to grant political concessions to the above named countries, they should turn a deaf ear to our long-continued prayers for similar concessions. But the reason of this is obvious. If we resolutely and strenuously try to acquire the necessary pluck, Parliament will readily confer those rights upon us.

Arundodaya, 25th February 1906.—It appears from the King-Emperor's speech from the Throne that His Majesty has no knowledge whatever of the true condition of the people of India. It is true that the loyalty of the Indians has been manifested by their reception of the Prince and Princess of Wales during their tour through this country, and it is possible that this loyalty will be strengthened hereafter. But are the scenes of oppression enacted in Bengal and the encouragement offered thereto even by officers presiding over tribunals of justice a fit return for the deep-seated loyalty of the Indians? It was with the view of displaying this sentiment of loyalty that the Indian National Congress had invited His Royal Highness to Benares. Will the disregard of that invitation by the Prince tend to strengthen Indian loyalty? Will it be increased by such measures as the prosecution of the Bhāla on the serious charge of sedition for allowing publicity to an insignificant article? We suppose that all these things are not known to the King-Emperor. But it never behoves a ruler to connive at the oppression practised on his subjects on the plea that he has no knowledge of it.

Indian People.—The Indian People (Allahabad) of the 25th February says:—Since the visit of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales to Amritsar and his offering of Rs. 1,500 as a memento to the Golden Temple, we have steadily kept in view the similar offerings made by His Royal Highness. The same amount was presented to the Jama Masjid at Delhi, and a similar sum to the Cathedral in Calcutta. All these gifts display excellent judgment. But nothing whatever was till then offered to any Hindu temple or shrine. When the Prince did not visit the temple at Kalighat in Calcutta, we expected he would visit the Viswanath temple at Benares, but though the temple was not visited the memento has been sent.

We are very pleased that this presentation has been made. It is well known that Hinduism is the most ancient religion in India and has the largest following, and the 'unfidelity' and loyalty of the Hindu proceed chiefly from his religion. All the four principal religions in India, though Sikhism is only a part of Hinduism, have thus had equal consideration from the Prince of Wales.

The same paper says:—The Central Hindu College, Benares, has several grievances, large and small, against the Government, but it has distinctly scored by the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales. The Royal visitors have honoured very few schools and colleges with a visit during their tour, other sights and other things occupying them. But the Central Hindu College, undoubtedly stands apart as an educational institution, and the Prince and Princess of Wales readily responded to the invitation to visit the college and boarding house. What made the visit more important was its informal character. The Prince and Princess drove up in a motor car without ceremony, and they cordially shook hands with Mrs. Besant on arrival. The reception accorded to the Royal visitors was picturesque, simple and cordial. Mrs. Besant presented a golden brooch to the Princess of Wales, and she also read the address to the Prince, who expressed himself quite delighted with the visit. No other college in the United Provinces, except the Aligarh College, will receive this great honour, and Mrs. Besant and the Trustees of the Hindu College may be sincerely congratulated upon the Royal visit to that institution.

The same paper referring to the omission of Allahabad from the tour programme of the Prince of Wales, says:—Gwalior will be twice honoured by a visit from the Prince of Wales, but Allahabad has been given a wide berth, and the Queen's statue in Alfred Park will not be unveiled by the Queen's grandson. It is further announced that the Viceroy will visit Lucknow and Agra on his way to Simla at the end of March, but there is no suggestion or proposal that His Excellency will be invited to unveil the Queen's statue at Allahabad. Allahabad is the most central city in India, it has historical and religious associations of a most important nature, and it is at present the capital of the United Provinces. But to all intents and purposes, it is treated as an obscure, out-of-the-way village, not worth a visit by great dignitaries or distinguished tourists.

4TH MARCH 1906.

Civil and Military Gazette.—Although Cawnpore was for some untold reasons omitted from the programme of the Royal tour, we were on Friday last, the 23rd, honoured by a private visit from Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales who was accompanied by Sir W. Lawrence, Major Campbell, Lady Eva Dugdale and other members of her suite. The Royal train, which arrived punctually at 1 P.M., was drawn up at the Oudh and Rohilkund Railway level crossing, where the party were met by Mr. C. T. Allen, one of the senior partners of Messrs. Cooper Allen & Co. The Royal party at once drove off to the Memorial Gardens, and spent some little time viewing mementoes of the days of 1857. Leaving the gardens, the party drove to "Fair Lawn," where Mr. and Mrs. Allen had the honour of entertaining Her Royal Highness at lunch. After lunch the Princess, who had expressed a wish to see a couple of Cawnpore factories at work, was driven to the factory of Cooper Allen & Co., the manufacturers of the boots and equipment of the Indian Army. The Royal party were conducted through every department of this huge concern, where leather goods of every description, from a boot to a dainty ladies' hand bag, are turned out by machinery, under the supervision of a large number of trained European experts. The Princess displayed the greatest interest in every detail of this work. Her Royal Highness was particularly interested in some splendid specimens of crocodile leather work, in the shape of trunks, dressing-cases, hand-bags, etc., and purchased some articles. Shortly after 3-30 P.M. the Royal party drove to the extensive premises of the Cawnpore Woollen Mills. The carriages were drawn up in the quadrangle of the mills, and the Princess alighted on a carpeting of scarlet broadcloth (one of their own manufactures). The Hon'ble Mr. MacRobert was presented to Her Royal Highness, and conducted the party through the mills, explaining the different processes of carding, spinning, warping, weaving, etc., through which the wool passes before it emerges as the finished fabric. Her Royal Highness watched the manufacture of socks and the material from which the uniforms of the Indian Army was made. The greatest interest was evinced in the warehouse, where all the manufactures were tastefully displayed, and the Woollen Mills were also honoured by an order for some lohis (shawls). The Princess was much amused when she remarked that some of the "Guernsey" material was equal to English manufacture, and the proud Scotsman in attendance was heard to remark that "it was better."

Her Royal Highness was presented with a copy of the "Lalimli" dictionary bound in morocco, and signed her name in the visitors' book. As the carriages drove away rousing cheers were heartily given by the assembled staff.

After leaving the Woollen Mills the party drove to the Memorial Church, where the various records in the shape of photographs, etc., were viewed, and thence to Massacre Ghaut, where the tale of the tragedy of nearly fifty years ago was recited by an eye-witness. At 5-30 P.M. the Royal train steamed out of Cawnpore.

5TH MARCH 1906.

Englishman.—His Royal Highness during his visit to Gwalior State, availed himself of the opportunity of visiting famine relief work and of personally acquainting himself with all the operations connected with it, seeing with his own eyes the numbers of persons thrown out of work and the evil consequences which a failure of the rains accompanied by a withered crop, may bring in its wake if not combined by artificial means. The work in question is in the Marwar district, some 70 miles from Gwalior, and consists of a remunerative irrigation dam which is calculated to give a return of 7 per cent. on the outlay. About 6,000 men, women and children are employed on this work. The advantages accruing from an enlightened and up to date administration as illustrated by the famine policy of the Maharaja of Scindia, speak for themselves. The Chief of Gwalior has forestalled all the misery and distress which accompany famine relief works tardily opened and the appearance of the workers, who showed no signs of emaciation, was a proof that the work had been begun in time, proving the old adage, "Prevention is better than cure." His Royal Highness evinced the greatest interest in all the details of the work, riding in amongst the workers, inspecting the bazar, hospital, huts and those receiving gratuitous relief. All these arrangements, simple but effective, reflect the greatest credit on the officials concerned. His Royal Highness before riding away left a sum sufficient to give each individual on the works an extra day's pay.

The statement made in a Reuter's telegram of London, 1st March, regarding the approaching close of the Prince of Wales' tour, was erroneously given out from this office as having been officially made at home, whereas it was not official but taken from the London papers.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal today presents the medals given to the Inspectors of the Calcutta Police in connection with the Royal visit.

Much satisfaction will be felt at the announcement that Sir James Digges LaTouche, Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces, has been gazetted Honorary Colonel of the United Provinces Light Horse. The various Light Horse Corps in these Provinces were amalgamated in April last, and the appointment of His Honour as Honorary Colonel comes fittingly after the Royal visit to Benares, during which the Corps provided escorts for their Royal Highnesses and the Lieutenant-Governor.

Observer.—When I was a boy at Sunday school the car of Juggernaut rolled through my dreams, crushing myriads of poor heathen under its red wheels and drawing reluctant pennies into missionary box. India has robbed me of this cherished tradition and made me regret the pennies. Sir Alfred Lyall was the first to awaken suspicion. Then came the statistician with records showing that since the year 1818 only nine "accidents" had marred the festival of this incarnation of Vishnu. At Seringapatam the story died a violent death under the wheels of Juggernaut. I was standing in the shadow of these war-worn walls when the voice of raillery fell upon my ear: "Oh, Brahmin! Good Brahmin! Of your piety and humanity why do you not come to the aid of these puny disciples who strain at the car of your god and move it not?" It was a Muhomedan who spoke, and the priestly Brahmin was effulgent with silent contempt. There, under the walls of the temple, on a broad green path was the car of my missionary dreams—a massive black tower graven with images—and tugging at the rope were the victims.

In a land where gods and demons swarm up the Jacob's ladder of pantheism and jostle one another over the topmost rung to die and be forgotten, this god of the car has survived and continues to do much of the leading business. This was his festival, and from all the country side people came to assist in his pilgrimage. Priests took the image from the temple and deposited it in a shrine hollowed out of the black tower and placed on ponderous wooden wheels. Men and boys in bright hued raiment held the rope and the huge mass of shrine and car creaked and groaned. Progress was slow, despite the efforts of two small wooden horses that spurned the earth and pranced mid-air. Heavy beams used as lever set the wheels in motion, but neither god nor devotees showed unseemly haste. Like children at play, they dropped the rope to cast rice and sweetmeats into the shrine and to scramble for flowers scattered by the priests. When the rope broke they were happy and scampered away to the merry-go-round that shrieked and whirled near the sacred enclosure. In vain the sepy directing the car from the lofty shrine waved despairing hands and called them back to duty. If the rope was old and enfeebled with treacherous knots the fault was not with them, and only an inconsiderate policeman would expect them to mend a rope when the merry-go-round was screaming invitations to ride a cock-horse. Juggernaut was left to his fate, and the sun had set before he completed his short pilgrimage and returned to his abode, leaving the worshippers to enjoy the fun of the fair.

The Prince and Princess missed this historic ceremony, which is in essentials similar to that on the coast of Orissa. Yet in Seringapatam they found many things to interest them. From the ramparts they looked upon the last battle-field of the Tiger of Mysore—the far-famed Tippoo Sultan who came to grief over a French alliance. Here, where the river spreads wide and shallow over a rocky bed, the British advanced to the assault. Here under battered grey walls, Tippoo heard from a breathless soldier how the enemy had forced the breach and poured like a raging torrent over the battlements. Through this gate he tried to escape, and was wounded by a chance bullet and by exhausted in his palanquin until a soldier tried to rob him of jewelled sword, belt and turban. The wounded Tiger of Mysore roused himself to a last effort and struck with his sword. A bullet ended his stormy life, and his body lay under a mound of dead till the British came with torches and dragged it from the dead, and saw at last that "the Tiger's spirit had gone."

These prison walls enshrine another memory that might be written in letters of gold on the tomb of the boy Lang, whom Hyder Ali ordered to write to his father, offering a splendid bribe if he would surrender Vellore and threatening the son with instant death if the father refused. "If you consider me base enough to write such a letter, on what ground can you think so meanly of my father? It is in your power to present me before the ramparts of Vellore and cut me in a thousand pieces before my father's eye; but it is not in your power to make him a traitor!"

Pioneer.—Who would have thought after all the weeks and months of real hard work everything should have come to nought, but this is what has happened, and there is no getting over the fact. A few days ago all was bustle and excitement, camping grounds were being cleared, tents pitched, and the Resident's band of men, office, soldiers and servants were straining every nerve to make His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales's visit to the Nepal Terai a success in all senses of the word. The camping ground was an ideal one, the Prince's tents and those of his Staff having been pitched on a wooded plateau overlooking the lower Nepal hills and showing glimpses here and there of the higher snowy peaks beyond. The rest of the camp (including kitchen, servants, sepoy and post office tents) was immediately below this plateau and stretched out through half a mile or so of jungle towards the Railway line—one should say the "Station," but the level piece of ground where the train stopped could hardly be honoured by this name. At the same time it must in justice be added that the Bengal and North-Western Railway officials and men worked their hardest and opened up the Railway long before originally intended so as to be of use during the Royal visit here. A road had been made between the Railway line and camp, by which visitors were to have ridden up on elephants, and Maharaja Sir Chandra Shamsler, the Prime Minister, had a special carriage sent from Calcutta for His Royal Highness's private use.

The Maharaja and his following of 10,000 men, most of whom were to assist in some way or other towards the Prince's pleasure and comfort, had arrived near our camp, officers and officials were coming daily; the telegraph and postal arrangements were completed; elephants from as far off as Assam and many other distant Indian stations had marched up to Thori to assist some six or seven hundred others collected by the Nepal Durbar. Hopes for good shikar were at their highest, shikaris were trying up "kills" all over the near-lying jungles (we even went so far as having two tigers prowling about our own camp!) and there was every prospect of having, if not the best shoot ever known in Nepal, at least one that would come up to everyone's highest expectations when . . . one word was breathed and the whole aspect changed! It was Cholera. The disease had broken out in the Maharaja's camp. The Resident and Residency Surgeon held long consultations together; urgent telegrams were sent and received almost hourly; visits to the Maharaja and his camp, four miles off, where the disease broke out, took place; and in three days our hopes had fallen from highest anticipation and excitement to deepest depression and disappointment. Efforts were made to prevent the epidemic spreading, and it was hoped for a time that a shoot on a smaller scale might possibly be arranged; but the disease spread among the mahouts (the special man "Jamak" selected to drive the Prince's own elephant being among the first to succumb), and after several days it was seen to be hopeless. Tents were pulled down and furniture stacked in dismal heaps, officials were dismissed and men from uninfected areas sent away. Guards were placed on rivers and streams, and the Resident and Residency Surgeon only remained with a small party of sepoy and a hundred followers or so, who had drunk from streams of water known to have been contaminated by sick men from the Maharaja's camp, and who were being kept in quarantine until the Residency Surgeon deemed it safe to allow them to return to their homes.

Undoubtedly our sympathies turn at once to the Maharaja, who had been doing all in his power to make the intended shoot a success in every way, and who had not spared his time or money in order to entertain His Royal Highness in truly princely fashion. The Prince himself, as we know, had his disappointment to bear, but this must have given way to concern for the sufferers from cholera and sympathy for the Maharaja.

Englishman.—There is no likelihood any more of a Royal shoot in the Nepal Terai, as the encampment had to be broken up owing to the rapid spread of cholera in the camp. The mahouts of elephants assembled were attacked, and the man specially selected to have charge of the Prince's elephant was among the first who died.

Morning Post.—We are here in Mysore at our furthest South, within some twelve degrees of the Equator, where the sun lays that warm, heavy hand upon one's shoulder that can only be felt near the ecliptic, and in a week or two we shall be fifteen hundred miles away to the northward, shivering in a fur coat on the borders of Baluchistan. Thus we have at least in climate that variety which in other particulars one has looked for in vain. Indeed, one might almost say that the programme which has been arranged for the Royal Tour forms a more instructive homily upon India than any book provides. Planned by men qualified by a long acquaintance with the country, and anxious doubtless to turn so exceptional and expensive an event to the best advantage, we may take it that the dull repetition of events, illustrative of so little and so lacking in distinction, was the best calendar that could have been compiled. But what a commentary it is on the lives of India and Anglo-India, on the lack in each of anything significant and individual, on the failure of both to produce any effect of correspondence and coalition; that nothing less insipid nor more edifying could be found for the Royal visitors than the recurrent round of garden parties, foundation-stone laying, and opening ceremonies. From the recorder's standpoint the consequence has naturally been deplorable. Everything after the first few weeks was either a repetition of what had gone before or not discernibly different from the same event at home; and thus one has been compelled more often than not to fall back on India for one's material.

That may seem to open untold opportunities, but it does not. One soon begins to realize that to the Englishman in India, India is a great way off; so that one comes to regard it as might a captain who never left the bridge of the ship which he commanded. He has his chart-house for instruction, the steersman and officer of the watch for company; his hand laid at any moment on the engine-room lever may effect profound changes in the fortunes of the ship. But into the great hive of life beneath him he never enters, and of its activities he knows next to nothing. As far as the proportion of numbers goes those three men on the bridge of a crowded ship represent pretty fairly the comparison of the directing influence of India to its crew and passengers of three hundred millions, but no isolation which one can imagine in terms of the sea will compare with that of the Anglo-Indian. Hence, when one talks of falling back on India one only indicates a descent to the superficial crust of it.

Here in Mysore the superficiality is accentuated by the fact that during the only recently-ended minority of its present ruler we have had a good deal to say to the State's affairs, and the exterior appearance is in consequence somewhat Anglicised. Still, Mysore must not be robbed of due credit for its progressiveness, seeing how considerable and how enlightened was the influence of its late Prime Minister, and that it was in Mysore that the present Diwan of Travancore received his training—a Minister whose zeal for learning seems likely to make its Southernmost State take in the question of primary schools the lead of all India. Mysore with its industrial and engineering schools and its Technical Institute just begun, its green parks and substantial buildings, its asphalted drains, its standpipes along the streets, and its clean, neat air, has a quite Western suggestion of modernity. One cannot help lamenting the displacement of the picturesque old wells, whose leisurely deliberation was so significant of the country, by the bright brass taps from which water gushes at a touch of the finger. But a tap from which a woman draws water into a lovely brass chatty is better than a well to which she brings a hideous tin can; and the oil tin as a household ornament does not seem to have penetrated into Mysore, and one hopes that the efforts of its legislators to cultivate village industries and an appreciation of beauty will include the banishment of the American can.

An aid to that sort of education, an object-lesson in beauty, is at present available in the shape of the new palace which is in process of building in the heart of the town. A quarter of a million rupees have been spent upon it, a fourth of the sum which would have been needed in England, and it is still a great way from completion. But enough is already there to challenge one's admiration and to indicate what is to come. Massiveness is the note of it; there is a sense of weight in all its stones, in the black marble domes, in the pillars of red and green porphyry, in the deep-cut serpentine, the soapstone lattices, and the rough-grained grey granite of which the walls are made. All of these, save the serpentine, are quarried within a mile or two of Mysore, and the only stone which has been brought from outside the State is the sparingly-used white marble from Jabalpur, which serves, inlaid, as a frame for doors and windows. What Mysore can do in the way of carving may be seen in frieze, cornice, capital and tympanum, which are mostly of serpentine, and in the splendid teak and sandal wood doors and ceilings. Cast iron is used in the audience and marriage halls, in both cases with deplorable results; but one cannot suppose that the architect is altogether responsible for the spoiling of the admirable western court with unsightly pillars, for which constructively there seems to be no need. One spoke of the Palace as a school of beauty and that to one's surprise was what one found it. The place resounded to the mallet, the chisel was everywhere eating its way into capital and pediment; chips of granite flew from the low vaulted roofs; the floors were littered with men at work upon blocks of marble, slabs of porphyry, junks of teak, and panels of sandalwood, intricate lattices and delicate inlay, on ivory doors and jambs of silver; yet there was no attempt made to exclude the public, whether it came in a loin cloth or a black silk coat. Men, women, and children, the whole populace streamed in, watched with wondering eyes the brown teak turn to birds and flowers, and the shapes of gods and beasts grew out of the green serpentine, shook the granite chips from their hair, brushed the dust and the mire of masonry from their saris, humbly removed themselves when found in the way, and so wandered on from room to room and out into the square again without any marshalling or supervision, so much more civilised and better mannered than any English crowd could be—if you can imagine one permitted into a palace which was in course of building—and acquiring, doubtless, new ideas of beauty and decoration and the dignity of craftsmanship at two annas a day. The Palace is proof that with proper training and direction the native workman is equal to anything connected with architecture that can reasonably be asked of him, and one is glad of the chance to express one's admiration of Mr. Irwin's design, having written in a different sense of buildings in Madras with which he was associated. There is nothing in that city worthy to be named beside the new Palace of Mysore, which must rank among the few great modern buildings in India.

There seems to be a variety of opinion as to what is really the Deccan, some authorities considering the Kistna its southern boundary, others carrying it right down to Cape Comorin. The name is no guide, for it only means "the land to the right" to the right, that is, of the invader marching eastward across Hindustan from the north-western passes. But, however incorrect, the name seems to have come to mean for most the great triangular table-land, two hundred thousand square miles of it, skirted on its three sides by mountain ranges, which ends here in Mysore. From the top of Chamundi, the precipitous hill close on four thousand feet high, which overshadows Mysore, one looks out across the flat fields of a deeper red than any loam of Devon, at the southern boundaries of the vast gneiss plateau which the sun and the weather of innumerable years have worn down from its imposing thickness to the red and grey laterite blanket which lies porous and thirsty over these interminable plains. Far away on either hand converging towards the southwards are the last spurs of the Western and Eastern Ghats, which have followed the coastline of either Presidency for seven hundred miles, while closing the gap between them, a full eighty miles away, looking cool and fresh beyond the blazing levels, with white clouds curling on their purple heads, are the lovely Nilgris, where the parched ear can hear the unceasing sound of waters and downs green as Hampshire uplands greet the scorched eye; where oranges grow wild in the sheltered valleys, and heliotrope and verberna tower high above the head. With two months of winter still ahead of us and the mercury in the nineties even now, one can imagine how men, slaving in the summer heat, and wondering with each exhausting day if their sapped energies will last to the end of it, may, looking across the plains at that cool paradise, lift up their eyes unto the hills from whence help cometh.—(H. F. PROVOST BATTERSBY.)

Pioneer.—The Princess reached Dehra on Wednesday at 10-30, accompanied by Sir Walter Lawrence and Major Campbell. The party were met by Majors Watson and Cameron, Commandant and Adjutant respectively of the Imperial Cadet Corps, and drove to the former's bungalow. In the afternoon the Princess visited the Mess of the 2nd Gurkhas and had tea with the officers, being greatly interested in the Mess trophies and plate. Later Her Royal Highness visited the armoury and lines and conversed with the native officers. On Thursday the Princess motored to Mokampur, about seven miles from Dehra and lunched in the forest, returning to Dehra about 4 o'clock. On Friday the Princess left Dehra at 10 in the morning for Rajpur by motor. From Rajpur the party went up the hill to Mussoorie in dandies, accompanied by Lady Dugdale and Major Campbell, going straight to the Charleville Hotel. The same afternoon the Princess visited the Convent. The Municipality presented a bouquet of flowers, otherwise the arrangements were private. To-day Her Royal Highness will visit Landour and to-morrow (Sunday) she will return to Dehra.

6TH MARCH 1906.

Englishman.—The Princess of Wales arrived at Dehra Dun on Wednesday, staying in cantonments at the pretty cottage, residence of Major Watson, Commandant of the Imperial Cadet Corps. She drove round the station in motor car on Wednesday, and on Thursday attended the picnic at Konwalla out in the Dun. On Friday the Princess went up to Mussoorie. Her Royal Highness arrived at the Charleville Hotel in time for lunch on Friday. Saturday was devoted to sight-seeing. On Sunday morning the Princess attended service at Christ Church, Mussoorie, returning to Dehra immediately afterwards. Tomorrow the Princess visits Hardwar, viewing the Bathing Ghats and head works of the Ganges Canal, going on thence to Roorkee.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—This "Garden of India" was at its best on Wednesday morning, the 28th, when Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales arrived by special train at 10-30, driving from the station in a barouche and pair, attended by Sir Walter Lawrence and Major Watson, C.I.H., Commanding the Imperial Cadet Corps, to the latter's pretty cottage in Cantonments. Nearly all the Cadet Corps quarters and all the officers' houses are built like old English cottages, and with the snow-tipped hills as a distant background and the purple hills near by the scenery just now is splendid.

On Wednesday afternoon Her Royal Highness drove about Cantonments in her motor car attended by Lady Eva Dugdale and an A.-D.-C.

On Thursday a picnic was arranged at a most picturesque spot a few miles out of Dehra—Koawalla—where the Royal party arrived in motor cars.

On Friday morning Her Royal Highness and party motored up to Rajpore and then went up to Mussoorie to get a good view of the snows, and are honouring the presence. Her Royal Highness intends to attend Divine Service at St. Thomas Church on Sunday. The Princess goes to Hardwar on Tuesday, the 6th, where she will visit the ghats and the Ganges canal works, and go on to Rurki.

We are having a very busy time in our hitherto dull little station, for theatricals and a Fancy Bazar come off next week, the first in aid of the Home in Mussoorie for Soldiers' children, and the other for the local Babies' Home.

During the visit of the Bishop of Lucknow here last week a confirmation was held, and the offertory was devoted to the support of the Diocesan Board of Education, and amounted to Rs. 126.

A severe shock of earthquake was felt here early on Wednesday morning, but no damage was done.

Standard.—Mysore is one of the best governed of Indian native states, and the most important in Southern India, except that of the Nizam. For nearly half a century it was under British management, and when we handed it back to the reigning dynasty, twenty-five years ago, we did so with a first-rate Anglicised administration, which the late Maharaja, assisted by a native Prime Minister of exceptional ability, maintained intact. They even introduced further improvements, creating a Representative Assembly, which, it is true, is not allowed to do anything in particular, but, on the other hand, is permitted to talk as freely, and almost as long, as it pleases. There are many interesting things to see and do in this pleasant little country. Good shooting is to be had, and the Prince of Wales was taken to the great keddahs, where the wild elephants are caught and corralled, with the assistance of traitorous tame giants of their own species. Those whom history tempts more than sport can drive out from the bright 'Residenz-Stadt,' where the Maharaja is building what will be the finest and most artistically important modern palace in India, to the famous, but now ruined, city of Seringapatam, where the last rounds in the fierce struggle for the Carnatic were played off between the British, the French, and the Mahometans.

When I took the trip to Tippoo Sahib's old capital it was in a motor-car on a clear, warm morning, some hours before the Royal party were expected to make the same journey. Many people were passing along the nine miles of road, lined with green mangoes and spreading banyans and other trees of the forest, as roads so often are in India. The villagers had been ordered to keep the track moist for the august visitors, and they stood in groups to see our unfamiliar machine go by—men with their white togas flung over one shoulder, and women, statuesque and graceful in their crimson and orange robes, with the great brass lotas balanced on their heads. Sometimes we came upon roadside hamlets, with the goats and buffalo calves straying in and out of the byres, amid brown, laughing children; or upon the shepherd, with his long staff and long mantle, walking solemnly at the head of his flock. At Seringapatam there is much to see if one is in the sight-seeing mood. They show you the beautiful mausoleum with the tombs of Tippoo Sultan and Hyder Ali, those sturdy Moslem tyrants, with whom we had pretty nearly the toughest of all our fights for India; and the tomb of General Baillie, who died a prisoner in Tippoo's hands. One may also see the dungeon arches where Major Baird, a hot-tempered officer, was kept in captivity for three years and a half, chained to a native warder. "I'm sorry for the chiel that's tied to oor Davie," said Baird's mother when she was made acquainted with this arrangement.

But Mysore has other interests which are in no way connected either with archaeology, with history, or with sport. The Kolar Gold Mines lie in this State, and their names, Champion Reef, Mysore, Ooregum, and the rest, are known to thousands of people in places where they buy and sell shares, who, perhaps, would find some difficulty in explaining precisely where they are. The Kolar district is now one of the leading goldfields of the world, and it is able already to throw two million pounds' worth into the common stock of the precious metal every year. And in order that the mines may be worked with economy and efficiency, the State Government has established a scheme for transmitting to them, over 90 miles of intervening country, the electric energy developed in its power station at the Falls of the Cauvery River. There is nothing in India, or in all Asia, more remarkable in its own way than this skilful and successful effort to utilise and transmute some of the wasted force of Nature; and it says much for the Mysore administration, under its late Divan, the clever Brahmin statesman, Sir Seshadri Iyar, that it had the courage and foresight to carry out and finance this project. The Sivasamudram power station, planned by a clever Anglo-Canadian engineer, Major de Lotbiniere, R.E., but fitted up by an American company, and run by American managers, is worth coming a long way to see, by those who are interested in the future, as well as in the present and the past of India.

But not many people, indeed, save those whom business takes there, even do think of seeing Sivasamudram. For one thing it is not easy to reach. It is thirty miles from the nearest railway station, and it was not thought necessary to bridge the distance even by a tramway or construction-line for the transport of heavy machinery. Men and animals are too cheap in India for such assistance to be required. The dynamos, the turbines, all the weighty forgings and huge pipes and tubes were brought in on bullock-carts, at a rate per ton with which mechanical transport could not compete. There is no passenger traffic in the remote and solitary river-bottom where the works lie. The officials have a tonga service to and from Maddur station, on the line between Mysore and Bangalore; but it was temporarily suspended at the time of my visit, because all the vehicles were needed at Mysore and the Royal Shooting Camp. The only possible mode of conveyance was the native country cart, which is called a julka, and so in julkas a companion and myself determined to traverse the 30 miles from Maddur to Sivasamudram. Experienced Anglo-Indian residents at Mysore obliged us beforehand with lurid descriptions of the horrors of this method of transport, which they assured us was fit only for the dura ilia of the native. In the result we did not fare so badly, though I should not recommend the trip to any one solicitous as to his personal comfort.

You become acquainted with various strange machines in your passage through the Empire of India. There is the two-horsed tonga, with the pole running right under the body of the carriage, and the single-horsed ekka, with a similar arrangement of shafts, both of which are apt to tip you out backwards if not properly balanced; there is the Burmese chaise, which is a decayed match-box drawn by an enlarged rat; and there is the bullock-cart, drawn by two trotting zebus with painted and brass-tipped horns, which is so pretty to look at that you almost forgive its absence of springs. For rancid discomfort the julka is in the first flight. It is like a costermonger's barrow turned the other way about with a pony between the handles, and it is provided with a sort of beehive or dome-shaped cover of plaited straw. It is about two feet wide, and the floor slopes steeply from front to back. A whole family of natives, men, women, and children, can manage, in some acrobatic fashion of their own, to huddle up inside it; but a single moderate-sized European, with a moderate-sized dressing bag, finds himself badly cramped for space.

I crawled under the tilt, and discovered that when I tried to sit up my hat was in contact with the tilt roof, and when I attempted to lie down my legs protruded indecently beyond the tail-board. Moreover, the concern was redolent of that mingled odour of garlic, coconut oil, and warm humanity, which the native leaves behind him, and clouds of dust arose from the sacking which covered the boards every time I moved. The pony was a minute, country-bred framework of gaunt skin and jagged bone, and I formed the worst anticipations when I reflected that I had thirty miles to travel by this agency, under a scorching afternoon sun which pierced the straw covering as if it were tissue paper. However, the ragged Mahometan driver was willing and the pony belied his looks. We went along at a smart ambling trot that carried us over the ground at an unexpected speed; and when, after a dozen miles, we stopped to change horses, the wiry little beast, as soon as he was released, took a long roll in the dust, and then, espying a tethered stallion about twice his own size, went up to him with a snort and began a spirited fight. The julka covered the thirty miles, with two relays of ponies, in little more than three hours, and delivered us at the inspection bungalow of the power station in time to sit down to dinner with the Chief State Engineer and the manager of the scheme, Americans both, and as hospitable and as keenly interested in their work as American men of business and experts usually are where-over you meet them.

The next morning I went all over the installation with my genial hosts, and marvelled much at what I was shown. It seemed strange to hear the familiar, kindly American locutions; stranger still to witness this superb example of American mechanical skill, here amid these lonely hills in the heart of Asia. It is a beautiful corner of country which the engineers have annexed, albeit, one heard with regret, much troubled by malaria—a country of bold headlands and scooped hollows and flashing waters. Near Sivasamudram, which is just at the point where Mysore State and the Madras Presidency touch, the Cauvery makes its spring of four hundred feet from the Deccan upland to the lower level of the coast region. Down the mountain stairs the swift river hastens, gushing through clefts and gorges in foaming cataracts, or pouring in fleecy torrents over the sheer black surface of the cliffs. One lovely cascade hangs like a floating bridal veil of silvered gauze over the brow and shoulder of the mountain, and loses itself in a rockbound basin of still, green water at its foot.

A couple of miles above the Falls the Cauvery broadens out into a shallow boulderstrewn bay, before gathering itself for its downward plunge. Here is a long stone bridge of native workmanship, perched on a hundred little rough pillars, rude and primitive to the eye, but which yet can stand unharmed the fiercest violence of the river when it roars and races in the madness of its flood orgy. Hard by the engineers have thrown their dam across the channel, and placed their weirs and gates through which the water is led, by four deep aqueducts or canals, to the penstocks which feed their turbines four hundred feet below. Round about the pond or forebay at the head of these great steel pipes are clustered the offices of the works, the bungalows where the managers and officials live, their little club and recreation ground, and the neat brick huts of the work people and coolies, together with the fitting shop, where skilled mechanics do the repairs necessary for keeping the machinery in order, and the drum and winding engine of the tramway which runs down the perpendicular face of the cliff alongside the penstocks.

We take our seats in the trolley, and in a couple of minutes are in the generating shed at the lower level of the river. In the long brick building we find the row of turbines, the wheels set with little cups round their tires, which are receiving the impact of the solid core of fluid as it pounds out of the penstocks. Our expert guides explain to us the score of elaborate devices employed to regulate the flow, so that each wheel spins its allotted 300 revolutions per minute, no more and no less, and show us the chains and bridles which render the angry river nixies safe, if not willing slaves to man. Opposite the turbines is ranged the line of dynamos; and you can stand between these two files of imprisoned iron monsters, and know that the miracle is being wrought in your presence. The Spirits of the Waters are transmuted into the Spirits of the Ether and the inert stored forces which the river has gathered from the rain-clouds is turned into that fiery energy, which is carried through a few thin threads of wire to the engine houses and stamping mills of the Kolar Gold Fields nearly a hundred miles away.

Eleven thousand horses, with all the thunder of their trampling hoofs and the strain of their quivering limbs, could not equal the power which those few purring boxes of steel and copper evolve, and the engineers hope to work up to a full capacity of 20,000 h.p. before long. Even in the East you feel that the new magic is more potent than the old, the machine mightier after all than the crude force of flesh and blood and tissue, spent with uncalculating prodigality. For my part, when the men of science were explaining to me, in that lucid, exact language of theirs, which puts our literary efforescence to shame, the triumphs of reasoned ingenuity which the General Electric Company of Schenectady, N.Y., had brought to bear to economize labour and develop efficiency—while I listened to them, I was thinking what it may mean for India in the future. A shrine of Siva, the embodiment of the elemental force which brings life and death, was near this place, may have stood on this very spot. East and West are in contact again—the West, purposefully bending Nature to the service of man; the East, trembling before Nature as a cruel capricious Colossus avil of lust and blood. Siva has gone, and Schenectady has come. But the conflict is only beginning. Are the old gods vanquished yet? Which will prevail in the end, Siva or Schenectady?

Labour-saving, at any rate, is a new idea in Asia, and it is carried far at the Cauvery station. The whole apparatus is as near as possible automatic. When I heard that by this scheme the eleven thousand horse-power derived from the river-fall is turned into electric energy, generated at a force of 32,000 volts transformed to a voltage of 2,000, and thus transmitted to the Gold Fields of Kolar, and to the street lamps of Bangalore, I looked to see a great army of workmen, a whole corps of officials. But nothing of the sort is in evidence. Mr. Haskell, the manager, is the only high officer permanently in residence at the Cauvery station, assisted by occasional visits from Mr. Gibbs, the Chief Executive Engineer. The whole skilled staff consists of no more than a score of Eurasian operatives and fitters, and there are less than a hundred all told of native labourers, coolies, cleaners, and sweepers. The machines do their work by themselves. George Eliot, in "The Confessions of Theophrastus Such," imagined a cycle in which machinery should be endowed with intelligence and volition. We seem almost to have reached that stage, when we enter this great generating shed, and see the cohort of turbines and dynamos whirling obediently and uninterruptedly, with only a single oiler to wait on them; or when we ascend to the switch-room above, with its tiers of levers and dials and pointers and one skilled operative sitting at a table with pencil and notebook, occupied chiefly in taking records, concerned only to see that nothing goes wrong with the process by which the downward rush of the river is turned into magnetic energy. The tubes and wheels and wires do the work; the human assistant need only put a finger upon the pulse of the organism now and again, to ascertain that it is beating normally. Yet the Cauvery Station, with its 93 miles of wire to Kolar and its 57 to the electric lights of Bangalore, is one of the largest producers and transmitters of power in the world. At Niagara, and at three or four other places in the United States, its capacity is exceeded; but it is ahead of anything that exists and is in actual operation at this moment of writing either in Europe or in Asia. No more striking example is to be found of the scientific employment of the natural fall of great masses of water for the development of electrical energy.

And at Sivasamudram the new agent, Phileas Blanchet, as M. Hanotaux has called it, is free from the repellent surroundings that are usually found where great work is being done through the action of coal and steam. With water-power and electricity it is not necessary to deface a whole country side, to hide the daylight under palls of smoke, to poison grass and trees and rivers, or to pile up hideous mounds of refuse and burnt-out cinders. Though the engineers have diminished the volume of the flow in the dry season, the Cascades still drift in gleaming folds down the rocks, the wild flowers bloom among the clefts, and the low brick buildings, the pools, and reservoirs, and canals made for the power scheme, have done little to spoil the beauty of this fair, though, unfortunately, fever-haunted valley of the Cauvery. Nature is enslaved, but here, at any rate, she is not degraded or deformed.

7TH MARCH 1906.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The 12th and 13th March are being observed as public holidays throughout Baluchistan in honour of the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales to the province.

Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales returned from Mussoorie to Dehra Dun on Sunday afternoon. The route along the Rajpore Road was crowded with spectators, and as the motor cars flashed past, Her Royal Highness bowed very graciously to the different groups assembled. On Monday a picnic was arranged at the Mohan Pass, where the Royal party proceeded at 11-30 A.M. On Tuesday, they left on trolleys for Hardwar.

Pioneer.—On the conclusion of his recent visit to Benares His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales was pleased to address the following letter of acknowledgment to his host the Maharaja:—

Prince of Wales's Camp, India,
21st February 1906.

My dear friend,—Before leaving Benares I wish to express to Your Highness my warm and grateful appreciation of the hospitality which you have extended to the Princess of Wales and myself and to our staff. Though the rains interfered with some parts of the programme, your most perfect arrangements for our comfort were a complete success, and the Princess and myself leave Benares with most pleasant memories and with sincere feelings of friendship for yourself.

Believe me,
Your sincere friend,
(Sd.) GEORGE P.

To His Highness Maharaja Sir Prabhu Narain Singh, Bahadur, of Benares, G.C.I.E.

His Royal Highness also sent for Captain Bindeshwari Prasad Singh, A.D.-C. to the Maharaja (who was in charge of all the arrangements in connection with the visit), and after thanking him for the excellence of his management, presented him with a medal and a silver box as mementoes of the occasion.

Pioneer.—His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor leaves Allahabad to-day to meet the Prince and Princess of Wales at Aligarh. He will subsequently pay a visit to Agra returning to Allahabad on the 10th.

Times of India.—Perhaps no incident of the Royal tour in India will awaken more widespread interest, or touch the hearts of the people more nearly, than the visit the Prince of Wales has just paid to a famine camp. The conventional accompaniment of a Royal progress is too often the concealment of such scenes as do not indicate complete and abounding prosperity. The fact that His Royal Highness has insisted on visiting a famine relief work, and satisfying himself by personal investigation of the character and efficiency of the measures provided, is a gratifying proof that he is amply conscious of the necessity of becoming acquainted with the less cheering aspects of life which the people of India are sometimes called upon to endure. The presence of Royalty at a famine work is probably without precedent in India. There are many Englishmen who have passed their whole lives in this country without gaining any acquaintance with famine conditions by direct contact in the mofussil. The knowledge His Royal Highness has now acquired will stand him in good stead should he ever be called upon to assist in appealing in England for help in India in time of famine. The conditions at present obtaining in certain areas in India are not such as to make any such appeal necessary at this juncture; but it is meet and right that His Royal Highness should endeavour, as he has done, to gain a first-hand knowledge of the people in times of tribulation as well as of joy. It is the sympathetic character of such an incident which will, however, be more widely appreciated even than its practical aspect. No people are more responsive to sympathy than the natives of India; and though this simple visit only illustrated in brief conditions that have unfortunately prevailed sometimes on an extensive scale, it will strike an answering chord in many hearts that might be left untouched by pageantry and applause.

8TH MARCH 1906.

Civil and Military Gazette.—The Princess of Wales arrived in Mussoorie on Friday afternoon, and went straight to the Charleville Hotel, where a suite of rooms had been arranged for Her Royal Highness during her three days' stay here. The weather was superb and the view of the snows magnificent. The station was alive with excitement, the roads were cleared of snow—an arduous work undertaken by hordes of delighted Arganis—while freshly painted lamp-posts, tanks and hydrants, and a Mall newly laid with budjri testified to the energy of the city fathers. The shops flew into bunting and the bazars into whitewash. All along the line of march the European residents of the station assembled at various points, and gave Her Royal Highness an enthusiastic welcome.

On Saturday, the weather being still fine and brilliant, as many places of interest as possible were visited by the Princess and her party. Luncheon was taken at the Himalaya Club, and then Her Royal Highness went up to Landour. Landour is covered with more than a foot of snow, and some of the roads are impassable. However, a path was dug to the cemetery, where the tree planted by the Duke of Edinburgh, railed round and placarded, was seen to flourish exceedingly. Her Royal Highness was accompanied by Sir Walter Lawrence and Lady Eva Dugdale, while Mr. Hope acted as cicerone. Among other places honoured by a visit from Her Royal Highness were the Mussoorie Convent and the Soldiers' Home at Landour. The Princess took a keen interest in all that she saw even down to the local manufacture of walking-sticks, a trade which is greatly encouraged in these parts. Hence arose an incident which deeply impressed the Arayan imagination. Some walking-sticks were bought by Her Royal Highness from an excessively poverty-stricken craftsman. "Lo!" cried the admiring bazar, "now is this one's shop made. And he was of the poorest! How did the Shahzadi know it?"

On Sunday morning the Princess attended Divine Service at Christ Church, going down to Dehra immediately after service. This Royal visit will be a most memorable event in the annals of Mussoorie and is a most auspicious opening for the season. The station now seems gilded.

Englishman.—The morning of the 7th was occupied by His Royal Highness in receiving deputations from the 38th and 39th Central India Horse. His Royal Highness also conferred the silver Victorian Medal upon the senior native officers of the following regiments, who have lately received the honour of having His Royal Highness appointed their Colonel-in-Chief:—38th Central India Horse, 39th Central India Horse, 1st Sappers and Miners, 14th Sikhs, 1st Battalion 1st Gurkha Rifles, 2nd Battalion 1st Gurkha Rifles.

The visit of the Princess of Wales to Mussoorie, an honour which was as unexpected as welcome, threw the station into a ferment of excitement after an unusually tame winter. Heavy snow at the end of February somewhat damped anticipation, but when the morning of the 28th broke bright and clear, the temperature rose, and with it the enthusiasm of the populace, for the Royal visit was now a settled thing. Immediately an army of Arganis, as jolly as sand boys, set about clearing the mall, dumping the snow into drains and private compounds without rebuke, for on this occasion householders did not object to personal inconvenience; lamp-posts, tanks and hydrants were painted, and as much winter thatch as possible removed from pillars and masonry. The remainder, whirled about by the wind and twisted in untidy stacks, added to the beauty of scene. The bazaars hummed with agitation; every inhabitant thereof whitewashed his dwelling, painted his door, washed his face, and hung out some sign of rejoicing, a flag, a handkerchief or a picture, helped in his labour by the nearest policeman, who generally remarked it was a pity that this great thing had not happened in the hot weather. The shops burst into bustle, and generally tidied up their premises, while the morning of the 2nd was spent in removing the big stones that had been accidentally mixed up with the budjri spread on the Mall.

Her Royal Highness arrived in the station punctually at half-past one and went down the Mall to the Charleville Hotel, where a fine suite of rooms had been prepared for her. All along the road were groups of residents and visitors who welcomed the Princess heartily, while saluting crowds of palahis, in their distinctive dress, and wild Arganis in their cotton raiment, wholesomely coloured by mother earth, gave an out-of-the-way touch of the picturesque and barbaric. Her Royal Highness was accompanied by Lady Eva Dugdale and Sir Walter Lawrence, while Mr. Hope, than whom no one is better acquainted with the ins and outs of the station, was in attendance on the Princess when she went out sight-seeing. On Friday afternoon the Mussoorie convent was visited, while on Saturday Her Royal Highness went from one end of Mussoorie to the other, lunching at the Himalaya Club and then going up to Landour, through the bustling, excited bazaar. In Landour the snow was still very deep, but a path was dug as far as the cemetery, where grows a tree planted by the Duke of Edinburgh.

On her return from Landour the Princess visited the Soldiers' Furlough Home, which has now been established in the Philander Smith Institute Buildings. Her Royal Highness was greatly interested in all she saw and heard, and neither the water-supply nor the poorest craftsman in the Landour Bazaar escaped her attention. Regarding the former she received all details from Mr. Hope, while touching the latter, the ill-paid local industry of walking-stick makers will now flourish exceedingly, for none other than the Shahzadi has bought sticks to take to England from the poorest of Mussoorie stick-makers! On Sunday morning Her Royal Highness attended Divine Service at Christ Church and afterwards planted a tree in the church compound, a more accessible place for sightseers than the misty heights of the Landour cemetery. The Princess left Mussoorie about one o'clock, leaving behind her an imperishable memory of dignity and graciousness, combined in a Royal personality that can never be forgotten by any who had the pleasure of seeing her.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—Mussoorie, March 5th.—The Princess, accompanied by Lady Eva Dugdale, Major Campbell, A.-D.-C., and Captain Hill, left Dehra for Mussoorie on the 2nd March, starting by motor car shortly before 11 A.M. and arriving at the Agency Hotel in about 20 minutes, where dandies (which had been painted Royal blue and white) were in readiness for the journey up the hill. Upon reaching Mussoorie the Princess proceeded along the Mall as far as the Criterion, where rickshaws were waiting to convey Her Royal Highness and Lady Eva Dugdale to the Charleville Hotel.

Although Mussoorie seems practically deserted at this time of the year, quite a large number of residents had assembled in the verandahs of the Library and Criterion in order to catch a glimpse of the Royal Lady. The Princess, who was becomingly gowned in dove colour, excited much admiration by her imposing appearance and gracious manner.

After luncheon at the Charleville, where a suite of rooms had been especially prepared and decorated for the reception of Her Royal Highness, the Princess, accompanied by Major Campbell and Captain Hill, took a long walk, going round part of the station where the snow is still lying in considerable quantity, in spite of the fine weather and heat of the sun.

On Saturday the Princess, accompanied by Lady Eva Dugdale, Major Campbell and Captain Hill, having previously taken luncheon at the Himalaya Club in the south end verandah which commands a fine view of the Dun, walked to the top of Landour in order to obtain a view of the snows, which show magnificently clear at this time of year. When returning in the afternoon to the Charleville, Her Royal Highness stopped at the principal business establishment of Mussoorie (Messrs. Fitch & Co.) and very graciously accepted some copies of Mussoorie views and also a few snapshots of Her Royal Highness which had been taken the day before.

On Sunday morning the Princess attended Divine Service at Christ Church, and after the service was over planted a tree in the Church compound.

Her Royal Highness returned to the Charleville for luncheon, and started in a rickshaw for the journey down hill at 2 o'clock. The Princess walked for a considerable distance before taking a dandy at the Masonic Lodge for Rajpore.

On leaving the Charleville Hotel, Her Royal Highness presented Mrs. Wutzler with a beautiful pearl and enamel monogram brooch, at the same time expressing appreciation of all the arrangements which had been made for her reception at the hotel, and the pleasure which she had experienced from her visit to Mussoorie.

As the Royal visit to Mussoorie was quite an informal one there was no public demonstration of any kind, but an exquisite bouquet of white flowers was sent to Her Royal Highness by Mr. C. Hope, Superintendent of the Dun, on behalf of the Municipal Board. The Princess appeared to thoroughly appreciate the absence of all ceremony and to enjoy the privacy of the visit.

On Monday the Princess visits the Mohan Pass, returning to Asarori for luncheon, and leaves Dehra on the 6th instant for Haridwar to see the Bathing Ghats, etc., and on the 7th starts for Roorkee to rejoin His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales on the 8th at Hathras.

Morning Post.—Eight miles away, with the rock-bound waters of the Cauvery gurgling on every side of it, lies in the island of Seringapatam, what was mortal of a man whose name was once well-known in England, but whose identity and achievements very few to-day would probably be able to recall. Here, though histories are scarce and those who can read them not many, Tipu Sultan's name is still a living memory; not so much because of what he did, though that should be enough to endear him to Mysore, but because he died fighting. It cheered one's faith in the value of making a good end to find that the big thing about him which has stuck in the minds of his countrymen was the fact that he would not surrender. The circumstances of his defeat and death were really very little to his credit. He was beaten by a mixed force, a twelfth of his own in strength, and after being wounded he was shot through the head in trying to defend his jewelled sword-belt from a common soldier. But these things do not remain to soil his memory; perhaps they are wise enough not to insist on such details in the Mysore schools, since all the scholars remember of their lost hero is that he would not be taken, which gives him at any rate a spiritual value for them which is not always achieved by our more elaborate biographies.

But the native memory is not tenacious only of its own elect. It has been interesting everywhere to find with what an undimmed appreciation Lord Ripon's Governor-Generalship is still recalled; and more unexpected was it to discover how revered is Lord Dufferin's name, and with what grieved and intimate resentment the financial disasters which clouded his closing years are regarded, owing to the share he had in the restoration of Gwalior to the Maharaja Scindia—proof that magnanimity is no more wasted than valour in our dealings with the East. Tipu Sultan lies beside Haider Ali in the midst of a lovely garden, under a dome supported by wonderful columns of black hornblende—a stone rarely seen in anything approaching the size of these monoliths, dark as jet and almost as highly polished—which, flanked by gaunt cypresses, surround with such a gloomy fitness the resting-place of the dead.

Magnanimous as have been our dealings with Mysore since Seringapatam was taken, it was not of magnanimity one thought, looking out across the river from the dungeons in which close on four hundred British soldiers dragged out an incredible existence for three years and a half, but of the strong hand and the prescient determination; for it was not the Tiger of Mysore alone that drew Lord Mornington into his jungles, but the menace of a greater and more distant Power. It was French intrigue in Southern India and French support to our foes there, coupled with Bonaparte's overwhelming victories in Europe, which forced upon the Governor-General the immediate necessity of deciding whether the control of India should fall to France or to ourselves. In those days, so hard now to realize, nothing seemed out of Napoleon's reach. He had equalled Alexander's conquests; he was credited with an ambition to surpass them, to reach that girdle of the triangle of low India, too. Ambassadors had been sent from Tipu to Mauritius, and the Governor of the Isle of France had called for volunteers to drive the English out of India. In Haidarabad Frenchmen officered the Nizam's soldiery, which was stiffened with French troops. The risks of invasion were thus considerably increased by the footing France already had in the country, and Lord Mornington found in that risk a sound reason for his comprehensive measures.

It is curious, as a sample of the way Fate has of throwing man against man, that one should find the future Duke of Wellington fighting in engagements which were aimed at the possibilities of Napoleon. Colonel Arthur Wellesley served under General Harris during the second siege of Seringapatam, was once well beaten in the advance upon it, and occupied, after its fall, Tipu Sultan's summer palace, which still stands in its garden just outside the fort. On its walls is a most humorous picture of Colonel Baillie's defeat by Haider Ali and the French near Conjevaram, a fight, like many another that we have lost, so creditable to the fashion in which it should not have been fought. The picture, which completely covers one of the verandah walls, has been twice repainted, but does not seem to have lost the character and innocent freshness of the original artist, who was unhampered by the cares of atmosphere or perspective, and who, native though he was, and on the other side, has given a stiff sort of valour to the British square which looks quite like our idea of ourselves, and a touch more of grace and a hint more of figure to the advancing Frenchmen which look quite like our idea of them also. And one wonders afresh if these men who could fight all through the hot weather in their queer black top hats, high stocks, and tight long-tailed scarlet coats were of stouter stuff than their descendants who find the sun pretty intolerable in sola topees, and loose white kits; or if the British soldier of to-day could outlive as did the survivors of that gallant square the horrors of over three years' captivity in an underground dungeon not big enough to hold more than a tenth part of them.

One had the chance at Mysore, while the Prince of Wales was at the khedda, of seeing the swift, abrupt, and unromantic coming of spring to the jungle. That coming interests no one in India. How should it? Spring means to those who live here not the loveliest season of the year, but the door of entrance to the most detestable. Every gleam that suggests, every sound that heralds it, are to them hateful. And so to those sights and sounds they pay no heed, and of any, save those dinned into their senses, they remain unconscious. They are forced to listen to the coppersmith's pestering iteration, but they do not hear the note of the dove; their eyes are compelled to blink at the gold mohur's glory; their noses are assailed by the mango's scent; but of trees, almost as lovely, now coming into flower in southern jungles, they know neither the beauty nor the hour, and with odours far sweeter than the mango's they have made no acquaintance. He would be unsympathetic indeed who should expect from exiles any other attitude. In full flower now are the plants that remind them most of home; all the year's blossom of an English garden massed into the pomp of a month, in which black raspberries and long red strawberries ripen amid the petals of May, July, and September. That sounds a queer mixture, but to the unaccustomed eye the jungle confusion is just as curious. In England the spring takes months to its shy courting, but here it is marriage by capture—a sudden, forcible shaking down of the old green leaves and an outburst of new ones almost on the morrow.

A week ago you might have taken the great silver-stemmed Indian fig for an evergreen, since scarcely one of its dense green leaves had fallen or faded in all the long avenues. Then one morning one heard a sound on the tent, a little different from the scampering feet of squirrels, and before night the heavy, stiffening leaves were strewn all about it, and in two days the silvery outstretched arms were bare. But ere then one had seen young figs in the jungle, which had put forth their tender shoots, through which the sunlight filtered red as through a rabbit's ears. So sudden here are the ways of spring.

But there is often something prettier in its swiftness, for in many of the trees of which no one seems to know the names the fall of the leaves is followed by an outburst of flowers before leaves come again. There are tall trees, like Spanish oaks, with waxen rose-red flowers all over their bare silver-grey branches, and flushed pools of fallen petals about their roots. Others are covered with crowns of flame-coloured, tulip-shaped cups; others still with bright orange spires, which match the lantana, which blossoms beneath them; and from others hang yellow tassels or long trumpet-shaped bells.

But the rich heavy scents of the spring do not come from the gay flowers but from the pale ones. From the mango most of all, because mangoes are so many, and this year their slender leaves are almost hidden under a cloak of greenish-yellow plumes, from which is shaken the thick, sweet scent, like a mixture of meadow-sweet and mountain ash, rather drowsy at midday but delightful in the cool morning as one gallops under the laden trees. But away from the mango's dense shadows are more delicate flavours. There are odours of jasmine, vanilla, and heliotrope from trees with flowers in fleecy white clusters, long creamy corollas, and feather-like sprays; while, more arresting than them all, where the jungle is thinner, their ivory censers scatter incense over the magnolia's bare boughs.—(H. F. PROVOST BATTERSBY.)

Pioneer.—Dehra Dun, March 6th.—On Monday, after visiting the Dehra Bazar, the Princess of Wales motored over the Mohan Pass on the Sahranpur Road, and thence returned via Assarorie where she lunched at a bungalow in the forest. From Assarorie Her Royal Highness motored over to the Hurbans-wala division of Dehra Dun tea gardens, accompanied by Major Campbell, A.D.C., and Major Watson, Lady Eva Dugdale, Mrs. Watson, and Captain Hill, A.D.C. Arriving at 4.30 the party was shown over the factory and tea house by Mr. W. Harris, Manager, and the Princess was much interested in everything connected with tea manufacture packing, etc., and also in the tea garden generally. After the inspection the party took tea on the lawn with Sir Robert Hume, G.C.B. Lady Hume, and their daughters, and left shortly before 6

o' clock. On Tuesday the Princess, accompanied by Sir W. Lawrence and staff, left Dehra for Hardwar at 12-30.

Times of India.—Aligarh, March 7th.—The Trustees of Aligarh College have arrived from different parts of India to take part in the reception of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. His Highness the Aga Khan arrived Monday night and is staying with Mr. Archibald, Principal of the College. The city has put on a gala appearance, being lavishly decorated. Mr. Adamji Peerbhai, of Bombay, has subscribed one lakh and ten thousand towards the College of Science fund, of which Rs. 25,000 are to be set apart for a fellowship as a memorial of the Royal visit.

United India and Native States.—In commemoration of the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales to India, Mr. K. S. Pimpalkhare, the well known native artist of Poona, has prepared two excellent life-size portraits in oil of Their Royal Highnesses, which are to be presented to the Poona Native Institution. The unveiling ceremony is to be performed by Mr. Kincaid, District Judge, very shortly. Mr. Pimpalkhare, who is a Member of the Society of Artists, London, has already painted portraits of quite a number of Governors and other celebrities of Bombay. He is said to be indebted for much of his success to His Highness the Chief of Ichalkaranji who has shown himself a liberal patron of the Fine Arts.

Westminster Gazette.—His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales is to-day visiting the Muhammadan College of Aligarh. Founded in 1876 by an earnest band of Muhammadan reformers, this college aims at giving to Muhammadan youths a liberal Western education, while at the same time instructing them in their own faith. The hope of the founders was to educate a generation of broad-minded and tolerant Muslims who would spread European education among their co-religionists and remove from the Muhammadan community the bigotry which has so long stifled its intellectual growth. The aims of the founders have met with astonishing success; all over India Muhammadans are beginning to turn to Aligarh not only as an educational centre but also as the home of a most hopeful school of ideas. If it continues to increase its ascendancy over the Muhammadan mind as steadily as it has done in the last ten years, Aligarh will shortly become the intellectual capital of Islam in India. Sir Antony MacDonnell visited the college when he was Lieutenant-Governor of the Province in which Aligarh is situated, and in a glowing peroration he well expressed the hopes with which to an intelligent Muhammadan Aligarh is identified:

"It is not too much to hope that this college will grow into the Muhammadan University of the future, that this place will become the Cordova of the East, and that in these cloisters Muhammadan genius will discover, and under the protection of the British Crown work out, that social, religious, and political regeneration of which neither Stamboul nor Mecca affords a prospect."

May this hope be realised!

9TH MARCH 1906.

Englishman.—Aligarh, March 8th.—After a break of more than a fortnight the Royal progress of the Prince and Princess of Wales entered on its penultimate stage to-day. The Prince came from his shooting camp and Her Royal Highness from Hardwar, which point she reached after a most pleasant visit to Lucknow, Dehra Dun, and Mussoorie. They met at Hathras Junction, and thence the united Royal party travelled to Aligarh, where a halt of six hours was made so that Their Royal Highnesses might gain a first hand acquaintance with the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College, that creation of the late Sir Syed Ahmed, which was moulded into its present permanent shape by the late Theodore Beck and Mr. Theodore Morison.

The visit to Aligarh, at first intended to be quite private, gradually developed into a semi-state ceremony. Their Royal Highnesses were received on arriving by the Collector and drove through a series of triumphal arches to the college escorted by a mounted infantry detachment of the Naini Tal Volunteers there. They were received by the Lieutenant-Governor, Sir James La Touche, as patron, and His Highness the Aga Khan as visitor of the college, and a gathering of the Trustees of the college including Nawab Fyaz Ali Khan, the President, Nawab Gohsimulmulk, the Secretary, Nawab Yusuf Ali, Nawab Syed Hosain Bilgrami and Mr. W. A. Archibald, the Principal, and members of the college and school staff. After a number of presentations had been made, the Royal party then passed through the great court through lines of cheering students and old boys to the Lytton Library where they lunched with the Trustees and a small gathering of those specially engaged in or interested in the success of Aligarh together with representatives of the civil station.

After lunch Their Royal Highnesses entered upon a detailed inspection of the college. They saw the classes at work and inspected some of the students' rooms and the dining hall. Then escorted by a detachment of the 18th Tiwana Lancers, Their Royal Highnesses drove to the English house, which is a part of the college carried on on the same lines as a house at an English public school. This they inspected carefully and then made a circuit of the college grounds returning to the great court. Their Royal Highnesses paid a lengthy visit to the tomb of Sir Syed Ahmed and appeared considerably interested.

On their way out the Royal party was again vociferously cheered by the students and accepted from the Trustees a handsome cabinet containing views of the college. They appeared greatly pleased with all they saw, and before leaving Their Royal Highnesses expressed their warmest appreciation of the work carried on at Aligarh.

There yet remained an hour or two before the Royal train was due to resume its long journey to Quetta. These were spent in watching that famous regiment of Sillarad Cavalry, the 18th Tiwana Lancers who gave on the maiden an exhibition of the horsemanship in which the Indian Cavalry are unequalled. This included bare-backed riding and jumping, tent pegging and other feats of the equestrian that are possible to a born horseman. All Aligarh kept high holiday, and delighted thousands lined the maiden and the roads through which Their Royal Highnesses passed on the way to the station to continue their journey northwards.

It was a fortunate circumstance that the route of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Quetta carried them through Aligarh and allowed them thoroughly to appreciate the work of the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College. For not to know the M. A. O. is to be ignorant of the most remarkable educational movement in India, and to fail to understand the forces that are moving His Majesty's sixty millions of Muhammadan subjects. As the M. A. O. has passed its troublous adolescence, and is now bursting into full manhood, Their Royal Highnesses's visit revives interest in the principles underlying the formal educational work of the college—principles which, if the institution is to realise its full responsibilities to the Muhammadan community, must never be allowed to fall into the background.

What was the service for which the College was called into existence? When the last century was about to enter its fourth quarter certain Muhammadan gentlemen in the United Provinces, realising the backwardness of the Muhammadans in the matter of education, determined to find the remedy. Led by the distinguished scholar, who was born for this duty, the late Sir Syed Ahmed, they decided that a return to the old methods of Oriental education was impossible. They agreed that the only education that could bring their race into harmony with the civilisation around them, and so restore it to a position of influence, was an education frankly acknowledging the advance of science, catholic in its sympathies with all that was admirable in the history, literature and philosophy of other countries, broad in its outlines and exact in its studies. Knowing full well that they would have to pass massive bunkers of ignorance and conservatism, but imbued with the faith that moves mountains, they commenced work at Aligarh in 1875. The reasons determining the selection of Aligarh were twofold. It was a convenient centre for the great areas of Muhammadan population, and it was an abandoned cantonment, with many acres of government land and many deserted military buildings waiting to be put to some useful purpose. There the work of the college was commenced with a few school classes and a modest staff of seven masters.

Yet even at this stage the note was struck that has rung through every phase of the work at Aligarh. While utilising the standing buildings, Syed Ahmed began his permanent structures on the most extensive scale. Men, seeing the tiny classes, laughed at his quadrangles larger than those of Oxford and Cambridge: at his plans as ambitious as those of a western American township. They smiled in their beards when he anticipated the day which saw the college expand into a University "whose sons shall go forth throughout the length and breadth of the land to preach the gospel of free enquiry, of large-hearted toleration, and of pure morality." Yet with scant intermission the history of the college has been one long struggle to find adequate room for those who would come within its walls. Its early combats were not few. It had to fight against apathy and prejudice, against speculation and dissension. But Syed Ahmed found a coadjutor in Theodore Beck, who linked to his enthusiasm a generous ardour and disinterestedness which warmed the college into a life that resisted all chilling blasts, and to-day with its four hundred college students and a like number of boys in the school, with buildings covering many acres and others rising on every hand, the cry is still for room.

Yet we should perpetrate a gigantic blunder if we regarded the M. A. O. as a mere machine for imparting instruction up to the Government standards, and for preparing students to pass those tests, which most curiously are designed to be proofs of intellectual capacity. Though Aligarh might be well content to be judged by these meters, its main purpose is to develop men of character: it stands or falls by its moral and intellectual tone. The predominating aspect of the college is its common life. Round the huge quadrangles are the students' rooms, where they live in small chummers, adorned according to their individual tastes, and they dine in the common room. These boarding houses are divided into blocks, each in charge of a Sub-Proctor, who is responsible to the Proctor and the Provost, the idea being to make the Sub-Proctor as much like an English House Master as the disposition of the quadrangle will permit. Athletics are encouraged, though the boys are so addicted to cricket, football and hockey and riding that direction rather than stimulus is required. There is the Siddons Hall, where debates are conducted on the model of the Oxford Union. There is the English House, which owes its existence to the devotion of Mr. Gardner Brown, where a number of boys live with him in a detached bungalow exactly as they would in an "English House." Joining in this pleasant common life are boys from Shiraz, Tehran and Bushire: from Peshawar and Quetta: from Bengal and Bombay, as well as from Northern India: from the great Muhammadan State of Hyderabad: from Mysore, Madras, and even from Burma. All are linked not only by a common faith, in which they are carefully instructed, but by a common love for Aligarh.

Has the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College succeeded in its purpose of making men and not superficially-educated machines? A few years before his death Theodore Beck claimed that the College "had turned out some very nice, manly and loyal young men who are likely to be of service both to Government and to the Muhammadan community." Speaking with all the weight attaching to his official position, Sir Auckland Colvin declared that, "To have been an Aligarh man is, I have over and over again found, a passport to the respect and confidence of both Englishmen and natives. They carry with them the stamp of their training: the impress of the mind of the man under whom that training has been accomplished." Those opinions will be subscribed to by everyone who has had a considerable experience of the products of the College. But you find the heaven working strongly within the quadrangles of Aligarh. What but a genuine appreciation of the highest purpose of the College could have inspired the Duty, or Anjuman-al-Farz, founded to collect funds for scholarships for poor students and to remove the prejudices existing in Muhammadan Society against the College? The members of the Society, or servants of the Duty, collect money by begging during the holidays, and the invested capital already exceeds thirty thousand rupees. What but really happy recollections of College days could bring the students back to Aligarh, as they do come, to fight again the battles of their glorious youth? What but a pervading and moulding influence could induce the quiet dignity and simple manner that you find in all who wear the college uniform? A manner that is by no means inconsistent with the "joie de vivre," as you gather from the joyous shouts in the playing fields, ringing as true as if they came from English throats.

Yet with all these solid and hopeful signs the college has not reached maturity. The old generation has passed away. Syed Ahmed, Beck, and Morison, who dug the foundations and prepared the superstructure are gone. Syed Ahmed left energetic successors in Faiz Ullah Khan and Nawab Mohsin-ul-Mulk; Strachey and Macdonnell bequeathed their interest to Sir James La Touche, who knows more of the work of the college even than his predecessor; the mantle of Beck and Morison has fallen on Mr. W. A. Archbold, who combines with wide learning an acquaintance with India gained as Secretary of the Board of Civil Service Studies at Cambridge, and the knowledge of men and things that comes from travel; and His Highness the Agha Khan has thrown all his influence and experience on the side of the movement. But it is with the Muhammadan community rather than with a few individuals that the future of Aligarh rests. On the extent to which they are prepared to sink their local prejudices, to throw themselves whole-heartedly on the side of progress, depends the ability of Aligarh to fulfil its mission as the rallying point of Muhammadan enlightenment—as the instrument that will fit Muhammadans worthily to take their place in the new India.

And that introduces the wider question whether Aligarh should continue on its present lines, or develop into a great Muhammadan university not only for India but for the East. In burning words the Agha Khan appealed to his co-religionists for a crore of rupees to make Aligarh a home of learning that would command the same respect as Oxford or Berlin, Leipsic or Paris. We want, he said, "to create for our own people an intellectual and moral capital; a city that shall be the home of elevated ideas and high ideals; a centre from which light and guidance shall be diffused amongst the Moslems of India and out of India too, and shall hold up to the world a noble standard of justice and virtue and purity of our beloved faith." Certain objections have been urged against particularist universities, chiefly that they would divide instead of uniting the Indian peoples. On the other hand, Mr. Morison urges that they would make possible genuine university towns, that they would be able to insist on religious instructions; and that they would be able to stipulate for a residential qualification. These are now academic questions as the money is not forthcoming. If it ever is and the Government grant a charter, the material is ready; if it is not, the college can do its work under its present name.

Englishman.—The second visit to Gwalior of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales terminated to-day. The recent change in the weather rendered the climate of Gwalior and Sipri most enjoyable, for a cool pleasant breeze tempered the keen rays of the sun. His Highness the Maharaja has spared no personal effort to ensure the perfect comfort and good sport of his Royal guest, and assisted by officials of the State has succeeded admirably in his desire. One great feature of the shooting has been the opportunity given to His Royal Highness of seeing jungle life and its surroundings in their normal conditions. Owing to the sudden change of plans elaborate preparations were impossible, and in the outlying and unknown beats His Royal Highness's experiences were just those which occur to the soldier and the civilian. On the whole the sport was good and on several occasions somewhat exciting. His Royal Highness greatly enjoyed his life in the shooting camp, no day appearing too long for him and he has invariably shown even on blank and hot days the cheerful patience of the true sportsman. During the present visit to Gwalior six tigers, three panthers and two sambhars in addition to small game have been killed, and the Prince has shown that he is equally good with rifle or gun.

The Prince of Wales's special train from Gwalior passed through Agra this morning en route to Aligarh. The train halted at Agra Fort station for half an hour.

Indian Daily News.—The Prince of Wales has been pleased to desire that a pension should be granted to the heir of the late Dafadar Dilawar Khan, 21st Cavalry (Frontier Force), who was drowned in the Lundai River, near Peshawar, on the 19th January 1906, in an attempt to assist Lieutenant Robertson of the same regiment who had been swept away by the current. The Commander-in-Chief now announces that the Government of India have sanctioned the grant of an extraordinary pension to the widow of the late Dafadar in recognition of the gallantry displayed by her husband on that occasion.

Standard.—The day after leaving Swasundram, we picked up the power-cables of the Cauvery station at their other end, and made our way to the Kolar Gold Fields, where the energy developed from the river falls is used to work the stamp mills and other mining machinery. Here, too, one felt oneself in the Newer World. The mining settlement straggles along the line of the great reefs for a length of some nine miles, in a high, breezy plain, with bare, scarped hills, like South African kopjes, jutting out of it in the distance. The winding gear and headworks of the mines are dotted at frequent intervals, surrounded by stonebuilt battery-rooms and crushing sheds, cyanide tanks, motor-houses, mounds of tailings, with officers' bungalows, enclosed in flower gardens, brick tenements for the European workers, and row after row of small straw tin-roofed huts for the native miners.

It is, as I have said, one of the noticeable goldfields of the world, representing, as it does, a capital of £2,102,000, a market valuation, when I was there, of about nine millions sterling, a total gold production well over 23 millions, and a contribution by way of royalty, to the revenues of the Mysore State, of not less than eleven hundred thousand pounds. Thirty-thousand persons are employed above ground and below, and five and a half lacs of rupees are paid out in wages every month. There are more European residents here than in almost any place in India, outside the military cantonments and the Presidency cities; but of course the great majority of the miners and labourers are natives, and there is no lack of them apparent. The lowest unskilled coolies receive eightpence for a day's work of eight hours, and a cottage, which he occupies at a rent of eightpence to one and fourpence a month; and these would be deemed favourable terms anywhere in the Peninsula.

The European foremen and skilled artisans and the officials are also very well paid; a man who would be satisfied with something under thirty shillings a week at home, may be making here two hundred pounds a year or more, with free quarters, lights, and medical attendance, and very little occasion to spend largely on his necessities or comforts. He comes as a single man, without "encumbrances"; if he has a wife or family they stay behind him, and he is allowed by the companies five months' leave of absence every three years and a free return passage, in order that he may go home and visit his belongings. The careful man, under these conditions, can have a very nice nest-egg laid by at the end of a few years, and some of the Cornish miners, who are thrifty and saving to penuriousness, do not take long to amass money enough to return to the old Western county as capitalists in a moderate way.

What strikes one most about this mining settlement is its air of quiet, well-conducted prosperity. There is little outward evidence of the rowdiness and raffishness, and the adventurous instability, which are characteristic of such concourses of humanity elsewhere. The great firm which manages nearly all the mines, and is the virtual employer of almost the entire population, encourages neither booms nor rushes; the outside promoter and prospector receive so scanty a welcome that in the whole colony there is not a single hotel where they can stay, and unless they come properly introduced, they will be hard put to it to find a night's lodging. On the other hand, any person who brings suitable credentials with him may be sure of hearty and hospitable entertainment in one or other of the commodious bungalows of the chief officials. The climate of Kolar is one of the best in India, outside the hill-stations, bright, breezy and equable, and seldom hot enough to make the parkah necessary. These conditions, and—perhaps most of all—the absence of any floating population, since almost everybody on the field is engaged under contract and has some definite status, render the level of health high, and that of crime low. I noticed no saloons, or bars, or gambling-rooms, or drinking shops; but there is a first-rate hospital, there are good schools for the Eurasian children, churches and chapels, social institutes, cricket and tennis grounds, racquet courts, and an excellent club. The Gold Fields Rifles count among the smartest volunteer forces in India. For general comfort and well-being and for the absence of disorder and violence of any kind, I am assured by those who knew California, and South Africa, and Australia, and British Columbia, that the Kolar settlements have no superior, and probably no equal.

We were shown the shafts and surface workings of the great mines, the Champion Reef and the Mysore, whose names they know so well in Throgmorton-street, and the Place de la Bourse. We peered down the new shafts, 2,500 feet deep in one case, 4,000, when completed, in another, which are to tap the veins at their lower levels, and prolong the life of mines which already are among the steadiest and most constant producers within the investors' ken.

We went into the reduction sheds, and watched the ever-at-fascinating process by which the shapeless, useless-looking chunks of grey stone are made to yield the precious metal their hearts. Then we inspected the cyanide tanks, with their pools of deadly liquid, and the tub holding a hundredweight of an innocent-looking white precipitate, one feathery ball of which would suffice to poison a regiment. Finally we pass to the trim little office, where the manager opens the three-inch armour-plate door of the strong-room and reveals the gold bricks glistening in a tempting row, ready to be packed and sealed and labelled and sent down under an armed escort to the railway.

It is all very modern, business-like, un-Indian. The sturdy Cornish miners, the keen-eyed Welsh and Scotch foremen and fitters, make us forget the coolies and sweeper-women raking away at the sand-heaps and tailings. The cheery fresh-faced mine-managers and engineers, loud in speech, jovial, careless, informal in dress and demeanour, they seem to have little in common with the precise civilians and the sporting young exquisites of the parade-ground. We hear the deep Lancastrian bass, the rolling burr of Northumbria, the level monotone of the American West. We pass from the mine works, in company with these good-humoured, well-informed, practical men of business, to their club, and from the club to the hospital, a model of all that is up-to-date and scientific, where the alert young doctors exhibit the latest triumphs of curative electric apparatus and X-ray improvements. We look from the spotless wards out upon the neat garden, with its English flowers, and beyond that to a tall brick chimney, a row of sheds, and the straddling iron legs of a windlass hoist; and we forget that we are in India.

But what are those strange, piercing cries, unearthly, blood-curdling, that fly through the open windows? What is this Mænad figure which meets our gaze as we emerge hastily upon the terrace? A woman, with long black hair floating loose in the wind, comes staggering past the low iron fence of the compound. Her red robe streams behind her, leaving breasts and shoulders bare; her arms are wildly extended, and in one up-lifted hand she brandishes a kind of trident; the head is thrown back, the dark eyes blaze with frenzied light, the features are hideously distorted; demoniac shrieks tear her as she runs. So might some priestess of Cybele have looked when the fury of the goddess was upon her. And that, indeed, is the case of this coolie woman. "Drunk?" says one of the European spectators. The hospital surgeon shakes his head. He points to a small three-sided enclosure of rough stones in a patch of waste land hard by. Within is a big boulder forming a kind of altar, and upon it a rude wooden image. It is a temple of Kali, the Hecate of the Hindu Pantheon. The altar-stone was just a lump of the quartzite rock scattered over the brae. But there was something a little unusual in its shape and size, and so the people took to worshipping the spirit that dwelt within it. Then somebody walled it in, and they put the misformed red-daubed idol upon it, and now, adds our informant, it is a temple, "and we must not touch it."

The woman has been worshipping at the shrine of the Goddess of Terror, until the mania has entered her brain. She is possessed of the devil, as our forefathers would have said; the gad-fly is stinging at her heart, the æstrum of Kali, the Slayer, the Blood-drinker, she who is the wife of the Destroyer drives her onward. Her husband and a group of neighbours follow at a respectful distance, half alarmed, half admiring. She approaches the steps of the hospital, and it is time to intervene, lest she break in and disturb the patients. The doctors and a policeman—modern science and the instruments of the law—bar her progress, and exhort her friends to take her away; but they are obviously unwilling to meddle with this manifestation of the deity. The trident is taken from her, and with difficulty she is turned back and headed off to safer ground. An hour afterwards, when we pass by the low wall of the crude temple, we see her crouching upon the altar steps, her snaky locks falling over her bowed head, a circle of villagers in awed silence, as they watch her shivering shoulders and listen to her convulsive sobs. Close by the laden trucks are rolling to the mills, and the wire-ropes are rattling over the drums of the winding engines. Here, as in Sivasamudram, we are faced by the perpetual contrast, the inevitable question—Which will survive in the end—the old gods of Asia or the new spirit of the West? Is it to be Siva or Schenectady, Kali or the General Electric Construction and Maintenance Company, Limited? Perhaps it will be neither—perhaps both.—(SIDNEY LOW.)

Times.—During the shoots in Gwalior State the Prince of Wales bagged nine tigers and three panthers, besides other big game. All the tigers were fine Royal ones and afforded splendid sport.

The Prince and Princess of Wales arrived here (Aligarh) to-day (8th March) and, after visiting the Anglo-Oriental College, proceeded to Quetta. The Royal visit to Aligarh is to be commemorated by the erection and equipment of a School of Science connected with the College. To provide for this seven lakhs (£46,666) have already been subscribed by Muhammadans in India, the Aga Khan giving over £15,000.

Times of India.—Aligarh, March 7th.—His Highness the Aga Khan has received the following telegram from Mr. Adamji Peerbhoy:—

"As the most gracious visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales to the Aligarh College, the foundation and centre of Muhammadan enlightenment, is to be commemorated by the erection and endowment, as suggested by Your Highness, of a School of Science to be attached to the College and to be called the Prince of Wales's School of Science, I shall be obliged by your kindly informing Their Royal Highnesses of my unswerving loyalty and devotion to the British Throne and to the Royal House and Person of our Most Gracious Majesty the King-Emperor, and that in addition to the Rs. 10,000 recently subscribed by me to the funds that are being raised for the above purpose I hereby give another sum of Rs. 75,000 to the same object, in the full conviction that no better mode can be devised for fittingly commemorating the Royal visit than by the establishment of such a school, as the status of Muhammadan education, which has hitherto been at a very low ebb, if not almost wholly neglected, cannot fail to be thereby greatly raised with the most gratifying results. The Muhammadan youth trained in the school will ever cherish the remembrance that it came into existence solely and wholly through the Royal Visit, a fact which of itself will keep alive their feelings of loyalty and devotion to the Throne.

"The Muhammadans of India are by nature a loyalty-loving people, as they realise that English rule has proved to be the greatest blessing which has ever fallen to their lot, while the late Queen-Empress's solicitation for India and its people caused all to love, honour and adore the Crown of England. An old man like myself may be privileged to make the above remarks in contrasting the old with the new order of things, and I feel that nothing can possibly be better than to have a true and visible symbol of the great compliment which His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, the Heir-Apparent to the British Throne, and His Royal Consort have paid to the Moslem national sentiment by their visit to the college and their appreciation of the good work done by it.

"I also give the further sum of Rs. 25,000 for the establishment of a Fellowship for Scientific Research in connection with the Prince of Wales's Scientific School, and would beg you to request Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales to graciously allow it to be called after her name as that would enhance the value of the fellowship and be gratefully remembered by future generations. My concluding request is that I may be allowed to remain an anonymous donor, unless Your Highness would think fit to disclose my identity."

General Duff will leave Calcutta at the end of the week on short tour. He will proceed to Karachi, where he will convey Lord Kitchener's farewell to Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales on behalf of the Indian Army and will afterwards proceed to Quetta and, probably, later on, to Delhi.

10TH MARCH 1906.

Englishman.—The tour of Their Royal Highnesses in India would not have been complete without a visit to Aligarh, which is the centre of Islamic thought and culture in this country, and, indeed, is growing rapidly to be considered the educational Mecca of the Mahomedan world. It is true that at Alexandria, Constantinople, and Teheran are to be found colleges of great traditions which attract thousands of students, but it is at Aligarh alone that an education is given of a modern type, in which, although religion is not neglected, particular attention is paid to the modern arts and sciences and, what is just as important, the formation of character and manners. Although the College has been in existence for only 30 years, it has already created a type, and the very term "an Aligarh boy" conveys an impression of accomplishment and dignity. There is the more reason why Mahomedans should take kindly to the study of the sciences because practically all the science of to-day, whether mathematical or natural, has been built up on foundations laid by the ancient Arabs who devoted themselves to astronomy, logic, algebra, and alchemy at a time when the rest of the world was plunged into the disorder which followed on the destruction of the Greek and Roman civilisations. So far as the amenities of life and the graces of conduct and conversation are concerned the European civilisation, of course, has little to teach the well-bred Mahomedan, whose manner and bearing are the result of careful training in the family circle. Polish amongst Mahomedans is not confined to those who have an inheritance of wealth. In this respect the Aligarh College has worked on material already good and ready to hand, and if it is said that the Aligarh boy is a special type, it is only because he has imbibed, in addition to his traditional and national instinct for courtesy, something of the natural ease of the products of our own public schools.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales arrived at Aligarh, on Thursday shortly after noon, the Royal train conveying the Princess from Dehra having joined the Prince's train at Hathras. Their Royal Highnesses were met at Aligarh station by the Collector, and proceeded to the Mahomedan Anglo-Oriental College, where they were received by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor and the Trustees and Principal of the College. After luncheon with the Trustees the Prince was shown over the College buildings, the students giving His Royal Highness a most enthusiastic reception. It is gratifying to be able to state that the Aga Khan's scheme for commemorating the Royal visit to the College has received liberal support from Mahomedans all over the country, the leading Mahomedans of Bombay, as witnessed by the munificent donation of Rs. 1,10,000 given by Mr. Adamjee Peerbhoy, having taken especial interest in it. The 24 lakhs in hand will enable the construction of the new Science School to be commenced at once, while further donations are promised. The leading Mahomedan College in the East will ever cherish the honor which has been done to it by the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales. Their Royal Highnesses left Aligarh on Thursday evening for Quetta.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—"A Member of the Pariah Community" wrote from Madras to Sir Walter Lawrence:—

"Pariah is a word which has had fastened to it the unenviable as well as undeserved distinction of standing for all that is low and vile in the social division of the people of this country. However that may be, the Pariahs form a part, "an integral part, of the real people of India, the patient, humble, silent millions, the 80 per cent., whom men's eyes, even the eyes of their own countrymen, too often forget."—(Lord Curzon.) They are as a class uneducated and illiterate. They have few wants and fewer interests; and as a rule their thoughts rarely travel beyond the dull daily round of ordinary avocation. But one of the things they know, and know well, is that to the people and Throne on the distant island, though divided from themselves by continents and the waste of seas, they owe what little of peace, security and joy they possess. They have no organisation, political, literary, tradesunion, or other, and cannot therefore receive Collectors, Governors and Viceroy's. Still less are they in a position to organise a suitable reception to the Heir to the Throne and his Consort. If I, a lowly member of this lowly and degraded class, may be permitted for the moment to speak in their name and on their behalf, and in the name and on behalf of similarly situated communities all over the country—for their number is legion—I would request you to convey to Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales our sentiments of deep loyalty and warm attachment to that Throne to which they will one day be called, and to offer them in our name a most loyal and dutiful welcome to this country. May the Giver of All Gifts shower upon them both his choicest blessings."

In reply the Pariah received the following letter:—

Prince of Wales's Camp,

10th February, 1906.

"Dear Sir,—I am directed by the Prince and Princess of Wales to thank you for the sentiments expressed in your letter of the 6th instant on behalf of the Pariah community.—Yours very truly, (Sd.) W. LAWRENCE.

T. H. A. writes to the Advocate of India.—"Before Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales bid India's shores farewell, I would once more bring to mind the question of the Delhi Darbar medals, which the Indian Volunteer Contingent were done out of. I admit that a few silver ones were issued, but to whom and when nothing is known; all we can do is to congratulate the lucky recipients. But what about the others? I am sure they were as much entitled to them. The lot of the Contingent at Delhi was not all down and feathers. Far from it; we had no feting or sightseeing as the English Contingent experienced—Colonel Goodwin and Captain Hulke will vouch for that; it was all work and no playing at soldiers at Delhi. His Royal Highness has seen enough of the Volunteers in India, and I am sure a word from him would go a great way in obtaining for us the long wished for Delhi Darbar Coronation medals."

Lady's Pictorial.—With the King on the Continent, the Prince and Princess of Wales in India, the Duke of Connaught in South Africa, and Prince Arthur of Connaught in the Far East, there was no adult Prince of the Blood Royal left in Great Britain last week to represent the reigning house, but the success of the various Royal missions is compensating cause for congratulations. From India come the happiest reports as to the results of the Prince and Princess of Wales's journey, and though the official programme of the visit was practically only concluded last week, the fruits of the mission are already becoming evident, and from all sides come accounts of significant special acts and demonstrations of sympathetic loyalty which have been evoked by the personal influence everywhere of the Royal visitors. Though so far away the thoughts of the Princess of Wales have often turned homeward, and it is interesting to note her name as one of the sponsors represented at the christening of the little daughter of Princess Alexander of Teck.

Our Home.—His Highness the Maharajah Gackwar of Baroda is the only ruling Indian Prince of note who is not in India during the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales. His Highness came to Europe last summer on account of his health; he spent several months in England, but has been in Switzerland for most of the winter. The State of Baroda is on the western side of India, and with Hyderabad and Mysore, ranks as one of the leading principalities of India. Its ruler is entitled to a salute of twenty-one guns, the highest distinction, and one much prized by those Indian Princes who enjoy it. His Highness is also well known throughout India as one of the most progressive of rulers; he takes himself very seriously, and works hard to promote the well-being of the inhabitants of his territory. The State of Baroda is a little smaller than Switzerland, and its population amounts to nearly 2,000,000. His Highness is a personal friend of His Majesty King Edward, and is rather his ally than vassal.

The Gaekwar is a Hindu Prince with a very strong attachment to the religion he has inherited. He is the husband of only one wife and is in favour of breaking down quietly but surely the restrictions under which an Indian lady lives. He has been married twice, and one of his palaces is named after the Princess who was his first wife and to whom he was devotedly attached. The present Maharanee, who accompanies the Gaekwar on his journeyings just as a European wife would travel with her husband, is a very charming lady and shares her husband's keen interest in anything that makes for progress in his dominions and among his people.

She is slight in stature and build, and exceedingly graceful. The Indian costume which she always wears suits her Oriental beauty to perfection. Soft clinging folds of drapery and the fascinating sari over her head seem to fit the calm expression of her countenance; her full dark eyes are the windows of a noble soul and also reveal a strong and charming personality. The Maharanee, of course, possesses many beautiful jewels. Indian Princes wear very fine jewels, and the Baroda jewel-case contains a diamond necklace valued at £250,000, while the Maharaja's emeralds and pearls are hardly rivalled in the East.

If there is one question which His Highness of Baroda has "on the brain" it is education. He is a strong believer in the doctrine that a good education is the best endowment of every boy and girl. He sets an excellent example to his people in the manner in which his children have been educated. His elder sons, after careful preparation in India, joined the University at Oxford, and acquitted themselves excellently. His younger children are receiving equally careful instruction. In a recently published Administration Report of the State of Baroda some pages are devoted to an account of the progress in their studies of two young princes and of the only daughter of His Highness. This little lady, we are told, has progressed in her English studies as far as the Fifth Reader of Longman's "Ship" Literary Studies; she writes compositions in English, and analyses and parses in the same way as English school girls. She also gives some of her time to natural science, domestic economy, and music. English, it must be remembered, is not her mother tongue; Marathi is the language she first learned to speak; in Marathi she has made excellent progress, and in Sanskrit, the classic tongue of the East, she is well advanced. It will be seen that the little Princess is to enjoy the advantages of Western education combined with the learning of the East; a young lady who can sew, embroider, do decimals and fractions, and at the same time recite long passages from the great epics of India, promises to be a brilliant woman. No doubt, she will be sent to England to complete her studies at one of the universities.

If the Gaekwar's sons and daughter speak English as well as their father does, they will win special distinction. His Highness's fluent English and the sound common sense of his public speeches fully merit the appreciation they receive. In another direction he has shown his broad-minded ideas. When the marriage of his eldest son became a State question of importance he allowed the young Prince to follow the dictates of his own heart, instead of being compelled to abide by the decision of his parents and the State. He chose an Indian lady of distinguished family, and the marriage was celebrated with oriental magnificence just two years ago.

Queen.—The visit to Quetta, strategically perhaps the front door of India, will be of special interest to the Prince of Wales who regards his Indian tour not as a mere pleasure or sporting trip, but also as a unique opportunity of getting an inkling at first hand of the political, economical, and social conditions of that great Empire which he will sooner or later be called upon to govern.

Quetta is a military station, of the first rank. Indeed, a larger body of troops is quartered here than in any Indian frontier garrison, and it is one of the nine great commands of military India. It is a gay and lively station, and one of the most popular in northern India. It has the reputation of being a decidedly sporting station.

Though it is a Siberia in winter, it is not in summer, as might be supposed, judging from the climate of the adjoining province of Sind, altogether a Sahara, as, during the hot season, the heat is tempered by the cool winds from the heights, and then Quetta is 5,000 feet above the sea.

Twenty years ago Quetta, then known as Shalkot, was a miserable little frontier post surrounded by a mud wall, which was so shaky that "it looked as if the vibration from its one mountain gun would bring it to the ground." Its garrison corresponded to its size and importance, consisting of "one gun crew, a company of infantry, and twenty mounted men." It is now a fine, well-built town, with broad avenues and handsome roads and large bazaars. There are practically three Quettas, the native town on the south side of the Thames, as the Shalkot river with a pathetic clinging to home associations is quaintly termed; adjoining, but distinct, is the civil station, containing many fine buildings—clubs, hospitals, institutes, banks, libraries, hotels, etc. On this side, too, there is also a large recreation ground (which boasts the finest stretch of turf in India), including a race-course and a polo ground. Then on the north side of the Thames is the modern fort, the cantonments, and the parade ground.

Quetta and district were purchased from the Khan of Khelat by the Indian Government in 1883, while Pishin and Sibi had already been assigned to the British in 1879 by the Amir of Afghanistan.

The whole region is now known as British Beluchistan, and has a population of some 350,000, with an area of about 47,000 square miles. It is administered directly by the Indian Government through a political agent, Sir A. H. McMahon.

Considerable developments in communications have taken place recently. A road to Seistan, metalled as far as Nushki (eighty-two miles), has been made, while a railway, which is estimated to cost 7,000,000 rupees, is now being constructed from Quetta to Nushki.

At this great frontier fortress—an advanced post of empire, which serves as a kind of "retort courteous" to the territorial aggressions of Russia on the Beluchistan frontier, the Prince will doubtless appreciate the complexity and importance of the great frontier problem which Lord Curzon has grappled with so vigorously. To put the history of the frontier question in a nutshell, it may be divided into three phases. First, the "forward policy" (the military system); second, the "close border policy," favoured by civilians; and, finally, the present policy, which may be described as "the native frontier garrison policy"—a kind of compromise between the other two systems. With this policy Lord Curzon has been very closely identified. It has been described as "defence not defiance," and its main principle consists in the withdrawal of the advance garrisons and posts in the semi-independent districts of the borderland, strengthening the forts and garrisons in the new frontier province and in British Beluchistan, utilising tribal levies for the defence of the Khyber Pass, and in large measure allowing the natives to police themselves. Costly punitive expeditions have been abandoned, and instead any seriously disaffected district has been blockaded. A notable example was the blockade of the Waziri country in 1900-1901. This was thoroughly successful, and the cost was only about £100 a day, so that the whole cost of a year's blockade amounted to little more than what a punitive expedition would have spent in a fortnight. These figures should appeal with special force to Lord Kitchener.

As a frontier garrison Quetta is even more important than Peshawar, as it is on the direct route of what most military experts consider will be the line of the Russian advance should the invasion of India ever be seriously attempted.

The one great sight of Quetta is the famous Bolan Pass Railway, where passengers are carried into the heart of some of the boldest mountain scenery in India. It seems curious in this wild, mountainous, and sparsely-populated region to find a duplicate railway to Quetta. The second railway, the Bolan Pass, long the despair of engineers and a bone of contention between the provincial and the central government, would probably have existed only on paper but for the Russian scare induced by the historic Penjdeh incident in 1885. This alarming act of aggression on the part of Russia rather forced the hands of the Government, who thought it advisable to have a direct line through the Bolan Pass from Sibi Junction, in addition to the northern line via Harnai and Bostan Junction. By the beginning of 1887 the Bolan Pass line was open for traffic, but was hastily and flimsily constructed, and being laid for the most part on the river bed, was naturally much subject to floods. Indeed, some forty miles of the original track have been given up, and a new and more direct line constructed through the Mushkaf Gorge. The original line (officially known as the Sind-Pishin Railway), via Harnai, passes through the famous Chappar Rift, and has a gauge of 5 feet 6 inches. This line is far more solidly built, and cost a very large sum, as a great deal of tunnelling, cutting, and embanking was necessary.

On the Sind-Pishin railway the most sensational scenic feature is the Chappar Rift, a stupendous limestone gorge, which the line crosses by a bridge known as the Louise Margaret Bridge. This was so called in honour of the Duchess of Connaught, who opened the bridge during her visit to Quetta in March 1887.

"The Bolan Pass," says Lord Curzon, "is a pass in the most precise sense of the term, for throughout its sixty miles length it takes the form of a defile, in the narrowest places only some twenty yards wide, though in others expanding to more than a mile, confined by mountain walls of uniform ruggedness, though of varying height." The wild grandeur and weird desolation of the pass will impress the most matter-of-fact tourist, and, indeed, might almost be described as awe inspiring. It is said that until lately there were only five trees visible throughout its entire length, which used to be proudly pointed out to the traveller.

Northwards the railway has been extended by means of a tunnel under the Khojak mountains to Chaman, on the Baluchistan-Afghanistan frontier. This is now the terminus, though rails and material sufficient for an extension of the line to Candahar, eighty-five miles off by the surveyed route, are actually stored here.

The Khojak tunnel is remarkable not only for the grandeur of the mountain scenery, but as the longest railway tunnel in India, nearly two miles and a half long. It was completed in January 1892, after four years' work, at a cost of no less than 6,000,000 rupees, more than double the original estimate. It is fortunate that the advice of the late Sir Robert Sandeman perhaps the greatest "Warden of the Marches" after John Nicholson that India ever possessed, was not taken. He had strongly advocated a more circuitous route round the western side of the Amran Range by Nushki, as less costly, better adapted for trade, and less likely to annoy native prejudices.

Times of India.—The "Pall Mall Gazette's" correspondent at Cairo telegraphed as follows on February 11th:—

Much to the general satisfaction, it has at last been definitely decided that the Prince and Princess of Wales will pay this country a visit at the end of next month, on their way back from India. During their stay in Cairo they will be the guests of the Khedive at Abdin Palace. The exact details are still the subject of negotiation between the Agency and India, and they will depend largely on the health of the Princess of Wales. This visit will prolong the season, which is usually on the wane, before March is out, and in all probability the end of April will this year still see a goodly number of visitors in the land of the Pharaohs.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE NEWSPAPERS PUBLISHED IN BENGAL FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 10TH MARCH 1906.

The Sambalpur Hitaisini.—The Sambalpur Hitaisini, Bamra, of the 17th February gives an account of the Prince of Wales's tour through Hyderabad, Mysore and other places, and hopes that this tour may lead to some good in the end. Its other contemporaries in Orissa write in the same strain and wish the Prince a safe and successful journey back home.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE PAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE BOMBAY PRESIDENCY FOR THE WEEK ENDING 10TH MARCH 1906.

Jām-e-Jamshed, 7th March 1906.—"We are glad the Prince has had an opportunity of visiting a famine camp and to have an idea of the conditions under which famine relief is dispensed in this country. When the programme of the Royal tour was being arranged, we had repeatedly expressed the opinion that it would be better to give Their Royal Highnesses an opportunity to see some of the famine camps and affected tracts. 'The nation every country dwells in the cottage,' and the population that dwells in the cottage in India lives periodically, if not always, in straits of which no one could be expected to have an adequate idea till he has seen it at close quarters. To have shown the Prince only the brighter side of India would have been not only obviously unfair to the people but an unkindness to him personally, and it is indeed a matter for gratification that the Prince has had an opportunity given to him to visit a famine camp and to see how the failure of a single season spreads devastation and misery over large tracts of the country, sap the very life-blood of the people and making it practically impossible for millions upon millions to stand upon their legs without the crutches of State aid. We are told that His Royal Highness 'evinced the greatest interest in all the details of the work, riding amongst the workers, inspecting the bazar, hospital, huts and those receiving gratuitous relief, and before riding away, left a sum sufficient to give each individual on the works an extra day's pay.' It would be impossible to exaggerate the value and the importance of this visit and of the very happy impression created by the truly Royal beauty which the thoughtfulness and the generosity of His Royal Highness prompted him to leave behind. It is hard to say how many of those poor 6,000 men, women and children employed on this particular work would live to return to their homes. But there could be no doubt that those who would will cherish till the end of their lives grateful memories of the visit that future king paid them in the hour of their sore affliction and of the bounty he left behind to mark his sympathy and kindness."

Karnatak Vaibhav, 3rd March 1906.—There are some ultra-loyal persons among us who proclaim at the top of their voice that the condition of the people of India will be improved in consequence of the Royal tour. We are afraid, however, that there is very little that can be urged to substantiate this statement. Nay, it is easy on the other hand to prove that the has entailed an enormous pecuniary loss on the people and that their condition has consequently become worse than before. The Prince has now been touring among us for a period of four months. What remissions and suspensions of revenue have been granted to the public during this interval? How many starving people have got a full meal during all these days in commemoration of the Royal visit? What special privileges have been bestowed upon our loyal native Chiefs, who fleece their people and spend enormous sums of money? The Prince has only promised to communicate to his Royal father the fact of the loyalty of the Feudatories. It is foolish to expect any good from such dry admissions about our loyalty by the King-Emperor or his son.

Phaniz, 7th March 1906.—“The Royal visit has become the general topic of the day among the citizens of Karachi and well it might, for we have never before been honoured with the presence of Royalty in our midst and the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales will be a unique and historical event in the annals of this city. Small wonder, therefore, if our fellow-citizens take a keen interest in the forthcoming visit and feel honoured thereby. We take this opportunity of marking our deep sense of appreciation of the officials who have so zealously and industriously devoted themselves for months past to make the Royal visit a decided success and not to leave the least loophole for discontent or murmur. It is indeed a lucky circumstance to have for the organizer of the various functions during the visit a Collector like Mr. Mules who have spared no pains to make the occasion a marvel of perfection. No less credit is due to Mr. Brunton, our sturdy and valiant Chief Officer, for the splendid arrangements made by him. The stand that he has erected near the Frere Hall for the eight thousand and odd guests who are expected to attend the ceremony of unveiling the statue of Her Majesty the late Queen Victoria is a sight to see and admire. At one time there was an ill-natured rumour about a distinction to be observed in the seats to be allotted to the different communities, but knowing as we do Mr. Mules and Mr. Brunton, we discredited those rumours at the very outset, and the event has proved them to be false. Strenuous efforts have been made to provide as many seats as possible so as to avoid any disappointment. And we publish elsewhere a letter from Mr. Mules wherein with characteristic forethought and kindness he informs the people that if the limits of space prevent some people from having a look at the Royal visitors at the Cantonment Railway Station and the Frere Hall Stand, they can take their seats behind the cordon of troops and police who will line the route of Their Royal Highnesses' procession. ‘The public will be not only at liberty but welcome to take up position, etc.’ says Mr. Mules. We are sure the public will thankfully acknowledge this concession and freely avail themselves of it.” [Elsewhere the paper writes:—“Karachi is busy making elaborate preparations for according a right Royal reception to the ‘Shahzada’ and his consort. Steam-rollers are working here, there and everywhere, and the organizers of ceremonies, we daresay, have not a wink of sleep at night. Flags and bunting are much in demand. The topic of the hour is the Royal visit, and even the little children are chatting every day about the unique event. We hope the authorities concerned will make suitable arrangements for pleasing the little angels. The children should be given every opportunity of seeing their future Emperor and Empress; they should be given suitable mementos to remind them when they grow old about the Shahzada's visit in our midst, and we hope that a packet of sweets will be given to each of them so that they may cheer and bless the day.”]

Sind Gazette, 2nd March 1906.—“Same mistakes must have occurred in Reuter's rendering of the official statement regarding the tour of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales. We fail to see how the tour can be ‘officially completed until it is over, unless it is imagined in England that the shooting trip now being enjoyed means that all ceremonial visits to Indian towns are over. The Prince and Princess yet, however, to be greeted by the populations of Quetta and Karachi and by the ruling Chief of Lus Beyla, the Khan of Khelat and the Mir of Khairpur. As much affectionate loyalty exists in the North-West portion of the Peninsula as elsewhere in the Indian Empire, and the friendship and devotion of the Chiefs who have not yet seen Their Royal Highnesses are fully as much desired and appreciated by the British Crown as those of others who were privileged to receive them earlier in the tour.”

The Gujarati of 4th March 1906 vehemently protests against the alleged optimistic descriptions given by the special correspondent of the Times of India accompanying the Royal party on their tour regarding the happy relations subsisting between the British Government and its Feudatory States. It insinuates that the encomiums bestowed by the Times correspondent on the loyalty and independence of the Nizam have a sinister import and are officially inspired. It says:—When the Prince and Princess proceeded to Hyderabad, the Nizam's favourite daughter was lying on her death-bed. It is said that when she fell ill, the Nizam abandoned his intention of inviting Their Royal Highnesses to his capital, but had ultimately to yield to official pressure. It so happened that the Nizam's daughter died during the stay of Their Royal Highnesses in Hyderabad, and if what is reported be true, the Prince actually complained that arrangements should not have been made for inviting him to Hyderabad, when it was known that the Nizam was under the shadow of a domestic calamity. His Royal Highness was much affected by the sad event, and having left Hyderabad on a shooting trip did not return to the Nizam's territory. The Prince is after all human, and he must have divined what the feelings of the Nizam must have been over the whole affair. Anglo-Indian journalists taking the incident as the text of their sermon have bestowed hollow-sounding praises on the loyalty of the Nizam. They say that although the Nizam, being a perfectly independent potentate, could have excused himself, if he chose, from entertaining the Prince, he subordinated his personal grief to the claims of the Royal visitors upon his hospitality. We think, however, that the real object of this fulsome flattery of the Nizam is to divert public attention from this painful occurrence. It is a transparent device to soothe the wounded feelings of the Nizam and to gloss over the whole ugly affair. The incident, however, will not fail to be indelibly impressed upon the mind of the Prince as illustrating the treatment accorded by Government to Native Chiefs.

SELECTION FROM NATIVE-OWNED PAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE CENTRAL PROVINCES FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 10TH MARCH 1906.

Saugor, 3rd March 1906.—The District Superintendent of Police reports:—“I recently heard that the Begum of Bhopal was much hurt at the Prince and Princess of Wales not visiting her State. She avers that the neighbouring Rajput Princesses, who during the Mutiny were disloyal, have been shown greater favour than she whose ancestors remained loyal to the Government in their time of trouble.”

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE NEWSPAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE UNITED PROVINCES FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 10TH MARCH 1906.

The Riyáz-ul-Akhbar (Gorakhpur); of 1st March 1906 says that though Mohsin-ul-Mulk (Secretary to the Muhammadan College, at Aligarh) does not stand in need of any title from Government (to raise his social position), yet as a matter of conventionality the Muhammadan community strongly desire that Government should take advantage of the present happy occasion (of Their Royal Highnesses' visit to the Aligarh College) to confer a suitable title on him (in recognition of his services to the cause of Muhammadan education).

12TH MARCH 1906.

Daily Mail, Quetta, 10th March.—The Prince and Princess of Wales have entered upon the last stage of their journey. Refreshed by nearly two weeks of freedom from ceremonial, Their Royal Highnesses reached Quetta this afternoon in stormy weather.

If the Prince and Princess were delighted with the Khyber Pass, they will be charmed with this citadel of the South-West Frontier. The Princess has an eye for scenery, and will take pleasure in the snow-clad mountains and bare ravines. She has also sympathy and imagination, and will be interested in the squatter-like village overflowing with the strange humanity of wild Frontier Baluchis, with long black ringlets and handsome faces, and Afghans, whose features give conviction of their traditional descent from King Solomon's armies and the son of Saul.

These untamed bordermen, who complain that the British occupation has made women of them, received the Royal visitors with that calm and dignified air of satisfaction which is the highest compliment.

How personal is the appeal to them may be judged by a single incident. The Prince, hearing that a man had fallen from a bicycle and broken his leg, stopped his motor-car and expressed sympathy. Evidently there was not a man who would not have thought a broken leg cheap at the price of this compliment, for the only condolence the sufferer's relatives offered was this:—"How fortunate is our brother that the Shahzada should speak with him."

General Smith-Dorrien, warden of nine hundred miles of mountains and sun-scorched plains, has much to show His Royal Highness. At Chaman, which will be reached by the railway which the late Amir compared to a knife thrust in his vitals, the Prince will see the road to Kandahar and the bare plateau, with the Afghan fort keeping watch for the man who ventures to set foot over the border.—(WILLIAM MAXWELL.)

Englishman, Quetta, March 11.—The spell of truly Royal weather which the Prince and Princess of Wales have hitherto enjoyed was broken when they entered upon the most picturesque stage of their progress. The climate of Quetta at this season has all the bracing charm of the Engadine in winter. The apricots and the almonds are not in bloom, indeed, they are barely showing the pink fleshiness of their budding life, and the poplars, chenars, and walnuts betrayed the barrenness of an English December. But the weeping willows are flecking the brown hedgerows with the green promise of spring, and their red-stemmed congeners temper their harshness with the rich colours of the afterglow. To compensate for the absence of the exuberant vegetable life which makes Quetta in April an Indian Paradise, the climate at its best is like wine to the faded dweller in the plains. Cold without the damp rawness of the winter months, the clear crisp ringing air sends the blood surging through the veins until your animal spirits run riot. In the azure brightness of the cloudless sun light, in the ethereal beauty of the full moon, the giant peaks, outposts of the Quetta valley, their barren rockiness clothed with the daintiest garment of snow, evolve in every change of light and aspect a new and more perfect beauty. To be in Quetta in such times is to appreciate the full joy of living.

This was Quetta for the week preceding the Royal visit. Then came the news of the depression forming in Persia, which is the infallible harbinger of rain and snow; but as the day slipped by without signs of the threatened break one began to hope that for once the portents might be astray. But Saturday morning broke with a deepening bank of purple cloud overhanging the valley and a moist softness in the air that could have but one significance, and an hour before noon the rain came down in torrents that speedily converted the trim roads into a quagmire. A little later the sun succeeded in tearing a jagged rent through this murky pall and the troops marched to their stations under more cheering conditions. The Warwicks trudged through the mire over-coated to the eyes to form the guard of honour, and the native infantry drawing their drab surtouts more closely round them and the cavalry in hood and cape invested the military display with the stern business-like air that properly belongs to the fortress station that guards India's second backdoor. When all arrangements were complete, the news came that in view of the bad weather and the inconvenience that would be caused to all by a State reception in a downpour, Their Royal Highnesses wished their arrival to be quite private. So the troops were marched off, the formal ceremonies were abandoned and the Prince and Princess drove to Government House with only a travelling escort. They were scarcely within its wall before the rain again descended in torrents.

Still there were many elements of picturesqueness in the scene. There were gathered at the station the Khan of Kelat, the titular overlord of the greater part of Baluchistan. The Khan nominally controls the arid mountain region, some ten times the size of Switzerland, that lies between Persia, Afghanistan, British India and the Arabian Sea; but of recent years a distinct change has overtaken the relations between the Khan and his sirdars. Mir Khodadad Khan, working through whom Sir Robert Sandeman wrought such an amazing change in Baluchistan, now lives in retirement at Pishin. With all his faults he was a man of character, but under his successor the sirdars have come to look more to the British Government, than to their traditional feudal Chief. Near the Khan stood the Jam of Lasbela whose territories abut on the sea coast north-west of Karachi, and near whose capital stands the still honoured grave of Sir Robert Sandeman. Round the Agent to the Governor-General were grouped the handful of officers who not only directly administer British Baluchistan, but are the controllers of a hundred and thirty thousand square miles of mountain, desert, and valley peopled by more than a million souls, where order is well nigh as profound as in the most settled districts of British India.

Then, at the head of his officers, stood the military warden of these marches, the guardian of nine hundred miles of mountain and plain, the watch dog over the second backdoor into India from the north. In the gamut of military appointments there is none more attractive to the keen soldier than this. There is the bracing contact with the frontier with its lesson that soldiering is a splendid profession, and not an excuse for living.

There is a climate which keeps men as hard as nails; to see a battery of "He-vies" or a company of Mountain Artillery march through Quetta is to realise what Mulvaney meant when he spoke of soldiers "Crammed full wid bull mait." There is a division of all arms to train, soon to be increased to two, and there are miles of defences to study. It is just the command for an officer like Major-General Smith Dorrien, who has further left a mark upon the station by materially improving the amenities of the soldier's life. And wherever they could find room clustered the sirdars of the Baluch tribes, Baluchis, with their curly locks and flowing white robes, Afghans, with their strong Semitic features, the Brahuis, betraying a still unexplained Dravidian strain, the Bugtis, Maris, and the strange wild clans whose existence was one of incessant strife till Sandeman extended his right arm right up to the Waziri border.

In the course of the five days they will spend at Quetta; the Prince and Princess will come into contact with every phase of its political and strategical work. On Monday the official visits of the Khan of Kelat and the Jam of Las Bela will be made, and the Sirdars of Baluchistan received in Durbar. Then on the military side time will be made for a detailed visit to Baleli, where the fortifications are centred which in the opinion of competent judges render Quetta impregnable against direct attack, and for an excursion of Chaman, the little station looking out over Spin Baldal fort, the outpost of Afghanistan, and where are accumulated the materials for a railway to the Kandahar, that lies across the plain. The short journey to Chaman will carry them to the Kwaja Amran Chain, holding the advanced line of defences and through the Khojak tunnel which Abdur Rahman Khan sorrowfully likened to a knife thrust in his vitals.

But to-day in accordance with the invariable practice of the tour was a day of rest. Their Royal Highnesses attended Divine Service in the Church of St. Mary of Bethany in the morning, and there was no State ceremony. To-day, too, the weather has betrayed a perfection that made it hard to realise that this was the raw chilly wet station that greeted the Prince and Princess of Wales twenty-four hours ago. The sun has invested the valley with the cheerful crispness of an English spring, and although the triple peaks—Takattoo, Murdar and Chiltan—are dipping their summits in the greyish clouds and purple shadows are clinging to the low hills round Baleli, there is the hope of the splendid freshness of the last week.

We learn that the Government of Nepal has presented to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales an interesting and valuable collection of Indian animals, which the Prince intends to send to the London Zoological Society's Gardens for exhibition. The animals are expected to arrive in London in June and will be especially exhibited. The Duke of Bedford, the President of the Society, will defray the cost of transport from India to England. When the present King's Indian Menagerie was exhibited at the London Zoo in 1876, the visitors in that year numbered 915,764, a total exceeding by 65,000 the attendance in any previous or subsequent year, so the collection should be a great help to the Society. It would be well if the Government of India could afford greater assistance than has hitherto been given to the Calcutta Zoological Committee in obtaining animals from Nepal and other parts of India where the rarer wild animals may still be found, though in decreasing numbers.

Indian Daily News, Quetta, March 11.—The Prince and Princess of Wales reached Quetta this afternoon after a journey of forty-five hours from Aligarh. When the Royal train entered the Bolan Pass this morning, heavy clouds hung over the further snow-capped hills. Rain was falling when Mach was reached, and after ten o'clock a thunderstorm was playing over the hills. Later on, as the snow-crowned ranges were neared, the view of bright silver crested peaks and pearl grey mists was superb. At Quetta hail and rain began to fall about half past nine, and as it continued, a telegram was despatched to the Prince regarding the reception arrangements. The original programme provided for a public arrival and the presentation of a Municipal address at the railway station, if the weather permitted.

Heavy rain and showers of hail were still alternately falling when the advance train arrived a little before two o'clock. The troops, after lining the roads, had been ordered to return to their quarters, but after two o'clock the weather cleared and they again marched out to take up their positions along the route from the station to the Residency. The Royal train was timed to arrive at three o'clock, and by that hour there was a large gathering of military officers, civilians, many ladies and the striking assembly of Baluchi and Brahui notables at the station. The arrival of the train was delayed, and then the intimation came that on account of the weather the arrival would be private. For the second time the troops were marched back to their quarters and only the guard-of-honour of the Royal Warwickshire Regiment remained on the platform, while a travelling escort of Jacob's Horse with some of the Zhoob Levies remained in the vicinity of the station. The officers, the provincial representatives and the public who had gathered in the station also remained to greet Their Royal Highnesses.

Quetta lies in a close circle of hills which are to-day thickly streaked with snow, and when the Royal train entered the railway station at half past three, the curtain of mist had lifted and the silvered peaks gleamed under a bright sun. The Prince and Princess were received by the Hon. Mr. Tucker, the Acting Agent to the Governor-General in Baluchistan, the General Officer Commanding at Quetta, His Highness the Khan of Khelat and the Jam of Las Bela. A bouquet was presented to the Princess, and thereafter Their Royal Highnesses drove straight to the Residency. A salute was fired by the garrison artillery and a knot of children of the British garrison gathered on a stand close to the station entrance and sang "God bless the Prince of Wales." The route to the Residency had been decorated, but the rain had left nothing but limp bits of coloured rags and bedraggled arches. Though the weather was fair for the actual arrival, within half an hour of Their Royal Highnesses' reaching the Residency, a heavy thunderstorm broke over Quetta.

Rain and sleet continued to fall sharply until nearly midnight last night, but in spite of the weather there was an attempt at illumination on the hills. Beacon fires burned along the crests of the Chihaltan, Takatu and Hunrai, which form the circle within which Quetta lies. This morning the weather is fine and clear, and the air is like wine. The hills have a thicker coating of snow than was visible yesterday and over the loftier peaks are piled banks of cotton and wool. The cloud is tinged here and there with an ominous greyness. The pinnacle crags rise gleaming in white splendour, and the whole picture before the eye is one of wintry brilliance, and graceful and lovely in the extreme. At eleven o'clock this morning the Prince and Princess attended parade service at the Church of St. Mary of Bethany. The Quetta programme is now greatly subject to the weather, but to-morrow the Prince will receive the Municipal address which had to be postponed on Saturday, and will later receive a visit from the Khan of Khelat. A durbar at which the Sirdars of Baluchistan will be received will be held at the Sandeman Hall in the afternoon.

Pioneer.—Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales visited Roorkee on Wednesday last, having journeyed from Hardwar to Roorkee by motor-car along the bank of the Ganges Canal. She was accompanied by Lady Eva Dugdale, Sir Walter Lawrence, and members of her staff, and was much interested on the way at the various works on the great Ganges Canal. At Dhanauri, for instance, she was shown the special escape gates for coping with flood water from the River Rutmio by the Executive Engineer, Mr. Anthony. One of these gates was dropped to show Her Royal Highness the releasing gear and the manner in which the flood water would be drawn off from the Canal to the bed of the Rutmio on the lower side. The party arrived in Roorkee at 1 o'clock p.m., and was greeted at the entrance from the Canal bank by 800 workmen of the Canal Foundry, who lined up on every wall and roof of the buildings and made their loyal and profound salaams as Her Royal Highness was passing the works. The Princess drove straight to the house of Colonel and the Hon. Mrs. Sandbach, with whom she lunched, and afterwards all the officers and native officers of the P. W. O. 1st Sappers and Miners were presented to Her Royal Highness by Colonel Sandbach, D.S.O., R.E.

At a quarter to four in the afternoon the Princess and suite visited the Canal Foundry, driving in motor-cars to the main gate of the works, where they alighted. The Superintendent

Mr. D. Souter-Robertson, was presented to Her Royal Highness by Colonel Sandbach, and his little daughter presented the Princess with a lovely bouquet of heliotropes, which she graciously accepted. The party then went through the various departments of the Canal foundry, Her Royal Highness being conducted by the Superintendent who explained all the different processes of manufacture. The Princess stayed for some time in the foundry, and on leaving expressed her pleasure at having visited these workshops and at all she had seen there. The Royal party left the Canal Foundry at 4.25 in motor-cars and went to the Thomason Civil Engineering College, where the Princess was conducted through the various buildings by Major Atkinson, B.E., Principal of the College. Her Royal Highness was much interested in the College work, and especially in the excellent photographs which was shown her, being samples of work done by the students. The College roads and buildings were gaily decorated for the occasion, a triumphal arch being erected on the road to the north front of the College. In the evening Her Royal Highness went for a motor ride down the main Meerut road to Manglaur and got back to Roorkee about 6.30 P.M., and proceeded to the Royal train at Roorkee railway station and dined in her carriage. Mr. Hope Kavanagh, District Superintendent of Police, was in charge of the police arrangements and the roads during the Princess's visit, and at the railway stations Her Royal Highness sent specially for Mr. Kavanagh, expressed her pleasure at the way he had managed everything for the comfort of the party and during her stay in Hardwar. Before leaving Roorkee Her Royal Highness presented signed photos of herself to Colonel Sandbach and to Mr. Kavanagh in commemoration of her visit. The Princess left Roorkee by special train at 11 o'clock the same night for Aligarh.

Times Quetta, March 11.—The bright, crisp wintry weather prevailing in Quetta for the past week broke yesterday, when it became wet, raw, and stormy. The Prince and Princess of Wales consequently passed through the striking scenery viewed from the train as the railway climbs from Sibi to the Quetta Plateau under unfavourable conditions, and at Quetta the arrangements for an official reception were cancelled, as it was decided that the arrival should be private. The Khan of Khelat, the Jam of Las Bela, and the picturesque sirdars of the Baluch tribes were in attendance, and will be received in darbar on Monday. Sunday being a day of rest, which Their Royal Highnesses have scrupulously observed throughout their tour, no ceremony took place to-day except a church service.

One's first impression of Quetta, the head-quarters of British civil and military administration in Baluchistan, is as of an oasis in the wilderness, so striking is the contrast between the belt of vegetation which surrounds it and the desolation of the wild mountain ranges through which the railway climbs up to it, whether by the Bolan Pass or across the Choppar Rift by the still more impressive Harnai route. The lofty plateau, upon which Quetta is situated more than 5,000ft. above sea-level, and the boldly scraped hills which only imperfectly shelter it from the winter blizzards of Central Asia are themselves as bleak as the rest, but by dint of irrigation, the trim gardens and avenues of the civil and military "lines," and even patches of cereal cultivation and orchards of apple and pear trees are gradually expanding from year to year round the mud walls of the old native town, which was less than 30 years ago one of the Khan of Khelat's tumble-down forts. Only 25 years ago a Liberal Government, chiefly concerned to remain consistent with the line it had adopted in Opposition, still refused to recognise in any way the importance of Quetta. But facts have, as usual, proved stronger than theories, and to-day with its girdle of detached forts and its northern outposts at Chaman, right on the Afghan frontier, Quetta is admittedly one of the military bulwarks of our Indian Empire.

Quetta occupies in regard to Western Afghanistan a strategic position in many respects analogous to that which Peshawar occupies in respect to Eastern Afghanistan, with this important difference, that whereas there still lies between Peshawar and Kabul a very difficult stretch of mountainous country inhabited by warlike and potentially hostile tribes, the only natural obstacle to an advance from Quetta upon Kandahar has been overcome since the Kwaja Amran range, which blocks the Quetta plateau in the north, has been pierced by a tunnel and the railway carried through it under the old Kojak Pass down to Chaman, whence an unbroken plain stretches away to Kandahar. Of late years, too, the importance of Quetta as regards not only Western Afghanistan, but also Eastern Persia, has received due recognition by the construction of the railway to Nushki and the opening up of a new trade route along the margin of Northern Baluchistan into Seistan. The events of the last two years in Further Asia and the upheaval in Russia have no doubt averted, or at any rate postponed for a long time to come, the danger of a Russian advance to the south through Khorasan and Seistan which might have ultimately turned our defensive positions on the north-west frontier of India, but apart from such larger considerations of Asiatic policy, the development of our relations with Persia from this new base has been already amply vindicated by the results of the MacMahon mission to Seistan and the settlement of the Afghan-Persian boundary dispute in the debatable region of the Heri-Rud.

Quetta happily enjoys the advantages of a relatively healthy climate, for though the cold in winter is very severe, the hot season is not unbearably oppressive. Its selection for the establishment of the new Indian Staff College is doubtless mainly due to its healthiness, and its importance as a military station seems bound to go on growing. The spring is certainly not yet sufficiently advanced for Their Royal Highnesses to see Quetta at its best, but combined with his visit to Peshawar and the Khair Bar Pass, the Prince's journey into Baluchistan will have served to give him a very useful knowledge of the North-West Frontier and to familiarize him with many of the great Imperial problems connected with it.

13TH MARCH 1906.

Englishman, Quetta, March 12.—This morning broke with the full splendour of a mountain winter day. The brightest of blue skies just flecked with diaphanous clouds warm enough to be pleasant and cold enough to make brisk physical exertment a joy. It is this weather that makes Quetta in winter an Indian Engadine.

The official programme opened with the reception of the Municipal Address that would have been presented on Saturday had not the rain so sadly upset all arrangements. It was the more interesting because it traced a development that cannot be paralleled in modern India outside the Chenab Irrigation Colony. When as the most valuable fruits of the Second Afghan War we entered into possession of the passes that make our frontier against Eastern Afghanistan and North-Eastern Persia practically impregnable, the Quetta plateau was one of the most depressing places in Asia. A few groups of aged and stunted mulberry trees stood about in despondent attitudes at intervals in the swampy plain surrounding the ancient mud volcano which now forms the basis of the central fort and round the fort clustered a mud and wattle collection of dome crowned huts which figured as the town. So wrote Sir Thomas Holdich of the Quetta of a quarter of a century ago.

To-day the Municipality were able to claim that the mud and wattle huts with their four thousand poor occupants, have expanded into a town of over seven hundred acres with a population of a quarter of a lakh. A town with twelve miles of good road, mostly lined with fine trees—though the ravages of an insect called the borer have been direfully destructive of all whose wood is soft—with a revenue of two and a half lakhs, a good water supply, adequate sanction, and improving facilities for education. The bloodshed and anarchy common all over Baluchistan have been replaced by peace and order. The appalling communications that strewed the valleys and the passes with dead and dying transport animals in the two Afghan wars, have given way to railways up the Bolan Pass and the Hurnai, good military roads and facile means of travel even to Loralai and Fort Sandeman in the remote Zhob Valley, telegraphs and posts. The scanty trade constantly interrupted by tribal feuds has grown into a flourishing commerce with Kalat, Seistan, and Southern Afghanistan, which has increased by five lakhs of maunds in the imports and two and a half lakhs of maunds in the exports. With this record the Municipality could honestly claim an extraordinary advance on previous conditions that affords an example of what can be effected under the benign and enlightened ascendancy of British power.

In reply His Royal Highness said:—

Gentlemen,—The address which has just been read presents in very graphic language a story of which we may all feel proud. While thanking you heartily for your welcome to the Princess of Wales and myself, I congratulate you with equal heartiness on your achievements. We, who are familiar with the older and more slowly growing institutions of the West, are naturally struck with the rapid career of Quetta. You have mentioned the honoured name of Sandeman, who won the people of Baluchistan to the ways of peace. I doubt not that the traditions of that great man inspire and direct you in your labours and I can detect in your address two of his qualities, courage and hope. We shall have opportunities during the next few days of seeing for ourselves the work which has been achieved within the short space of thirty years, and it will be my pleasing duty to inform the King-Emperor of the wonderful progress which has been made on this frontier of the Empire since he visited India. May every success and prosperity attend your useful labours. The concluding words of your address have greatly touched us, and we sincerely join in your expressions of thankfulness for the blessings which Providence has bestowed upon us during our journey to and in India.

Then His Royal Highness received formal visits from the Khan of Khelat and the Jam of Las Bela. The conditions have markedly changed since Sir Robert Sandeman working through the Khan pacified Baluchistan with a facility that made his administration a subject for puzzled admiration. In their most desperate feuds the Baluch tribes owned a certain shadowy allegiance to the Khan which Sandeman with his intuitive perfection turned to profit. But the man through whom he worked and who was devoted to him with a quite touching affection was deposed for an act of savagery and the sirdars now look to the British Government with the confidence Sir Robert inspired. Still he is a figure amongst the Indian Feudatories controlling a mountainous kingdom ten times the size of Switzerland and paid his homage in full state, but with an escort of native cavalry instead of his own picturesque Sowarsis.

On the east side of Quetta stands a low domed building that commemorates the great work of Sir Robert Sandeman in Baluchistan. There, this afternoon, were gathered the sirdars of all the varied Baluch tribes to pay homage to the Heir to the Throne, that Sandeman taught them to respect. It was a wild and picturesque assembly, that in many respects recalled the meeting of hard, strongfeatured frontiersmen who greeted Their Royal Highnesses at Peshawar. Baluchis, Brahuis, Bugtis, Kakars and Marris, they squatted on rich carpets in the aisles of the cruciform hall with the iron reserve and patience characteristic of these fighting tribes. The Baluchi is said never to wash his garments except for a durbar. When he does he makes as dashing a figure as any to be found in the East. With his voluminous robes falling round his stalwart figure, with a Grecian simplicity, a drooping white turban, his uncut raven locks tumbling over his shoulders in careless profusion, and hawk eyes looking over a hook nose set in a gnarled face, darkened with a flowing beard, he looks what he is, an inhabitant of this wild borderland of rugged mountain and arid plain. Besides these striking figures the sirdars in heavily embroidered surtouts of crimson and lake and russet, despite their Kabul caps and baggy breeches, looked almost tame.

Conspicuous even in this assemblage of what the Americans would call real live men, who paid homage to the Emperor's son with a proud dignity that had not even a trace of servility were the representatives of the forces that keep the peace on the borderland. An essential factor in the Sandeman system was the tribal levy, the policy of making the tribesmen their own police-men, since adopted with conspicuous success in other parts of the North-West Frontier. And when the formal presentations were over, His Royal Highness bestowed sanads upon those who have been deserving well of the Government. No figure challenged more general admiration than the soldierly Subadar-Major of the Zhob Levy Corps, which was raised almost immediately after Sir Frederick Roberts' expedition through the valley. A little later an illustration was given of the character of some of the men who compose these levies. A havildar and two sepoy were called up and the Prince pinned on their breasts the Order of Merit of British India of the third class awarded for conspicuous courage. In a raid on the Shimbaz post, last April, Havildar Hiyatkhan, who was in command, continued fighting, though wounded and by his personal example encouraged his men to continue the defence. Sepoy Ali Jan, when left severely wounded in the lower room in the hands of the raiders at imminent risk of his life, shouted to his comrades in the upper room that the ceiling was being fired and enabled them to extinguish the flames and Sepoy Sultan Khan put out the flames although in so doing he exposed himself to a heavy fire.

The ceremonial over the Hon. Mr. A. L. Tucker, C.I.E., the Agent to the Governor-General, speaking in the vernacular expressed by command the pleasure the Prince of Wales had experienced in meeting the sirdars and his appreciation of the loyal spirit that had brought them from their distant homes to attend the Durbar. With the same state that accompanied the assembly the gathering slowly dissolved.

Englishman.—Among the officials who will assemble in Karachi to formally attend the departure of the Prince and Princess of Wales at the end of the week are: Lord Francis Scott, A.D.C. on behalf of the Viceroy; General B. Duff, Adjutant General; Sir Arthur Fanshawe, Postmaster-General; Mr. H. Stuart, Head of the Criminal Investigation Department; and Mr. V. Gabriel, Under-Secretary, Foreign Office.

Indian Daily News, Quetta, March 12.—The Prince this morning received an address from the Municipal Commissioners of Quetta which was enclosed in a silver casket. The address was presented in the Durbar hall of the Residency, and was read by Major Archer, President of the Municipality. It is stated that about thirty years ago, at a time almost coincident with the visit of the King-Emperor to India, the late Sir Robert Sandeman, whose memory is still cherished by all the people of Baluchistan, entered Quetta to be the founder by peaceful means of a province exceeding in area that of the British Isles. Quetta then consisted of few mud hovels clustered round the Miri inside the fort, with no more than four thousand inhabitants. Soon the country was divided into districts; bloodshed and anarchy gave place to peace and security; the telegraph was extended, and railways were constructed through the Bolan and Hurnai passes. Quetta, which now comprises an area of 769 acres, has taken a leading part in the growth and prosperity of the remaining portion of the province. In 1891 the population had increased to nearly 19,000, and in 1901 had risen to 24,584. The Municipal Committee was constituted in 1896, and funds have been since continually devoted to the improvement of the town which, since the opening of the railway, has become a commercial centre of importance, trade converging on it from Kalat, Seistan, and Southern Afghanistan. Substantial houses have taken the place of mud huts, and the town possesses some fine public buildings, notably the Sandeman Memorial Hall and the recently erected library and museum.

The address continued:—"Since Quetta was established we have been honoured by the visits of no less than four Viceroys, including Lord Curzon, who took so deep an interest in the frontier, and whose departure from India we greatly deplore. History tells us that many of the conquerors of India have passed through this place on their victorious marches between Central Asia and India, and that the renowned Akbar was left here as a child by his father Humayun; but the visits of these sovereigns were merely those of transitory rulers, and it has been reserved for the King-Emperor to do this country the exalted honour of sending his son and heir, accompanied by His Royal consort, to become acquainted with Baluchistan as the permanent portion of his stable Empire. In the wonderful transformation that has taken place we recognise the benign justice of British rule, which affords equal opportunities to all without distinction of caste or creed. Compared with much of what Your Royal Highnesses have seen elsewhere, this rampart of India, Baluchistan, must present a bleak contrast, but although one of the youngest of India's offspring, it is a promising one, and though Your Royal Highnesses may have seen more magnificence, more wealth and more advancement, we humbly beg to assure Your Royal Highnesses that nowhere has His Majesty more loyal and devoted subjects, nor have Your Royal Highnesses a more heartfelt welcome."

The address concluded:—"The tour of Your Royal Highnesses is now almost completed, and we humbly desire to express our thankfulness to Providence for having watched over Your Royal Highnesses' progress. We pray that Your Royal Highnesses may be restored in health and safety to your august father and to the children from whom you have been separated for so long a time."

Picturesque without being garish and relieved by an interesting incident from ceremonial dullness was the Durbar which the Prince held this afternoon, when he received the Sirdars, Maliks and Motabirs of Baluchistan in the Sandeman Memorial Hall. This hall, though small, has a dozen domes, and its design is strongly Saracenic. From narrow galleries with arched openings you look down on a floor which is a cross. This afternoon the cross was filled with shaggy-haired Baluchis for the most part turbaned with coils of white cloth, their white garments covered with heavy poshtuns more or less embroidered. Men of remarkable physique, their bearing was extraordinarily dignified as they knelt rather than squatted on the floor. At the head of the cross sat the Prince with the Khan of Khelat and the Jam of Lasbela on his right, the Agent to the Governor-General, the Hon'ble Mr. Tucker, Sir Walter Lawrence, and Major-General Smith-Dorrien on his left, with the members of his suite and a mass of British officers behind. The Princess watched the proceedings from one of the galleries. The Durbar having been formally opened, the Agent to the Governor-General presented the Khan of Khelat and the Jam of Lasbela, each of whom tendered the homage of his sword. The Political Agents afterwards presented the Sirdars, Maliks and Motabirs of their districts in turn. The most interesting incident came next when the Prince presented sanads or certificates of recently bestowed titles to eight of the Sirdars for notable services, Bangal Khan Jonazai, who belongs to the elder or Ishak Kabul branch of the Jomezai tribe of Zhob, already held the title of Sardar Bahadur for services rendered to the Baluch-Afghan Boundary Commission eleven years ago, and received from His Royal Highness the title of Nawab for services with the recent Seistan Arbitration Commission. Shahzada Mahammed Ismail, a direct descendant of Shah Shuja, a former Amir of Afghanistan, was given the title of Khan Bahadur for loyal and excellent services in the Zhob Levy Corps, of which he is the Resaldar-Major. The sanad of Khan Bahadur was presented to Mir Azim Khan, the head of the Chourozai section of the Shikhrani tribe, in recognition of his loyal service and influence over his tribe. Mehrab Khan Bugti, the eldest son of the Bugti Chief, accompanied the Seistan Commission, and his reward was the title of Sirdar Bahadur. Mir Alam Khan received the title of Khan Sahib in recognition of his influence over the Mengal tribe, and for special services as Thanadar of the levy post of Saruna. Mir Mian Khan, the eldest son and heir of the Kerd Chief, is responsible for the safety of the Bolan Pass; the excellent discharge of this duty has been rewarded by the conferment of the title of Khan Sahib. A similar title has been bestowed upon Mouladad Khan, Mani Khel Gbilzai, the Native Assistant to the Transport Registration Officer, No. 6 Circle, Quetta, for services in connection with the Baluch-Afghan Boundary and Seistan Commissions and the Somaliland Expedition. Qazi Fakir Ahmad received the title of Khan Sahib for long and loyal service, especially with the Durand Mission to Kabul, the Baluch-Afghan Boundary Commission, Saraca-Major Brazier Creagh's Mission to Seistan, Major Shores' expedition to Mekran and Persian Beluchistan, and with the Seistan Arbitration Commission.

The sanads having been presented, the Prince in turn decorated Havildar Hayat Khan and sepoy Ali Khan and Sultan Khan of the Zhob Levy Corps with the medals of the third class of the military division of the Indian Order of Merit for conspicuous gallantry during an attack by raiders on Shimbo's post on April 26th, 1905. Havildar Hayat Khan was in command of the post and continued fighting, though wounded, and encouraged the men by his personal example. Sepoy Ali Khan was left severely wounded in a lower room in the hands of the raiders and at the risk of his life shouted to his comrades on the upper floor that the raiders were setting fire to the ceiling; he thus enabled them to extinguish the fire. Sepoy Sultan Khan was on sentry duty when the raiders attacked the post and put out a fire in the floor of the upper storey by digging away the flooring, thus exposing himself to a heavy fire from below.

The Prince in pinning the medals upon the breasts of these men, warmly complimented each of them; thereafter the Durbar was formally closed, His Royal Highness first requesting the Agent to the Governor-General to express to the Sirdars, Maliks and Motabirs, his great pleasure at having been able to meet so many of them and his appreciation of the trouble many of them had taken in coming long distances for that gathering. These remarks uttered on the inspiration of the moment were conveyed to the notables by the Hon'ble Mr. Tucker, who addressed them in Urdu.

In driving to the Sandeman Hall and in returning to the Residency, Their Royal Highnesses followed the route through the town which should have been taken on Saturday on the occasion of their arrival. The route passed through the compound of the Quetta Club, and here and at other points along the road numbers of people were gathered, the roads being lined by the Royal Garrison Artillery, the Welsh and Warwick Regiments, and by the Zho band Mekran Levy Corps. The guard-of-honour outside the Sandeman Hall was furnished by the Warwicks. Afterwards the Sirdars were entertained, the arrangements for this being managed by a committee which included the Revenue Commissioner and the Political Officers.

Irish Times.—The tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales in India is drawing to a close. Their Royal Highnesses have been absent from England for close upon six months, and they have filled in their time by getting into the most personal relations with native life in the East. They have been shown the resources and the strength of British power, not only in the great cities of India but upon the frontier as well, and they have been given evidence of the strength of the ties which bind the native population to the Throne. From Bombay, at which spot Their Royal Highnesses first set foot upon Indian soil, to Quetta, which is being honoured with their presence at the present time, is a far cry, but the guiding motive of our rule in each locality is the same. Whether we are dealing with ordered communities which occasionally come into conflict the one with the other, as is the case in Bombay, or whether upon the frontier, the Administration is engaged in the difficult task of restraining the tribesmen from falling upon one another. British rule holds all men equal in the eyes of the law. It is the impartiality with which the law is administered which has convinced the bulk of the native population that there is no alternative to British domination in India. We have had to take severe measures to repress frontier risings from time to time, and in the result those who lent themselves to the revolt have been driven to admit that British intervention not only was necessary but imperative. Thirty years ago Quetta, to-day one of the outposts of the Empire, was a collection of tumble-down forts. The Prince of Wales, in his reply yesterday to the address of welcome presented by the Municipality, was entitled to express his surprise at the progress which had been made by Quetta. Apart from other considerations, the fact must not be lost to sight that in regard to Western Afghanistan Quetta occupies in many respects a strategical position analogous to that which Peshawar occupies in regard to Eastern Afghanistan. One may hazard the opinion that under some Powers a post like Quetta would not exhibit the signs of social and of commercial activity which are exhibited by this military bulwark. We should say that not the least interesting of the experiences of Their Royal Highnesses in India will centre around their stay in Quetta, and that these will enable them to appreciate not only the virility of British rule in the East, but the sure foundations upon which that rule is built.

Madras Mail.—London, February 23.—Lord Lansdowne, a former Viceroy of India, speaking in the House of Lords in reference to the King's speech, said that only those who have lived in India and mixed with the people of that country could appreciate the intense respect and devotion with which the Sovereign of the Empire, and those closely connected with him, were regarded there by all races and creeds.

Lord Ripon, a former Viceroy of India, replying, remarked:—"Lord Lansdowne knows India as well as I do. I know how deep is the respect and attachment of her people towards the Crown. When I was there few things were remarked more vividly and with greater pleasure by the Princes and peoples than the visit of our present Sovereign. That feeling continues and will be extended by the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales."

Mr. Chamberlain, in the House of Commons, observed:—"We all know how the personal link of the Crown is of the utmost importance in connection with the Government of the great dependency of India. I rejoice to think that the visit has been an entire success."

At the opening of the new Convocation of Canterbury, the Primate presiding, the Upper House adopted an Address to the King, in which, having referred to the strengthening bonds of loyalty and affection attaching the Colonies to the Mother-country and His Majesty's Throne by the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to the Colonies, proceeded to express the belief that similar blessing would attend the visit to India which is now greeting Their Royal Highnesses with characteristic splendour, and that the people of that vast land might steadily advance in all true welfare, and in concord with one another and in united loyalty to His Majesty.

Mr. George Made, the sculptor, is commissioned to execute a statue of the Prince of Wales, to be erected in Bombay to commemorate the Royal visit to India.

Times.—Quetta, March 12.—The story of the rapid development of Quetta was unfolded in the municipal address presented to the Prince of Wales to-day. It told how, when Quetta passed into the possession of the British, the town consisted of a few mud hovels clustered round a mud fort. Now it embraces a population of 25,000 with a rapidly expanding trade with Afghanistan, Khelat, and Seistan.

After the municipal ceremony the Prince received visits from the Khan of Khelat and the Jam of Las Bela, and in the afternoon held a durbar, which was attended by all the Sirdars of Baluchistan. They met in the hall which commemorates the work of Sir Robert Sandeman—a picturesque gathering, recalling an assembly of frontiersmen at Peshawar. Baluchis, Maris, Bugtis and Kakars squatted on the floor in flowing costumes, their uncut hair tumbling over their shoulders, men of splendid physique and strongly marked character.

When they had paid their homage there followed an incident illustrating how peace is maintained among these wild peoples. A havidar and two sepoy of the Zhoob Levy Corps were presented with the Order of Merit for gallantry in resisting a raid on the Shinbaz post in April last.

14TH MARCH 1900.

Daily Chronicle.—The Royal tour in India is probably marked by the giving of many presents, a delightful privilege of Royalty that always savours of the land of fairy tales, exercised though it is in a prosaic age. But the King's gift has lost much of its ancient spontaneity nowadays, and the witty courtier is no longer rewarded on the instant by the chain from a Monarch's neck, or a purse of gold from his hand. It is not so long, though, since this kind of gift was still made. An excellent story is told of Dominico, the celebrated harlequin, who, dining one day with Louis XIV, fixed his eyes covetously on a dish of partridges. "Give that dish to Dominico," said the King, hospitably. "And the partridges, too, Sire?" said the incorrigible Dominico. The dish, as it happened, was of gold.

Indian Daily News.—Quetta, March 13.—Last night the Quetta Bazaar was illuminated, and a display of fireworks takes place to-day. The Prince returned the visit of the Khan of Khelat. A dinner and reception will be held at the Residency to-night.

After the visit to the Khan of Khelat the Prince and Princess accompanied by General Smith-Dorrien, went out at noon by train to Balali, eight miles from Quetta, to inspect the defences.

The Prince and Princess returned to Quetta from Balali about 6-30. During the excursion they ascended a hill from which a splendid view of the country was obtained. The military aspects of the position which commands the points of approach were explained by General Smith-Dorrien.

Times.—Our relations with the semi-independent tribes of Baluchistan, whose chiefs were on Monday received in Durbar by the Prince of Wales, constituted, when we first brought this region within our sphere of influence, a political problem of scarcely less difficulty than that still presented by our relations with the Pathan tribes in the region of Peshawar. It was solved practically and there is every reason to believe permanently by the genius of one great frontier officer, Sir Robert Sandeman, who, by a rare combination of firmness, patience, and justice, succeeded in winning the confidence of the Baluch tribesmen and securing their allegiance on equitable terms to an unaccustomed régime of peace and lawful order. He was helped, no doubt, to some extent by the constitution of tribal society in Baluchistan, which has always been organized on a more aristocratic basis than amongst the Pathans. Though the Afridi tribes have their maliks, in those essentially democratic communities the influence wielded by the headmen is apt to be merely nominal, or at least depends more upon their personality than upon their office. The Baluch chiefs, on the contrary, exercised real power, and it proved naturally easier to negotiate with them than it does with an Afridi jirgah of some two thousand tribesmen, with whom it is often a case of quot capita, tot sententia. The Khan of Khelat, for instance, who claims descent from a freed man of Ali, the fourth Khalif, whose family afterwards came over from Arabia to Sind with the first Mussulman invaders of India more than a thousand years ago, was generally recognized as the head of the old Baluch Confederacy by the great majority of the Baluch Sirdars, though the Jam of Las Bela, also reputed to be of ancient Arab extraction, proved at times rather a dangerous rival, and the Chief of Kharan, as the head of the Nausherwani tribe, once enjoyed an almost dominant prestige, especially in Western Baluchistan. It was Purdil Khan, an ancestor of the present Chief of Kharan, who is said to have slain Ashraf Khan when he fled before Nadir Shah from Kandahar, and to have taken the Koh-i-Nur diamond from his dead body. These three chiefs, together with the rest of the Baluch Sirdars, are now loyal vassals of the British Crown, and, though British Baluchistan, or that portion of Baluchistan which is subject to direct British administration, forms only a very small part of the whole of Baluchistan, the restraining influence of the paramount Power, represented by a mere handful of Englishmen, makes itself felt as surely throughout the length and breadth of this wild and sparsely-populated country as in the immediate neighbourhood of Quetta. The secret of Sir Robert Sandeman's success with the Baluchis, as of the slower and more partial success achieved under Lord Curzon's administration in dealing with the Afridis, lay in reconciling with the respect we must enforce for our superior conceptions of law and order, the consideration we owe to the ancient customs and traditions and tribal methods of self-government of a primitive but virile race.

16TH MARCH 1906.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—Quetta, March 14.—The Military manœuvres which were to take place to-day were abandoned early in the week, and the day has been left free except for a visit to the lines of the Welsh Regiment, where the Prince and Princess lunch with the officers. At midnight to-night they leave Quetta for Chaman, within sight of the Afghan Frontier, where to-morrow morning the Prince presents colours to the 127th Baluch Light Infantry.

This morning, the Prince, at the request of the Hon. Mr. Tucker, planted a hawthorn tree in the compound of the Residency on the spot where Sir Robert Sandeman first pitched his tent in Quetta, thirty years ago. The interesting little ceremony took place quite privately.

The 127th Baluch Light Infantry, to whom the Prince of Wales presents new colours at Chaman, were raised in Karachi in 1844 by Sir Charles Napier, at the first Baluch Regiment. The Corps served during the Mutiny from March 1857 to May 1859 and took part in the siege of Delhi and the storming of the Kashmir Gate. It has the distinction of being the only regiment of the Western Command which fought at the siege of Delhi.

It afterwards served in the campaigns of Rohilkhand and Oodh. Despatched to Africa, the Regiment served in Abyssinia from 1867 to 1869 and was present at the capture of Magdala. A Regimental souvenir of this campaign is a fine Coptic cross, one of the four taken at Magdala, and presented to the Corps by Lord Napier. After Abyssinia the regiment served in Afghanistan in 1881 and five years later was despatched to Burma where it remained for three years till 1889. Eight years ago it went to British East Africa returning to India after a year in the Protectorate and in Uganda, where it was engaged in the suppression of the Soudanese Mutiny. Detachments of the Regiment served also with the 2nd Baluch Regiment in Egypt in 1882, and with the 3rd Baluch Regiment in China from 1900 to 1902. The force which operated in Mekan and stormed Nodiz Fort five years ago was mainly composed of the 127th Baluchis.

Chaman, March 15.—Entraining last night at Quetta Their Royal Highnesses accompanied by the Hon. Mr. Tucker, Agent to the Governor-General, and General Smith-Dorrien, arrived this morning at New Chaman, the terminus of the North-West Frontier Railway and distant only fifty-seven miles from Kandahar. During the night they were carried along the northern face of the Tokatu range by Bostan and across the Pishin plateau to Gulistan, and after passing through the Killa Abdulla for nearly eleven miles up the spurs of the Kwaja Aman, the train early this morning entered the famous Khejsh tunnel. Two and-a-half miles long, the tunnel cost sixty-eight and-a-quarter lakhs to build. From the middle of the tunnel the line descends by a devious route for seventeen miles to New Chaman, where the Royal train arrived at 8-30. The return journey this afternoon will afford a sight of the country passed through in the night.

The formal reception of Their Royal Highnesses took place about ten o'clock. The Prince and Princess were received by the Political Agent of Quetta-Pishin, and his assistant, and the Achkynar Malik and Motabins were gathered on the platform. The guard of honour was inspected and Their Royal Highnesses thereafter drove straight to the parade ground, where the ceremony of presenting colours to the 127th Baluch Light Infantry took place.

Standard.—Let us suppose, by a long stretch of fancy, that we are living in the year 2106, and that the Japanese, taking advantage of the dissensions and divisions among the Western nations, had become the masters of the greater part of Europe including the British Isles. Let us conceive ourselves in Wales in this hypothetical period. The Principality is inhabited by two and-a-half millions of people, speaking Welsh and English, as they do to-day. There are schools for both races, just as there are at present, there are newspapers in the two languages, there are landowners of Norman blood, and there are Celtic tenant farmers paying rent to them; there are Methodist ministers, Church of England parsons, and an Anglican bishop still drawing the modest revenues of St. Asaph; there are tax-collectors and revenue officers, not distinguishable from those who are even now discharging their honourable functions; Welsh or English judges will be deciding cases in the local courts, barristers and attorneys, mostly Welsh, will be arguing before them; Welsh miners will be hewing coal in the Rhondda Valley, enterprising financiers from London will be making money out of the ores of Swansea and the cargoes of Cardiff. There is a Japanese regiment at Chester, and a cruiser flying the chrysanthemum flag is guardship off the Severn. But beyond a few traders there are no Japanese residents at all, save and except a Mr. Hayashi or a Mr. Inaga, who is the Chief administrative officer of the province with a couple of young Japanese assistants, a Japanese police-commandant, and a Japanese Chief Judge. Imagine, further, Mr. Hayashi or Mr. Inaga ruling from an extremely modest country house somewhere in the mountain valleys, and that he has no Parliament or Local Assembly to control him, but receives his orders direct from the Mikado's Cabinet at Tokio, or from a Japanese "Government of Europe," with its seat at, say, Vienna. Imagine all this, and you get something rather like the miraculous condition of things which prevails in British India at this moment of writing.

And if anyone says that this is a mere fancy picture, I can point him to a district in Southern India which is not much smaller than Wales, with a nearly equal population, where the inhabitants are of two races as different from ourselves as either Englishmen or Welshmen are from Japanese, with their temples, their priests, their religious systems, their schools, their vernacular newspapers, with all which things we practically do not interfere at all; where there is no British military force within a much greater distance than that which separates Chester from any part of Wales; where all the police, the revenue collectors, the minor civil officials, and the subordinate judges are natives of India; and where there are not more than half a dozen Europeans, all told, to assist the English gentleman, who has a chuprassi or two and a few policemen about him, as the only external signs of that authority under which the entire district rests, in perfect order, peace, security, and apparent content. He is 36 years of age; he draws about the salary of a county court judge at home; he lives in a bungalow, which looks shabby compared to that of the adjacent wealthy native landowner; and he takes his instructions from a centre of government which he can only reach by a day and a night's travelling in a train that in India would be called fast.

Those who think that India is a country in which a horde of foreign officials "batten" upon the natives should look at the actual figures. They will find that the "horde" is one of amazing smallness. It is hard to believe when out of India—it is harder to believe when there—that the Indian Civil Service comprises little more than a thousand persons. "Including military officers in civil employ," says Sir John Strachey, "and others, about 1,200 Englishmen are employed in the civil government of 232 millions of people, and, in the partial control of 62 millions more." On the average there are only four members of the ruling race for every million of its subjects. Bureaucratic administration has surely never been exercised with a stricter economy in the higher grades of service. We might have filled India with a swarm of officials of our own blood, conferring upon them every place of any importance in all the departments. But we use our Englishman in India with parsimonious thrift. We engage him only for a few superior posts, leaving him to conduct the actual management of the country, its revenue system, its defence, its finances, its police, its justice, by means of whole armies of natives. India is a Government of Indians under British direction. You need not to go out into the rural districts to see the provincial ruler at work, with perhaps two European assistants, perhaps one, and his corps of native dependents, to understand what that means in practice.

The unit of Indian administration is the District; and the man who matters is its chief, the District Magistrate,—the Collector, as he is called in some provinces, the Deputy Commissioner in others. He is the regimental officer of the Indian service, and on him, much more than on Lieutenant-Governors and Members of Council, and even Viceroy's efficiency of the whole vast machine depends. He tramps through the mud, and does the hard work: lives in camp most of the winter, fries and bakes in the summer, and simmers and stews during the rains. The Councils and the Secretariats escape to Simla, or Ootacamund, or some other pleasant hill-station, to perform their intellectual labours during the hot season; but the Head of the district works away on the plains except when he is lucky enough to be absent on leave.

Within his own area of jurisdiction, which may be as large as Kent or Yorkshire, or larger still in the south, the Collector is a monarch, rather of the personal than the constitutional type. He is himself responsible for the behaviour of his million or so of subjects; he has to see that the laws are carried out, that the police do their duty, that the revenue is punctually gathered in: to supervise his string of native deputy collectors, assistant commissioners, tehsildars, naibs, patwaris, and the rest, down to the village headmen. Prisons, schools, roads, railways, canals, dispensaries, famine, plague, epidemics, the state of the farms, the progress of trade and commerce, the social condition of the people—in all these he is constantly and practically interested. He is judge as well as governor; he should be a lawyer as well as an administrator and accountant, and he ought to know something of land surveying, of irrigation, of agriculture and stock-breeding, of sanitary science and engineering. And on all these subjects and many others he must be prepared, at short notice, to write with fluency and intelligence.

To his people the District Officer is the Government, in corporeal form. For the villager, Parliament, the Cabinet, the Secretary of State have no existence; the King-Emperor is a dim, mysterious shape in another planet; the Great Lord Sahib and the Governor are far away, inaccessible potencies; even the Commissioner is too remote. But the Head of the District they know; they see him in the flesh, when he goes his rounds, in the camping season, or when they themselves sit outside his cutcherry to proffer a petition. The aspiring small landowner, who thinks that his family importance entitles him to be placed on the provincial darbar list, the official who believes that he has been unjustly denied his promotion, the tradesman who hopes for a Government contract, the village headman who has a complaint to make against the Public Works Department for an insufficient supply of irrigation water—all these and many others appeal in writing or by word of mouth to the Huzoor, the Presence who is to them the personal representative of the beneficently despotic Sirkar. He sits outside his tent, or on his verandah, or in his dusty little office, and hears, judges, condemns, admonishes, awards praise or punishment, makes notes, reproves the petitioners, or promises to have their cases further considered. It is government as they understand it in the East: the Cadi under the palm-tree, with modern improvements.

And the Cadi for the most part is no more than a very average fairly well-educated, intelligent Briton. He is not, of course, as a rule either a genius or a hero. Some people write of him as if he were necessarily both. The visitor to India, with his literary and historical recollections upon him, may confess to a faint feeling of disappointment when he comes in due course to make the acquaintance of the rulers of India in situ. I suppose the race of the Lawrences, the Herbert Edwardeses, the Nicholsons, the Taylors, the Sleemans, is not extinct. But the ordinary civilian, as you meet him, though an excellent fellow, does not perhaps strike you as the silent, strong man, masterful but kindly, self-devoted, yet unbending, for whom you have been looking.

Such men there are, such you will even find in the course of a hasty peregrination. But the majority are only average persons, much like their fathers, brothers, and cousins in rectories, college, common-rooms, and public offices at home. For myself I confess that the young civilian fell a little below my expectations, just as the young officer of the native army, and even the young police superintendent, rose rather above them. One has been taught to believe the soldier "stupid," the policeman perfunctory: but I do not think that in brains and character they rank far behind the competition-wallah. A man may pass a moderately stiff examination, and write I. C. S. after his name without changing his nature. The civilian has the ordinary faults, the ordinary virtues. His outlook is often limited; he is sometimes pedantic, conceited, and too complacently official; but he belongs to a service which brings out some of his best qualities and mitigates his worst—a service which has a tradition of hard work, self-reliance, and absolute, irrefragable, untainted integrity. And the training of the Districts is like that of His Majesty's ships: it makes or breaks the subjects. If the young civilian is gifted with the elements of strength, resourcefulness, judgment, and knowledge of human nature, he is developed and improved by the splendid responsibilities of the magistracy, till he is fit for even greater things. But if not, he is quietly removed from the Executive deck, and put to office work in the Secretariat, or turned into a Sessions Judge, or given some other employment in which ability and industry may compensate for some lack of decision and temper.

But are they better or worse than their predecessors? How do they compare with the men of the pre-Mutiny and pre-competition days, and those who inherited the traditions of that period? These are questions to which diverse answers will be given, and on them it is not easy to come to a definite conclusion. Some of the elder generation of officials are altogether unfavorable to the men of the new order. In old-fashioned Anglo-Indian society and in the Indian clubs there are dolorous headshakings over the social shortcomings of the younger civilians. Many of them, it is whispered, are not "gentlemen," but clever lads who have worked their way up, with scholarships and exhibitions, from the board schools and grammar schools to the Universities and the high places in the Civil Service Commissioners' list. "Why, sir, the son of my father's gamekeeper is Collector of my old District," says the indignant veteran; and you are bidden to observe that the natives have the keenest sense for social distinctions, they know one kind of sahib from another, and they dislike rulers of plebeian origin. But in these democratic days the gamekeeper's son has "come to stay;" and if, besides having the wit and industry to pass high in the examination, he also happens to have rowed in his college boat or got his blue, if he is a good sportsman and a good fellow, manly, capable, and well-mannered, perhaps even the astute Oriental may not detect his disabilities of birth. So far it does not seem that the new system has filled the I.C.S. with "smugs," or weaklings or persons too unpunished to hold their own in the cultured society of an Indian cantonment.

It is also alleged that the latter-day civilians know less of native life and the condition of the country than their forerunners. There is something in that, too. One is often told that they are not nearly so well acquainted with the vernacular; but the suggestion is probably quite incorrect. The older official had a rough knowledge of the colloquial speech of his province, picked up from his servants and his native subordinates, but he had seldom studied the language and grammar as the young officials and officers are now compelled to do.

On the other hand, I dare say it is true that he was better acquainted with his district and its people. Facilities of communication, here as everywhere else, have worked their effects. The official of the days when John Company Bahadur ruled, and long after, was more closely rooted to the soil of Asia than his successor. The voyage to Europe was long and costly; the civilian did not look forward to taking it more than once or twice during his whole term of service. India was his home; and he knew that if he did not leave his bones there he would at any rate not often get away from the country in twenty, thirty, or forty years. But now, when the voyage is an affair of a fortnight, people are constantly taking it. Anglo-Indian is always on the move, flitting backwards and forwards. Many of the ladies get home every season; plenty of the men can contrive a holiday in England—or in France, Italy, or Switzerland—once in about three years. Europe is no longer a remote region, from which only faint echoes reach the exile. Modern Indian society is closely in touch with the West; it has read the new books, seen the new plays, kept itself in the current of politics, sports, and amusement.

The change is in many ways beneficial. The Anglo-Indian is, physically and morally, the healthier for it. It saves his liver, and keeps him from sinking down into the crude provincialism which Thackeray drew with savage veracity in the person of Jos Sedley. The original of the Collector of Boglewallah exists no longer. But the new arrangement has its drawbacks too. The Anglo-Indian is thinking "Europe" all the time, and even the civilian is a lodger, a mere transient visitor, in his district, who will not stay in it long enough to know it with the ancient intimacy. Something has had to be paid for the swift steamers, the rapid mails, the telegrams, the railways to the hills, the frequent holidays, which has robbed the life of the Englishman in India of some of its former terrors.—(SINCE LOW.)

17TH MARCH 1906.

Birmingham Daily Post.—There is some likelihood, I am told, that the King will welcome the Prince and Princess of Wales back from their long Indian visit at some port in the Mediterranean. No announcement can be made at this stage, but it would cause no surprise in quarters likely to know if Malta were chosen for this rendezvous. The departure of the Prince and Princess from Quetta to-day marks the virtual termination of their tour. The homeward voyage in the Renown from Karachi to Suez will enable Their Royal Highnesses to secure some much-needed rest and they are said to be looking forward with much eagerness to their projected stay in Cairo, for which event much preparation is already in progress, both in the official and in the social world. Should the weather in England a month hence prove uncertain, the Prince and Princess may make a halt upon the Mediterranean littoral, or may even return in the Renown through the Straits and across the Bay of Biscay, with the object of acclimating themselves more gradually to the changed conditions of temperature.

Globe.—A "Times" telegram from the Royal camp at Quetta states that the Prince of Wales, during his visit to Chaman, "inspected the arrangements for the rapid assembly of troops there and for the extension of the railway to Quetta." As Chaman is on the British side of the frontier, and has had railway connection with the Indian network of transport for a considerable period, the Ameer has always recognised the right of the Indian Government to make whatever arrangements it deems necessary for the strengthening of this outpost. But it is the extension of the line to Kandahar that stands on an entirely different footing. Habiboolah Khan has from the first refused permission for its construction a single yard beyond the boundary dividing off Afghanistan from India, and it will surprise us greatly if he has withdrawn, either formally or informally, from that nonpossumus attitude.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—Quetta, March 15th.—Chaman means a meadow, and in the middle of the meadow is the railway. The fort, the railway station and the bit of town are dumped down in the middle of a saucer rimmed by low hills. You step out of the little station, bright this morning with pretty red cloth and behind you lie the snow-fringed Kwaja Amran heights pierced by the Khojak tunnel. In front lie the low bare hills of Afghanistan. The brown mud fort is a mile away, and another mile beyond is the line of white eteops marking the border. Spin Bwidocks, the first of the Afghan forts on the road to Kandahar, lies an advanced hillock like a heap of mud in a top corner of the meadow. Beside the British fort is the mobilization camp. The meadow is dotted with red water tanks ranged short of the frontier line. The telegraph wire ends abruptly, and along the railway are piled the stores for the future advance of the railhead. Two engines stand in a siding waiting always with steam up. It was to this advanced outpost of Empire the Prince and Princess came this morning. The mildness of spring was in the air; along the well-made station roads almond trees were in glorious blossom and streamers and arches brightened the knot of low-roofed buildings which have sprung up in the seventeen years since New Chaman was occupied primarily. Their Royal Highnesses came for the presentation of new colours to the 127th Baluch Regiment, and the ceremony was as picturesque as any of the similar ceremonials that the Prince has undertaken in India. In the circumstances surrounding it the occasion had a significance and a distinction entirely its own. Now guardians of the frontiers on the high road of Empire, the Regiment which alone of the battalions of the Western Command proudly wears the Shumla for Delhi, paraded to receive its highest honour and the emblems of its highest trust from the hands of the Shahzada, the first heir of his line to gaze northward towards the passes along which conquerors have marched upon India. The tide of conquest rolls south no longer; the son of the white Badshah looks north, and behind the lines of dark-faced infantrymen rise the spirals of smoke from the engines always ready. Red breeched and dark tuniced, the battalion stands smartly and moves with precision to the words of ceremonial command. Men of splendid physique, they are, Baluchi and Brahui, Orakzai and Afridi, Adam Khel, trans-frontier Yuzufzais, cis-frontier Mohmands and Punjabi Mahomdians, set warders of the borderland. The Prince and Princess stood, by the saluting base with General Smith-Dorrien, the Hon. Mr. Tucker, General Beatson, Colonel Young and other members of the staff in attendance. The old colours' inscribed with the names of Delhi, Abyssinia, Afghanistan, Burma and British East Africa were paraded to the strains of Auld Lang Syne and carried reverently to the rear while the band played the Regimental melodies "Georgia" and the Old Folks at Home. The drums having been piled and the new colours placed upon them the banners were uncased by Major Mennie and Major Soarby, who in turn handed them to the Prince. His Royal Highnesses presented each colour to a native officer who received it on bended knee.

The Prince then addressed the battalion as follows:—

Colonel Even, officers, non-commissioned officers and men of the 127th Baluch Light Infantry,—Since the days when your Regiment was raised by Sir Charles Napier, more than 60 years ago, it has rendered gallant and devoted services to its Sovereign and Empire not only in India but across the seas in Africa, Burma and the Far East. The names of your campaigns are displayed on the colours which I have great pleasure in presenting to you. They are a sign of your duty to your King-Emperor and country, and also a record of those actions in which your predecessors have upheld the honour of the Regiment. For such reasons you rightly venerate them, and upon them take your oaths of allegiance. May you ever be guided by the noble traditions which they betoken, and should you again be called to active service may victory attend you. I am certain that the colours will remain safe in your keeping."

General Beatson thereafter, in a loud voice, read an Urdu translation of the speech to the Regiment.

Colonel G. E. Even, Commanding the Battalion, in replying to Royal Highness said:—

"I desire on behalf of the British Officers, Native Officers, Non-Commissioned Officers, and men of the 17th Baluch Light Infantry to express our cordial appreciation of the great kindness you have shown us in thus coming down to Chaman, one of the furthest outposts on the border of the Indian Empire and presenting the Regiment with new colours to-day. The 15th March will always be "a red-letter day" in the annals of the battalion, and their new colours which have just been thus graciously confided to our charge at the hands of your Royal Highness, and made doubly precious thereby, will be as loyally cherished and devotedly guarded in the future service of the King-Emperor as in days gone by have been those old emblems of loyalty and devotion which have to-day passed from our keeping. I beg to assure your Royal Highness that we are deeply sensible of, and value to the utmost, the great honour which has been conferred on us to-day, and on behalf of all ranks to respectfully wish your Royal Highness happiness, health and long life."

The colours having been borne to the ranks with due state-lines, the Prince and Princess inspected the regiment, and the ceremonial came to an end. Thereafter, escorted by a detachment of the Sind Horse, Their Royal Highnesses drove past the bazaar, decorated with carpets and Afghan cloths, to the British fort, and saw the frontier line. On the British side of the boundary were caravan encampments, mud huts built by traders and used as halting shelters, with a few camels beside them; across the boundary a few Afghan nomads had pitched three or four white tents and around them a flock of sheep and goats were grazing. The Prince and Princess were shown the mobilization camp, and were afterwards conveyed by trolleys along the line to the Commissariat sheds and were shown the stocks of railway stores on the lineside. Their Royal Highnesses began the return journey to Quetta about noon.

Before the departure the Achakzai Maliks and Motabirs were presented to Their Royal Highnesses at the station, and a Mutiny veteran, who was one of the first recruits of the 127th Baluchis, and fought at Delhi, was also presented. The Prince and Princess manifested great interest in the features of the country in returning to Quetta and trolled behind the train from Shelabag, at the mouth of the Khojak tunnel, to Killa Abdulla at the foot of Kwaja Amran. Their Royal Highnesses reached Quetta shortly after six. They leave for Karachi at ten to-morrow morning.

Morning Post.—From Mysore we started upon our last great zigzag across India, which is to cover some four thousand five hundred miles in taking us to the port of departure which is but a quarter of that distance to the north of us. Once more we shall pass though in an opposite direction through the United Provinces and the Punjab, across which two months ago the dusty train took us. Meanwhile we are leaving the south, the wonderful South of India, without having seen the least fragment of its treasures, without having had so much as a glimpse of those marvellous temples which are its especial glory and which go so far, if not to make intelligible, at least magnificently to illuminate that all-embracing theism of the Hindu, "humorous, amorous, obscene, subtle, and refined." The answer, doubtless, is that we went to Mysore and have come to Hyderabad for sport and not to make acquaintance with the mind of India; but even so adequate a reason cannot eliminate one's regrets. For here in the south we were away from all the "show" places and off the main tracks of the trotter. We were in touch with the real thing, with the great fanes which are still a part of the life of the people, as none of the beautifully-preserved antiquities we have visited can quite be said to be.

Sport at Mysore hardly fulfilled expectations, but it provided one amusing incident which was distantly related to the khedda drive. Coming back to Mysore one evening along the road which led out to the scene of the drive, when the warm scent of the mangroves was dying out in the night dew and the white trees, amid whose jasmine-scented azalea-like blossoms the sunbirds, like jewelled shuttles, had flitted all day, were a mere ghostly dimness, the acetylene glare in front of the motor became thick with dust, and the driver threw out his clutch and listened for the throb of the engine which he imagined must be in front of him. Not a sound came, however, to suggest another car on the road, and suspecting dust-devil he ran on again into the murk of it. The dust grew denser, and just as the lamps were becoming useless between their thick, milky cones of light appeared a huge dark, lurching mass, which a jerk of the lamps showed to be the hinder parts of an elephant. Surprise and habit tightened the driver's fingers on his horn and as the hooter blared behind him the elephant, instead of turning to trample on the car, as the driver, alarmed at his unpremeditated rashness, expected flung back over his shoulder a terrified bellow, and undulating monstrously from side to side, plunged down the road at an undignified gallop, his great haunches quivering, and his big pads meeting the road like the beats of a piston. Whether he took the hoot of the syren for the hoarse voice of some infuriated female of his species whom he was anxious to avoid, or for that of some new and dreadful beast with eyes of fire and a throat of brass, he was so flurried, that in his desire to escape it, he took the only course that could keep him in his path, and for three miles went straight along the road at a speed that would have shocked a Surrey magistrate, filling the dust churned up behind him with outraged howlings, with the motor hard upon his heels. Amusing as the experience was, there is something incongruous in motoring through an Indian jungle in search of game, and one suspects that the failure of so promising a district to provide the Prince with sport may have been due to the noise and the taint of the number of motors that not only took the Royal party to the khedda but continued to run daily between it and Mysore. Were that the cause one would regret it less than any other, since all such luxurious facilities, especially where the quarry is worth adventure, have a tendency to rob the title of sportsman of all its old honourable implication of hardihood.

From the blank covers of Mysore we went north-east to that small space of British territory in the centre of the State which was assigned to us when Mysore was restored to its native ruler. The journey is typical of the joys of travel in Southern India; our express special, which had to make no stops for passengers or baggage, doing the journey of eighty-five miles, down hill in six and a-half, and up in seven and a-half hours, an average over the double journey of twelve miles an hour for fourteen hours. One hastens to add that there are better lines in the Deccan, the "Poona Special" of the Great Indian Peninsula which picked us up at Guntakal, and will carry us to Benares being, at the price, equal to a comparison with any train in the world, and ahead, save in the matter of speed, of anything that we can show in England. It has a dining car which is a model in effective simplicity of what such cars should be and never are; it cooks you a dinner which is as different from an English train dinner as the dishes of Piccadilly are from those of Peckham; so liberal is its electric lighting that reading is as easy by night as by day; an electric fan is always ready to pour its ministration upon you; it has a window of wooden lattice, a window of wire gauze, a window of smoked and of plain white glass, according as you may wish to keep out the dust or the flies or the glare or the wind. There is a telephone in every one of its corridor compartments, its abundant lavatories include a shower bath and all this on the amplitude of a 5ft. 6in. gauge, without the expenditure of an extra penny, the only practical difference between its two classes, being that four may sleep in a second class and only two in the first. One writes with grateful appreciation because one had said hard things of Indian railways, and the hard things have been deserved. One does not abate a single epithet one has used of them in making one's salaam to the Great Indian Peninsula.

But the Great Indian Peninsula takes one away from Bangalore, while the perplexing question was what took one there, for Bangalore is as utterly bare of objects of interest as Anglo-India can possibly be. It is a cheerful, healthy station, a couple of thousand feet high, whose large Eurasian population advertises its suitability to the European temperament. It has a park, a parade ground, a palace, some tanks, and a bazaar. As a consequence of our visit it has a statue of her late Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria, but even the consequence hardly seemed a sufficiently adequate excuse for our presence. In addition to the unveiling there was a banquet, a garden party, and a presentation of colours and really, coming to think of it, one can imagine nothing more that Anglo-India could have desired. These things may seem inadequate from an Imperial point of view; but though it is easy to acquire Imperial views while the railway wheels grind slowly out the Imperial miles beneath us and Imperial vistas stretch for months from the carriage windows, it is unreasonable to expect the same exaltation from people whose every limitation and inconvenience is a garrulous reminder of what Imperialism costs them. Who can wonder if they consider themselves exempt from any further contributions to it and regard a Royal visit as something on the other side of the account, and the Princely approximation at a garden party, or the brief sublimity of a presentation as their only means of "getting back" on the Imperial idea.

Bangalore complained of the heat, which not only proves how favoured it is, since we were rejoicing in its breezy coolness, but also that if you want to hear the best of a station you must go to a bad one. The gods are adepts at plaguing us with our good fortune.

From Bangalore without having discovered why we had come there, we continued northward to Hyderabad through a country which suggests a Titanic and Saturnian humour. The more southern part of it is astonishingly like the Karoo. If one is not mistaken the resemblance is honestly come by since the Karoo is also the result of a decomposed plateau of iron-stained gneiss. It is thanks to the sage greens and greys, dull creams, russets, and yellow of its little bushes, the more charmingly coloured it is also of course incomparably more arid, but in this month, with the parched water-courses, the rocky hills, the abrupt undulation, the lean scrub and the green mimosa, the resemblance is astonishing. As one passes into the Madras Presidency the resemblance ceases, and for mile on mile the scene suggests only a big brutal indifference to humanity. Rose-coloured rocks, tons in weight, are piled fantastically one above the other. The hills are made of them; loose boulders, one above the other, from the enormous blocks at the base to the pillars and cubes and pyramids perched along the sky line. Often it looks as if a mere touch would send masses the size of a house tumbling headlong from the top to the bottom. And, running along the crests of the ridges like the rough hair on the spine of an angry wolf, strange broad black veins thrusting up their ribbed outcrop above the rose-red rocks, lend to the landscape an indescribably savage and sinister aspect. In that adamantine welter there seems no place for man, no hope for human industry, no opportunity for human strength.

It seems a place in which giants have played and of which giants have tired, leaving these granite blocks which were their playthings flung about in some last fit of bored caprice. Yet men, humble and patient, have scraped the red earth wherever there was room between the stones for a plough to be driven, and the withering greenness of their meagre crops offers for miles the only contrast in colour to the scattered stones of that iron solitude.—(H. F. PROVOST BATTERSBY.)

Queen.—(BY EUSTACE REYNOLDS-BALL, F.R.C.I., F.R.G.S.)—Karachi certainly offers an eloquent testimony to the British

pluck, daring and enterprise. It would at first seem that no commercial port (destined to become the Liverpool of Northern India) could have a more unpromising environment, situated on the edge of the burning arid plain, felicitously termed by Burton the Unhappy Valley—and, indeed, it is the antipodes of Kashmir—with a climate which is an alternation of Siberia and the Sahara. To add to these drawbacks there was great scarcity of water, and an unruly, if sparse, population.

The plague hit Karachi hard, it is in a measure endemic; it periodically dies away and revives each year. It checked the place seriously. The streets of the native town are, as is usual in Indian cities, thronged of an evening, "but in the early days before panic toned down to apathy and despair, the writer drove through the streets to note the effect of plague and panic, and found the place like a city of the dead. He was there in a cholera year, when the known deaths, and many were not recorded, were 7,000, but the scare then was as nought by the side of the plague scare. When plague prevails many more die from fright than from the actual disease itself." The commerce of the place is now rapidly recovering, and the population is fast increasing by influx from abroad.

Fifty years ago Karachi was a wretched little fishing village of a few mud huts; it is now a thriving and populous town of nearly 120,000 inhabitants, with a score of European mercantile firms, the usual official machinery of commissioners, judges, magistrates, etc., and a military cantonment of some strength.

Karachi lies low and flat on the seashore, on the edge of the great Sindh desert. At the time of the British occupation in 1842 it had no water except such as brackish wells supplied, and possessed one tree only. Water has since been brought to the town from large underground "catchment" reservoirs, some sixteen miles distant; and all is changed, an unkindly salt soil has been made to do its best, and there are trees of sorts—everywhere.

But the introduction of water has not, however, been an unmixed blessing. The subsoil has got so waterlogged with waste water, through lack of fall for efficient drainage, that in some parts of the town a two-foot hole shows standing water, and malaria and fever have found a home in a region which was formerly free from these diseases. "Karachi fever" is an obstinate form of malaria with a name to itself.

A well-known historic parallel is afforded by the condition of the Roman Campagna, which was practically rendered uninhabitable owing to malaria caused by its flooding when the aqueducts were cut by the Goths in the sixth century.

Sindh is, like Egypt, practically rainless; 10 inches in the year is a good fall, while 7 inches is the average. Indeed old residents can remember when a whole twelve month has passed without a shower to speak of. The compensating dewiness, the air is moisture laden, enervating, and trying, and it is often a relief to escape to the dry heat inland.

Karachi tried to have a little sanatorium of its own, which it called Clifton, but it soon had to give it up, as, facing the open sea and the wind, the houses got filled with sand, and the road was smothered with it; in some places the shifting sand is many feet deep. All the jaded European can do now with his Clifton is to take a two mile drive to it, along a low causeway through the dreariest of mud flats, in the cool of the evening, get an hour's blow of damp sea breeze, and drive back to dinner at eight.

The glare in sandy, arid Karachi is so trying that the verandahs of houses are trellised in, giving them a prison-like look. The trellis allows vision, but tempers the glare. One curious effect of this trellis is that, standing a certain distance behind it, and looking at objects 200 or 300 yards away, things are seen double; one has to shut an eye if one would count them.

The parched desert country behind Karachi has a heat all its own. Jacobabad, some 300 miles away, often records 125° Fahr. The one mail train a day carries a coffin in the hot weather season. "for the use of passengers" if it need be; and in one year long ago twenty-three European engine drivers died whilst working their trains. A long journey by train in the hot season is particularly exhausting. Carriage windows are kept shut to exclude the heat, and I have not only known the woodwork hot to the touch, but even the water carried in the tanks on the roof could scarcely be endured with the hand.

Like many Indian cities, Karachi is a threefold town, and is composed of a native town, a civil station or cantonment and a commercial port (Kiamari) about four miles from the cantonment. Kiamari, the port of Karachi, is in itself little more than a wharf linked by a mole with Karachi, the mole carrying a goods line of railway and a road. The port is rising in importance, as it taps the fast increasing wheat and cotton trade of Sindh and the Punjab. Sindh wheat is good in quality, though it would amuse an English farmer to see a field of it after reaping. Often the stalk is but a foot high; the ears only are reaped by hand, the straw left standing for half-starved cattle to browse.

A striking geographical fact is that from the end of the breakwater at Manora Point there is actually no land south of this point and the South Pole.

Sindh, of which Karachi is the capital, is perhaps chiefly associated in the minds of most English people by the historic cypher despatch of Sir Charles Napier after the battle of Miani in 1819, which gave India Sindh Peccavi. Sindh was of great strategical importance to our troops as a kind of jumping off place, and as a basis for any operations which might be undertaken against Southern Afghanistan. By this victory of Miani not only did Great Britain get possession of the lower Indus Valley (the Unhappy Valley), but it brought under British dominions the whole of the Indian coast line from Chittagong to the mouth of the Indus.

The Indus (Sindhus) has been called the Nile of India. Just as Sir Charles Napier termed Sindh Young Egypt. Not only is it the great highway of Sindh and the Southern Punjab, but on the river depends all the agriculture of Sindh, though since the railway has been opened the river traffic between Karachi and Multan has become insignificant.

The only bridge between Attock (near Peshawar) and Karachi is the famous Lansdowne Bridge. This great cantilever bridge, though a magnificent work from an engineering point of view, is, however, as devoid of artistic merit as the Tay Bridge. It is, indeed, the ugliest bridge of its class in all India.

The great sight of Karachi is the sacred Crocodile Preserve at Magar Pir, some seven miles off. There are hot springs here which feed a shallow tank containing nearly a hundred crocodiles. It is a curious fact that the so-called alligators are really crocodiles, and are a different species from the long-nouted glialar of the Indus.

The story, usually thought to be fictitious, of the Englishman who for a bet crossed the tank by jumping successively from the backs of these crocodiles is, it seems, based on fact. The hero of this foolhardy feat was a certain Lieutenant Beresford, a friend of Sir R. F. Burton. When Burton and his companion were visiting the crocodiles' tank they noticed that these reptiles and certain flocks of reeds happened to make an almost continuous bridge across the tank. This prompted the daring subaltern to hazard the feat of crossing by hopping from one crocodile to another. To the amazement of the spectators he succeeded in this apparently mad attempt. Sir Richard Burton had already successfully performed an equally daring feat. He managed to muzzle a crocodile by means of a lasso, and then jumped on the reptile's back and enjoyed a somewhat zigzag ride. So it would appear that the egregious de Rougemont is only a plagiarist after all.

For much of the information embodied in this article I am indebted to my friend Mr. L. G. Wait, who lived for seven years in Karachi.

17TH MARCH 1906.

Times.—Quetta March 15th.—The Prince and Princess of Wales's visit to Chaman aptly illustrated the order prevailing on this part of the frontier. The railway from Quetta through the Khojak tunnel to the open country at Chaman was policed by railway employés. At Chaman, the garrison, consisting of the 127th Baluchistan Infantry, was drawn upon the parade ground to receive new colours from the Prince, and a handful of constabulary was the only guard imported. The scene beyond the cantonments is almost rustic in its pastoral tranquillity. From the walls of the mud fort the Prince and Princess were able to appreciate the strategical position of the frontier. Later Their Royal Highnesses inspected the arrangements for the rapid assembly of troops at Chaman and for the extension of the railway to Kandahar.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE PAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE BOMBAY PRESIDENCY FOR THE WEEK ENDING 17TH MARCH 1906.

Indian Spectator.—"Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales will have left the Indian shores by the time our next issue is in the hands of the reader. The papers received from England last week show that not only was there a reference to the tour in the Speech from the Throne, but in voting the address in the House of Lords every speaker dwelt on the happy results of the mission. The success of the tour, from a moral and political standpoint has, of course, been primarily due to Their Royal Highnesses themselves—their sympathetic interest in all that affects the well-being of the people, their gracious readiness to listen to the natives of the country, their noble acknowledgment of the feelings actuating the people, and their kind solicitude to be remembered by the ethnically alien inhabitants among whom they have been sojourning. For all the guidance which Their Royal Highnesses required in touring in a strange land, they were most fortunate in having at the head of their staff a retired officer possessing such intimate acquaintance with the manners and customs of the people and such unsurpassed knowledge of the country as Sir Walter Lawrence."

Jam-e-Jamshed.—"Two days more and the Royal visit to India will have terminated, leaving behind, from one end to the other of this vast continent, many happy memories. Behind the memories of the pomp and pageantry associated with the visit, there will be the impress of something that will be permanent and lasting; something that will live and endure in the life of the people among whom the sojourn has been made; something that will be the common heritage of the myriads that constitute the many creeds and races of this peninsula; something that will be a landmark in the annals of England's East; something that the historian will admit to have broadened the life of the people, to have widened their political horizon, and to have assured them of a higher place among the nations that constitute the vast British Empire. When the idea of the visit that has now been accomplished was first mooted, it was no doubt expected that it would secure many lasting and permanent benefits to India and the Empire. When the Imperial visitors put their steps on these shores that glorious November afternoon, and the Heir to the Throne first addressed the mighty throng of his future subjects that had gathered to greet him and his consort at the Apollo Bunder, those expectations were greatly strengthened. When now their tour is on the eve of being accomplished, and the Royal pair are setting their faces homewards, there can be but one message that can greet Their Royal ears from a grateful and united people, a message of warm and grateful acknowledgment of their having by their gracious and kindly demeanour, their generous and cordial appreciations, strengthened the bonds uniting the Indians to the Empire. It would be, indeed, impossible to exaggerate the great good that this visit has done both to the ruling class and the people of India. It has confirmed the Indians in their loyalty on the one hand and removed, on the other, what suspicions that lay in the British mind as to the real sentiments of the people towards the foreign rulers."

Gujarati Punch.—11th March 1906.—"We rejoice to learn that our Royal visitors have been impressed by the spontaneous demonstrations of affectionate devotion and loyalty on the part of Indians to the British raj. We trust that they will carry back to their home the happiest recollections of their Indian tour and will exert their best endeavours to ameliorate the condition of the poverty-stricken masses of India, when in the fulness of time they are called upon to sway the destinies of the teeming millions of this land. The Prince and his Royal consort have, by their kind condescension and sympathetic bearing, endeared themselves to the people of this country and made a deep and abiding impression upon them. The recent visit of the Prince of Wales to one of the famine camps bears testimony to the keen desire of His Royal Highness to see both the sides of the shield. The pomp and pageantry which are the conventional accompaniments of such tours are likely to mislead Their Highnesses about the true economic situation of India, and it was indeed a happy and well-conceived idea of His Royal Highness to make up his mind to visit an Indian famine camp with a view to gauge the true measure of distress prevailing in the country. Such scenes are likely to touch the most responsive chords in the Royal heart, and India will surely be benefited by the present experience of the Prince in India. We think it will not be out of place to call attention to the customary practice of conferring some boon upon the people to commemorate Royal tours. India is on the tiptoe of expectation as regards some reduction in the amount of the salt-tax and the raising of the taxable minimum under the Income Tax Act. We think that it will be quite in the fitness of things if these concessions are announced before the Royal visitors bid farewell to India."

SELECTIONS FROM ENGLISH PAPERS OWNED BY NATIVES OF MADRAS AND ON VERNACULAR PAPERS PUBLISHED IN MADRAS FOR THE WEEK ENDING 17TH MARCH 1906.

Messenger of Truth, Madras, 17th March 1906.—The Messenger of Truth, for March, referring to the Royal Tour, remarks that Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales were highly gratified by the way in which they were honored during their visit to different cities in this country; but hopes they have not failed to conceive the vast amount of poverty and misery lurking out of sight. As it is necessary and beneficial that the future Sovereign should be acquainted with the country, it is well, the paper adds, that His Royal Highness has now visited the country with his consort.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE NEWSPAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE PUNJAB FOR THE WEEK ENDING 17TH MARCH 1906.

The Sat Dharam Parcharak (Jullundur), of the 2nd March 1906, says that on the occasion of His Royal Highness's visit to Benares the Pandas rang bells and blow conches in front of the Royal procession, and that the members of the Arya Samaj also chanted hymns from the Vedas. It is to be regretted that the Swadeshists should sacrifice their religion on the altar of flattery. The performance of ceremonies like the above where a Hindu Raja is concerned, lends additional lustre to the Vedic religion, but the observance of the same in honour of a Christian Prince, who considers them to be childish, is not only meaningless but derogatory to the Hindu religion. It is said, adds the Editor, that the Prince is not pleased with the treatment accorded by the Anglo-Indians to natives, and that His Royal Highness will ask his father to grant certain privileges to the children of the soil. But it is to be feared that the efforts of the Prince in the cause of this unfortunate country will prove unavailing seeing that even the King-Emperor can do no more than utter the words that are put in his mouth by the party in power.

The Panja-i-Foulad (Lahore), of the 28th February 1906, regrets that the Prince of Wales has, during his visit to Rangoon done nothing for the tomb of Bahadur Shah. The Editor is of opinion that His Royal Highness would have done a graceful act if he had restored certain Princes who have been deposed by the Government of India to their gadi and dealt generously with the survivors of Theebaw, the ex-King of Burma.

The Paisa Akhbar (Lahore), of the 6th March 1906, remarks that it is to be regretted that contrary to the usual practice no prisoner was released this time on the occasion of the Prince of Wales' visit to this country and expresses the hope that His Royal Highness will yet take pity on this unfortunate class of His Majesty's subjects and direct the release of such of them as are not habitual offenders.

SELECIONS FROM NATIVE NEWSPAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE UNITED PROVINCES FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 17TH MARCH 1906.

Tafrih.—The Tafrih (Lucknow), of the 7th March, regrets that no announcement of a grant of any special concession to Indians was made in the King-Emperor's speech at the opening of Parliament, in honour of Their Royal Highnesses' visit to India. The loyalty of the Indians is recognized on all hands, still no privileges are extended to them, while the turbulent Transvaalers have been promised self-government in the near future. The visit of Their Royal Highnesses will no doubt strengthen the bonds of Indian loyalty to the British Crown, but it would do so still more, if it were marked by some special concession to the people. [The Shahna-i-Hind (Meerut), of the 8th March, expressing the same views, adds that this utter indifference to the claims of India shows that she can hope nothing either from a Conservative or a Liberal Ministry.]

18TH MARCH 1906.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—Leaving the delectable climate of Quetta, where their stay was keenly enjoyed, Their Royal Highnesses yesterday, having taken train at ten o'clock reached Sibi about four in the afternoon. The original intention was that the departure from Quetta should be by the Sind-Pishin line from Bostan to Sibi to enable Their Royal Highnesses to see the Chapar river which is crossed by a single hundred and fifty feet span, and the other striking physical features of the Hurnai route. The carriages of the Royal train were, however, too long for the curves on this line, and the return was therefore made by the Mushkaf-Bolan line, by which Quetta was reached on the day of the arrival there. At Sibi the 106th Hazara Pioneers paraded on the platform and were inspected by the Prince.

Karachi this morning gave Their Royal Highnesses a most cordial welcome. They were received by Lord Lamington,

Mr. A. D. Younghusband, the Mir of Khairpur, and among those present were General Hunter and Admiral Poë. After inspecting the guard-of-honour of the South Wales Borderers Their Royal Highnesses proceeded to a large shamiana outside the station where the Municipal address was presented. The shamiana was densely crowded. The Municipal address was read by Mr. Beaumont, President of the Municipality.

The address of the Karachi Municipality stated:—

"The time was—and that but seventy years ago—when Karachi consisted of a few straggling rows of dwellings which housed at most ten thousand souls, and when our harbour served only to shelter a few score fishing boats. The occupation of Sind by the British in 1839 at once revealed the important position of Karachi, and the efforts of all those entrusted with the administration of the province, and of those connected with the trade of the port, have since been directed to developing its manifest resources. Our first growth was not rapid, for roads and railroads, on which ports must ever depend, were for many years, few and ill-served, in Sind, and thirty years ago, when Your Royal Highness's gracious father visited this dependency, Karachi was not deemed worthy of the honour and happiness of being included in the cities chosen to accord him welcome. This propitious occasion is, therefore, a matter of the greater gratification to us, inasmuch as it marks our growth and the importance of our city and its harbour."

19TH MARCH 1906.

Birmingham Daily Post.—On Saturday the Prince of Wales, who is almost at the end of his Indian tour, demonstrated in an admirable address the possibilities of the Imperial ideal as applied to this great Eastern dependency. It may be that there are some even in these days, unable to appreciate in its full significance the meaning of Empire. They look upon the aspirations of peoples and the development of nationalities with a circumscribed view which declines to pay any recognition to that moral impulse which history impresses upon us as constituting the basis of fruitful ambition. Judged in this limited light, there is, probably, no country so little understood as India. It suffers, in British eyes, by reason of its self-concentration. We are apt to forget, for instance, both its immensity and its internal resources. How many who lightly talk of its being a far cry to India realise that it embraces nearly two million square miles of territory, that it is considerably larger than the whole of Europe—excluding Russia proper, Poland, and Finland,—or that something like three hundred million of its people own allegiance to the British Crown? Then if we pass from abstract considerations to practical evidence, we have the fact that India constitutes what Mr. Cecil Rhodes was fond of describing as a valuable commercial asset. In 1904-5 India conducted a trade amounting to £175,000,000, and showed the largest revenue ever recorded in the annals of the country. This advance was largely the result of the improved conditions of agriculture and of the extension of railways brought about by British rule and enterprise. The important point is that the beneficial advantages of such development have not been confined to India. We sent to the country upwards of forty millions worth of goods, or in other words, the value of the exports from the United Kingdom to India were equal to the whole of our exports to Australia, Canada, and Cape Colony. The recital of these plain facts certainly ought to make India a living reality to us—to enable a people of whom it sometimes is cynically said that they are commercially-minded to appreciate what the Prince of Wales on Saturday well described as a "great and wonderful land." The prevalent view of India must be due to the fact that it is not fully understood. It is essentially a country where extremes meet. On the one hand, we have high caste princes—kings in all but name—all powerful and immensely rich. The profusion of wealth that marks an Indian potentate on occasions of State overshadowed the mythical magnificence of the Arabian knights. In glaring contradistinction we have poverty and abject misery in their lowest forms. Plague, pestilence, and famine have their happy hunting ground in "the brightest star in the British Crown." That these contrasts should exist must furnish food for anxious reflection. The consoling thought is that under an enlightened British Administration an improvement of the country is being effected. Though the process must necessarily be gradual when dealing with such a vast area and population, it is sure. Amelioration cannot be other than slow in such a country, because it is retarded by the mysterious workings of Nature, which for long periods withhold the fructifying rains that spell prosperity for the patient and hard-working peasant. So far as human skill and foresight can ensure, these elemental drawbacks are being safeguarded against by the provision of irrigation systems, the establishment of relief works, and modern facilities for the transit of agricultural produce. Our work in India will bear analysis by posterity. Because the Indian people; from peasant to prince, know that British rule is solely concerned with their material interests we have the loyalty which has so deeply impressed the Prince of Wales throughout his tour.

Daily Mail.—The Royal tour through India ends with the visit to Karachi, where the Prince and Princess of Wales now are and whence they will take ship for Egypt.

Their Royal Highnesses have travelled by railway alone in India and Burma 8,807 miles, and have spent twenty-eight nights in the train. The Prince has delivered fifty speeches and performed a multitude of ceremonies. These facts serve to show that the tour has been no light undertaking, and has involved a strain on Their Royal Highnesses' endurance.

The Princess, as well as the Prince, has been in excellent health throughout the long and often tedious journey, and omitted only one engagement at the earnest solicitation of her doctor. Both have taken keen interest in the many problems—social, economic, and military—that present themselves in every administrative centre.

The Royal progress has been followed eagerly by the natives who understand nothing so well as personal appeal. The effect of the visit will certainly prove excellent, especially in the Native States.

Daily Telegraph.—Karachi, Sunday, March 18 (12.20 p. m.).

Leaving the bracing mountain cold of Quetta the Prince and Princess of Wales descended the Bolan railway, crossed the scorching Sind desert, and reached the moist sea breezes of Karachi early on Saturday morning. Here, as at Quetta, they were reminded of the transformation wrought by the fertile pacification of British rule. The municipality, in an address presented to His Royal Highness traced the growth of Karachi from a petty fishing village to a great seaport, shipping the produce of the new irrigation colonies to Europe.

The Prince's reply bidding farewell to India in terms of generous enthusiasm created a deep impression.

Replying to the address from the municipality the Prince of Wales said:

"On behalf of the Princess of Wales and myself, I thank you for the welcome which you have given to us in this rising and prosperous seaport, the capital of Sind. Your progress is remarkable even in an age of progress, but the figures which you have quoted and the strenuous policy of extending irrigation in Sind and the Punjab suggest the idea that vast development await your city and harbour in the immediate future. I am very glad to have the opportunity of seeing Karachi, for I am conscious of the fact that this place is destined to play an important part in the future of our Empire, and if I may judge of the spirit of the inhabitants of Karachi from the sentiments expressed in your address, I have little fear but that you and your successors in office will be able to grapple with the difficult question of development in a large and far-sighted manner. Your concluding words of "God speed," for which we are both most grateful, remind us, alas! that our visit to India is near its end. I can assure you and our other friends in all parts of this great and wonderful land that we leave India with feelings of gratitude and affection. We have seen enough to make India a living reality to us, and enough to make us wish that we could see more, and to implant for ever in our hearts sympathy and interest in all that affects our fellow-subjects in India, of whatever creed or race. Although our receptions everywhere were scenes of brightness and splendour, and we have been greeted by thousands of cheerful and happy faces, we have not forgotten the hard lives led by those in the trying climates of the plains, and we know the miseries which beset the patient and hardworking peasant when the rains do not come in due seasons. We are both sincerely thankful to have been privileged to visit India, and to have gained impressions that with future study and observation, will enable me to try to understand some of the problems of British administration. For I fully appreciate the advantages that a visit to this great Continent must give to any one in considering even the simplest Indian questions. Our journey has, in all parts of India, been most happy and delightful, thanks to the love and goodwill that have been evinced by all classes. We have been deeply impressed by that feeling of loyalty to the Crown and devotion to the person of the King-Empress which has been displayed ever since we first set foot on Indian soil, and we have been also greatly touched by the evident memories of affection towards my dear brother which still remain in the hearts of those with whom he was brought into contact during his stay in India, some sixteen years ago. In bidding India farewell, we can truly say that our visit has been to us an unbending and unbroken series of happy and most instructive experiences."

This afternoon the Prince unveiled the statue of Queen Victoria, subscribed for by the people of Sind, and erected in the grounds of the Bartle Frere Hall. Referring to the figures of Peace and Justice at the base of the statue, the Prince said: "You do right to connect them with the memory of Queen Victoria, for she greatly desired that her Indian subjects should ever enjoy these blessings."

Practical Teacher.—Although the Royal party spent only one day at Amritsar, it is a city of great interest and is not from its striking surroundings, nor even its architectural wonders, but mainly from its people, it is the holy city of the Sikhs, one of the most remarkable of the peoples of India. Lahore, which the Prince visited on his way to the North-West Frontier, is the capital of the Punjab, but Amritsar, its near neighbour, is looked upon as the city of the Sikhs, for it is their sacred city, and the Sikhs are essentially a religious community, bound together only by their faith. The Sikhs are of the same race as the Hindus around them, and bear perhaps much the same relation to these Hindus as the Protestants of Europe bear to the Roman Catholics, for there is a curious parallel between the Sikhs of India and the Protestants of Europe.

About the time of the Protestant movement of the West, this Sikh movement began in the East; they rejected the worship of idols and abolished the distinctions of all castes—priestly and other; they have a sacred book (the Granth) in which is held in the greatest reverence. They had to fight for their religion too, and were persecuted and massacred; then growing stronger, they massacred their enemies. So the faith struggled for its existence for some three hundred years, and their indomitable courage, religious fervour, and fire physique finally made them victorious. They stemmed the tide of Mahomedan conversions (conversions, of course, by fire and sword), and thus their land marks the boundary between the Mahomedan region to the west and the Hindu region to the east. In the early part of the nineteenth century the Sikhs had become the most important political power in the country, and India would certainly have been theirs had it not been for the British conquest. Two fierce wars were fought, but the European forces, with their arms and training, were too much even for this fighting race, and by the middle of the century the Punjab was added to British territory. But the English respected the Sikh religion—indeed, of all the religion of India it most deserves respect—and the Sikhs have appreciated this tolerance, for the Mutiny did not spread among this people, and their services at that time have since been repeated again and again.

Amritsar is the Holy City, and it holds their Holy Book in the Golden Temple. This is striking rather than beautiful. In the middle of the city is a great square with a lake bordered by a marble pavement, and standing in the centre of the lake (the Pool of Immortality) is the temple, the lower part of inlaid marble, the upper part plated with gold—dazzling, almost blinding in the sunlight. On the pavement around the lake are worshippers who bathe in the waters or sit beneath the trees listening to the reading or explaining of the scriptures. Others cross the marble causeway to the temple, where they lay offerings of flowers or money before the Granth, which is read aloud, or rather intoned all day long by a priest.

But Amritsar has other claims to importance, for it is a commercial centre, and also there are several flourishing industries. Here the fine wool from the goats of Kashmir is made into the famous Kashmir shawls; carpets scarcely less notable also come from here; silk goods of many kinds, and of the finest quality are made; and the carving of ivory adds to the artistic renown of the city. Certainly, Amritsar is one of the most prosperous of Indian cities, and its prosperity is not, as yet, accompanied by the smoke of factory chimneys, which defaces parts of Bombay and Calcutta. Further prosperity may be before it too, and one sign and foundation of that is to be found in the college for the education of Sikhs—the Khalsa College which the Prince visited and encouraged during his short stay.

When the Prince left the Punjab and came to the basin of the Ganges his visits were marred by remembrance of the Mutiny, for here, at Delhi, Lucknow, and Cawnpur, the struggle raged most fiercely, and at these places the Englishman cannot but recall with horror the scenes enacted half a century ago in those terrible months of massacre and treachery. The blackness of the remembrance is relieved only by thoughts of the gallantry and heroism which the sore need brought forth, and the story of the Mutiny is one which will ever hold the attention of Englishmen, and must always be revived when visiting the towns of the upper Ganges basin. The Prince visited Delhi and Lucknow, but not Cawnpur, whose story is perhaps the blackest of all.

In 1857 India was still largely in the hands of the old East India Company, and held in British rule by an army, fully five-sixths of which were Native sepoys. Too much power was in native hands, and when trouble came the few scattered, and since communication was then very difficult, almost isolated British regiments were totally insufficient to deal with it. Disaffection had sprung up, and misunderstanding and ignorance among the troops were taken advantage of by such men as the notorious Nana Sahib, who had been refused a title and position which he claimed. One such misunderstanding was in reference to the cartridges to be used when the Enfield rifles were introduced. The cartridges were greased, and had to be torn open with the teeth, and this was thought to be a plot of the Europeans to break down the caste of the natives and make them Christian, for it was falsely stated that the grease was the fat of hogs and of cattle, the touch of which would defile the Hindus. The spark which finally caused the blaze was struck at Meerut in May 1857, and the mutineers marched at once from there to Delhi, nearly forty miles to the south-west. The Europeans here were almost totally unprepared for defence; many were murdered in the streets, and a few English officers held out for hours against a horde of rebels, and tried to defend the great powder magazine. When all hope was gone they blew it up, and, marvellous to say, although many hundreds of the enemy were killed by the explosion, a few of the gallant band escaped, and finally reached shelter. The city was in rebel hands, and soon a small force, mainly of Europeans and Sikhs, was sent to retake it. For months this force held the "Ridge" outside the city against more than four times their own number, and throughout the great heat of an Indian summer strove to get possession of the town. After many attempts it was taken by assault, and among the many brave deeds of the time, that of the blowing up of the Kashmir Gate stands pre-eminent. A few engineers and sappers volunteered to cross the bridge leading over a ditch to the gate, to lay against it bags of powder, and to explode this to gain an entry. This they did in face of a terrible fire directed upon them, and before the work was accomplished only one man was left able to fire the fuse. The gate was shattered, and the waiting troops stormed the breach; after hard fighting the city was captured, and the fall of this stronghold did much to quell the Mutiny.

Elsewhere these months had seen terrible scenes. Lucknow had more warning than Delhi, and its noble defender, Sir Henry Lawrence, made preparations for holding at least the Residency. This he fortified, brought here the English women and children, and laid in a store of provisions. Almost immediately the threatened storm burst, and Sir Henry Lawrence acted promptly. He attacked the mutineers, and Lucknow remained in British occupation when all the surrounding country was given over to the rebels. Yet in spite of all he could do regiment after regiment forsook him, and at last they had to fall back upon the Residency. Then came what must have seemed to the little garrison the crowning disaster, for a shell killed their brave leader. Still they held out, and some weeks later were relieved for a time by General Havelock and Sir James Outram. Yet the new force was weakened by fighting, and was vastly outnumbered by the rebels. Many weeks again passed before the second relief, when Sir Colin Campbell and his Highlanders came and took off the women and children. Yet this relief had its sad incident, for in this time of victory the second defender, Sir Henry Havelock, died. Even yet the fighting was not over, for the mutineers were driven in from around and centered at Lucknow, till there was an army of about 150,000 men. Again Sir Colin Campbell assaulted the city, and with a greater force than before, for by this time he had 20,000 troops; he was entirely successful, and the Mutiny was virtually over.

Yet if heroism is associated in our minds with the names of Delhi and Lucknow, horror is suggested when Cawnpur is mentioned. The city had some warning, and the Europeans entrenched themselves in two barracks, but these and the earthworks they threw up around them gave but poor shelter. Here the men with their wives and children were besieged, and for three weeks were in the sorest straits. One of the barracks was burnt, their ammunition had been seized by the mutineers, food was miserably scarce, and, perhaps worst of all lacked water in that scorching heat, for the well was outside their entrenchment, and to attempt to reach it meant almost certain death. They could scarcely hope for relief; and then came a message from Nana Sahib, who had posed as an ally, that if the garrisons capitulated the Europeans would be allowed to go down the Ganges in boats to Allahabad. This seemed the only hope, and the small band now left went out from their shelter to the boats, but then found that they were the victims of treachery, for after entering the boats they were fired at by their foes on either side of the river. One boat was swept down the stream, but the rest was taken, the men killed, and the women and children held prisoners. A fortnight afterwards Sir Henry Havelock approached in the hope of relieving the garrison, and then the worst horror was perpetrated; by the command of Nana Sahib the whole of the women and children, about 200 in all, were massacred, and the bodies of the dead with those still living were thrown into a well. Two days later Havelock entered the city, but the vengeance which was afterwards exacted was too late. After the long struggle was over a monument was erected to the memory of the victims. A figure of an angel has been placed over the mouth of the well, and around it is a wall bearing the inscription—

“Sacred to the perpetual memory of a great company of Christian people, chiefly women and children, who near this spot were cruelly murdered by the followers of the rebel Nana Dhundu Panth of Bithur, and east, the dying with the dead, into the well below, on the 15th day of July 1857.”

The historical associations of Delhi reach back much farther than Mutiny days, for Delhi was the chief seat of the Moghul Empire, whose magnificence is suggested by the fine buildings such as those shown in the illustrations. The great mosque, the Jama Masjid, probably the greatest in the world, stands on a vast platform, to which access is gained by three great majestic stairways. The vast gateway is of red sandstone, the doors below of brass, the huge domes of pure white marble. There are also red galleries and gilded pinnacles, and the building is so large that it cannot be appreciated except at a distance, and then the details, often of exquisite design and workmanship, are not seen. The picture gives some idea of the portions of this building, but does not suggest the size of the Kutab Minar, the great five-storeyed tower; the lower three storeys are of fluted red sandstone, covered all over with designs, carvings, and inscriptions, and separated by balconies. The upper two storeys are of white marble, and commence to climb upward from a height of nearly 200 feet above the ground. It is named after Kutub-ed-Din, who forced his way from slavery to a throne, from which he ruled the land, and his sons after him, long before the Jama Masjid was built. A still earlier history is recalled by a solid iron pillar, nearly 24 feet long and more than 2 feet in diameter as its base. How it could have been wrought cannot be imagined, for it is very old, and bears a Sanscrit inscription.

Modern Delhi is shown in the view of one side of the Chandni Chauk—the “Seluer Street”—a wide thoroughfare leading from the Kashmir Gate. It has a fine row of trees along the centre, and is bordered by booths, shops, and warehouses. Here the gold and silver work of ancient renown is side by side with the products of the mills, which here, as elsewhere, mark the entrance of India into the modern manufacturing world.

Agra, a hundred miles farther down the Jumna, was next visited—Agra, the city of architectural marvels of the Pearl Mosque, the Hall of Audience, and, greatest of all, the Taj Mahal. Description of these is hopeless, and pictures are but little better, for they must be seen to be appreciated. The inimitable blend of vastness and delicacy, the purity of the white and the brilliance of the colours, always harmonising the perfection cannot be reproduced by pen or brush, and the camera gives but a dead image instead of a vivid reality. There is no mosque like this Pearl Mosque; it is hard to imagine a greater profuseness of elegance, colour, and richness than that of the Hall of Audience; the Taj Mahal itself has no equal in the world.

Agra is a constant memento of Shah Jehan's greatness; the Taj is the incarnation of his love and sorrow. When Prince, and fighting to gain all the country for his father, he married a Persian girl, whom he loved devotedly. Soon after he became Emperor she died, and Shah Jehan determined to build a tomb worthy of her and worthy of their love. Nearly twenty years it was in building, many thousands of men spent their strength in the service, artists were brought from other countries, and many lands were deprived of their precious stones and jewels that this wonderful building should lack nothing. It rises above a garden of many-hued flowers and sparkling waters, and its cool, clear beauty could be in no finer setting. A great marble platform, by comparison seeming low, yet 20 feet high and 300 feet square, bears this vision of beauty, which, though so vast, is of delicate loveliness, for its proportions are perfect. Its milk-white walls, crowned by the great dome, are thrown into relief by the lower red mosques standing on either side, and at the four corners of the marble plinth rise the tall white towers. Great as is the building, even the smallest details are wonderful and some of the most beautiful work, perhaps, is in the exquisite tracery of the marble trellis which screens the tombs of Shah Jehan and his loved wife. Wonderful, too, are the designs worked in precious stones, marble, and gold, hidden away in the gloom of the interior. There one realises that the building with all its brilliance and magnificence is indeed a tomb, and one recalls the sad latter days of its creator, for after a great and wise reign Shah Jehan was dethroned by his own son, Aurungzeb, and kept a prisoner till his death. With him, too, the glory of the Moghul dynasty passed away, for his son was without his greatness, and sowed the seeds of the disruption which broke the great power of the Moghul rule.

The scene changes greatly with a short journey southward to Gwalior. The change is due partly to the fact that the low plains of the Ganges are left for the higher grounds bordering the Deccan plateau, but chiefly because of historical differences. Gwalior is the capital of a Native State, and ruled by a descendant of the warlike Mahrattas, who challenged the Mohammedan power and for long fought against the British. The Mahrattas were a strong Hindu race living in the Deccan, who conquered portions of the decaying Moghul Empire and founded several States of their own in Central India.

At Gwalior the welcome given to the Prince presented much the same mixture of the modern and the medieval which characterised the visits to the other Native States, but Gwalior is in many respects one of the best ruled of these. There were thirty-six elephants waiting to carry and escort the visitors, and for the first time the Prince made an Oriental entry riding a magnificent elephant, one of many with painted faces, golden and silver adornments of great weight, and howdahs plated with gold and silver. Elephants seemed to be a feature of Gwalior; they guarded the routes, they hauled the visitors up the steep face of the rocky plateau on which stands the fort overlooking the town. This fort has seen many sieges, and during the Mutiny it was captured—for the last time—from the natives who had rebelled against the English, although their ruler Scindhia remained loyal.

The present Scindhia is one of the finest administrators in India. His rule is no easy one, and one of the chief difficulties is the famine which haunts the land, for here, in the centre of India, there is not an abundance of rain in good seasons, and when the monsoons disappoint, the lack of water soon tells on the land. At the time of the visit indeed, water was scarce, and though the tanks were dry, the canals empty, and the ground parched, yet to welcome the Prince and Princess the precious liquid was lavishly spent in laying the dust and in keeping the gardens moist. This gives but one small instance of the right royal scale on which the Royal party was entertained by the en-getic Scindhia, who personally supervised almost every detail. He has encouraged and organised education, from colleges for nobles' sons to elementary schools; he has given his State a fine system of railways, managed the finances carefully to avoid undue pressure on the poor, and proved almost a model ruler. Here, too, there is an Imperial Service Corps, which he personally accompanied to China five years ago. Tiger shooting was one of the chief attractions of the visit, and the Prince had fine sport, thanks to the excellent arrangement. The Princess gave expression to a happy and kindly thought in giving a Christmas tree to the nobles' children, for Christmas Day was spent here. The tree was loaded with presents from England, and anything which comes from England is in India greatly appreciated; indeed, English-made goods have a value perhaps not always deserved.

From Gwalior and the soldiery of the Middle Ages to Lucknow and khaki-clad troops was the next journey. The Prince went there on the day after Christmas Day, and had quite a busy time, for there were several interesting and suggestive ceremonies on that same day. In the morning, at the railway station itself, the Governor of the Province (Oudh) presented local Indian magnates and British officers to the Prince, and the Municipality presented an address, and almost immediately afterwards two more Indian princes were received at Government House.

In the afternoon there was a ceremony which marks a great contrast between Mutiny days and the present, for when the Prince had decided to visit Lucknow a memorial of the visit was suggested, and it was decided that this should take the form of a Medical College. One hundred thousand pounds were subscribed by the time of the visit, and at least two-thirds of this sum were given by the natives of the district.

But by far the most interesting feature of the day came afterwards when the Prince paid a visit to the Residency, now ruined and bearing silent testimony to the heroic struggles it had witnessed. Then, most notable of all, there was a band of veterans, the gallant survivors of that fight. These the Prince inspected as they were drawn up outside the Residency, and told them of his appreciation of their bravery and their noble service.

Standard.—The Royal tour in India ends to-day with the departure of the Prince and Princess of Wales from the flourishing seaport of Sind, homeward bound. Since they landed at Bombay, on the birthday of the King-Emperor, they have traversed his Asiatic Empire from west to east and from north to south. In Upper Burma they visited a capital which, when His Majesty made his Indian tour, was the seat of an independent and at times hostile Power. The cantonment and fortifications of Quetta, which they reached luxuriously in a railway carriage, stand on ground that lay, thirty years ago, well outside the limits of British territory. And in their journeyings to and fro over the vast continent between these two points they came to many places which, in 1875, were practically inaccessible to the tourist. But their progress, though far more extended, has in one respect, at any rate, been an exact repetition of His Majesty's. From first to last it has evoked fervent demonstrations of India's loyalty to the English Throne. From every class of His Majesty's Indian subjects, from Ruling Chiefs and hereditary nobles, from great landowners and merchants, as well as from humbler ryots, from the crowds in populous cities and peasants in mud-built hamlets, from the fighting races who give their sons to defend the King's rights, not in India alone but in lands across the dark water, from high and low, Their Royal Highnesses have received a welcome the cordial sincerity of which, we venture to think, will never be forgotten by them. No one who knows India will grudge the pains due for the anxious forethought with which the programme was drawn up, and for the vigilance that watched, for the most part unseen, over the safety of the Royal party; but, without this universal sentiment of good-will toward the Heir to the Imperial Crown, the most elaborate precautions might have failed of their object and, even if marked by no mishap the tour would have lost nearly everything that has rendered it enjoyable. For whatever æsthetic delight they have taken in the marvels of Hindustan, the Royal travellers, we feel certain, have been far more deeply touched by what they have learnt of the hearts of the Indian people.

When the Prince gave audience at Ali Musjel to the head men of the Afridis, one of them, Hafez Saadullah Khan, Malik of the Kamar Khel, who has lost his right eye, said: "Blind though I am, I can touch my King's hand." "We are poor people," another Malik explained, "and we live in a poor country; yet the land will blossom like the rose now that it has been trodden by the footsteps of the King." Shah and Shahzadas were all one, no doubt, to the wild waters of the Khyber hills; but the note of personal homage to British royalty was the echo of an emotion that had thrilled all India. The telegrams and letters of our Special Correspondent afford ample and unmistakable evidence of the profound impression made, not so much by the state in which the Prince travelled and the sumptuousness of his retinue, as by the personal qualities which are among the hereditary possessions of our Royal House. It is not easy to determine the shades of Western character which most surely appeal to the Oriental mind. An Englishman may steep himself in the philosophy and literature of the East, and know more about Indians than they know of themselves, and yet arouse nothing but their curiosity or contempt. Lady Herbert Stanley, "a lady who is very good at describing," and the author of "Bother" that none was so ready to gain the confidence and respect of Asiatics than an Englishman, once wrote, and positive naval captain of the old school. Lord Mayo, more than any other Viceroy, achieved popularity with a apparent effort, and it may, perhaps, be asserted, as a general rule, that unalloyed dignity beamed with genial kindness, goes farther to make an Englishman liked in India than any other merit he may display. If this be correct, there is no need to seek for a better explanation of the unimpeachable fact that the Prince of Wales, like the King and the Duke of Cornwall, before him, can leave India with the full assurance that his sojourn there will ever be gratefully remembered.

Of the pomp and circumstance that attended the Royal progress, the processions and displays, the military parades and civic exercises, we have had an almost daily record. Time has been spared, too, for shooting parties, in which the Prince has shown the same ardour for the chase which distinguished the early Moghul Emperors, of whom Akbar decorated the milestones near Agra with hundreds of thousands of oxen's horns, his hunting trophies; while Jehangir boasted that he had slain eighty-six tigers and ninety wild boars with his own hand. The Prince shot his first tiger in the Rajpoot State of Jaipur; and, in Gwalior, early in the present month, the Royal bag included nine tigers and three panthers. A spring fever in the Nepal Terai had to be abandoned owing to an outbreak of cholera; but in Rajputana, Central India, Hyderabad, and Mysore the Prince had enjoyed excellent sport. The only other notable changes in the programme were the omission of Duff's, Elbera, and Simla from the itinerary. In most respects, however, the Royal party had closely followed its intended route. The interest of India cannot be exhausted in a few months; but, thanks to the extension of railway communication, the Prince and Princess have visited all the chief centres of population, and most of the places famous in history; and they have been entertained by nearly all the more important ruling princes in their picturesque capitals. The tour will be towns vied with each other in the grandeur of their hospitality. At Agra and Delhi the Royal tourists marvelled, as every traveller must, at the splendid monuments of the Moghul dominions. At many-templed Benares they were in the heart of Hinduism. The golden fane at Amritsar and the tomb of the Lion of the Punjab at Lahore recalled for them the days when the Sikh power was a rival to our own. The Residency at Lucknow as well as the Ridge, the Kashmir gate, and the grave of Nicholson at Delhi, and for the Princess the infamous well at Cawnpore, revived memories, both glorious and sad, of the Mutiny. At Seringapatam, our earlier wars with Hyder Ali and Tippu Sahib and the victories of Wellesley and Cornwallis, were brought to mind. The Khyber and Bolan Passes led them to the very portals of the Empire, and near Rawalpindi the Prince reviewed one of the nine divisions of the Army which, if need be, will take the field to protect its borders from invasion. With no inconsiderable knowledge, gained by observation and intercourse of the land and people, Their Royal Highnesses are now returning: and the ties that bind India to the distant Western Isles, which are responsible for its welfare, will be all the stronger for the sympathies happily awakened by their journey within its confines.

The Prince and Princess of Wales arrived here this morning, and were presented with an address from the municipality, to which His Royal Highness replied.

In the afternoon the Prince of Wales unveiled a statue of Queen Victoria.

Afterwards Their Royal Highnesses received visits from the Mirs of Sind. The Princess wore a shamrock in honour of St. Patrick's day.

In one respect, and one only, the Royal progress through the Indian Empire has been unfortunate. It synchronised with a change of Government, a general election, and a period of intense and passionate excitement in domestic politics. With their thoughts absorbed in the cataclysmic struggle at home, few people have been able to follow with close interest the details of an apparently uneventful journey in the East. And from this point of view the tour has suffered in another way. It followed rather too closely upon the Delhi Durbar, which carried spectacular magnificence to a pitch seldom reached before in India and never, perhaps, destined to be attained again. Accounts of Oriental pageantry, pursued with avidity when King Edward VII. was their central figure thirty years ago, fell rather faintly on ears still echoing with descriptions of the sumptuous scenes enacted at the old Imperial capital during Lord Curzon's viceroyalty.

But this circumstance should not be permitted to obscure the real significance of the Princess tour, which has on the whole successfully accomplished the purposes for which it was undertaken. It was not planned to amuse or entertain the public at home, but to produce certain results, clearly conceived though, of course, never precisely formulated, in India itself. That country in all its sections and geographical divisions, has been accustomed from the immemorial to purely personal rule, nor do the vast majority of Orientals even now understand any other system. The Governor-General-in-Council, the Cabinet, the Secretary of State, the Imperial Parliament, are incomprehensible abstractions to them. "The golden link of the Crown" is a bond of the utmost practical value in keeping together the heterogeneous provinces and the miscellaneous nationalities of India. The people believe that the King-Emperor, the Kaisar-i-Hind, is the supreme source of authority, and that the various high personages with whom they are in more or less direct contact—Commissioners, Lieutenant-Governors, the Viceroy himself,—are no more than his servants, high-placed but ordinary mortals like themselves. The sentimental reverence attaching to Royalty in the East is something in which we are now but faintly reminiscent in the West. Nobody can have mingled, as I have done with the native crowd in all the great cities of India, during the Royal entries and processions, without being keenly conscious of this fact. To merely look upon the face of the Shahzada is an emotional experience for the Indian peasant. The tour was carefully planned so as to give this opportunity to as many people as possible; and there is, with one or two exceptions, not a province or Native State in which tens of hundreds of thousands of persons have not travelled from their homes and poured into the streets of the local capitals to see the Prince and Princess pass by, and to go back to their villages, and talk of the great event for years to come, of the grand-on of the Queen whose name is revered in every cottage, and the son of the King, whose personality is also becoming exceedingly well realised throughout the peninsula.

So much for the people. As regards the Native Princes, the great and minor feudatories, and the native aristocracy generally, the effect has been equally marked. Many of these Chiefs and Rulers it must be remembered are imbued with a pride of birth which is as justifiable as any feeling of the kind can be for a man whose ancestors were kings before Bourbons or Hohenzollerns were heard of, one in whose veins runs the blood of the Mahometan Emperors, may have some excuse for thinking something of his race. It is among the standing difficulties of our situation in India that the power of these high-born personages is not, and never can be, quite equal to their pretensions. In recent years they have, to a large extent, reconciled themselves with the facts. The descendant of the Sangods or of the Kings of the Carnatic is well aware that certain great officials in India, sprung perhaps from the middle classes, are far more influential than themselves: they treat the Residents with deference, the Governors, and Viceroy with the respect due to their status. Yet it is a great satisfaction to them to be placed, once in a way, in personal contact with the Imperial House through its future head, and not merely through its servants and delegates. There is not a reigning Chief—and almost every reigning Chief of importance, except those of the extreme south, was visited or received—who does not regard the attentions paid to him by the Prince of Wales as an honour far greater than any that could be conferred on him by the Government of India.

Moreover, the tour has helped to bring home to them the fact, of which the most enlightened and high-spirited of these feudatories are becoming increasingly conscious, namely, that they are not so much our subjects as sharers with us in the triumphs and responsibilities of the Empire, of which the King is the head. It may be added that the personal impression created by the Royal travellers on the native princes and nobles was extremely favourable; while Their Royal Highnesses themselves could hardly fail to be gratefully cognisant of the lavish Oriental hospitality, the ungrudging courtesy, bestowed upon them by rulers like the Nizam, the Maharaja of Gwalior, the Maharana of Udaipur, and others, and by wealthy members of the native aristocracy such as the Maharaja of Benares. Nor can the visit have failed to accelerate the growing movement in favour of sound, and even progressive, administration in the Native States. The time has gone by when these States were nearly all backward and chaotic, requiring constant pressure from the Indian Government. There were several "naughty children" at the native courts when the King paid his visit: there are hardly any now. The Prince must have noticed little difference between the best of the dependent principalities and our own territories; and his trip must have confirmed the salutary belief, which our rendition of Mysore has strengthened—that the age of annexation in India is past, and that all we ask of a native ruler is that he shall govern his people as well as those under our own officials, or, if possible, better.

Nor should one ignore the meaning of the visit to the Anglo-Indian community. There is no body of persons who work harder and do more useful service than those who, as civilians, military officials, or private individuals, maintain, in their several ways, the Empire of Britain in Asia. They work hard, their material reward is sufficient, but certainly not excessive: it is their legitimate complaint that their labours are habitually ignored or misunderstood at home. The visit paid to their several local centres by the Heir-Apparent, the "functions" and parades, the honours distributed in judicious moderation, the balls, garden-parties, and receptions, the oft-reiterated ceremonies which the Prince and Princess went through with unswerving cheerfulness in town after town—all these things made bright spots in the rather monotonous level of Anglo-Indian life, and were thoroughly appreciated. They were taken as a compliment officially rendered on the part of the people of England; and they do not get too many of these compliments at the Indian civil and military stations.

The tour was seasonable: it came at the close of a period during which opinion in India has been in a somewhat restless and effervescent condition. For this there have been several causes. India, like every other part of Asia, has felt the dynamic shock caused by the Russo-Japanese war. The defeat of the Muscovite power has been overshadowed in the bazars by the revelation that a purely Asiatic State has met and mastered one, which is regarded, in India at least, as purely European. The East, in fact, is supposed to have for once challenged the West and won. Erroneous as the deduction may be, it has had the curious effect of causing a certain mental disturbance, especially among the semi-educated class in the Indian towns—an emotion, of course, eagerly cultivated by the agitators, who make it their business to preach a vague discontent with the British rule. The Swadeshi movement, ostensibly economic in its origin, has been energetically taken up by the same faction, who contrived to associate it, skilfully enough, with the local opposition to the division of the immense Province of Bengal into two administrative districts. There were some apprehensive Anglo-Indians who feared that the disaffection was not confined to the professional politicians and the journalists of the vernacular Press; they thought it might have touched the masses. The best answer to these suggestions was the whole-hearted demonstrations of welcome which the Prince received from the swarming thousands who crowded the streets, not only in Bombay and in the up-country capitals, like Delhi and Lahore, but in sun-kissed Madras and Mysore, and in the Bengal metropolis itself. Politics is still skin-deep with the Indian populations; but loyalty is an instinct, though it requires the visible presence of some one very near the Throne itself to call forth its amplest manifestations.

There is a kindred aspect of the matter on which a word may be said. It is not doubted that the controversy between Lord Curzon and Lord Kitchener and its sequel had a considerable effect on Indian public opinion. Natives were disconcerted by the dispute between the two greatest officials in the dependency, nor was their confidence restored by the sudden disappearance from the scene of the more highly-placed and conspicuous of the two. To many natives it must have seemed a warning salutary, perhaps, but disturbing, that even the loftiest member of the hierarchy, the "Lord Sahib" himself, is but a servant, liable to dismissal by the unknown power in the distant capital across the sea. It was distinctly useful to have this startling lesson speedily followed by a concrete example of that permanent and stable element which Orientals understand. The presence of the Prince of Wales was illustrative of the stability which underlies the changes of officialdom and the flux of parties. Viceroys, Commanders-in-Chief, Governors of Provinces, Judges, Magistrates, come and go. But the Throne and all that it means to the Asiatic intelligence, remain as the visible embodiment of the British supremacy by which the peoples of India are shielded from domestic disorder and external aggression. A Royal tour, such as that which has just been brought to a successful conclusion, is valuable if only because it tends to stamp that essential truth more deeply upon the public mind throughout our Eastern realms.

Birmingham Daily Post.—By the time this letter reaches England Their Royal Highnesses, the Prince and Princess of Wales will have brought their tour through British India to a conclusion, and H. M. S. Renown will be almost on the point of leaving Karachi on her homeward journey. The present, therefore, may afford a fitting opportunity for a brief review of the possible effects of the Royal visit on our Indian Dependency. India, of course, holds a unique position in our Empire. She is hardly bound to England by those ties of sentiment which hold the colonies and the mother-country in an imperial grip, and she is certainly not a conquered country in the generally accepted sense of that word. Englishmen must always remember, when talking about India, that her population is as diverse in religion and language as are the nations of Europe, and that successive waves of conquest have left the inhabitants in a deplorable condition of poverty and helplessness. The East India Company in the early days had no wish to interfere in the government of the land, but they were forced to defend their trade from the attacks of the French, and gradually the Company adopted a more aggressive policy. Of the Army fighting for the Company four-fifths were natives, and to-day two-thirds of our Indian Army are children of the soil. These facts are necessary to be taken into consideration when dealing with the problem of British rule in India. In spite of the opinion of the older generation of Anglo-Indians that after a reasonable length of time we should have accomplished our mission and ought therefore to leave India to govern herself, the fact is that our relations with this land of mystery and enchantment, instead of weakening have grown closer and closer. It must be supposed that these ties are purely those of affection and sentiment for British rule; although, it can safely be affirmed at the outset that the Royal visit has called forth in a particularly marked degree the loyalty of the native princes towards the King-Emperor. Binding England to India is a vast and increasing volume of trade, which would cause great commercial loss to the United Kingdom, if through unforeseen circumstances our present relations were destroyed. India has a very poor idea of nationality. Municipalities exist in the larger towns, but they are without the sense of corporate and civic life which is so characteristic a feature of our English cities, and neither do they seem to be actuated by the principles which are the very essence of local self-government at home. While other nations have progressed and gone forward in the march of civilization; India to a large extent has remained stationary, the large mass of natives to-day living under similar conditions to what their ancestors did centuries ago. Civilization, no doubt, has been at work, but it has touched only the fringe, and those who can read and write form a very small fraction of the community. Under the peaceful rule of Great Britain life and prosperity are secure, and the toiling millions can pursue their avocations without fear of oppression. This is something to have gained, but it must be confessed that the natives for the most part are but passively indifferent to British rule. For centuries they have been harnessed, and downtrodden, and now they accept, though without enthusiasm, the freedom which a tolerant British Raj wisely gives them. With the educated classes things are very different. Some are quietly but actively engaged in an endeavour to foster a national spirit. A worthy object in itself, if sought for India's good, but one cannot help thinking that underneath the desire is the motive to be quit of England, although they must know that the country so far is not the least fitted for democratic government. Others criticise the Government, and appeal for the constitution in a country where autocracy is as firmly engrained to-day as ever it was. Neither is the pen of the sedition-monger silent, and in the native press it is no uncommon thing to find a just and humane Government held up to ridicule, and sometimes to revilement.

The Royal visit could not have come at a more auspicious or opportune moment, for lately the horizon has been clouded by one or two matters, which have not favourably impressed the native mind towards England. One cause for regret was the trouble between Lord Kitchener and Lord Curzon, another was the Anglo-Japanese Treaty, while a third factor, which has not secured the attention at home which it deserves, is the Swadeshi movement. The resignation of Lord Curzon, and the clause relating to defence of India in the famous treaty are both taken by the famous natives more as a sign of weakness than of strength. Lord Curzon may have been criticised for many of his actions, but in the final struggle which led to his retirement public opinion here was almost unanimously in his favour. The native could only see that the representative of the King, who was governing India by express command of the King-Emperor had been overthrown by a soldier. To them, with their autocratic ideas of government, such a thing was impossible and the retirement of the Governor of India was a step which they failed to comprehend. About the constitutional principle of the subjection of the military to the civil element they cared little, but they were certainly rather amazed when they found that the personal representative of the King was hardly the important and supreme Chief they had hitherto imagined. From more than one quarter one hears the wish expressed that the King-Emperor could see fit to appoint a permanent Viceroy of royal blood, but, of course, this is a large question with arguments both for and against. So far as the treaty is concerned they ask, "Is England afraid to increase the Indian Army?" and "Do we distrust the natives in the defence of their country?" It is a thorny point, full of difficulties. The possibility of bringing in an outside army to help in the defence of India is very much resented by the natives. One feels, however, that the British Government are undoubtedly right in taking special precautions to defend the north-west frontier. It is a curious historical fact that invasions of India have all come from that quarter, and one is not unnaturally prompted to speculate whether history will again repeat itself. The answer is one which can only be left to the future to decide, and while the contingency may be remote the danger is there, and preparations must be made by a far-seeing Government. The partition of Bengal, or as it is far more correctly called, the "duplicating of the administrative machinery of a hitherto too large province," has stirred up much feeling, and resulted in the movement, which goes by the name of "Swadeshi." Notwithstanding the attempts of the Government to stamp out dissatisfaction, and the advice of those who thought that by leaving the movement alone it would die a natural death, it has assumed considerable dimensions. Local industries have been stimulated, and there is a large demand in Bengal for Indian-made clothes in preference to British goods. Only a year ago Manchester dhoties fetched a 12% better price than Bombay dhoties of approximately the same quality. Now this difference has disappeared and Swadeshim is a living force.

The visit of Their Royal Highnesses has been an epoch-making event in the history of India. Everywhere they were received with warm and genuine enthusiasm and unlimited hospitality, and in the Native States, the Indian rulers manifested the greatest loyalty and devotion. Nothing whatever has occurred to mar or interfere in any way with the success of the Royal visitors' triumphal progress. The Prince and Princess of Wales will have the satisfaction of knowing that whatever they have done they have been instrumental in deepening the attachment and affection of the Indian people towards the British Throne. One of the significant features of the Royal progress through the streets of the large towns was the hearty character of the greeting which Their Royal Highnesses' presence called forth. It seemed as though the native for the time being had lost his usually cold reserve, and was only too proud to be allowed to pay his homage, or mark of respect, to his King-Emperor's son. The crowds in Bombay, Calcutta, Madras, and the other important cities behaved just like an ordinary English crowd, which usually is far more demonstrative than the Eastern. Here, however, on this occasion, the people accorded the Royal visitors a right loyal welcome, and there was just as much cheering and waving of handkerchiefs as would be the case at home. The Royal drives through the native bazaars of the principal towns did an immense amount of good, and it is remarkable to notice the large number of coloured prints and pictures of both the Prince and Princess, which now adorn the walls of the native shops. As often as not they hang side by side with, or in the centre of a group of curious and weird allegorical drawings representing some phase of Eastern religious mythology. The capitals of the great feudatory States were not less backward in evidencing attachment to the British Raj. Their progress through the Native States had the effect of creating a firmer affection, which, for the sake of India, one hopes will be of a lasting character. At Indore Their Royal Highnesses met the Central Indian Chiefs; in the fairy city of Udaipur they were the guests of a great Rajput chieftain; the Maharaja of Jaipur entertained them in his celebrated Pink City, and the "Lord of the Desert," the Maharaja of Bikanir in his sandy home. They received the Junjah chieftains at Lahore, and then far away north the Maharaja of Jammu gave them a cordial welcome. Coming back to Central India Scindia greeted the guests with all the pomp and magnificence of the East. After the short visit to Burma the Prince and Princess passed through Mysore, and thence to Hyderabad, the sole survivor of the old Deccan Mohammedan kingdoms, and brought to a conclusion the lengthy tour through Native States. Their Royal Highnesses met the native rulers in open and friendly intercourse, and gained their hearts in a manner only possible by a personal visit. At Benares, the Holy City of the Hindus, the cordiality of the welcome was most marked, and throughout the desire has been to pay to the King-Emperor's son the greatest honours that the East could bestow. The same spirit is to be found in the words of the Tashi Lama of Shigatse, the most venerable figure in Buddhism, when he said to the Prince at Hastings House, Calcutta:—"I have come from a distant country, over mountains, rivers, and snowy passes to meet Your Royal Highness, and I would gladly have travelled ten times the distance for the honour of such an interview." A Parsee well known in Bombay, when presented to the Prince, naively remarked, "Prince, you have made us all one," and this remark is true in regard to India generally. Certainly it is to be applied with peculiar force to Calcutta, where the situation was regarded, with a certain amount of anxiety. The agitation about the partition of Bengal, however, did not interfere in the slightest degree with the remarkable spontaneity of Calcutta's reception, and the leaders of the anti-Partition movement showed their wisdom by rising above party and legislative acts. The people of India have seen the son of their King-Emperor, and have had brought vividly before their minds the blessings of British rule. The happy memories connected with the visit will not soon be forgotten, and those who are best calculated to express an opinion declare that the presence of the Prince and Princess of Wales in India, short as it has been, has yet been helpful in attaching the people more firmly to the Imperial Throne, and the beneficent results will become more and more apparent in the years to come.

Daily Despatch.—The Prince and the Princess of Wales concluded yesterday a tour which all the correspondents agree in describing as memorable. There is not the least occasion to doubt the appropriateness of the word; it is only inappropriate if applied to the journey as followed by the public at home. Here in England we have to confess that this splendid progress of the heir to the throne has failed to impress us. The glory and glitter of the pageants, the wonderful background of nature and art upon which they were displayed, the panorama, of races and religions, white cities and dazzling skies, the calm wonder of the mountain and the fertile loveliness of the plain—the vision of these and their like has passed and left the home-bred imagination of cold as before. The pens of the descriptive writers are now giving way to the dull industry of the statisticians, who know to a decimal point how many miles the Prince and Princess travelled, how many speeches His Royal Highness made, and how many banquets he attended—which is probably more than he knows himself. It is to be feared that arithmetic will not impress the public if descriptive writing cannot. The explanation is that our thoughts have been very much occupied at home. The public imagination has had no time to travel, being required first for guessing the solution of the Balfourian word-puzzle and then for ascertaining the probable legislative quotient after dividing social aspiration by Parliamentary time. Again, the significance of the tour was blurred by the ceremonial extravagance of Lord Curzon's Delhi Durbar of two or three years ago. Fortunately, the trip was not designed for the amusement of the home public, which always has the Divorce Court to fall back upon if politics fail. Neither was it designed altogether for the pleasure of the Prince of Wales, who might have sought, had he been free to choose, a less exhausting holiday. It was meant to impress our Indian fellow-subjects, and at the same time to extend the Imperial education of one who will some day reign over them and us. In both these objects it appears to have been quite successful. The Prince acknowledges that he has profited greatly by what he has seen; and the enthusiasm evoked in India, and particularly in the feudatory States, cannot, even allowing for pardonable exaggeration by the special correspondents, have been artificial, nor can its effects be other than lasting. India has the benefit of a devoted and most competent civil service, and has been ruled by a series of high-minded and patriotic Viceroys. None of them can do for India, however, what the members of the Royal Family can. The throne strikes the imagination as no official can do. Great Britain, as well as India, should therefore be grateful to the Prince and Princess for their assertion of the symbols of our rule.

Daily Mail.—Yesterday Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales left Karachi for their homeward voyage. They passed the afternoon quietly, and towards sunset drove to the wharf where the Renown was lying. Some time was spent in personal leave-taking, and it was growing dusk when the white-hulled battleship, whose band struck up "Auld Lang Syne," steamed slowly from the shore, the Prince saluting and the Princess bowing her adieux in response to the repeated cheering.

Lord Lamington signalled the Bombay Presidency's farewell from the Indian Marine troopship Dufferin, which accompanied the Renown to sea; his message was:—"The tour will live in the recollections of the people as a joyous memory. Marked by Your Royal Highness's kindly interest and graciousness, it will have attached them more than ever to the throne of the King-Emperor.

The tour, from beginning to end, has been an unqualified success. No holiday could have been more interesting or instructive, and it would be strange indeed if Their Royal Highnesses did not bring away with them many notable and picturesque memories. They landed in Bombay on November, 9, and about a week later began their Indian pilgrimage. It was of a more extensive character than that planned for His Majesty the King, when he in 1875, as Prince of Wales, visited India. In those days India had only 7,000 miles of railway; now she has over 27,000 miles. Many of the places in the recent tour were not included in the one thirty years ago because either no railway communications existed or the places were not considered safe for so august a tourist. Indore, Udaipur, Jaipur, Bikanir, Lahore, Peshawar, Rawalpindi, Jammu, Amritsar, Delhi, Agra, and Gwalior, were visited between November 15 and Christmas Day. After that Lucknow, Calcutta, Darjiling and Calcutta (the return visit) were the favoured cities. Then began perhaps the most novel feature of the tour—the trip to Rangoon and Mandalay. Returning to Madras, the Royal visitors, called at Mysore, Bangalore, Haiderabad, Daulatabad, Benares, Bettiah, Aligarh, Simla, Quetta, and finally at Karachi. Their Royal Highnesses have thus seen the north, south, east and west of India, as well as that ultima thule—Upper Burma. They have experienced all varieties of Indian climate though not the real hot variety. They have seen the Rajput princes, the Normans of India, in their feudal splendour; they have seen Hindu and Mahomedan princes at home and they have seen most of the famous sights of India, in which may justly be included the machinery of British administration at work.

Many pens have been devoted to the task of estimating the effect of the Royal tour upon the Indian peoples. Most of these harp upon obvious notes. But the fulness of time will probably reveal that the greatest influence, far-reaching in many directions, has been the presence of the Princess of Wales. The point, of course, implies a great deal more than the mere fact that this has been the first occasion when the wife of the Heir Apparent, the gracious lady who may one day be the Queen-Consort of England, has visited India. The visit of the Princess involves a very much larger question. There is a theory extant in the East to the effect that among rising races or nations men control affairs and women are neither heard nor seen. They have their influence, as women always have had, but it must be hidden. We are not unfamiliar either with the theory or the practice even in this country; and none has been quicker to recognise this feature than the high-caste Indian whether Hindoo or Mahomedan. In India, however, the purdah system of the seclusion of women marks a sharp distinction between the Eastern and the Western interpretation of the theory. And as the purdah or screen has become somewhat of a tyranny the seemingly unreserved life of the English "mumsaheb" has begun for some time a source of curiosity and envy to her Indian sister. There was never perhaps a more popular Vicerine than Lady Curzon, and her life and movements during the great Coronation Durbar opened very wide the eyes of cultured and aristocratic Indian ladies; but more remarkable even than that was the appearance among them, unveiled, of the Queen—that is to be. Large lustrous dark eyes opened still wider at that spectacle. The affability of Her Royal Highness, it need scarcely be said, won all hearts. But who can estimate accurately the depth of the impression created in the more or less rigid home-life of the superior native or the influence the visit of the Princess will exercise upon those who have seen and conversed with her?

Normally, there is, from the woman's standpoint one great distinction between India and England. Here shopping gives zest to life among fair, if frivolous, ladies; and bargain-hunting is rare sport. In India there is in the most places no shopping. Ladies do not go shopping, the shops, come to them. It is a quaint custom. After tiffin the mem-sahab and her friends rest in the verandah and there comes along the "bokkus-wallah or box-bearer." Of course, he is no box-bearer himself. Low-caste natives carry huge tin boxes in his wake. He is usually a noteworthy individual—this Eastern Autolyceus. Arrayed in spotless white with a white turban and a richly-hued shawl round his loins, he proceeds to show his wares with conspicuous tact. The inspection of these boxes affords to ladies keen pleasure, for Abdul Kareem knows his business; he has not only travelled through the cities of India, but often enough he knows the shops in Oxford Street and Piccadilly and has walked along the boulevards of Paris. Daintily new and tempting goods, and in the right taste, too, soon pass from hand to hand. If the mem-sahab be experienced then begins the tug-of-war—bargaining. In the end Abdul Kareem yields with a sigh of resignation. He is supposed to be vanquished, but in all probability he has netted on an average a profit of 50 per cent. and more. The Princess of Wales has had an insight in this kind of shopping. She has also visited the bazaars, and no doubt the European stores in the large cities. But the native bazaar is at times a sight worth seeing, provided one's olfactory nerves are strong. A long Indian street with quaint houses and shops on either side, is distinctly picturesque, full of colour and indescribable odours. Here sits a butcher in front of his little cabin; he has but the fragments, cut into long strips, of a goat. No one wants joints from this shop. The strips of meat are used for "kabab," that is to say, balls of meat highly spiced and roasted on skewers. There is a bangleshop, and the rows of coloured glass bracelets which the native women wear by the score look in the sunlight like so many captive rainbows. Next there is the powder shop, with its pyramids of curious looking red, white, black and yellow substances. These are used as caste-marks on the forehead of men and women. Hard by is the dyer dyeing his clothes. Near him sits the pan seller. He is among piles of green, glossy leaves neatly arranged. He takes a couple of these leaves smears them with powdered lime, adds a little arcaea nut, some spices and then, deftly folding the leaves, fixes them with a clove. It is the famous betel nut pan for chewing. Every one in the bazaar is chewing pan. There in the distance is a jeweller's shop. It has some silver filigree work. Apart from that there is not apparently £5 worth of stock on view in the place. But if you are armed with a proper introduction, the humble-looking individual who owns the shop will produce from some inner receptacle ropes of pearls fringed with rare amethysts and jewels that would ransom kingdoms. Alongside is a sweet shop with enormous piles of roasted Indian corn and "goolabey-rewri" or Indian toffee, weird, strange mixture. The presence of the Princess in some of these typical Indian streets must have caused no small measure of sonation. Their Royal Highnesses will no doubt come home laden with Indian curios and other interesting and valuable objects. These will probably be exhibited in due course; and if that is done, it is to be hoped Lord Curzon's collection, which we believe is exceedingly rich and varied, and which has not yet been unpacked, will be exhibited at the same time. They will be things worth seeing.

Daily Telegraph.—Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales have said their farewells to India, and have already started on their way towards home. The Indian portion of the Royal tour came to a close with the ceremonies at Karachi, where the Prince in an interesting speech, said that the visit had been to the Princess and to himself "an unending and unbroken series of happy and most instructive experiences." Those words fitly sum up a tour which has now spread over many months. The Prince and Princess arrived in India on November 9th of last year, and have been travelling almost incessantly throughout the length and breadth of the vast Dependency, seeing as many of the great sights of India as possible. At the same time, they have attended innumerable official functions, which must have made the features of their Royal Highnesses familiar to hundreds of thousands of those who one day will, in the natural order of things, be their loyal subjects. "We have seen enough," said the Prince, "to make India a living reality to us." The programme of the tour was as faithfully adhered to as it was skillfully drawn up. Very few cuts were made, and those only under pressure of necessity. Continued bad weather caused the abandonment of the trip to Darjeeling, Ellora, and Simla; cholera interfered with a sporting tour in the Nepal Terai. With these exceptions the Prince and Princess faced cheerfully their arduous round of duty and pleasure, and wherever they went captured those with whom they came in contact. We shall not attempt to retrace so lengthy an Odyssey, but one or two of its principal episodes and incidents may well be recalled. The Prince of Wales is not likely to forget his ride into the far-famed Khyber Pass, as far as Lundi Kotal, where the Khyber Rifles, who formed his escort, are recruited from the turbulent tribes which are as often in a state of war with the Indian Government as in a State of peace, and where the ten headmen, who brought their tributary offerings of sheep, control a fighting force of some twenty-five thousand men. For the first time, moreover, the Heir to the Throne has visited the great province of Burma, which, when the King was in India in 1875, owed no allegiance whatever to the Queen-Empress. Quetta again, the head-quarters of British rule and influence in Baluchistan, and one of the chief strategical positions in the military defence of India, was thirty years ago a petty and unconsidered fortress of the Khan of Khelat.

A Prince who has visited Quetta and the Khyber, and has reviewed at Rawal Pindi fifty-five thousand British troops—at their very best in the North-West, and ready for instant action—will have gained impressions of the highest value on the greatest military problem of the British Empire. Who, again, can estimate the political consequences that may flow from the change of cordial visits at Calcutta between the Prince of Wales and the Tashi Lama, the spiritual ruler of Tibet, and the first of his degree to cross the lofty barriers which separate India from Tibet, and enter into direct relations with the Indian Government? The tour of the Prince and Princess has naturally been exceedingly welcome to all Anglo-Indians from the Governor-General to the youngest servant of the Crown, but perhaps, if there is one feature which stands out in special prominence it is the cordiality of welcome which the native Princess have shown, without exception, to the son of the King-Emperor. Wherever the Prince of Wales went, whether, to the small Rajput States of Udaipur, Jaipur, and Bikanir, or whether enjoying the superb hospitality of the Maharaja Scindia at Gwalior, or of the Nizam at Hyderabad, or of Sir Pratap Singh, the Maharaja of Jammu and Kashmir, his manifest desire has been to do honour to these proud Princes, who have repeatedly, during the last few years, displayed their chivalrous loyalty to their overlord, the Emperor of India. The British policy of scrupulously respecting their sovereignty and of interfering as little as possible in their dominions so long as they govern reasonably well, has borne excellent fruit. They are encouraged to be strong and living factors in the administration of India, and they are eager to make common cause with the supreme Government in India's defence. The visit of the Prince of Wales to their capitals, his review of their troops and his participation in their sport, will strengthen the ties which bind them in loyal fealty to their Emperor. As for the manifold peoples of India, they are not so articulate as the people of the West, but nowhere whether at Bombay, Madras, Calcutta, Delhi, Benares, Lahore, or any of the great centres of population visited by the Prince and Princess, has there been an adverse cry heard, despite the anti-partition agitation which aroused such bitter feeling in Bengal, and the delusive impressions made on the native mind by the victory of Japan over her Western adversary. It is no wonder that the Prince quits India "with feelings," as he says, "of gratitude and affection."

Nor is the tour even yet concluded with the exception of the voyage home. The Renown will make a short stay at one of the Egyptian ports, sufficient to give the Prince and Princess an opportunity of visiting Cairo, and seeing at least a few of the wonders of Egypt. Some of those wonders date back to the most remote periods of antiquity—a thousand years are to Egypt no more than a hundred elsewhere in the Old World, and no more than ten in the new—others belong to the last few years of our own time. The latter stand to the credit of a handful of Englishmen rather than to the credit of England. No one can be particularly proud of the Egyptian policy of British statesmen during the critical eighties of last century, and for some years later. They did not know their own mind, and waited on events. Happily for England, however, there was one Englishman in Egypt who did know his mind, and the British statesmanship has since retrieved its reputation by giving him its implicit confidence. The regenerate Egypt, which is now the envy and wonder of the world, is the handiwork of Lord Cromer, assisted, as he has been, by a succession of brilliant men, trained under his direction. In spite of the capitulations, in spite of persistent opposition offered in the early years by other nations, in spite of the enormous debt by which Egypt was saddled and the evil tradition of Ismail's ruinous extravagance, in spite of the entirely anomalous position of the British Resident and the British Government in a country nominally independent, save for the suzerainty of the Sultan, Egypt has been recreated on a sound financial and commercial basis. The prosperity of the country has leaped up in the last decade, and for the first time for centuries the wretched down-trodden fellahs have their full share in the bounties which have been scattered along the Nile Valley. Where the fellah earned two piastres he now earns three; the Government have rescued him from the local usurer, reduced his taxes, and raised the tide and overflow of the Nile, on which the welfare of Egypt has always depended. To the south, the great provinces of the Soudan have been reclaimed from the most atrocious savagery, and a railway now runs from the Red Sea across the waste of sand to the new capital which has risen on the ruins of Gordon's Khartoum. The work is not yet finished. Indeed, it has but just begun. Hardly more than the foundations, in the opinion of those who have faith in Egypt's future, have been laid, and vast schemes of irrigation will take many years and many millions before they can be carried into effect. But the triumph already achieved is a splendid monument of what capable Englishmen can do in the way of governing men, if they are not hampered by interfering politicians at home. The Prince of Wales does well to conclude his Indian tour with a visit to Egypt. But for India there would be no British Resident in Cairo; but for Indian experience it is hardly conceivable that Englishmen would have been able so soon to set Egypt on her feet again. The visit of the Prince and Princess is the best compliment that can be paid to the organising genius of Lord Cromer.

The last day spent by the Prince and Princess of Wales in India was intimately associated with leave-taking ceremonies. An inspection of the 130th Baluchi Regiment preceded the investiture at which honours were conferred on those directly associated with the Royal tour. The list is generally regarded as fittingly recognising the excellent service which has been so loyally rendered. To Major-General Duff falls the unique distinction of receiving the K. C. V. O. on the same day as he is gazetted Chief of the Staff.

In the cool of the evening the Prince and Princess of Wales drove a distance of four miles to where His Majesty's ship Renown was lying, and spent half an hour in cordially bidding every one good-bye. Then they finally said adieu on board the battleship to the staff who have done so much to render their Indian visit a pleasant memory. As the Renown glided from her moorings her band playing "Auld Lang Syne," India's last glimpse was of the Prince with his telescope, and the Princess with her field-glasses, standing on the port quarter of the vessel. When the Renown emerged from the harbour Lord Lamington, Governor of Bombay, signalled the Presidency's farewell from the troopship Dufferin, saying that the visit of their Royal Highnesses will ever live in the recollections of the people of India as a joyous memory.

The following is the text of Lord Lamington's message of farewell:

On behalf of the Bombay Presidency, I beg to express regret at the termination of your visit which will ever live in the recollections of the people as a joyous memory, and which marked by your Royal Highnesses kindly interest and graciousness, will have attached them more than ever to the throne of His Majesty the King-Emperor.

The Princess's long tour is over. For the last four months and more he and the Princess of Wales have traced an unresting course over wide India from north to south, from west to east. Day after day the Royal train has steamed into a new centre of commerce, or of administration, or of historic interest, and every where, so far as the English inhabitants and officials of the place were concerned, the same pleasant but perhaps monotonous round of duty lay before Their Royal Highnesses. But the result is that there is now, in all the length and breadth of our huge Asiatic empire, scarcely a responsible officer, civil or military, with whom and with whose sphere of work the Emperor of India's heir has not been made personally acquainted. There is hardly a place of European importance that has not been given the opportunity of welcoming the Prince, hardly a native State whose ruler has not been allowed either to welcome him in his own palace or has not at least journeyed to pay his respects in durbār, and there receive attar and pan from the Shahzādā, whose coming had been looked forward to with such keen interest and impatience. A link has been established such as the conventional West cannot, perhaps, entirely understand. Man to man, the Prince and his future subjects have met, bread and salt have been eaten, and among the multitudes of Hindustan a vague sense of loyalty to an unknown source of future authority and honours has been exchanged for a real and ineffaceable memory of a man among them.

Nor is this all—perhaps it is not even the most important result of the long and arduous work of the past four months. There could hardly fail to have arisen in the mind of the common people of India a feeling that, so far at least as they were concerned, the final authority for all that, humanly speaking affected their daily lives and duties, their prosperity or their misery, their famine or their abundance, centered at Simla or in Calcutta. Theoretically, it is possible that the dependence of the Indian Government upon that in London is, to an infinitely small extent, recognised by the Indian ryot and taxpayer. But it is also clear that the small proportion of the huge population of India which does grasp this fact has of late been able also to understand that in this very Government at home there are changes to be reckoned with, bitter discussions of view, discontinuity even of policy. The Prince has made his visits out here in such a manner that not the wildest political fanatic has been left in doubt as to the impassible gulf that yawns between the varying Ministers and Cabinets of home and the warring interest of military and civil India, on the one side and on the other the impassive continuity above all the disputes of the political arena of the only thing that the East understands and bows down before—the Imperial Throne and dynasty.

This is no small matter. It is a matter of history that Duke William of Normandy secured England by a single act—the conversion of a long series of feudal peoples, with no interests or duties beyond those expected by an immediate overlord, into a state bound together from shore to shore by a personal tie also to the King's own person. This in a way is unfair illustration of what the Prince has done by his visit to India. The old proverb that the road to Delhi is long has too often been adapted to a new rendering, though indeed London is to-day nearer the remotest part of India than under Aurangzeb were the two capitals at Delhi and Daulatabad. This personal proof of the interest and affection which the King-Emperor feels in his great feudalities in Asia comes at a time when it was needed. Administration and development will do much. Perhaps in European eyes nothing else is needed to fulfil the expectation or definition of good government. But in the East, the eye-hunger for a sight of him in whom the majesty of Empire is one day to be embodied is a demand that cannot safely be neglected, and the Prince of Wales has deserved well of the wider Empire by sacrificing much to gratify it. Those who have been round the long course with him will never forget the crowding millions in whose grey lives the sight of the son of their great White Emperor will remain the greatest of all events. Once back again in their villages, the story will never grow old, and the link that has been forged this winter will bind to the Crown the affections of far more than the village pilgrim to Benares, or Peshawur, or Mandalay, who with his own eyes saw the King's son drive by.

To the Princess also belongs credit of an especial kind. There were many who—from no small knowledge of India—foresaw and regretted that the ingrained traditions of the country would necessarily curtail the share she might otherwise have taken in the ceremonies of the tour. It is true that much of the formal work of reception has had to be done by the Prince unaided, but if she found herself at a disadvantage in some matters of sheer convention, Her Royal Highness has more than made up for it by her interest and kindness in other and perhaps more influential ways. From the first she set herself to understand and gain the sympathy of her own sex, and in this she has been wholly and delightfully successful. Especially into the women's hospitals of India has the Princess brought the sunshine of her presence and sympathy. Wherever she has stayed, Her Royal Highness has without delay sought out and visited the sick and suffering behind the purdah. The province and freemasonry of women remains the same in all ages and countries, and if her route through India had been marked by this alone it would have been difficult to estimate the good that had been done thus unobtrusively. But the Princess has also been able in the time necessarily at her sole disposal to see much of the country that the almost interminable public engagements of the Prince rendered it impossible for him to visit. Scarcely anything of interest has escaped Her Royal Highness, and whether it were the stately remains of Buddhism at Sarnath or the traces of that splendid generation of Mahrattas, from whose very lips we dashed the cup of Empire, or, again the life of a village woman or the work of Burmese silk-weavers—into all, instantly and with good knowledge, has she made her sympathy and interest felt. And the route has taken the Imperial visitors over strange and interesting ground indeed.

Before their eyes have passed all that makes up the panorama of our own East, the most gorgeous of them all. Bombay, with her shifting caravanserais, of East and West, prosperous, characterless, and never at rest; Udaipur, with her silver palaces reflected along the blue, still waters of the mountain lake; Jaipur, where the city, gay as Vanity Fair, still holds in check the on-sweep of the desert sand; desert Bikanir, with its Egyptian sunsets and wells 300 ft. deep into the sand; Lahore, the busy capital of a province, and busier centre of Church life; the Khyber, with its frowning rocks, each instinct with a legend or a stern necessity; Jammu, frowned upon the distant ice-cold Himalayan peaks; Amritsar the city of the Sikhs and the stoutest pillar of our house in India; Delhi, royal, lonely and magnificent, dreaming yet of Shah Jehan, of Nadir, and of Nicholson; Agra, the world's memorial of love; Gwalior, with her ancient splendour confused with modern science; Lucknow, the Vallhalla of India; Calcutta, the fragment of the unseen West that savours all Hindustan to-day; Burma, with its royal traditions and its golden spires; opulent Madras, the most liked city of all India; Mysore, the living proof of our disinterestedness; loyal Hyderabad, the living wraith of a vast memory; Benares, the home and centre of all Hindustan, unrivalled, foul, contemptuous, superb; Quetta, one of the watch-towers that look down upon the plain of Armageddon; Karachi, the coming mart and military base of our Central Asia—they have seen them all, and their wanderings are over.

Before we turn back the page on which the story of this tour is recorded, it is but bare justice to recall the unswerving sidelity to the great task which had been set them or both the Prince and Princess of Wales. Nothing even now remains of the hundreds of triumphal arches, or the myriads of festoons, flags, and lanterns, which have almost oppressed the Prince's route with their loyal abundance. The legions have thundered past, and India has returned to her old self. But the memory of this tour will not lightly fade, and that that memory is one which will link us yet more strongly with our Eastern dependency stands most of all to the credit of the two central figures. To the almost sacred names of Queen Victoria and the King, the Prince of Wales has gone some way to adding another in the simple minds of the Indian countrymen. A threefold cord is not quickly broken, and the great work of England in the East goes forward the better to-day for the touch of personal contact which the Prince's presence has supplied, and for the guarantee it has given to those best able to understand it of a great dynastic performance.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The last of the public ceremonies to be performed by the Prince and Princess of Wales prior to their departure from India took place this afternoon. Fittingly it was the unveiling of a statue of the great Queen whose memorials throughout India have given an impressive distinction to the Royal Tour, and have emphasised the Imperial aspect of the Prince's progress through the land to a degree that no other demonstration has equalled. The Sind Memorial, towards which over Rs. 1,08,000 were subscribed the Mir of Khairpur heading the list with a quarter of a lakh, is a fine group of statuary, the work of Mr. Hamo Thorneycroft. It has been erected in front of the Frere Hall named after the late Sir Bartle Frere, who among the high offices he held under the crown, was at one time Commissioner in Sind and accompanied the King-Emperor on his Indian tour thirty years ago. The monument to the late Queen has cost £6,600. It consists of a classically treated architectural pedestal with statues in, bronze around the base and crowned with a colossal white marble statue of the Queen-Empress, wearing her widow's veil and the imperial crown and robes of state, and holding in her hands the sceptre and the orb. On each side of the plinth just below the level of the feet are carved projecting ship's prows emblematic of naval supremacy and worldwide dominion, and at the front is an escutcheon with the Imperial monogram V. R. I. The sculpture in describing his work says that the principal group at the feet of the pedestal represents India approaching Justice and Peace. These are symbolized by two seated figures into whose presence an Indian woman reverently and with an expression of gratitude advances. Peace crowned with flowers, sympathetically leans forward to receive her and points upwards to the statue of the much beloved sovereign and benefactress. Justice blindfolded sits with firm and dignified demeanour holding the scales and sword. These figures are heroic in size, as are also the lion and tiger on either side lying with heads erect as if guarding the monument. At the rear of the pedestal is an allegorical figure of a woman heavily draped and bending to her work pouring water from an urn upon the thirsty soil, while behind there springs up luxuriant vegetation and the rich fruits of the earth. This last figure is a felicitous indication of her fertilizing action of the mighty Indus on which depends the welfare of Sind and was inspired by a happy suggestion from the Hon'ble Mr. Batty.

Appropriately facing the Victoria road, the Memorial is approached by a marble terrace and the grounds around it, to be known hereafter as the Queen's Lawn, will be laid out according to the design already approved.

The unveiling ceremonial was singularly impressive and picturesque. There was a great gathering around the veiled statue, the assembly being extremely brilliant. While school children on the road cheered vigorously, the Prince and Princess were received at the terrace by the Governor of Bombay, Mr. Younghusband, the Commissioner in Sind, and the Chairman, Mr. Mules and the Members of the Victoria Memorial Committee. They advanced in stately procession to the dais fronting the monument and were loudly cheered by the throng in the enclosure. On the dais were the Mirs of Khairpur, Hyderabad and Mirpur, resplendent in heavily bejewelled quaintly shaped hats and green velvet coats richly brodered with gold. The Naval Commander-in-Chief of the East Indies, the Lieutenant-General Commanding the Western Command and their staffs were also there.

"On behalf of the Committee and of subscribers to the Victoria Memorial Fund, and the whole public of Sind, I beg to express our sincere and heartfelt thanks for your gracious kindness in honouring us this day by your presence here, and to you, Sir, for consenting to perform the ceremony which will disclose to your Highness and to this great and representative assemblage from all parts of the province, a marble statue, which we trust you will consider a not unworthy token to posterity of the veneration and affection of her people for the great and good Victoria, Queen of England and Empress of India. Your Royal Highness in your progress through the immense British provinces of India and the Feudatory States which flourish under the protecting shadow of your great father's Throne, must have encountered innumerable tokens of the extraordinary devotion to her Imperial Majesty the Queen-Empress Victoria which was felt by the people and Princes of India during her life time, and of the reverence and affection in which her memory is held to-day. Sind is only a smaller corner of your Royal and Imperial Father's dominions in the East, but I can assure you, Sir, that in no portion of his vast realms is loyalty to the Crown and devotion to the monarch and his house more keenly felt or more firmly rooted than in this province. And I speak with an experience of its people extending over three and thirty years. Your Royal Highnesses, if it were possible to enhance these feelings, your gracious presence among us this day would assuredly do so. For the first time in history a Prince and Princess of Wales have entered our land and have graciously consented to come among us, thereby giving to many thousands of your Imperial Father's subjects the keenest gratification and delight.

Sir, on the occasion of your arrival at the gate of India, your first public action was to unveil a statue of her Imperial Majesty the Queen-Empress Victoria, and now at the termination of a most brilliant and successful tour, on the completion of which we beg respectfully to congratulate your Royal Highnesses, you are about to perform a similar ceremony, and we venture to hope this will be a gratifying remembrance in the years to come, which we earnestly pray may be many and happy for your Royal Highnesses and all the Royal Family. I have already had the honour of submitting to your Royal Highness a brief history of this memorial, and I need not therefore now go into details regarding Mr. Hamo Thorneycroft's beautiful work or bring again to your notice those who have rendered such valuable assistance in connection with its erection. In asking your Royal Highness to graciously unveil this Memorial, may I also request you to name the grounds around it "The Queen's Lawn." I can assure you, Sir, we shall spare no pains to lay them out in a fitting manner. I also venture to ask your Royal Highness's acceptance, as a souvenir from the subscribers, of a casket containing an album of views of Karachi and Sind which they hope may occasionally bring back to your mind a day which will long live in the annals of Sind and has unspcakably gladdened its people. And, finally, I beg on behalf of the whole province, to wish your Royal Highnesses a safe and prosperous voyage to England and a most happy meeting with your children and your Royal parents, to whom we ask you to express the assurance of the loyal devotion of Sind to his Majesty and the Queen."

The Prince in reply said:—

"Gentlemen,—It is a great pleasure to the Princess of Wales and myself to take part in a ceremony which crowns the loyal and loving efforts of five long years, and it is our good fortune to have an opportunity of being associated with the people of Sind in this splendid tribute to our late beloved Queen-Empress. We have read the admirable pamphlet which describes the history of the Memorial and have noticed with interest the names of Mr. Wiles and Mr. Moti Rana Adrani and others to whose energy we owe so much. We have noticed, too, with special satisfaction that all classes in Sind have joined in raising this statue which is fitly symbolised by figures of Peace and Justice. You do right to connect them with the memory of Queen Victoria, for she greatly desired that her Indian subjects should ever enjoy these blessings. I shall be happy to name the grounds on which we stand "the Queen's Lawn." And we both hope that this statue and the lawn around it may bring pleasure and recreation to endless generations. Gentlemen, we thank you for your parting words, and I shall not fail to convey to the King-Emperor and the Queen the loyal expressions of the people of Sind. We are deeply touched by Bombay's affectionate welcome to the shores of India. On the eve of our departure we are equally impressed with Karachi's sympathy and good wishes."

The conclusion of the address was loudly cheered. Descending the dais steps the Prince and Princess inspected the richly chased silver casket presented to them as a souvenir of the occasion. Enclosed within the casket was a satin-covered album of views of Sind.

The casket cover is carved with figures representing a durbār. Having admired these handsome pieces of work, the Prince touched a button and the screen of flags concealing the monument fell away. There was an instant of surprised admiration and the ringing cheers burst forth for the event accomplished and for the sculptor's work. Their Royal Highnesses and the whole assembly gazed long in admiration and appreciation of a statue which is one of the finest pieces of work in India. The bronze figures around the pedestal, heroic in size are striking in conception and make the monument unique among the Indian memorials of the late Queen. The frontal group of bronze figures where India approaches Justice and Peace, while Peace points to the benign figures above, is especially impressive, and the whole composition of the Memorial finely reflects the sculptor's conception. While their Royal Highnesses still admired the monument a bouquet was presented to the Princess. Thereafter the Royal party departed amid more cheering.

Morning Post.—Hyderabad, the capital of the Deccan, is perhaps of all the cities of India the one regarding which the visitor's expectant attention is raised to the highest point by the allegations of travellers, and it is, unquestionably, the one which most copiously disappoints that expectation. There must be something in the air of the place which breeds exaggeration, as it seems also to breed in its proprietors a false sense of importance, for there is nothing else to do it, save it be the dispread size of the city and its suburbs, eighteen miles through in one direction and fourteen miles in the other, so they tell you, and the more than half million of its people which make it the fourth city of India in a State which is as big as France. But with its size ends all its claim to note. It is true that one may see in its streets a queer mixture of races, Rohillas still reminiscent of French occupation in their baggy red tunics and cut away coats; Arabs that might have come as they stand from the desert and coal-black negro faces under the fez. But where in any living city of the East will you not find mixtures, as unexpected and even more remarkable. And what are its buildings but mere straggling aggregations of undistinguished stone. The Nizam's palace, which covers close on half a square mile, almost a quarter of the walled city, and which is really a nest of nobles each with its own half-disciplined retainers is so inconspicuous that it would be impossible from any of the hills around the pick out its position among the multitudinous roofs without the help of other landmarks. The new palace, in which the Royal party was lodged magnificently placed on a crest of a ridge just south of the city, is a pile of whitewashed stucco without style or distinction, and nothing better can be said of any of the great glaring buildings which stand out with such effect in the curiously theatrical landscape in which Hyderabad lies; a surf of rocky rose-red hills amid lakes of blue water and levels of emerald green rice.

Then, too, the sights of which the traveller tells, the men who are sheer walking armouries, and who "draw" at the slightest provocation, take so much seeking that one gives them up in despair, and the truculent and reckless tendencies of the mob are just as difficult to discover. The wild riding through the streets of the chiefs' retainers does furnish scenes which are occasionally amusing, as when three of them the other day, galloping madly to pick up the rest of their escort, were suddenly held up by a jutka which has turned at right angles across their path. A jutka is something like a coster's barrow with a piece of linoleum bent over to form an arched roof to it. It is generally horsed by an unbroken rat of a pony, who is uncertain on the level, and jibs and shies when asked to go up or down hill. This particular specimen had spun away from the slope as the three impetuous swash-bucklers were hard behind and about to pass it, and the sudden swerve put the whole length of the jutka against their horse's noses. The horses had to stop, but the three riders continued their flying career, lance in hand, over the top of the jutka which, struck by the breasts of the charging steeds, turned completely over, with the driver and his family upside down inside, the pony upside down between the shafts, with protesting hoofs in the air, and the three horses on top of them all scrambling and slithering amid the still revolving wheels to get on to firm ground again. No one emerged from the incidence without some alteration, the jutka especially was affected, and the lancers' facings had disappeared and one of their lances was broken, but there appeared no disposition, even on the pony's part, to take the affair seriously; it seemed to strike no one as outside to ordinary Hyderabad routine.

Still, save in these small, light-hearted ways, Hyderabad no longer lives up to its reputation, and there is little of interest left but the un-Indian gaiety of its brightly-painted shutters and the immense straggling intricacy of its interminable bazaars. One was able to appreciate that by getting lost in the heart of it after nightfall cycling, lampless, back from Golconda. The dark that comes with one stride suddenly made it impossible to ride further through the dim moving figures with which the streets teemed, and forced one to plod along a rough and uncertain roadway covered with dust so thick that one felt to be walking on a layer of feathers. The dust was thick in the air, too, gritting the teeth and clogging the nostrils mixed with the odours of cardamom and cinnamon, clove betel, incense, and the musty warmth of half-naked humanity. For the darkness was full of people, and stray beasts and creaking bullock carts, and it was only diluted here and there by the lights which escaped from the small, square, open-ended stalls, where some dealer sat with a lamp beside his wares, rolls of stuff, brazen vessels, heaps of sweetmeats, or piles of grain. Sometimes in the bazaars, with shops on either side, there was enough light to show the colours on moving figures but at the next corner probably there was so inky a blackness that one could only guess where the houses were by their blotting out of the stars, and one was likely, even groping one's way, to stumble over some meditative cow lying munching in the roadway. And on every hand there was music: tom-toms and thin reeds, and cymbals; music indoors and out. In the glow of a room musicians could be seen playing, their backs to the wall, their long oboes thrust out before them; or the strange clamour would descend from some dark upper chamber, or the street would grow thick with a noisy procession of drums and pipes, which might, for all one could tell from the music's character, be accompanying a marriage revel, with the bridegroom perched up above the wreathed cattle, and the beds and bales and boxes of the new household, or be escorting under a gaudy awning, with flowers and spices laid about it, some dead grey face looking up at the sky. One plodded on through it all in the dusty, redolent air, steering, as well as one could, by the stars through the obscure, tortuous, interminable labyrinth, since one's best Urdu or Guzerati was thrown away where only Tamil or Telegu was understood or spoken. Really a more helpless position in an ordinary way amid a people with so unflattering a reputation could not well have been achieved, and the experiences proved how undeserved was the reputation, since instead of a knock on the head one was offered nothing but obliging assistance—an assistance not always according to knowledge but obviously inspired by goodwill. Indeed, in a city where the Muhammadan ruler pays the salary of the pastor and contributes largely to the expenses of the Christian Church, and his nobles are the best helpers and largest buyers at sales of work and church bazaars, one can scarcely expect to find a truculent and intolerant spirit. All, indeed, that one did find was the curious gradation in soldiery to which other Native States had accustomed us, from queer-looking footmen with the ancient musket to the smart lancers of the Imperial Service Troops, which, if not trained to such a remarkable pitch as those of Mysore, carried off the honours on parade from the Indian Cavalry.

That parade at Secunderabad produced an interesting ceremony in the presentation by the Prince of Wales of colours to the 2nd Rajput Light Infantry; not that the presentation of colours is an exceptional ceremony, but because the regiment of which the King is Colonel-in-Chief, is one of the two in the Indian Army that have the honour of carrying three colours, the third, which bears the words, in English and Hindustani "Laksh and Victory", having been conferred on it for exceptional gallantry in the campaign of 1803, which was ended by the battle of Laswari and the capture of Delhi. The regiment, with its eight companies of Rajputs, is a fine one as can be found in the Indian Army; in drill no infantry battalion that one has seen out here could give points to it, and the physique of its big broad men made even the Lincolns and Manchesters, both above the average, look small by comparison. There was another interesting contrast at the review, though only a picturesque one, between the uniforms of the 26th Light Cavalry and of the Nizam's Bodyguard. The 26th, which were the Madras Light Cavalry, wear the old French-grey blouse buff facings and silver cross-belt and lace, gold sword-belt, worn in the case of the native officers over a crimson cummerbund fringed with gold, and silver braid on blue breeches.

It is, perhaps, the prettiest uniform in the whole British Service, and in vivid opposition to its avoidance of the primaries was the cardinal and gold turban, the vivid gorse yellow blouse with gold belt and cardinal facings the white breeches, and black top boots of the Bodyguard. Bright yellow is the Hyderabad colour, and there is a fine smear of it over every thing immediately connected with his Highness the Nizam.

The distances in Hyderabad offer an interesting example of the difficulties attending the distribution of troops in India. Secunderabad cantonment, where the Hyderabad Contingent is quartered which will supply the nucleus of the future Ninth Division, covers nineteen square miles. Bolarum is some six miles to the north and Trimulgiri three miles to the north-east of it, and the troops, from considerations of water supply, have to bespread out over the entire area. Consequently the distance each regiment has to march to take part in brigade drills makes of itself quite a respectable day's outing. In order to dine with a friend the other night at the further end of the cantonment it was necessary to make regular posting arrangements to cover the twenty-two miles, and there would seem to be an easy competence awaiting anyone with sufficient enterprise to offer Secunderabad the hire of a few "run-about" motors.

The closing scenes of the Prince and Princess of Wales's visit to India have been fully in keeping with the spirit which has made their progress remarkable even among Royal journeys. In the ceremonial sense the tour has been attended with complete success. With the exception of the tiger-hunt in Nepal the long and exacting programme has been carried out without a single hitch. The presence of the Prince and Princess has evoked a display of enthusiastic and affectionate loyalty from all classes of the King-Emperor's subjects. That outburst of feeling has been due in no small degree to the tact and sympathy characteristic indeed of all members of the Royal Family, and not least our future King and Queen. Practically every important centre of the Indian Empire has been visited. The Prince's drive up the Khyber Pass without any regard except an escort of Afridis will remain an especially memorable incident, and the confidence which he thereby reposed in the chivalry of the hill tribes is among the most valuable political results of the tour. But if in its ceremonial aspect the Royal progress has been thus singularly felicitous, other consequences to which it is bound to give rise are almost more significant. People in England are apt to overlook the fact that in the last report the dominant factor in our Indian administration is the personal relation between the governors and the governed. In this country the vicissitudes of political life give colour to the impression that the fortunes of our great dependency are determined, at least to a large extent, by the Minister who by the suffrages of his fellow-countrymen finds himself temporarily in charge of the India Office. In a great measure this is of course true, but it is nevertheless a consideration which is seldom or never present to the minds of the majority of our fellow-subjects in India. In their eyes the raison d'être of the Government, to which they stand in a relation of almost unquestioning obedience, is the rule of the Emperor of India. Personal sovereignty, in short, the source of the only power which they recognise or which indeed they are able to understand. In this sense the person of the King-Emperor acts as a connecting link between India and this country, without which our dominion would at once cease to be intelligible. The loyalty and affection with which this personal rule is associated in the eyes of the great masses of Hindoos is due in the first instance to the veneration with which they regarded the late Queen, the first Empress of India. Although Queen Victoria was never able to visit her dominions in Asia, the sympathy which she never failed to display in the fortunes of her subjects in that Continent, her efforts to learn their language, and her constant reliance on her Indian attendants secured for her a regard indistinguishable from the closest personal ties. To the millions who dwell in India the death of the Queen was a loss which they could only compare to the loss of a mother. The affection with which Queen Victoria was regarded by her Indian subjects has been extended without diminution to King Edward. The memory of his visit, as Prince of Wales, is still green in the memories of a people singularly alive to the qualities of sympathy and justice. It is well, therefore, that the tradition of English sovereignty in India should have been worthily continued at the hands of the Prince of Wales. The experience he has gained can hardly fail to be of the utmost value when he in turn is called upon to wield the sceptre over the millions who will hail him as their Emperor. The outcome of his journey was well expressed in the concluding words of his speech at Karachi in which he referred to the figures of Peace and Justice at the base of Queen Victoria's statue. "You do well, said the Prince, "to connect them with the memory of Queen Victoria, for she greatly desired that her Indian subjects should ever enjoy these blessings.—(H. F. PROVOST BATTERSBY.)

Pall Mall Gazette.—The Prince and Princess of Wales are on their way home from India after a tour of which the success has, happily, been unbroken. We cannot doubt that the presence of the Royal tourists has done much to stimulate the loyalty of all classes and races throughout that vast congeries of humanity which composes the three hundred millions of the Indian subjects of the King-Emperor. It is, indeed, one of the advantages of modern facilities for travel that Royal personages should be able to make, with ease and frequency, tours which would have been impossible more than a generation or two ago. In old times a King of England was, as a rule, not much more a traveller than the humblest of his people, and certainly much less acquainted with distant lands than many of the more adventurous among his subjects. That need no longer be the case, nowadays, and it is all to the good that it should not be. The future Emperor of India and his Consort will, like his present Majesty, know not a little of India from personal experience, a fact which is good for them, for India, and for the whole British Empire.

Pall Mall Gazette.—The Royal tour in India, which came to an end yesterday at Karachi, has run to almost exactly as many days as that of thirty years ago, when the Prince of Wales was the King that is. The King kept his thirty-fourth birthday at Bombay, and told an addressive municipality that he should never forget it. It was on his father's birthday that the Prince of Wales landed at the Apollo Bunder.

The King was back in Bombay again on the 11th of March, 1876, and sailed in the Scrapis on the 13th. The Prince of Wales reached Karachi on March 17, and sailed from the capital of Sind yesterday. Governor Wodehouse, Sir Phillip, a second cousin of the late Earl of Kimberley, did the parting honours to the King. It was to another Governor, the man who foresaw, and whose prescience would have prevented, the Boer War, Sir Bartle Frere, that the facilities for a Royal embarkation at Karachi are due.

In the course of the thirty years between the two tours "the golden link of the Crown" has become at once closer and more comprehensive, and the Prince's thoughtful farewell allocution bore testimony to this fact. To it he could ascribe, not less truly than tactfully, the "loving welcome" which he and the Princess had met everywhere, and from all classes. What, besides, has been strongly brought out by this Royal progress is the increased capacity of native States for administration on modern lines. When the King was there the number of "bad boys" was not insignificant. Now, the significance is the other way.

Standard.—(By SIDNEY LOW.)—"Christ is our salvation; Caste is our curse." The sentence was painted in black letters on the white-washed wall of a little mission building. It represents the honest opinion of many earnest teachers who are trying, with very moderate success, to turn the people of India to the Christian faith. Some Hindu reformers take that same view. Whenever there is what may be called a Protestant movement in Hinduism, an attempt to bring back the old Vedantic system, and to purge away the priestly excrescences, there is a sort of revolt against caste. The new theistic Hindu sects, such as the Brahmo Somaj and the Arya Somaj, preach the equality of all men in the spiritual world. The Sikhs, who started as Hindu Puritans, with Brahmanism as their Spurlet Woman, are not supposed to recognise caste distinctions. But the insurrections have usually died away; the non-conformists themselves end by a return to orthodoxy, and reconcile themselves with the caste arrangement. The Sikhs have really, though not ostensibly, fallen into castes; so, to a large extent, have the mahomedans; so have the native Christians in the South of India, where alone they count as a substantial element in the population. Simon Sebastian, clerk and writer, is a good Catholic; he attends Mass, he listens to prayers read in the Latin tongue, he confesses his sins to Father Dominic or Father Ambrosius. But he will not marry his daughter to a man who works in leather, nor eat with him, nor, if he can help it, touch him even in church. For twenty centuries or more the people of India have lived under the rule of caste; the vast majority of them live under it to-day and will so live far longer than we can see.

It is an affair of immense complications, intricate and confused. The origin is probably ethnological. Such appears to be the conclusion of the closest modern observers, including Mr. H. H. Risley, whose Introductory Volume to the Indian Census Report of 1901 contains more information on the whole subject than is to be obtained elsewhere in a convenient form. The highest castes of all, the Brahmans, who are the priests, and the Rajputs, who were the knights, are descended from the northern conquerors, the "Aryans," who came down from beyond the mountains. The secondary classes are a mixed race, made up of these fairer, taller, people of the north and the Dravidians, or Mongoloids, who still constitute the mass of the population in Bengal, the Central Provinces, and the South. Climate and environment worked physical changes in the course of centuries, and, no doubt, there has been much mixing of the blood, even for the aristocratic Septs. Still, many of the high-caste Hindus bear obviously the stamp of race. The Brahman, with his light brown skin, his lithe, delicate build, and his well-cut features is clearly marked off from the swarthy peasants of the Lower Ganges, the stubby, semi-negroid Telugus and Tamils of Madras. The contrast is most noticeable in the south, where the priestly order has always kept itself apart and retains many of its ancient privileges. Some of the high-caste Southern women, the celebrated "cream-coloured" Iyengars, have been justly praised by exigent connoisseurs in female beauty; and I have seldom seen faces of more intellectual distinction than those of the leading native barristers and pleaders of Madras who are all Brahmans.

The Hindus are not the only people among whom elaborate devices have been attempted for preserving intact the supposed purity of certain superior stocks. Most conquering aristocracies have tried it, and most have failed. But in India the classification is guarded by the strictest observance of the principle of heredity, and it is not confined to a comparatively small number of selected families. It has been extended till it includes most of the population, so that everybody above the lowest stratum of outcasts is a member of some caste. Society in India is made up in air-tight compartments, every group being rigidly marked off from all the rest, so that it is deemed impossible, or at any rate wrong for a person to pass from one to another, or even to establish very intimate relations with those outside his own circle.

The common tie may be that of race, social status, or occupation. To get a loose analogy, we might suppose that everybody who could claim descent from one of the old Norman families in England formed one caste; that members of the "learned they used sometimes to bury the wretched little body in the compound, with a jibing verse over the grave, something to this effect:—

"Your life, my dear, we must destroy,
Since you're a girl and not a boy."

And the mothers? Did not the mothers object? My friend, the company officer, asked the question. "If it was the first one," replied the Rajput corporal, calmly, "they used to give a lot of trouble. But after a time they got used to it."

Worse than the infanticides, much worse, are the child-marriages, with all their evils, of which the greatest is girl-widowhood. A Hindu widow, as everybody knows, is treated with heartless cruelty. We have abolished sati, but one sometimes wonders whether that is really a reform since millions of women have exchanged the swift and passing agony of the Burning Ghat for years of oppression, neglect, and misery. Many thousands of widows, year by year, have to choose between a life of degradation and shame if they leave their husband's relatives, and barbarous ill-treatment if they remain with them. One wonders why the voluble reformers, who are so eloquent over the rights of the people of India, do not make more effort to remedy this, the worst of their wrongs. Yet, though perfunctory resolutions are passed at the National Congress in favour of raising the age of marriage—to twelve! no serious attempt is made to wean the people from this custom, and there are more infant-marriages in enlightened Bengal than in all the rest of India. All the Congress orators combined have not done so much as a single unobtrusive Political Officer, Colonel Walter, a former Agent for Rajputana, who in 1888 induced all the leading Rajput families to agree to a revised code of marriage rules. Under this scheme, fourteen was laid down as the minimum age of marriage for girls, the expenses of betrothal feasts and wedding feasts were regulated according to a fixed and moderate scale, and second marriages, during the life-time of the first wife, were prohibited. The code is the greatest social reform which has been made effective in India for about 2,000 years. When we consider what this quiet English gentleman accomplished by moral suasion alone, we may be tempted to ask whether our Government does not sometimes deal too tenderly with caste abuses, and if that which Colonel Walter did for Rajputana the law might not contrive to do for the whole of British and native India.

Times.—Yesterday the tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales in India, "an unending and unbroken series of happy and most instructive experiences", as the Prince called it in his farewell speech, came to an end, and their Royal Highnesses embarked on their home-ward voyage at Karachi. The mere ceremonial aspects of the visit already belong to the past. But the memory and the significance of this great Imperial progress of the Heir to the Imperial Crown and his gracious Consort are not things of the moment. They will live long and bear good fruit, as the Prince himself acknowledged, in the memory of the Royal travellers. They will also live long and mean much among a people who, diverse in all else, are unified by a common allegiance, and accustomed to regard the idea of government in a personal rather than an abstract aspect. The Prince of Wales is not, indeed, the first Heir to the Imperial Crown who has visited India. Not only his late elder brother, but his Royal father had preceded him in a memorable visit, and the Prince recalled the fact on his first landing at Bombay. He said that as in visiting India he was but treading in the footsteps of the King-Emperor his father, so he hoped that his children and his children's children would carry on the precedent thus established and make themselves personally acquainted with this splendid portion of their Imperial heritage. "What can they know of England who only England know?"—the question must address itself with peculiar force to one who is destined to become the ruler of an Empire on which the sun never sets; and the present Prince of Wales has already answered it for himself in a way which has wrought the happiest results in past and present, and promises not less happy augury for the future.

We print to-day an exceedingly interesting and instructive letter from our Special Correspondent, who, having accompanied the Royal tour throughout and furnished us with many vivid and impressive descriptions, now undertakes to point some of its larger and deeper morals. He brings before us the vastness of the Indian Empire, the variety and diverse origins of its populations, the sharp divisions of their faiths, customs, habits and modes of life, the infinite complexity of the problems which the rule of so vast and diverse an Empire involves. We in England who see India only on the map and can span it between finger and thumb, are apt to think of it as a more or less homogeneous entity. In reality it is a microcosm far more varied in race, language, religion, climate, and habits of life than that of Europe, just as in extent and population it exceeds Europe if the Russian Empire be excluded. The Prince and Princess of Wales have travelled 8,000 miles by rail in India besides a sea voyage of 2,000 miles from Calcutta to Rangoon and thence back to Madras; they have seen much more of India than most travellers see, and yet after all they have left many parts of it unseen. But mere extent is no measure of the variety of the Indian Empire. "It is," says our Correspondent, "astonishing that men who have spent their lives in India should go home and talk . . . of 'the Indian people' as if this vast sub-continent were inhabited by a homogeneous race united by those bonds of common descent and language and faith and customs which combine to make up a nation."

It was perhaps excusable for Burke and his contemporaries to talk in this way, because India then only meant the dominions of the Company, and the dominions of the Company meant little more than Bengal—the divided western portion of which now, be it observed, numbers a population approximately equal to that of the German Empire. But now-a-days such language is absurdly and mischievously misleading. No man who has seen as much of India as the Prince of Wales has seen is ever likely to use it or to think of India in the categories it implies. We invite our readers to reflect on the graphic picture which our Correspondent draws of India as it really is, and then to consider how inestimable an advantage it must be to the future Sovereign of that vast and varied Empire to have seen and learnt for himself not a little of what it means. How much he has seen and learnt may be gathered from his admirable farewell speech at Karachi.

The abiding wonder is that, India being what it is, a mere handful of Englishmen—for that is all they are in comparison with the teeming native populations—should have been able to rule it as they have done and do. There is much in the early history of British rule in India which can only be defended, if at all, by a moral standard strictly relative to the circumstances and public sentiment of the time. But broadly speaking we may honestly claim that, in our own day, the Government of India is enlightened, beneficent, and humane. It may not be ideally perfect. No Government is. But it is nevertheless, as our Correspondent truly says "perhaps the greatest administrative achievement that the world has ever seen, and it is an achievement which would be impossible without the high standard of efficiency and devotion to duty to which the Indian Civil Service has attained." In surveying the wondrous panorama of Indian life and society which has been unfolded in all its variety before the Prince and Princess of Wales, and which the graphic pen of our Correspondent has enabled his countrymen at home in some measure to realize for themselves, it is essential to remember that the one factor which gives it any unity at all, which alone enables us to think of India as a single entity, however heterogeneous and even discordant its component parts may be, is that Civil Service which, a mere handful among countless multitudes, sustains the whole fabric by labours of which the sense of duty faithfully discharged is often the only reward. These are the men who bear the white man's burden in India; men who "spend their lives in work as arduous and responsible as can fall to the lot of any man struggling for the benefit of an alien people committed to their care not only against prejudice and ignorance, against famine and pestilence, against the hardships of isolation and exile, and often of prolonged separation from those nearest and dearest to them, but sometimes against the obloquy of cruel misrepresentation even on the part of their fellow-countrymen." Among the lessons of the Royal tour alike for our future Sovereign and his people this is, perhaps, the most significant of all.

Times.—With the exception of a brief visit to Aligarh and a few days at Quetta before the final departure from Karachi, the Royal progress through India, of which it has been my privilege to chronicle the chief stages in your columns, was practically brought to a close last week at Benares, when the Prince of Wales departed to seek compensation in a fortnight's quiet sport in Gwalior for the great tiger-shoot which an unfortunate outbreak of cholera had at the last moment denied to him in Nepal, whilst the Princess returned to the United Provinces to enjoy a short period of privacy and relative repose at Lucknow. The Royal tour may, therefore, be almost said to belong already to history.

That it would be a magnificent and stately pageant, such as could be produced on no other stage in the world but India, was a foregone conclusion, and on this aspect of the tour I trust I need not dwell any further, though I fully realize how hopeless a task it has been for me to convey by written word any adequate impression of the kaleidoscopic series of picturesque and brilliant scenes which for more than four months have passed from day to day before our eyes. What I should like to bring home to your readers in our own little island-kingdom, which even from south to north scarcely affords room for a railway journey of 24 consecutive hours, is the magnitude and infinite variety of this wonderful Indian panorama. From their landing at Bombay to their embarkation at Karachi Their Royal Highnesses will have covered over 8,000 miles by rail, besides a sea voyage of some 2,000 miles from Calcutta to Rangoon and thence back to Madras and, comprehensive as their tour has been, it will not even have touched whole regions scarcely inferior in interest to those which they have visited—neither the Malabar coast nor Southern India below Madras, neither the Central Provinces nor Eastern Bengal nor Assam. For almost every province in India would make a good-sized State in Europe; some of them surpass in population and sometimes equal in area even first-rate European Powers. Partition, for instance, still leaves Western Bengal with a population approximately equal to that of the German Empire. The total population of our Indian Empire considerably exceeds and its area more than equals that of the whole continent of Europe, excluding Russia. It is further from Bombay to Peshawar than from London to Vienna, and from Calcutta to Quetta is a longer journey than from Madrid to St. Petersburg.

Yet the magnitude of the journey accomplished by the Prince and Princess is insignificant in comparison with the diversity of countries and peoples they have seen. They have passed from the warm and humid zone of the western coast around Bombay, across immense tracts of parched and sun-baked table-land where the black shadow of famine too often hangs over the country and a few inches of rain make all the difference between starvation and plenty, to the wild mountainous borderland of the North-West Frontier, close up under "the Roof of the World," where summer and winter mark the extremes of heat and cold; they have traversed the densely-populated alluvial plains of the Gangetic delta, as well as the deserts of Western Rajputana and the scarcely less desolate plateau of the rock-strewn Deccan, whilst in Burma and in Madras they have seen the splendid luxuriance of tropical vegetation under the influence of regular trade-winds and steady rainfall. They have been greeted by Pathan and Beluch tribesmen with strongly-marked Semitic features, by Mussulman Panjabis and Bengali Hindus, by smiling Burmans with slanting Mongolian eyes, and by dark-skinned Tamils of the old Dravidian stock. It is astonishing that men who have spent a great part of their lives in India should go home and talk on public platforms and in Parliament of "the Indian people" as if this vast sub-continent were inhabited by a homogeneous race united by those bonds of common descent and language and faith and customs which combine to make up a nation. Race? There are three distinct races in India differing more widely according to every anthropological test than Swedes do from Italians or Prussians from Portuguese, and within these races there are lines of cleavage as deep as those which separate any two nations of Europe. Language? According to the last census 124 vernacular languages are spoken in India, and, though many of these are merely local dialects, the different families into which they group themselves are more remote in structure and origin than any two groups of languages spoken in Europe, except Hungarian and Turkish, whilst, again, within these different groups we find more than a score of different languages, many of them with entirely different scripts, and each of them spoken by millions of people, which are as distinct from each other as English is from Portuguese or Danish from French. Religion? The lines of religious cleavage are less numerous, but they are proportionately deep. Roughly, ignoring all other forms of belief, we may divide the population of India into Mussulmans and Hindus, the latter amounting to nearly two-thirds of the whole population, and the former to rather less than one quarter, and though the Mussulmans are most numerous in the north, there is scarcely a province in India in which they are not represented, whilst their preponderance amongst the fighting races of the peninsula is undisputed. Hinduism is undoubtedly the largest common denominator of the countless fractions into which the population of India is split up. But Hinduism is itself a fractor which divides as much as it unites. It represents the most fluid of creeds and the most ironcast of social systems. As a creed it includes the widest conceivable range of beliefs, from mere fetishism to the most subtle forms of transcendental philosophy. As a social system it ruthlessly immures its adherents within the prison-house of caste, from which there is no release save by death and rebirth, or by inexorable ejection from the pale of Hinduism—a far more terrible fate in the eyes of the overwhelming majority of Hindus than death itself. In our loose phraseology we are apt sometimes to apply the term "caste" to our own class distinctions. But what class distinctions are there anywhere in Europe to be compared with the inflexible laws of Hindu caste by which, for instance, the mere shadow of a low caste man passing over the Brahman's food pollutes it? Let any one who wants to gather some idea of what the Hindu social system means just glance through the list of castes enumerated in the Indian census; Brahman and allied castes, Kshatriyas and pseudo-Kshatriya castes, Vaishya castes of traders and agriculturists and artisans, "clean" Sudras from whom members of the higher castes can take water, and "unclean" Sudras from whom they cannot, castes whose touch pollutes the "twice born," and castes who pollute even without actual contact, hypergamous castes and endogamous castes, and within each group endless divisions and sub-divisions, each cribbed and confined within its own immutable pale. As for traditional customs and inherited habits of mind, where are two races or two peoples to be found, in Western or Central Europe at any rate, who differ so profoundly as the virile but untutored Pathan differs from the soft, but subtle-minded Bengali, or the chivalrous and stately Rajput, heir to a civilization older than our own, from the semi-savage hill-men of Southern India, or the flexible, keen witted Mahratta from the conservative and slow-minded Malayalim of the Malabar coast, with his matriarchal laws of inheritance and descent.

Even amongst those with whom the Prince has been brought into personal contact, what an infinite variety of types, what a medley of strange contradictions! Hindu princes who trace their descent from the heroes of Indian mythology, ruling chiefs whose forebears were but the satraps of the Moghul invaders, cultured native gentlemen, who not only speak our own language more fluently and correctly than many educated Englishmen, but have to a great extent assimilated our literature and our mental habits, and even our conceptions of political rights and liberties, and yet would consider themselves defiled by sitting at table with us, and regard all our social institutions, especially in regard to the position of woman, with the utmost abhorrence: gallant officers of our Indian Army who hold equal rank and exercise equal authority in their regiments, yet outside the sphere of their military duties can hold no social intercourse together, and would no more dream of messing in common than of allowing their families to intermarry; distinguished Indian lawyers whose supple intellects have been trained to seize every nicety of British law, and frontier chieftains whose contempt for all law but that of the stronger hand is curbed solely by the material force arrayed behind the British law giver; great landlords who administer their vast agricultural estates in the old patriarchal spirit of the East, and native millowners whose keen aptitude for business would bear comparison with that of any of our 20th century captains of Western industry; learned exponents of Hindu orthodoxy with all its strange rites, and to us inconceivably cruel customs, such as child marriages, with the perpetual widowhood to which they often condemn the young girl-wife, and political leaders, impatient to pour the new wine of Western democratic institutions into the old bottles of a social system which represents an ancient and intensely rigid civilization as far as the poles asunder from that of Europe. These contrasts, these contradictions, could be multiplied almost ad infinitum, and, beyond the classes with whom the Prince could hold any personal intercourse, there are the countless millions of India, humble toilers on the land, industrial workers in the cities, primitive denizens of the jungle and the hills, hardy boatmen and fishermen who spend their lives on the great rivers and the deep waters of the sea; all split up again by caste, by creed, by race, by occupation, by language, into innumerable groups whose whole range of social experience is bound up within the narrow limits of their own village, or their own profession, or, in still more comprehensive terms, of their own caste, which in one shape or another includes everything that can differentiate man from man.

Surely no spectacle could appeal more strongly to the human imagination than that which the Prince and Princess have seen spread out before them whilst they have been passing in continuous review for more than five successive months all these vast and varied countries with their still more vast and varied populations, alien in race, alien in tongue, alien in faith, over which they will some day, in the natural order of things, be called to reign. In his first speech, delivered on landing at Bombay, His Royal Highness said that as, in visiting India, he was but treading in the footsteps of the King-Emperor, his father, so he hoped that his children and his children's children would carry on the precedents thus established and make themselves personally acquainted with this splendid portion of their Imperial heritage. This is a promise of which the fulfilment cannot fail to bear excellent fruit, both for India and for the Empire. The present visit must have been an experience of intense interest and of great practical value to the future Sovereign of India. There can be equally little doubt that it has been profoundly appreciated by his future subjects, who have everywhere and on every occasion welcomed his presence amongst them with demonstrations of respect, and even of enthusiasm, far more effusive than might have been expected from races on the whole rather prone to Oriental apathy. The Prince and Princess, on their side, have not only responded with Royal graciousness to these exhibitions of popular good will, but they have constantly sought to enlarge as far as possible the circle of Indian gentlemen and ladies who could be admitted to the privilege of personal intercourse with them. The pardah receptions held by the Princess for the benefit of those Indian ladies from whom their social laws require the most rigid seclusion from all contact with strangers of the other sex will leave memories no less abiding than the frank and easy conversations into which the Prince has frequently led representative members of the various sections of Indian society. Nor have Their Royal Highnesses confined themselves to the more formal opportunities of intercourse afforded by State functions and ceremonial receptions. Only the other day, for instance, since she returned from Benares to Lucknow, the Princess drove out, unannounced and attended only by Sir Walter Lawrence, to visit a neighbouring village and see for herself something of the domestic life of the Indian peasantry. Another pleasant feature of the Royal visit has been the anxiety shown by many of the native gentry to commemorate it in some tangible shape by works of philanthropy or public utility, and to bring it home to the inhabitants of districts in many cases altogether remote from the Royal itinerary by public entertainments or by distributions of alms and food to the poor. In this and many other ways the beneficent influence of the Royal visitors has indirectly extended far beyond the area actually covered by their travels. On the political significance of the visits paid by Their Royal Highnesses to the great feudatory princes of the Indian Empire I have repeatedly had occasion to dwell during the progress of the tour. As far as the peoples of India are concerned, they have this, at least, in common, that, like all Oriental peoples, they prefer outward and visible signs to mere abstract conceptions, and the actual presence amongst them of the Heir-Apparent to the Throne, accompanied by so gracious a consort as the Princess, has helped to quicken, as nothing else could, their perception of the ties which unite them to the far-off island that has emerged so mysteriously out of the Western seas to control and shape their destinies.

There is one other feature of the Royal tour to which attention should, I think, be drawn before I conclude, and that is the encouragement which the signal proofs given by Their Royal Highnesses of the interest they take in every phase of Indian life must afford to the great Civil Service of India. We are apt at home to forget what the government of such a country as India means, though it is perhaps the greatest administrative achievement which the world has ever seen, and it is an achievement which would be impossible without the high standard of efficiency and devotion to duty to which the Indian Civil Service has attained. It is a service which undoubtedly holds out some high rewards and has built up a few world-wide reputations. But there are and always must be a large number of men in its ranks who spend their lives in work as arduous and responsible as can fall to the lot of any man, struggling for the benefit of an alien people committed to their care, not only against prejudice and ignorance, against famine and pestilence, against the hardships of isolation and exile, and often of prolonged separation from those nearest and dearest to them, but sometimes even against the obloquy of cruel misrepresentation, even on the part of their fellow-countrymen, and who can never hope to emerge from relative obscurity or to grasp any of the richer prizes of their service. It can be no slight consolation for them to know that the work in which they play so strenuous a part has been brought directly under the notice of their future Sovereign, and that he will come home with a deeper and fuller appreciation of the large and really splendid share they take in bearing the white man's burden for the benefit of the whole Empire.

Western Daily Press.—The prolonged tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales through India came to an end yesterday, when Their Royal Highnesses steamed out of Karachi en route for Europe. Exactly six months have elapsed since the Royal party departed from England for the East, and it is a remarkable fact, illustrative of how methodically foreign travel can be arranged now-a-days, that the time-table has been faithfully adhered to. One or two of the towns and districts originally entered on the itinerary were struck out; but this was not due to any flaw in the arrangements, but simply to the sudden development of unwelcome local conditions. An outbreak of cholera, for instance, slightly diverted the course of the Royal progress; but the visitors did not hesitate to penetrate into districts that were suffering from the effects of scarcity. They have, therefore, seen India under almost all possible conditions. They have witnessed marvellous displays of Oriental pagantry and wealth; and they have contemplated those lowlier phases of native life which convey their own particular lessons to the observant tourist. Had it been otherwise, there would have been cause for regret, for a tour that merely reveals to the eye of the traveller the brightest aspect of life in a vast country, teeming with many millions of people of various castes and creeds, would be assuredly productive of a false perspective. The Prince and Princess of Wales have beheld the wealth and the grandeur of Indian life, and they have seen also how the poor and patient ryot labours for a scanty pittance on a soil which is not infrequently the sport of a fickle monsoon. The gigantic kaleidoscope has been twisted and turned so that it disclosed a well-nigh bewildering series of mosaics. From the rocky defiles on the North-Western frontier—regarding the safety of which the strategists are for ever at variance—down to the South-Eastern corner of the dependency the Royal tourists have passed. The Mandalay that was to Englishmen a mere geographical expression of sinister repute prior to 1880, became an interesting and romantic reality to the Prince and Princess of Wales and their suite. They were the first direct representatives of the Emperor of India to thread the course of the Irrawaddy, and to penetrate into the city which the malignant rule of King Theebaw converted into a veritable Golgotha. And not less interesting was the visit of the Royal tourists to the sterile country of the Afridi in the stony fringe of borderland whereon so many battles have been fought in recent years. The loyalty of the Afridi tribesmen has long been an uncertain quantity, and there are some symptoms now that it is not quite all that could be desired. But the Afridi headmen, during the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales, made voluble, if rugged, protestations of their allegiance to the Emperor of India, whose son had received them in durbar. We trust that these protestations are sincere, and that the trouble which has, during the past month or two, been brewing on the frontier will pass away without compelling a resort to the military demonstration which some of the Indian papers have been advocating.

It has been contented that the coincidence of a political upheaval in this country with the greater part of the Royal tour in India has somewhat militated against the public interest taken in the latter. It has often been laid down that the human mind is capable of appreciating only one sensation at a time. But it may be asserted, without fear of contradiction, that the Royal tour in India has never, in any of its phases, been wholly eclipsed by the shadow which was cast over the country by the general election. To paraphrase a famous utterance of the late Sir William Harcourt, "We are all Imperialists now," though there may still exist subtle and delicate shades of Imperialism. Consequently the Royal tour in India, which was undertaken for the promotion of the sentiment of a sane Imperialism, has been followed throughout with interest. It is agreeable to learn that the impression made by the Prince and Princess in the course of their extended itinerary has been excellent. The Prince has attained to a high plane of proficiency as a public speaker and a tactician; and his numerous addresses to the people of India have been marked by every desirable attribute. The Prince and Princess were both novices in Indian travel; but, with that ready sympathy and adaptability which are so valuable, they threw themselves whole-heartedly into the spirit of the mission with which they had been entrusted by the King. The Princess of Wales especially distinguished herself by the attitude she adopted towards the native women. The latter recognised in Her Royal Highness a member of their own sex endowed with a thoroughly responsive nature. In this sense it was a happy thought on the part of the King to arrange that the Prince should be accompanied by the Princess. For it ensured that there should be no neglect of any section of the community, and that the women-folk of India should be allowed to participate to the full in the pleasure and privilege of personally welcoming the envoys of the Emperor of India. The Prince of Wales has, by personal contact, expanded his knowledge of an interesting people over whom he will one day be called to rule; while, on their part, the princes, the merchants, the members of the industrial community, and the peasants of India have been enabled to make themselves acquainted with their future Emperor. The admirable results which accrued from the Indian tour of King Edward before he succeeded to the Throne have been multiplied and accentuated by the visit of his son.

The classes and the masses of India have not been free from the temptation to regard the sovereignty as something of a myth. This hazy atmosphere has been clarified; and they have been enabled to convince themselves of the reality of the headship of that Government under which India, take it all round, has prospered and been at peace. The measure of mutual gratitude inspired by the Royal tour cannot be accounted as insignificant. The "exploration" of India has, on the one hand, enabled the Royal travellers to arrive at a proper appreciation of the loyalty, the needs, and the conditions of many millions of British subjects. On the other hand, these teeming millions of all ranks, from the Maharajahs down to the ryots who toil in their rice-fields, have learned by ocular demonstration of the most convincing kind that their interests and aspirations are not forgotten; and that they themselves are accounted true citizens of the Empire. Viceroys may come and go; but, the British Throne, of which the Prince and Princess of Wales have been the embodiment in India during the past six months, remains upon its sure and steadfast foundation. This is one of the essential truths that have been borne in upon the minds of the Indian people during the tour which yesterday came to its pre-arranged termination.

World.—The conclusion of their tour in India finds the Prince and Princess of Wales in excellent health. Naturally Their Royal Highnesses and their suite found the swift transitions from heat to cold in different parts of India, as well as the variations of climate through which they have recently passed, rather trying to the constitution. The period of rest on the homeward voyage will, no doubt, be much appreciated after so much hard work; and when the return voyage is over the Prince and Princess are sure of a warm welcome back to England.

21st MARCH 1906.

Birmingham Daily Post.—No personal travel-notes, I hear, are to be published by the Prince and Princess of Wales for the present, but the story of the Indian tour, which is now ended, will be embodied in a volume issued under official sanction, to be published towards the end of next year. It is believed that Her Royal Highness will have a selection of her camera pictures reproduced in album form, for distribution among her immediate relatives, but there will be no edition available for publication. The idea has been mooted in the entourage of a sort of general survey to be written by the Prince of Wales, summarising the impressions formed upon his mind by his colonial and Indian tours; but there is no indication as yet that the suggestion meets with favour in quarters directly interested, and there are reasons that are likely to dissuade the Heir-Apparent from embarking upon such a project. The large number of addresses of welcome received during the last few months are in many instances unique examples of illuminated design, and are to be displayed at South Kensington in the autumn.

Bystander.—Hostesses and débutantes alike are looking forward to the return of the Prince and Princess of Wales as the signal for the real beginning of the season. Various reasons have contributed towards making the beginning of the present season one of the dulllest on record. The trend of politics induced most of the Conservative hostesses to seize the opportunity to spend these early weeks of the year in the South enjoying themselves there rather than in town entertaining for the good of their sadly afflicted cause. The death of the Queen's father has caused Her Majesty to postpone all Royal functions and to live in complete retirement, and the departure of the King for that favourite watering-place of Royalty—Biarritz—has been the last straw on the bending back of the young season.

Independent.—The Indian tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales is now almost a matter of history. Of its transcendent success, both socially and in a more practical form, the published reports seem to leave us in no doubt whatever. As a mere physical effort it is a remarkable achievement. The Royal party has travelled 8,000 miles through India and 2,000 miles by sea to Burma. The mere mention of these figures may bring home in some degree the enormous area which the Indian Empire covers. Of course it is impossible that the future Emperor and his Consort can have seen a tithe of that huge territory, or of the sights which are to be witnessed there. But they have done very well during their five months' travel. The Prince has come in contact with natives of all ranks and classes and creeds. As for the Princess, she has no doubt found much to interest her as a woman in lifting the veil behind which the Purdah system obliges Hindu women of the higher castes to conceal themselves. The poor Purdah Nashins must have excited her sympathy. Unhappily, even the visit of so august a traveller will have little effect in remedying a state of things which in non-Oriental countries would be regarded as a scandal. Though Western ideas and customs have to some extent been assimilated by Orientals, the habits and traditions which are most remote from our own are cherished almost with fanaticism. This feature of Indian life must have struck the Prince and Princess. But a deeper impression has probably been created by the diversity of race, creed, and language which has passed before their eyes. In no country are the people so heterogenous, or divided by so wide a gulf on all that they regard as essential in life. Yet on the whole India is a united Empire, humanely and justly administered. This is due, primarily of that faithful and high-minded service which has borne the heat and burden of onerous and often thankless responsibilities with little hope of reward. This, too, is an aspect of his Indian experiences which the Prince is not likely to overlook.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—Simple, devoid of all but the minimum of ceremony, but marked by a depth of cordial feeling, was the send off given to the Prince and Princess of Wales this evening, when the Renown sailed out bearing them homeward after their splendid progress through India. Leaving Government House at 5-30, and driving by a route lined by the South Wales Borderers, the Sind Volunteer Rifle Corps, the Mahrattas, the 130th Baluchis and the Karachi Artillery Volunteers, Their Royal Highnesses, attended by a squadron of Jacob's Horse, reached Keamari about a quarter to six.

Karachi has accepted the Royal visit and the departure homewards of Their Royal Highnesses from the port as a recognition of its importance. There has been a considerable expansion of trade since the Port Trust was constituted less than twenty years ago, and an arch spanning the approach to the Merewether Pier reminded us of the fact. Huge travelling cranes supported an arch of girders from which hung bags representing the exports and imports of Karachi in 1887 and in 1906. A single sack represented the 6,250 tons of nineteen years ago while last year's trade was represented by bags indicating over 1,652,000 tons. Other figures told us that 307 steamers entered the port in the first year of the Trust and 859 last year. Surmounting the arch was a model of a small sailing vessel with Karachi—Keamari 1856 beneath it. The model of a lighthouse stood on a lower arch, whereon the single word "Farewell" was inscribed. On the other side of the arch, looking towards the Renown berthed at the end of the pier, were the words "Safe voyage, happy meeting, loyal greetings to our King" painted white and lettered in gold. The arch was unique in design and looked most effective.

It was beneath this arch, erected by the Port Trustee, that Lord Lamington, the Governor of Bombay, and Mr. Young, husband, the Commissioner in Sind, received Their Royal Highnesses when they reached the pier.

Also in waiting there were the Chairman, Members and Officials of the Port Trust, with the Military and Civil officers and stretching along the pier towards the wharf were lines of scarlet covered stands bright with flags and filled with on-lookers. Beside the Renown lay the Indian Marine Steamer Dufferin and the Port Trustee's steamer Richmond Crawford, dressed from stem to stern. Upon arrival at the pier the Prince inspected the guard of honour of the South Wales Borderers, and then began the simple farewell. The Chairman, Members and Chief Officials of the Port Trust were presented. The Prince and Princess bade good-bye to all. There was a hearty handshake and a gracious word for all assembled beneath the arch, and particularly for the officials and others to whom the visit and the tour had given special work. The Prince included in this leave-taking the press correspondents who had accompanied Their Royal Highnesses throughout the tour. The Prince and Princess next said good-bye to the aged Mir of Khairpur and the three other Mirs of Sind, and then attended by the Governor and the Commissioner in Sind, Lieutenant General Hunter and other high military and civil officers, proceeded to the Renown. The crowd followed in the rear of the procession to the wharf. The Prince and Princess ascended the gangway from the jetty to the deck of the warship at six o'clock. The boatswains paraded at the head of the gangway, piped in unison and the ship's band played the National Anthem as the Prince boarded the vessel and the Royal standard floated from the after mast and the Trinity House flag from the fore. The Governor, the Commissioner, the Lieutenant-General and the whole of the Royal suite accompanied Their Royal Highnesses aboard. They came ashore after ten minutes spent in leaving-taking, and immediately the signal was given to remove the gangway. The Princess appeared at the taffrail with binoculars in her hands and within ten minutes more the warship had begun to move. As she got under way lusty cheers were raised, and the Prince appeared standing at the salute. The guard of honour on the Bunder gave a Royal salute, and ere the strains of the Anthem ceased came the sound of the battery firing from Manora Point. The white painted warship looked a thing of beauty as she slipped along the wharf, heading towards the sea. "Full speed ahead" and simultaneously with the signal, the cheering and waving of hands and handkerchiefs broke out afresh, and as they ceased the Renown's band struck up "Auld lang syne"; another cheer and the ship had passed the end of the jetty and was steaming straight out towards Manora. Off Manora Point the escorting Squadron the Terrible, the Hermes and the Perseus lay, and took up their charge as the Renown passed out of the harbour. A freshening breeze fluttered the flags at the mast heads and the voyage began in every circumstance of brightness. The Port Trust steamer, Richmond Crawford, carried a large number of passengers down the harbour to take a last glimpse of the home-speeding ship.

Irish Times.—The departure from Karachi on Monday of the Prince and Princess of Wales brings the Royal tour in India to a close. Since Their Royal Highnesses set foot upon Indian soil last November they have been engaged in fulfilling as lengthy and as varied a list of engagements as any that ever has fallen to the lot of Royalty. They have seen the glories of India with their own eyes, and they are in a position now to judge the character of the tie which binds millions of our native fellow subjects to the Throne of the King-Emperor. No Royal couple when they came into the full enjoyment of their heritage, as yet have brought to their exalted post the experiences which have fallen to the lot of the Prince and Princess of Wales. Their visit to the Colonies and their association with the men and women of our own race, to whom the British isles are but specks upon the map of the globe, enabled them to appreciate the extent of the Empire, and in all likelihood to marvel that it should have been the fate of the Briton to plant his rule North, East, South, and West. While we recognise the greatness of the Colonial tour we cannot avoid the reflection that in their journeyings through India Their Royal Highnesses daily found matters calculated more greatly to hold their attention. In the Colonies they were moving about amongst our kith and kin in the main—amongst peoples who, though sundered from the mother land by thousands of miles of ocean, nevertheless are animated by the ideals upon which we ourselves set store. But in India, the land of colour and of display, the Prince and Princess of Wales were thrown into contact with races whose aspirations are of the East, and who, although subjugated by force of arms, are controlled by a handful of Europeans. This aspect of our predominance in India cannot fail vividly to imprint itself upon the mind of one who hereafter will be called upon to concern himself with our methods of rule, and it goes without saying that nothing but good can result from the Royal experiences in the East.

Not the least striking feature of the tour is the complete success which has attended it. Their Royal Highnesses covered eight thousand miles by rail, besides a sea journey of some two thousand miles from Calcutta to Rangoon, and thence back to Madras, between the dates of their landing at Bombay and their embarkation at Karachi. Nevertheless not a single hitch of any sort has occurred, and those responsible for the arrangements are entitled to full credit for the ability with which they carried out the duties entrusted to them. A mere catalogue of the localities visited, of the distances covered, and of the functions in which Their Royal Highnesses participated would convey no adequate impression of the political success of the tour. The visitors everywhere were received with enthusiasm, and the manner in which they identified themselves with the native life of India has left upon the native mind an impress which will not readily be effaced. The late Queen Victoria consistently displayed a tender regard for the welfare of her Oriental subjects. At her express desire His Majesty, when Prince of Wales, visited India, and when in due time he ascended the Throne one of his first acts was to call upon his son personally to make the acquaintance of our native fellows in India. It is said that the Oriental memory is short, but we do not think that this interest upon the part of the Royal Family is likely soon to be forgotten. The native has seen his future King-Emperor, and he has been given more than one proof that the Royal House of Great Britain stands for justice and for freedom. There is in India, no doubt, a circle which sighs for the rise of a native monarchy; but the bulk of the population, mindful of the abuses which prevailed in the days of native sovereigns, is more than content that Great Britain should rule in India. From time to time our authority has to be asserted with some vigour, but no sooner have the troublesome elements been brought thoroughly under sway than they settle down and become loyal supporters of our authority.

To the well-known tact and graciousness of Their Royal Highnesses in a large measure must be attributed the signal success which has attended their stay in the East. But we take it that the knowledge that His Majesty inspired the visit played its part in determining the native rulers to extend to the Prince and Princess of Wales all the hospitality of which they were capable. The lead thus given at the outset was not lost upon the native community, and place after place vied in their endeavours to make the visitors at home, and to show that any "agitation" against British rule in India is the work of a section more noisy than important. It is safe to predict that were we to withdraw from India to-morrow in no long time the country would be thrown into a state of turmoil. The firmness, and at the same time the liberality, of our administration are responsible for the security of life and of property which obtains in the East, and foreigners who cannot be regarded as being over friendly to us time after time have expressed their admiration of the great civilising work with which we have charged ourselves for the benefit of the native races. The return to England of Their Royal Highnesses will be awaited with interest, for the public has not forgotten the graphic language in which, in his famous speech at the Guildhall, the Prince of Wales summed up his impressions of his Colonial tour. We do not doubt but that His Royal Highness will have some information to impart, and that he will convey to us his views, as to our foothold in India, and as to the attitude of the native population towards the British raj. He has conversed with men in the plains and in the hills, with men living beneath a burning sun, and with those others whose lands are covered with snow, and as a student of affairs with a wide knowledge of the world and of its ways, it would be strange, indeed, if life in India did not represent itself to him in some aspects of which travellers and others have failed to take note. He has been given opportunities which do not fall to the lot of the ordinary mortal of seeing behind the veil, and we are confident that the outcome of his experiences will be to confirm the belief that in India Great Britain stands for right and for equality of treatment as between man and man.

Newcastle Daily Chronicle.—The Prince and Princess of Wales have brought to an end their stay in India, which began on November 9th, and so has lasted for more than four months. The Royal progress has been followed with interest and sympathy by the people of this country, though the tendency perhaps is not to realise to the full the meaning which a visit of this kind has to the Indian mind. It has brought India into personal touch really only for the second time, if not with the supreme ruler that is, at least with the ruler that is to be. The average Indian subject might be almost pardoned for coming to regard British rule as the government of the British bureaucracies in the provinces of the Dependency and of the British soldiers scattered throughout the peninsula. Such a visit as this, however, gives a visible demonstration of the power that lies behind the men on the spot, and not the power alone of the monarchy, but of the Parliament and the constitutional system. Civil and military officials may have their differences. These, however, are only agents for the time being of Imperial rule, which, after all, is the enduring thing, the source of all power exercised within the borders of India. This is one of the chief object-lessons of the Royal visit. And another is the benevolent character of our sway in India. It is quite true that our occupation of India is a military one, but it is not true that we hold it by force. Pageant and military review have played a conspicuous part in the events of the past four months; but they have not been more important than the incidents which have had directly to do with philanthropic movements, with industrial progress, and with the development of the means of communication.

The soldier does not play the greatest part in the miracle which is performed daily of holding India, and the Royal visit has helped to impress the fact upon all minds. It was a happy idea which took the Princess to the East with her husband. Conventional views with regard to the status of women have sometimes meant that the Princess of Wales has had to remain in the background. But there is in India an enormous field for woman's work without offending religious prejudices or infringing the canons of caste, and in this domain of practical philanthropy the Princess of Wales has done work which is none the less valuable because it has not always, by the very circumstances of the case, been done before the eyes of all. It is idle to assert, as have sometimes been asserted, that the Eastern woman does not influence public opinion. There never was a community, large or small, in which, whatever might be their social status, women have been without influence upon the processes of social and political evolution. India cannot be seen in four months. But the highways may be trodden in that time, and during his visit the Prince of Wales has left unseen no important political, religious, or military centre, whether in the States ruled by native princes or in those directly under the control of the Crown. He has traversed India from north to south and from east to west; in Burma he has stood where the King's dominions are continuous with those of the Emperor of China; while on the extreme west he has passed along the wild gorge of the Khyber and at Quetta has seen the outermost tower from which watch is kept in the direction from which the next invasion of India will come at the moment when we grow supine.

The India which the Prince and Princess of Wales have seen is a very different country from the India with which the present King Edward made acquaintance in 1875. Then the railway system was only in its infancy. Now India boasts the finest railway system in Asia, and one of the finest in the world—a system which has for its foundation great iron highways for the distribution of commerce, and which has, as an important part of the whole scheme, strategic lines connecting the seaboard and the great military centres with the danger zone on the north-west. In 1875 Burma was not a part of the Empire, while Quetta was a distant place lying within the dominions of a not too friendly ruler. Thibet was little more than a geographical expression, and was for many more years to remain shut out from the outer world. Not the least notable thing about the Royal visit to India was the coming of the Tashi Lama to meet the future Emperor of India. It is not British policy to grab Thibet, but it is necessarily our aim to prevent the grabbing being done by another. Thibet could not for ever remain isolated from her neighbour on the south, and recent events including the visit of the Tashi Lama, have indeed shown that the policy of exclusiveness and aloofness was that of the dominant sacerdotal faction, and not of the people themselves. Not very many years after the visit of the present King, India stood in imminent peril of invasion. The danger was averted, and since then we have gone far towards making our position safe, though it can only remain so by eternal vigilance. India still has economic problems which await solution, in which respect she is like every other country. But agrarian legislation, the development of the railway system, and irrigation schemes have gone far to mitigate the horrors of a recurring scarcity of food and periodical ravages of disease. Though we have to confess to shortcomings, it may be said that British political genius has justified itself in India.

Yorkshire Herald.—The Prince and Princess of Wales have left the shores of India, upon the conclusion of a visit the importance of which it is impossible to exaggerate. Those who know our great Eastern dependency best are the most ready to recognise how largely the personal equation enters into our rule and domination. The authority of Viceroy and lesser officials receives its most impressive seal and stamp from the fact that it represents the powerful and benign influence of the occupant of the British throne, and it is of vital import that there should be no waning of that influence, but that, on the contrary, it should in every possible way be heightened and deepened. For Queen Victoria the Good the Indian people had a veneration of which there is still ample evidence, and no one can doubt that the King-Emperor has found an abiding place in the affections and esteem of his subjects. It was most fitting, as well as highly politic, that those subjects should be afforded the opportunity in some measure at any rate, to become personally acquainted with the Prince and Princess who may be expected at some future date to claim their allegiance on succession to the throne, and the visit, which has throughout its continuance been marked by such conspicuous success, has given them that opportunity. The excellent results of the tour, in its effect upon visitors and visited, are admirably summarised in three sentences. The Prince of Wales, in his speech at Karachi, said: "In bidding India farewell, we can truly say that our visit has been to us an unending and unbroken series of happy and most instructive experiences." Lord Lamington signalled the good-bye of the Bombay Presidency in the following terms: "The tour will live in the recollections of the people as a joyous memory. Marked by Your Royal Highness's kindly interest and graciousness, it will have attached them more than ever to the throne of the King-Emperor."

In these passages we find a greater significance and a truer indication of the value and the inner meaning of the incidents which have marked the progress of Their Royal Highnesses than can be conveyed by all the pomp and circumstance which has surrounded the tour. The scenes of splendour which have been enacted at the various points which have been specially selected for Royal attention have no doubt had their value. They have naturally impressed the populace with a sense of the dignity and importance of the visitors who have come to them from across the seas; they have at the same time brought more vividly home to the visitors the wealth and the magnificence of the vast empire over which they may be called upon to rule. But there has been something better than this for both parties. To the Indian princes and people there has been conveyed the assurance of the Prince's keen and sympathetic interest in all that concerns their welfare. His Royal Highness has made it manifest that he is unfeignedly desirous of fully understanding the problems which govern the lives of all classes of the community, that he is anxious to be apprised of everything which makes for the welfare of the millions who won his father's beneficent sway, and that his heart is as much with the patient and hardworking peasant as with the men of rank and station who have contributed to the brightness and splendour of the receptions which have been so freely accorded him. The Princess, too, has shown herself sincerely desirous of identifying herself with the interests and aspirations of her Indian sisters, and we may take it that the general effect of the tour has been to convince the natives, both high and low, that the King-Emperor and those who represent him are animated by the most kindly wishes and intentions, and may be trusted to act with justice and sympathy. Turning to the other side of the picture, we apprehend that the great value of the visit to the Prince of Wales lies in the insight which he has acquired into Indian affairs. There has no doubt been pleasure for His Royal Highness and the Princess in the wonderful surroundings which have been theirs during their stay, as well as in the welcome which has been given them by the "thousands of cheerful and happy faces" to which the Prince referred at Karachi, but for His Royal Highness there has been a lesson to learn, an experience to acquire, which, as he himself says, with future study and observation will enable him to understand some of the problems of British administration. There is surely a fine augury for future good in the circumstance that the prospective Emperor of India and his Royal consort are returning to this country with hearts touched by the love and goodwill which have been evinced by all classes of those who may later be their subjects, with imaginations fired by the marvels which have been unfolded to their gaze, and with minds enriched by the information which has been laid before their appreciative understanding.

22ND MARCH 1906.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—Most of the newspapers publish articles on the Prince of Wales' tour in India, which has not been marred by any hitch, and there is no question as to its being a political and social success. It finds a fitting termination in the visit to modern Egypt, the handiwork of Lord Cromer.

Morning Post.—We came into Benares on a still Sunday morning, with white and blue skies and the scent of the wild limes, like orange blossom, in the cool air. And we turned from the station, not into the crowded town, but out through the open green cantonments, past English faces above summer frocks driving in to the sound of the church bells. It was not a bit like England, but what leagues and lives apart from the city behind us! For Benares, commonly called Kashi—"The Splendid"—is the concentrated essence of Hindu Hindustan. Splendid it is not in any obvious particular; if it were, how should it be typical of Hinduism to-day, unless there is in sanctity any sort of splendour? For Benares is still, for the Hindu, the Holy City, the most sacred place of his pilgrimage in all India, the home of Shiva's worship in these northern plains; that grim, obscene, poetic vision of God as the regenerator and the destroyer. But splendid? No! One wonders if India has built anything splendid in the last two hundred years. Not that Benares dates only from the 17th century. But the glory of her temples and palaces was demolished by Alla-ud-din seven hundred years ago. Aurangzeb laid his heavy hand on what was left nearly five hundred years later, and she was still of the mercy of the Marathas after a hundred years more. Small wonder that sanctity is all that is left to Benares. Not that she makes no boast of what she has. You are bidden by no means to miss the Monkey Temple, the Golden Temple, the Nepalesse Temple, the Annapurna Temple and the Mosque of Aurangzeb. Really you might miss them all and lose nothing, but the Annapurna, which is called the Cow Temple, is worth seeing, as being to Benares what Benares is to India, a concentration of Hinduism; especially if you can see it, as we saw it, in mud.

The wonderful subservience of the weather to our plans—which might make the most sceptical superstitious of Royal influence—continued for us here. For though we travelled for three nights and days from Haiderabad, through a country reporting rain in every direction, not a drop of it touched the train, and we arrived to find Benares only just lifting her head from a deluge which had lasted all the time of our travel. The roads were dry again, but the roads are not Benares. The few broad streets through which one drives do not at all reveal her, for it is in the labyrinth of narrow, tortuous alleys, in scarcely one of which can three men walk abreast, with houses towering up crookedly to the blue riband of sky, does Benares work, and move, and have her being. And since down to the floor of these, not even the mid-day sun can reach, the mud lay still in slime, the water spread and trickled from puddles, and one had to slip and splash by half a mile of them before stooping under a doorway, creeping through a hole in the wall, clinging to a chain, with a long stride across to a ledge between two pillars, one found oneself looking down on to a small and filthy courtyard, surrounded on all its four sides by the high walls of houses, in the centre of which, and occupying indeed almost all the space, were the columns and conical roof of a shrine. In the narrow space round about it, spattered and besmeared with mud, white oxen wandered; and in and out through the central doorway the worshippers pushed their way, a continuous crowd of them, mostly women, low-caste women, in faded crimson saris, with the mud to their ankles, pressing up the steps turning for a moment to lay their offering in the enclosed part of the shrine, and passing out again with contented faces, making a way among the meditative cattle, sliding a brown hand along their sleek sides. The mud slipped from the floor of the temple and flopped down the steps, mixed with the grain and the white and yellow and purple blossoms which have been brought as offerings. It looked like—it was in fact—a shrine in a byre, and by what phrase can Benares be more fitly described. An hour spent watching those poor people come and go, while the stale reek of the place settled in one's nostrils, and the foulness, the irreverence, the piety, the simplicity of it all sank into one's heart, taught one more of Hinduism than could be learnt from books in many days. It seemed like a key to all the rest of it, a key that gave, indeed, nothing to one's hand but the consciousness of other men's possessions. But how grateful may one not be even for that when the possession is a faith from which all one's instincts are averse. And Benares needs sympathetic interpretation. With no reconciling loveliness of its own, no bond of beauty, such as have some of the other great cities, no strong link even with the past, it stands naked in its squalor and its fervid faith, and one may ever so easily take a disliking to both of them.

Perhaps, remembering the river front, one should not deny its claim to beauty, but that beauty seems somehow not its own, something accidental, unmerited, an intrigue of time and the great green river and the evening skies. The city is all on one shore. On the other is a vast of white sand, which the river that now slips a blue and silver arm about it scourges in the monsoon with its discoloured fury. On the other bank the town rises steeply from the water above its interminable flights of steps, in a tender crescent of more than three miles. As one looks along it down the river in late afternoon, sliced by the slanting sunshine into sharp light and shadow, or sees it with the rose of dawn in its face and the mists still floating about its ankles, there can be no question of its beauty. Yet there is not in all that long curve a single building that could be praised and there is a suggestion rather of Mediæval Italy than of India in the stained russets, sago green cream of its huddled, irregular, uplifted palaces. Now, with the river fifty feet below its flood level the bare, exposed, brown bastions on which the houses stand give the effect of a fortified city, and dwarf the decorated, many-windowed, upper storeys. The bluff walls rise from flights of steps with which the entire front is terraced, which reach up from the river, contracting, as they meet the abutments of the walls, till they disappear into temple or palace under dark arches or end in the streets that lead out of the town. The steps seem Italian, too, just as the narrow by-ways through the city suggest a Venetian calle; but on the steps India comes in again, dense enough and dark enough and bright enough to blot out the impression. It is there in its thousands every morning before the light has come into the sky, and till the sun is turning again to the west continues to wash its sins away and cleanse its soul in the sacred river. The women are there as well as the men, the women who take so small a space in the East's convictions of immortality, with their wet saris clinging to bodies so much more beautiful than the west can show, and that strong satisfaction of faith on their faces. Under broad sunshades of plaited palm thrust into a hole in the stone floor holy men sit and expound the law, and the sound of songs, of strange songs on men's voices floats to and fro along the front of the ghats. A thin stream of smoke drifts up from the centre of the crescent where are burnt the dead, happy enough to die in or to be brought to Kashi. They lie waiting their turn—what were men wrapped in white and what were women in crimson, their feet to the river, while other pyres are being consumed. A pile of wood is made and on it is laid the next in order, tied to its bamboo litter, and over it more wood piled. Then the torch is touched to its lips, a few poor strips of sandal wood—unless the dead was wealthy—are slipped into the pyre, and the logs are lighted. There can be for mortality no more lyric ending than these scented tongues of flame, but one can better appreciate the poetry from a little distance on the river, whence one sees only the coloured fire and the coil of smoke, and misses the crushing by the burners of some obdurate skull, or the thrusting back of some slim foot into the heart of the fire. So all Hindus are burnt who die in the city except little children and the victims of small-pox and cholera. These are rowed out and dropped in the middle of the river. So Sitla, the Goddess of small-pox, is propitiated, but one would fancy that the propitiation hardly extended to the disease.

With the river and the ghats one leaves the beauty of Benares behind one, yet in leaving it one feels to be going back to the inner secrets of the city. One may feel, however, while still on the Ghats, how uncommunicable are these, by standing by that tank which Vishnu dug and into which Devi dropped a jewel. Jewels are not dropped into it now, but flowers, milk, grain, sandal-wood, and sweetmeats, and the sacred pool exhales in return a reek which might warn even a troubling angel away from it. On the steps that lead to its dark foul water the infirm, the diseased, and the leprous sit; and down them the faithful go to drink of it. But nearer still to those inapproachable secrets is the Gyan Kup, the Well of Knowledge, in the quadrangle behind the Golden Temple, where the emblem of Shiva still lies in hiding.

Here where naked, long-haired fakirs, smeared with dirt and ashes, mix in the muddy crowd of pilgrims, beggars, Brahmas, women, cattle, and children, the surroundings are even more holy and more foul, since penned in by high walls there is no draught from the great Ganges to carry off their stagnant fetor. Yes, here the whole thing is if one could but understand it; its foulness and its sweetness and its greatness, its seeming failure and its age-long success. Here centuries ago a man preached a faith that was all serenity and kindness and beauty; within a mile men preach another that is all nobility and love and light. But on the crowds by the Well of Knowledge neither has any influence, neither offers any beauty that they can desire.

While writing of the mud one must not forget the marigolds, if only because they were the one pretty thing to be set against all the inanities of decorations we have endured. The marigold is Parvati's flower, and Parvati, who is the Hindu Venus—not the smirking mediæval Goddess, but the Greek one, terrible in her beauty as "an army with banners"—is the wife of Shiva, whom Benares honours. So it was that marigolds met us; marigolds in garlands hung from green bamboos; wreaths of marigolds nailed to wall and doorway; carts laden with their pale primrose yellow; women, clad in apricot pink, with piles of golden marigolds in brown baskets on their heads, and heaps of them at street corners, primrose and orange and deep velvet bronze, being strung deftly into endless cables. The joyous colour everywhere caught the eye, their aromatic odour hung gratefully in the air, covering even the multitudinous stench of the bazaar. At the temples priests hung marigold garlands about one's neck, and marigolds wreathed one's boat's prow on the river, and were scattered about her as she slid down the stream. So to the last the impressions mingled, the beauty and the deformity, the fineness and the foulness, mud and marigolds.—(H. F. PROVOST BATTERSBY).

23RD MARCH 1900.

Indian Daily News.—A correspondent of the Mussorie Times commenting on the visit of the Princess of Wales to Mussorie, writes:—

"We witnessed a very pretty incident on the road near the Toll Bar, which bears on the general belief of Her Highness's fondness for children. The little son and daughter of the Proprietor of the 'Wales' Hotel, Rajpore, had ridden as far as the 'Gate to Mussorie,' to see the Princess. On getting near to the young ones, Her Royal Highness ordered her dandy to stop, while Major Campbell, A.D.C., picked up the little girls who, nothing abashed, held out a bunch of wild violets and liped the request that they might be accepted. Her Royal Highness and Lady Dugdale were very pleased and laughed in a very happy manner at the wee mite's effort. On the return journey Her Royal Highness and suite visited the 'Wales' Hotel, where they spent some time and where Her Royal Highness again recognised her little friend of the flower incident. We are under the impression that, had there been a little more privacy, a 'romp' with the children would have ended what appeared to be a most enjoyable trip, so happy and affable were the whole party."

Standard.—In some ways, Benares is the most notable of the cities of India: not because of her wealth, her magnificence, or her beauty, for the Presidency capitals are richer, by far, and greater, nor has she any such noble monuments of art or such memorials of the past as those which lend undying interest to Agra and Delhi. But Benares is the metropolis of Hinduism, the Rome of the strange amalgam of creeds and customs that rules the lives of so many dusky millions, the mysterious Queen of the Brahmanic world; and, like a queen, Benares sits by the Ganges, albeit a queen with purple robes somewhat patched and tattered and a throne of ivory and clay. The stream of the sacred river sweeps past in a wide crescent of pale yellow water, and Kashi, "the Splendid," as the Hindus call the city, looks down upon the flood in a huddle of palaces and towers, of walls and window-spaces, of cones and cupolas and fretted temple pyramids, with the tall minarets of a mosque lifting themselves sternly towards the skies, as though calling upon Allah, the One and Indivisible, to bear witness against the idolatrous tangle below. Beauty and squalor, pretentiousness and insignificance, meet you as you are rowed past the broken line of wharves and ghats. Now a noble facade, now a tumbled heap of ruin or a patch of bare sandbank and gravel-pit ; now the deep red gopuram of a Hindoo temple or a white Jain steeple, with vanes and bells of gold ; now the mighty piers and massive stone blocks of an unfinished palace, which has slipped on its foundations of river mud, and lies threateningly on the brink. From the irregular masses of buildings terraced on the high bank, broad flights of steps lead to the water's edge : broad steps which for many hours of the day and most days of the year are all alive with pilgrims, bathing and washing, with worshippers throwing their chaplets of marigold upon mother Gunga's bosom ; with priests and ascetics sitting in prayer under great straw sunshades ; steps up which the red-robed women climb at evening, with pots of gleaming brass and dripping earthenware bowls ; steps down which they bring the dead for burning, and the dying that they may pass away with their feet wet from the lapping of the River of Life.

Apart from its sumptuous water-front, there is little dignity and charm in Benares. The temples, even the Golden Temple itself, are mean things, with no claim to architectural merit. The old town is a nest of narrow lanes, in which the pilgrims, on their way to the shrines and the bathing ghats, can look into the tiny booths from which is heard the clink of the brassworker's hammer and chisel, as he works at his images of Mahadeo and Parvati and Ganesh. The Moslems laid their heavy hand on Kashi, and most of its older shrines disappeared. If you want to see the true memorials of Hindu art, in its stronger days, you must go elsewhere, to Madura or Tanjore or Conjevaram, or to the temple caves of Ellora, enriched with sculptured figures, almost Hellenic in their austere simplicity. Benares, like Rome, has passed under the hoof of the spoiler. But Aurangzeb, the iconoclast, broke its idols in vain. When the Prince rode through the flower-festooned streets of Benares at the head of a great elephant procession, a company of ascetics, ragged and unkempt, greeted him at one point. A little further on there was a kind of lofty throne, under the canopy of which were seated two boys, dressed in the richest silks and jewels, with half a dozen gorgeous attendants to hold gilded fans and maces behind them ; small boys, who might have been princes themselves, by the haughty insouciance of their demeanour. These were the hereditary mahants, the heads, by right of descent, of the great religious corporations. They typified that insolent ecclesiasticism of which Benares is the centre, even as the fakirs represented the crowd of ignorant fanatics who wander into its courts, as irresponsible as its sacred bulls and cows, and not much more intelligent.

Benares is the embodiment of Hinduism, and, like Hinduism, it leaves on the mind the impression of a confused jumble, a mass of contradictions. What is the Hindu religion ? Men who have spent more years upon it than I have spent days confess themselves unable to answer the question. To the superficial observer it seems to be the strangest mixture : magic tempered by metaphysics, according to one epigrammatic description. The outsider, however, sees more of the magic, the crude idolatry than of the philosophy. Perhaps he does it an injustice on that account. The spiritual impress which Brahmanism has laid upon the Indian people is hidden from him. But what he does see is the welter of superstition in which it leaves the masses, the tyranny of priestcraft it lays upon them, the solid barrier with which it walls round private life, the crude, cumbrous, repellent mass of social observances on which it places the stamp of despotic custom and immutable law.

It is full of contradictions—not, perhaps, in this differing from other religions. It enjoys tenderness, self-sacrifice, mercy, so that its votaries will not take the life even of a stinging insect ; and it can exhibit the most relentless cruelty, especially where its own formalism is involved. "Thou shalt not kill," is the rule ; therefore a pious Hindu will allow an ox with a broken leg to starve to death in lingering agony by the wayside. When you hear of the barbarities practised upon women in childbirth, of the callous rites with which the dying are surrounded, the child-marrings, the persecution of widows, you sometimes feel inclined to wish that the missionaries and the Imperial Government could combine to sweep the whole business into the sea. Yet the Hindus are a kindly people, with more highly developed family affections than ourselves. If they do cruel things it is with the intention to be humane. Their humanity looks beyond this transient world to that which includes and comprehends all others, and it points vaguely to that abstraction of which the horrible gods and distorted idols are grotesque or terrifying symbols.

Of death, of the dead, and of the dying you see much at Benares, for every Hindu would like to perish by the Ganges if he could. Thus the Burning Ghat on the water front is always busy, and the tourist, as he is rowed along, can see the pile of logs crackling briskly with a stiff brown corpse laid upon it. There is no sanctity and no privacy about this place of cremation. The poor relic of humanity lies unregarded by the strand before the flames do their work upon it. Pariah dogs prowl about with expectant eyes ; knowing that the body may sometimes be thrown half-consumed into the river. That used to be done to save the expense of fuel, though it happens less frequently now, that the Government provide wood enough for every pyre free of charge. The Burners of the Dead, an unclean caste, who alone may tend the funeral fire, are sitting on a neighbouring bank, engaged in cheerful conversation, others are raking with long rods among the blazing heaps, poking down an exposed skull or a charred protruding foot ; close by women are dipping clothes in the Ganges, or filling their water-pots, without a glance at the pile and its burden. Life is cheap in India, and death too common.

At certain places, and in Benares especially, when Hindus are at the point of death, their kinsmen drag them from their sick-rooms, that they may breathe their last beside a sacred river. A heartless custom, it seems, which must be the cause of much suffering to racked and shattered frames, and is at times scarcely distinguishable from murder, for in the old days, if the victim, when brought to the water, still obstinately refused to render up his soul, they would occasionally help him on his way by filling his mouth with mud. Yet even this rite is not always repulsive. In Benares, drifting down the stream, one still luminous afternoon, some weeks before the approach of the Prince had caused the banks to be beset with decorated houseboats, we passed close to the Manikarnika Ghat, the most sanctified of all the stairways that lead to the Ganges. At the foot of the steps a group of three or four men were bending over a recumbent form, swathed in white. As we came opposite the ghat we saw that the figure was that of a woman, lying stretched upon a couch or mattress of cotton at the edge of the water, with the feet just touched by the sacred eddy. She had been brought here to die, so that her spirit might pass into the other world, saved and purified by the river of redemption. The dying light fell full upon the dying face, and it showed us the eyes already half-closed and a smile of transfiguring peace playing about the pale and quivering lips. There was no suggestion of harshness in this scene ; it was one of painful beauty. Happiness was written on the wan features under the loose white coil, the happiness of an intense and passionate calm, like that of the doomed Conci girl on Lionardo's canvas ; and in the attitudes of the watching attendants there was a grave and reverent tenderness. Yet as we looked up the bank we saw another party carrying a litter on which a sick old man was lying. They were running fast, and audible groans broke from the wretched shrivelled creature, as they jolted his crazy catafalque over the rough path, anxious to get it down to the brink before the end came.

So Hinduism shows its twofold aspect; and who shall say how far the deep spiritual tranquillity it yields its votaries is balanced by the wrongs, the follies and the barbarisms which hive under its shelter.

There is no religion in which the difference between the elect and the common herd is so marked. From a Welsh revivalist to an Oxford Professor of Theology the activity is steep. But the space between the highly cultivated Hindu, who is a philosophical Pantheist, and the villager, smearing himself with the blood of butchered goats before the altar of Durga, is more marked. In practice, it is largely priestcraft and a genial, primitive, rollicking, unclean idolatry. To "feed and see" the Brahmins is the main duty of the layman: that done, he is free to worship stocks and stones, or ghosts and demons, or any fee-faw-fo-fum images that seize his fancy; and his morals may take care of themselves, provided he sticks to certain caste practice and abstains from the killing of cows. Loose as the system is, it holds two hundred and forty millions in a clasp which has never relaxed through the centuries, and is just about as firmly fastened to-day as ever. It is natural to assume that Hinduism is a waning force, weakened by its impact upon modern science and progress. But that is extremely doubtful. Some of those who know most about India believe that the change is in the opposite direction. They tell us that in the years there has been a striking revival of Brahmanism, that it is going forward instead of backward, and clutching closer into its subtle embrace whole classes and tribes who before hung loose from its influence.

At first glance one would say that the railway, the telegraph, the printing press, the secondary school, must make short work of the worship of Siva and Krishna, of the hideous altars, the battenning temple herds, the offerings and the sacrifices. But it is not so. Hinduism is even promoted by these new agencies. The railways make the pilgrimages to the sacred rivers and the famous shrines easier and more popular. These festivals are public holidays much more than religious celebrations; but the priests and sadhus profit by them. They have assimilated the printing press, and with their vernacular tracts and cheap liturgies are bringing into the regular Hindu communion many aboriginals and Animists and outcasts and others, who were formerly mere pagans. Now that all India is drawn closer together by better communications and the printed word, so that its various provinces are growing conscious of a certain identity, the one thing they have in common, which is the Brahmanical system, emerges more clearly. It is becoming better organised, and is gaining some of the attributes of a church as well as a vague creed.

But education—surely this must tell? No doubt it does; but the educated Hindu sometimes reconciles the Higher Thought with the Lower Act in a startling fashion. It is not merely that cultivated native gentlemen, University graduates, trained lawyers, fluent writers, will doff their European ideas with their European garments inside their own doors, and submit themselves to the most irrational code of caste formularies. They do more. Persons who can quote Herbert Spencer and Weissmann at an English dinner-table may "go Fanti" at any moment. You may have a native friend, let us say, a Sessions Judge—I am not giving an imaginary case—who seems in the ordinary way all that is enlightened and refined. He understands our fashions, is well read in our literature, talks and behaves, in his office, or when you ask him to your house, much like any educated Englishman. But the festival of Kali comes, and you must not be surprised to find him, daubed with red paint, half naked, with dishevelled hair, howling and shrieking, in the midst of a frenzied crowd of idol worshippers. But that brings us to the large subject of the educated native, on which some thing more must be said on another occasion.—(SIDNEY LOW.)

24TH MARCH 1906.

Army and Navy Gazette.—The Viceroy has sent the following telegram to the King:—

"On the departure of the Prince and Princess of Wales from India I hope I may be permitted to assure Your Majesty of the signal success of Their Royal Highnesses' visit and the unbounded pleasure which it has afforded to Your Majesty's Indian subjects."

King Edward has replied as follows:—

"I am much touched by your kind words, and am delighted that the visit has been such a success. I am most grateful to you and to those in authority under you and to the whole populace for the magnificent reception accorded to them."

A Peshawar correspondent writes:—

"There is a sad story to tell of the death of a brave soldier. A party of the 21st Cavalry were crossing the Cabul river not far from Skab-Kadar, where there was a ford. The horse of one of the officers got into deep water and was borne down stream by the current, which at this time of year is very strong. The British officer and his charger with some difficulty reached the other side in safety; but a duffadar, a Pathan, seeing that his officer was in danger, at once went to his assistance. Being, however, weighted with accoutrements and ammunition he could not struggle against the strength of the water, and he was sucked under in the presence of the remainder of his squadron. His body was not recovered. The regret of all ranks is great, for he ought to have been saved that his gallantry might have been rewarded. Instances of soldierly devotion like this deserve to be made known showing, as they do, how true the spirit of loyalty of the native soldier to his British officer is."

With reference to the above, the general officer commanding the 1st (Peshawar) Division has received the following letter from the Chief of the Staff to the Prince of Wales:—"His Royal Highness has read in the newspapers of the sad incident which occurred on the Cabul river when Duffadar Dilawar Khan, of the 21st (P. A. V. O.) Cavalry, lost his life in the gallant endeavour to assist Lieutenant Robertson. This brave act of true comradeship has deeply interested His Royal Highness, and he directs me to send you Rs. 500 in the hope that it may prove of some use to the Duffadar's widow and family."

The King has approved the appointment of the Prince of Wales to be Colonel-in-Chief of the 1st Sappers and Miners at Roorkee, in recognition of the distinguished services of the corps.

Trimulgherry (Secunderabad, Deccan) garrison seems to have been exceptionally and gratifyingly treated during the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to India, for Her Royal Highness, with her usual interest in matters pertaining to the soldier, not only attended the Soldiers' Church service, but also paid a visit to the Soldiers' Institute, inspecting the supper room and stores, etc., displaying a kindly interest and amusement in some of the comic sketches done by a member of L. Battery, which adorn the supper room. This act of condescension and favour will be remembered by a loyal garrison.

Lady's Pictorial.—The Prince and Princess of Wales embarked on Monday in the battleship Renown at Karachi for their journey home, having left London on October 10th, and made a very complete and interesting tour of the Indian Empire in the five months they have been absent. The most notable places Their Royal Highnesses have visited include Indore, Udaipur, Jaipur, Bikanir, Lahore, Peshawar, Rawalpindi, Kashmir, Agra, Gwalior, Lucknow, Calcutta, Rangoon, Madras, Mysore, Hyderabad, Benares, Cawnpore, Aligarh, and Quetta, with Bombay as the base from which they have made their excursions.

Right up to the time of leaving the Royal couple were busy in various official ways. On Wednesday the Prince of Wales planted a hawthorn tree at Quetta, on the place where Sir Robert Sandeman first set up camp on arriving at Quetta. Afterwards His Royal Highness lunched at the mess of the officers of the Welsh Regiment, and left at midnight for Chaman, where he presented colours to the 127th Baluch Light Infantry on Thursday. The Prince and Princess left for Karachi on Friday.

Newcastle Daily Journal.—The tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales in India has now come to an end, and Their Royal Highnesses are on their homeward voyage. In every respect the visit has been memorable. The demonstrations of loyalty everywhere evoked were hearty and spontaneous, and the deep impression made on the Royal visitors was happily expressed in the Prince's parting speech at Karachi when he said: "In bidding India farewell, we can truly say that our visit has been to us an unending and unbroken series of happy and most instructive experiences." That the tour has been a triumphal Imperial progress, attended by scenes of unsurpassed splendour, could be realised at home by all who have followed the reports in the newspapers. On the people of India it has had the happiest influences. Lord Lansdowne, the Governor of Bombay, voiced the prevalent feeling in a farewell message to the Royal visitors, in which he said the tour will ever live in the recollections of the people as a joyous memory, and which, marked by their Royal Highnesses' kindly interest and graciousness, will have attached them more than ever to the Throne of His Majesty the King-Emperor. These are not mere conventional expressions; they are the statement of impressions which all reports concur in declaring have been made by the visit. The tour has been so long that nearly every part of our great Indian Empire has been visited. The Prince and Princess arrived at Bombay on November 9th, and from the outset the demonstrations of welcome were so hearty that His Royal Highness said they at once felt as if they were at home among their own people. The places subsequently visited were as enthusiastic in their loyalty, and what the Prince said of the reception at Bombay might have been applied to all the rest of India. The sentiment of loyalty towards the Crown was indicated by the ruling chiefs through many little, though none the less significant, things, such as the resigning of small prerogatives, and the rendering of special acts of homage never accorded to any Viceroy; for instance, the laying of a sword at the Prince's feet, instead of merely presenting the hilt; or, as at Jeypore, permitting the Royal carriage, contrary to all precedent, to drive through the courts of the palace right into the Hall of Audience. These things, trifling as they might appear to a Western mind, were significant of much in India. They were typical of the general desire to offer the fullest expression of devoted loyalty to the Royal House, and the special acts of homage were accepted in that spirit. At Karachi, at the close of the tour, the Prince was able to say that he and the Princess had seen enough to make India a living reality to them, and enough to make them wish that they could see more, and to implant for ever in their hearts sympathy and interest in all that affects our fellow-subjects in India, of whatever creed or race. They were, the Prince continued, both sincerely thankful to have been privileged to visit India, and to have gained impressions that, with future study and observation, would enable him to try and understand some of the problems of British administration. In a tactful reference to the difficulty of realising the importance of Indian questions without personal experience of the country, His Royal Highness said: "I fully appreciate the advantages that a visit to this great continent must give to anyone in considering even the simplest Indian questions." It is for want of this experience that the majority of the British public have been unable to realise the exact significance of two recent rather burning questions of Indian administration—the Curzon-Kitchener controversy and the partition of Bengal. The latter, which at one time threatened to rouse some feeling, is now accepted as finally settled, while the question of army administration, which has been temporarily settled by a compromise that is admittedly experimental must be left to time and the good sense of the Viceroy and Commander-in-Chief for a final solution.

Politically, one of the most important acts of the tour was the Prince's drive up the Khyber Pass, without any guard except an escort composed of Afridis, so recently in arms against the British. It was, according to Reuter's special correspondent, an open secret that many regarded the excursion as rash, and would have dissuaded His Royal Highness from it; but its happy accomplishment produced an excellent impression, showing, as it did, the implicit confidence of the King's son in the honour and chivalry of the Pathan, and his regard for the Sikh nation. Another feature of the tour to which allusion may be made was the visit to Burma. This was not a province of the Indian Empire on the occasion of King Edward's tour thirty years ago, and was, of course, not visited by His Majesty. The Prince's visit to Burma, the first made by a future head of the Royal House, was most successful, and had the happiest effects. The same remark might, indeed, be made of every part visited. There was one significant incident—the meeting between the Prince of Wales and the Tashi Lama—which was looked upon as very promising for our future relations with Thibet. Since the Young-husband expedition, and the discovery which was made of Russian intrigues with the Dalai Lama—now a fugitive—we cannot afford to treat the affairs of the mountain kingdom with indifference. It is to our interest, however, to show the Thibetans that they have nothing to gain, but everything to lose, by playing Russia's game, and that the best policy for Thibet is to observe treaties by keeping open trade routes, and to preserve friendly relations with the Government of India. The Tashi Lama's meeting with the Prince will, it is believed, have a favourable influence in that direction. Indeed, from whatever point of view it is regarded the Royal tour has produced the happiest possible impression. There was one subject which was giving cause for anxiety when the Prince and Princess first landed and for some time afterwards, and that was the fear that there might be a recurrence, though in a less severe form, of the famine which devastated India in the early part of Lord Curzon's regime. The Prince made reference to this in his farewell speech. "Although," he said, "our receptions everywhere were scenes of brightness and splendour, and we have been greeted by thousands of cheerful and happy faces, we have not forgotten the hard lives led by those in the trying climates of the plains, and we know the miseries which beset the patient and hard-working peasant when the rains do not come in due season." The rains have again, as a fact, not come exactly in due season, and according to the latest report, there were over four hundred thousand people on relief works. There is, however, reason to believe that the worst is over, and that the prospects for the future are more hopeful. In undertaking their Indian tour, the Prince and Princess of Wales were fulfilling a promise which was given when they made their voyage round the empire in the Ophir. India was expressly excluded from that tour, because it was reserved for the special visit which has now been paid. Royal tours of this kind, which seem, as described by special correspondents, to be mainly spectacular or social, are important links in the chain of empire. It is a subject for congratulation that in every part of the empire the people have now had an opportunity of personally realising the link that binds them to the Throne.

Outlook.—The Prince of Wales's Indian visit ended quietly at Karachi on Monday last, and the King will soon be welcoming home one of the most travelled of his subjects. We shall leave geographers and ethnologists to revel in the amazing statistics of the tour, of which the Special Correspondent of the Times wrote with all his well-known grasp and vividness in the issue of Monday last. The months of quiet travelling, chequered here and there by intervals of such pageantry as India alone is able to provide, will bear richer fruit than any of the Prince's previous tours. Our great self-governing Colonies, while they remain instinctive and devoted subjects of the Crown, have lost the old-world childishness which kindles at the sight of flashing plumes and uniforms. But in India display is still near the deepest instincts of the many races who combined to welcome their coming Emperor. They see the mysterious providence under which they live incarnate in the splendour of the passing pageantry, and their loyalty thereby takes form and permanence. While therefore the cultured classes have come intimately into contact with the Prince and the Princess, the poorer millions have gained by their brief presence in their own way, and India, we trust, will often be enabled to repeat the varied scenes of the last few months.

Queen.—(By EUSTACE REYNOLDS-BALL, F.R.C.I., F.R.G.S.)

Britain's myriad voices call,
Sons be welded each and all
Into one Imperial whole;
One with Britain, heart and soul,
One flag, one life, one fleet, one throne.

A cynical writer once defined patriotism as love of one's own country, and imperialism as love of other people's country; but no one will, we think, seriously attempt to belittle the Indian tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales as a kind of globe-trotting in excelsis. Few, in short, will deny its political and imperial importance. Indeed, the tour may be aptly described by the much-abused term, epoch-making. It is, indeed, unique, not only in its extent and importance, but in its political significance.

There is no doubt that the Prince of Wales can claim the record among the Royal houses of Europe for extensive travel. Indeed the tours of the German Emperor are to those of the Prince of Wales what the trips of a week-end excursionist are to those of a round-the-world globe-trotter. Indeed, we might go further, and if we include His Royal Highness's Bachelorette voyages in his youth, and the historic Colonial tour of 1901, we might search all history, to find a parallel. Perhaps the travels of Alexander the Great or Hadrian afford the nearest parallel. But at the same time, the Prince does not claim to be an explorer like the Duke of the Abruzzi or Prince Henry of Orleans, as his travels have necessarily been confined more or less to the great highways of travel. But, after all, to regard the journey from the point of view of mileage merely would be absurd—this is merely a striking incident of the tour.

It is neither easy nor profitable to make comparisons between the Indian and the Colonial tours, though the political significance of each is of the highest importance. Certainly the Indian tour entailed the hardest work—there was no restful interval afforded by the long voyage from one great colony (or group of colonies) to another, from the incessant round of ceremonial for the most part undertaken in tropical heat, for in many parts of Southern India great heat is encountered even in the winter months.

The Indian tour is a kind of supplement or complement of the Colonial tour of 1901. It has completed the Royal progress through the over-sea dominions which make up the great British Empire, and it has, in short, put the coping-stone on the Bridge of Empire. It is significant that throughout the whole of these two great journeys the Prince did not set foot on one inch of foreign soil, with the exception of a few hours' visit—and that was incognito and strictly unofficial—to the American side of Niagara.

Then the impetus given to the national expression of loyalty by the personal influence of the Princess of Wales must not be forgotten. The presence of Her Royal Highness in this grand tour of the Indian Empire did much to inspire loyalty to the British Raj among all classes. The Princess's personal charm of manner, her unaffected demeanour and gracious affability, her bonhomie and quick and intelligent appreciation of everything brought within her purview, and, in short, her true womanliness, were thoroughly appreciated by all who came in contact with her. Then her unwearied devotion to duty, even to what may be described as official sight-seeing as well as ceremonial functions, commanded the sincere respect of the officials and "civilians", and the "ornamental functions" of Royalty are no child's play.

It used to be said of His Majesty's historic Indian tour in 1875-6 that no Englishman had ever seen more of India in a single winter. But, of course, the Prince of Wales' travel record is far better, owing mainly to the enormous expansion of railways in the last thirty years. The King, for instance, did not visit Kashmir or the North-West Frontier, nor was Hyderabad or Mysore included in the Royal itinerary. Rajputana remains, I believe, a terra incognita to His Majesty, though the Prince visited several of the Rajput States, and, thanks to the new railway, was able to traverse the great Rajputana Desert from one end to the other. Then the King did not, like his son, manage to comprise a flying visit to Burma in the course of his progress through our great Oriental Empire. The King, however, included Ceylon, which is geographically, if not politically, a part of India, which the Prince of course visited instead in the famous Colonial tour of 1901. In mileage the honours remain with the Prince. But this, after all, is a narrow view of the significance of the visit of the Heir to the Throne.

Then no doubt this tour will be of some educational value to the British public. It is a common place that the chief ethical advantage of a great war is that it teaches the British public geography, and certainly the Royal tour through the Indian Empire has insensibly done much to dissipate the dense mists of ignorance about India and things Indian with which stay-at-home readers are enveloped.

For instance, newspaper readers are beginning to assimilate Indian atmosphere vicariously, and can distinguish between Chuprassies and Chuppatties. Chota Hazri is now easily recognised as the Oriental counterpart of the French café complet, of which perhaps the nearest English equivalent is "crackfast". We can afford to smile at the proverbial globe-trotter who, on his first visit to India, when asked if he would like some Bombay duck, replied that he preferred a wing, evidently regarding this piscatorial delicacy as a variant of the American canvas-back duck. We know that Zennah means a harem, and not an Indian town or state, and we are able to avoid the pitfall into which a writer in a well-known daily recently fell when referring to the Buddhist Nirvana as a town in Thibet! Some of us can even appreciate the difference between a dhooley (stretcher) and a dholi (washerman), and can smile at the famous "howler" of a well-known "member for India" who on one occasion in the House of Commons, when enlarging on some hard-fought engagement on the frontier, impressively led up by way of climax to the startling announcement that at the end of the engagement the ferocious dhooleys rushed from the rear to carry off the wounded! We can see the point of the favourite Anglo-Indian story about the recently-joined subaltern, who complained that all the villages in India seemed to have the same name—Janta ne (i.e., "don't know", the usual reply of his bearer). We might continue the list indefinitely, but we will spare our readers.

One criticism on the Royal tour may perhaps be ventured upon with all deference. No doubt many who read the graphic accounts of the State ceremonies at Calcutta and elsewhere must have been surprised to notice that the Heir to the Throne and the personal representative of the Emperor of India took a secondary position. For instance, the Viceroy, and not the Prince, technically received the salute at the march past of the troops.

When we consider that the Royal tour was in some measure undertaken in order to satisfy the well-known Oriental prejudice for personal rule, and to foster their deep-seated sentimental reverence for the person of the Sovereign, it is to be regretted that the technical precedence allotted to the Viceroy as the personal and official representative of the Crown, should not in this instance have been waived.

This is, I think, the more regrettable, as it is well known that at the time of the great Durbar in 1903 many of the ruling princes were disappointed—though there may not have been any overt manifestation of this—that it was the Viceroy, and not the Duke of Connaught, who was the channel through which their official expressions of loyalty and personal devotion to their sovereign, the King-Emperor, were presented.

Yet the Duke of Connaught was merely visiting India as a tourist and not in any official capacity, while His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales is not only, of course, the Heir to the Throne, but has visited the Indian Empire as the personal representative of His Majesty King Edward VII.

Saturday Review.—The tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales ended this week, and they embarked at Karachi. In a farewell reply to the local authorities, full of the tact which everywhere marked the Prince's official utterances, he acknowledged the loyalty and warmth of their reception by all the many races and classes he met. The political effect of this visit must not be underrated. It has not only enabled the heir-apparent to become acquainted with the most important part of his future dominions across the seas and with the chiefs and leaders of its many peoples, but it has also extended and intensified the feeling of loyalty and devotion to the Royal Family already shown towards the King and towards Queen Victoria especially, to a degree amounting almost to worship. In future the popularity of the Prince will be an asset in the relations between England and the great dependency where loyalty means devotion, not to a government in the abstract, but to the Sovereign and his dynasty.

Spectator.—The Prince of Wales, who with the Princess sailed for home on Monday, took farewell of India in replying to a municipal address at Karachi this day week. In his speech the Prince assured all his friends in India that he left it with feelings of gratitude and affection. Their journey had been in all parts most delightful,—“an unending and unbroken series of happy and most instructive experiences.” The Times correspondent, who has accompanied the Prince on his tour, sums up its significance in a striking letter which appears in Tuesday's issue. The ground covered—eight thousand miles by rail and a sea voyage of two thousand miles from Calcutta to Rangoon and thence back to Madras—brings home the magnitude and variety of the wonderful Indian panorama unfolded before the Royal visitors. In conclusion, the Times correspondent pays a well-deserved tribute to the Indian Civil Service. “We are apt at home,” he observes, “to forget what the Government of such a country as India means, though it is perhaps the greatest administrative achievement which the world has ever seen, and it is an achievement which would be impossible without the high standard of efficiency and devotion to duty to which the Indian Civil Service has attained.” It is, therefore, no slight consolation to them to know that their future Sovereign “will come home with a fuller appreciation of the large and really splendid share they take in bearing the white man's burden for the benefit of the whole of the Empire.” That is well said. We are all too apt to ignore India, and to confine our Imperial thinking to other and newer portions of the Empire.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE PAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE BOMBAY PRESIDENCY FOR THE WEEK ENDING 24TH MARCH 1906.

East and West.—In the course of an article headed “The Royal Visit—Some Impressions and Reflections,” contributed to the March number of East and West, His Highness the Aga Khan writes:—“Having been with the Royal Visitors in the same city only at Calcutta, I can offer but such impressions as relate to that city at first-hand. However, I have heard a great deal from all sorts and conditions of men in Bombay, Lahore, Jaipur, Lucknow and Madras about the visit paid by Their Royal Highnesses to the above-named cities. The following impressions are thus gathered partly from what I saw and heard at Calcutta and partly from what I was told by friends and adherents in other Indian cities. I arrived in the Indian Metropolis about the middle of December last and found that a wonderful and sombre change had come over the splendid city since I had last been there. All my friends, Muhammadan and Hindu, appeared quite broken-hearted—seemed to carry really bleeding hearts—over the partition of their province. I had never before seen such real universal grief felt by the masses and the classes in an Indian city over a measure of the Government. Naturally, in the circumstances, and since Government had shown so little consideration for the sentiment of the people of Bengal, and specially of Calcutta, one could hardly expect at the time any noticeable demonstration of loyalty and affection. I must confess, knowing the real depth of resentment in Calcutta, that I was afraid that for once the populace might be so foolish as to identify the Royal Visitors with the Government, and that the unpopularity of the Government, owing to the partition, might affect the reception. But as I drove on the day of the Royal arrival to Government House through the crowded streets where people in their hundreds of thousands had assembled on the vast maidan, my fear came agreeably to an end. I saw an affectionately expectant, an intensely joyous look on the face of every individual in that vast crowd. Had every individual of that crowd expected his dearest and nearest relative back home from a long journey, he could not have looked different.... Every individual looked and felt happy. One had to be an Asiatic to feel and realise this; and I saw that it was not, as before the arrival, mere affection that the people felt, but affection mixed with gratitude—gratitude for the ‘look’ the Prince and Princess had given to the people! The night of the illuminations, when they drove through the city, however, was the most glorious event of the Royal visit from the popular point of view. The scene that night I shall never forget. Tears of joy ran down the faces of old men and young Bengali lads who probably were students that had been agitating several weeks before..... The divine simplicity of the Prince and Princess impressed the native mind. The bombast and affectation that characterise some others who represent the might of England repel the genuinely affectionate Indian who belongs to perhaps the most simple among the loyal races of the world. When will our rulers learn that Asiatics are not impressed by show or by boastful ways, but that, like other human beings, they love to see simplicity with strength? When will our high officials as a class see that the most popular Oriental rulers of the past were not the magnificent, but the simple? When will they learn that pompousness, when added to the pomp of royalty, becomes unbearable? When will our English Governors learn not to accept ‘copy-book’ maxims about the natural untruthfulness, duplicity, servility and other vices of Asiatics, and specially of Bengalis, and to treat a race, singularly loyal and affectionate by nature, with the sympathy that their almost phenomenal devotion to what was at first foreign rule, and what is unfortunately still too often represented to them as foreign rule by some misguided men, so well deserves? The secret of the Royal visit, its intense popularity and its enormous political advantage, was this truly Royal gift of sympathy. If we can have a Royal representative of the Sovereign, above politics, and not responsible in this land, it would be better, from the Imperial Defence point of view, than 2,00,000 of additional European troops. Ask those who live and move amongst the people, those who are not confined to the spacious halls of Government House or the cloisters of Colleges or the halls of Justice, and see if they do not heartily support this view. The Royal visit has but confirmed the impression that the Delhi Darbar made on me. At Delhi, whilst the European visitors were undoubtedly impressed, the Indians, I fear, looked upon it, and amongst themselves talked of it, as a mere 'show' a tamasha.... My impression is that politically, and specially with the masses, the Royal visit has done immense good. I only wish Their Royal Highnesses could come out again a second and third time and pay a less rushing and less tiring visit to the country. With the Princes and Chiefs, too, the visit may be taken as having done infinite good. However, the need was not so great there, as with the masses, for the Chiefs usually receive courteous treatment from officials..... The British Empire owes a debt of gratitude to the Prince and Princess for having left their dear parents and children and for going through all the rush and fatigue of the vast programme and yet winning the love and admiration of all, specially of the poor and the lowly, who have realised, from their gracious kindness, that India is loved and trusted and respected by her future Emperor and Empress."

"On Monday last His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales bade farewell to the people of India, on his own behalf and on behalf of the Princess, in a characteristic speech. In a vast country, where little empires have flourished, and have fallen, where the relics of a gorgeous civilisation exist side by side with primitive culture, where the eye might dwell one day on sparkling snows covering majestic mountain peaks, and another day on smiling fields fringing the rolling flood, Royal visitors who see what is most worth seeing might feel as if they had been in a dreamland. It will be seen from the gracious words of farewell that while His Royal Highness remembers all classes of people who have greeted him, the longest and the most sympathetic shake of the hand is given to the poor peasant, wearing the livery of the sun and the fragmentary product of the hand-loom. We are sure that the thoughts of Their Royal Highnesses will constantly turn back to India, while here Prince and peasant, politician and purdah lady, will for many and many a long day remember the exalted personalities and their gracious demeanour. The best wishes of the people of this country hover to-day round the masts of the Renown. Many are the acts of personal kindness by which Their Royal Highnesses have won the hearts of the people. A native trooper was thrown down from his horse in a review, and the Prince caused daily bulletins to be sent to him regarding his health. A native bicycle-rider in his retinue met with an accident, and the Prince stopped his motor car and made anxious inquiries about him. It seems that a member of a deputation was absent through illness, and the next day he received 'ample compensation' in the form of an autograph letter. The newspapers gave out that the boys of a certain school grumbled at the loss of some of their Christmas holidays in consequence of an arrangement for the reception of the Prince, and His Royal Highness at once asked for a modification of that part of the programme. He read in a newspaper that a Duffadar lost his life in trying to assist a European officer, and he sent five hundred rupees for the widow and the family of the faithful comrade. Not only was His Royal Highness so gracious and kind, he was some times trustful to a degree, at which the wise men of the East shook their heads. It seems that his drive up the Khyber Pass, with no other escort than one composed of Afridis, was considered by many as a rash act, but His Royal Highness reposed a courageous trust in the loyalty of the people around, and it was justified by the excellent impression produced. No less happy was the impression created by the Princess among the native ladies and children with whom she came in contact." [The Past Gofar and the Indian Social Reformer write in a similar strain. The Bombay East Indian writes:—"We join the teeming millions of India in bidding a hearty and affectionate farewell to the Royal pair and wish them Godspeed to their sweet home." The Sind Journal writes:—"The right royal manner in which the Royal party have been greeted by the people seem to have touched them immensely. The many acts of thoughtful kindness and sympathy on the part of Their Royal Highnesses have endeared them to the hearts of the people. The Royal party have, as the Prince said at Karachi, seen and learned much, and have seen enough to make India a living reality to them, and to implant for ever in their hearts a sympathy and interest in all that affects their fellow-subjects in India, of whatever creed and race. Such impressions on the mind of the eldest son of our King-Emperor are sure to bear some fruit."]

Indu Prakash, 21st March 1906.—"It was the proud privilege of the first city of the Bombay Presidency to give India's hearty welcome to Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, and it has been the no less proud privilege of the second great trade centre and port of our Presidency to bid with a sorrowful heart the inevitable adieu. On both occasions our Presidency acquitted itself with the highest credit. Nor can it be a matter of small satisfaction that the Government of Bombay should have hit upon the right Oriental method of signaling the great event of this tour by materially helping the foundation of the Bombay Museum and by totally abolishing all boat-fees on the Indus. There is time yet for the Imperial Government to rise to the occasion and commemorate, in a manner worthy of themselves, an event of the beneficial results of which they will probably reap the lion's share in the form of a more deepened loyalty to British rule and personal attachment to the Royal Family of England. . . . The spirit of the Proclamation of 1858 ran through every speech delivered in India by the Prince. It pervaded every act of theirs. From the beginning they cut off all official trammels and made themselves one with us. Private interviews with Indian gentlemen of all shades of views and opinions and free discussion with them on the current topics of the day was a constant item in their programme, which was scrupulously carried out at each important town and city they visited..... The Prince also took care to visit a famine camp. That Their Royal Highnesses have not failed to grasp the true state of India, at least that they have not taken as gospel truth the official roseate view of a prosperous and contented India, would indeed seem to be the case from the tenour of the gracious farewell speech delivered at Karachi. 'Although our receptions everywhere were the scenes of brightness and splendour,' said His Royal Highness 'and we have been greeted by thousands of cheerful and happy faces, we have not forgotten the hard lives led by those in the trying climates of the plains, and we know of the miseries which beset the patient hardworking peasant when the rains do not come in due season.'"

Kal.—After going through a rushing and tiresome programme extending over four months Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales set sail for England from Karachi on Monday last. The Programme of the Royal tour was unusually crowded; there were balls, banquets and garden parties innumerable and in fact the Royal visitors may be said to have had hardly any breathing time during their sojourn in this land. Both the British and the Anglo-Indian Press have declared it as their opinion that Their Royal Highnesses have, by consenting to undertake a fatiguing tour through this country, laid India under an obligation. But there are some people who put the following query: "What loss would India have sustained, if the Prince and his consort had not visited the country?" In answer to this it is urged that the Royal visit has given the Indians an opportunity for displaying their loyalty. The tour, it is said, has conclusively demonstrated the loyalty of the Indians and their contentment with British rule. The crowds of eager sight-seers in the streets of towns and cities visited by the Prince, the grand processions and brilliant illuminations organised everywhere in honour of the Prince are all quoted as visible tokens of the loyalty of the Indians, and certificates of such loyalty are being showered upon us by the Emperor, British statesmen and even such papers as the anti-native Times of India. The gratification expressed by our rulers at the manifestation of our loyalty has fed the simple and credulous people of India to expect some signal boon at the hands of His Majesty the King-Emperor, and various visions are appearing before their minds' eye as to the particular form which the Royal bounty is likely to take. But those who are conversant with English laws, English history and English customs never believe that the Indians will be rewarded in the above manner. Even the Native Chiefs, who spent lakhs of rupees upon the entertainment of the Prince, entertain no such expectation. Why, even the Emperor, the Prince and British statesmen have not the least idea that the loyalty of the Indians, which has been so freely acknowledged by them, should be rewarded in some tangible form. They all seem to have had an understanding from the outset that all that it was necessary for them to do was to thank the Indians for all they did to welcome the Prince, and to sing the praises of their loyalty. Anglo-Indian officials seem to think that their administration of the country is so beneficent that there is nothing which the Prince could do for the people of India. They think that the fact that the people are contented with British rule was fully evidenced by the loyal demonstrations which greeted the Prince wherever he went and that such contentment renders the grant of any boon superfluous. The officials seem to argue that the Irish and the Boers, not being loyal and contented like the Indians, require to be conciliated by the grant of new rights and concessions, but that no such liberality is called for in the case of the Indians, who are thoroughly loyal and satisfied with the present form of the administration. The English have undertaken the sole responsibility for promoting the happiness of the Indians and have left nothing for the latter to do but to indulge in demonstrations of loyalty. As the Indians are not called upon to discharge any responsible duties, it would be ungrateful on their part to insist upon being fully fed. They are simply required to look pleased at the sight of Royalty and for this it is not necessary to have the cravings of hunger fully satisfied. The surging crowds in the streets through which the Prince drove are taken to be conclusive evidence of the people's loyalty. But the phenomenon is capable of a different explanation. The people may have been impelled by mere curiosity to throng the streets and witness the gorgeous processions organised by the officials in honour of the Prince. Who is not attracted by a splendid pageant for witnessing which no fee is levied? Will not thousands flock to a theatre if no charge is levied for seeing the performance?

Sind Gazette, 16th and 20th March; Phoenix, 17th March.

"We rejoice to believe that the Prince and Princess will carry away with them the happiest impressions of their sojourn in this country. Their experiences have been most varied, and as far as has been possible in so short a period they have been given an insight into the wonderful contrasts which exist side by side in this portion of British dominions. In no other part of the world are such contrasts to be found, for in India, old and new, East and West, stand in close but curious and often incongruous proximity, and the upward-beckoning stars of modern progress mingle their effectual fires with the light of the slanting suns of ancient civilisations. After the many glowing sights and scenes that Their Royal Highnesses have witnessed in other parts of India, we fear that their departure from Karachi may seem to them somewhat in the nature of an anti-climax. We cannot hope to rival the magnificent hospitality provided by the Indian Princes nor the brilliant demonstrations of more wealthy and populous communities. Karachi is still too young to possess many of the outward and visible signs of the spirit of progress which is animating her inhabitants, and, except to those who love the desert with its low horizons and its all pervading tints of blue and gold, the level plains of Sind present little of natural attraction. Nevertheless, our Royal visitors will doubtless be interested in visiting a city which, in a little over half a century, has sprung from a fishing village to be the third port in India, a port which is nearest to Europe and which, favoured as it is geographically, holds so high a position in regard to the defence of the Indian Empire as to have been called the Gate of India. Moreover, in loyalty and devotion to the Throne and the Royal Family we, in this province, are no whit behind the other parts of India, and the Prince and Princess will receive as cordial and enthusiastic a reception in Sind from all classes of the people as any they have met with in other parts of the Peninsula..... The inhabitants of Karachi have been very fortunate in the fact that the Royal visit has so closely coincided with the completion and arrival here of the statue that is to commemorate her late Majesty the Queen-Emress Victoria..... Although the period to be spent among us by our Royal guests is all too brief, yet it will be long enough to kindle interests and sympathy on one side and revivify affection and loyalty on the other, and thus strengthen and tighten the bonds which unite the people of this province to the Throne." Elsewhere the paper writes:—"The graceful concession to the poor boatmen of the Indus, which is announced to-day in a Gazette Extraordinary as Their Royal Highnesses' boon to Sind, will be greatly appreciated, and serve as a further indication of how far-reaching is the sympathy of our popular Governor." [In its issue of 20th March the paper writes:—"As at all other places in India which have been honoured by a visit from Their Royal Highnesses the general public at Karachi, too, have been charmed and delighted with the gracious condescension and open-hearted sympathy of the Royal visitors..... The people of Sind will learn with joy that the Prince and Princess considered Mr. Thorneycroft's magnificent memorial of the late Queen-Emress by far the most beautiful of its kind that they had seen in India. So pleased were Their Royal Highnesses with everything at Karachi, the warmth of their welcome, and the success of all the arrangements made on their behalf, that they expressed a desire to shake hands with all who attended the reception at Government House on Saturday evening. This most unusual honour was duly carried out to the very great satisfaction of those who were privileged to be present." The Phoenix writes: "The citizens of Karachi gave Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales a magnificent, enthusiastic and right royal welcome. The reception was worthy of the first city in Sind and was organised and carried out very largely by the people themselves through their chosen representatives..... The warmth of the enthusiasm with which the Prince and Princess were hailed was not stimulated by loyalty alone. It was also an expression of that close and intimate interest which is everywhere felt in their visit. The sense of the honour they have done to the people of India by coming among them is deep and profound..... The Royal couple have won the hearts of all beholders; the simple dignity of their demeanour deeply touched the throngs who gazed upon them. We believe their visit has produced a feeling of personal endearment towards them, and will tend to strengthen still further the bonds that indissolubly unite India to the Royal Family of Great Britain."]

Indian Spectator, 24th March 1906.—"With the truly Royal instinct of appreciation the King-Emperor has honoured the staff of the Prince and Princess of Wales in a very special manner just at the close of the Indian tour.

On the whole, the Crown gets off rather lightly with a G.C.I.E. bestowed on the Chief of the Staff, who bore the brunt of the tour and all its delicate and complicated details, and to whose rare sympathy and popularity is mainly due the success of this memorable visit. It is much to be wished Sir W. Lawrence could be induced to come back to India for a few years. But nothing short of a command from His Majesty would bring this about. We are very pleased to find Colonel Sir A. Bigge made a Knight-Commander of the Star of India along with General Beatson, whose tactful work is well known. This is an appropriate acknowledgment, as is that of the services of the other members of the staff who came out with Their Royal Highnesses. And we have no doubt that the recipients of these Indian honours will remember India to her advantage. Equally felicitous are the distinctions bestowed on Vice-Admiral Poe, Mr. Upcott, Mr. H. A. Stuart, Commodore Tyrwhitt, Major Watson, General Duff, Colonel Charles and others. The most notable of the selections, to us in India, is that of Munshi Aziz-uddin, the well-known Attaché. As a loyal servant of the Crown, who has travelled far and wide and dispensed most useful guidance to English as well as foreign Royalties, Mr. Aziz-uddin deserves well of the Government."

Suvasamitran.—Referring to the parting words spoken by the Prince of Wales at Karachi, the Suvasamitran, of the 20th March, observes:—That the Prince of Wales praised the enthusiasm and loyalty shown by the people of this land, wherever he went, is nothing wonderful. But it is immensely gratifying that he expressed a knowledge of the condition of the extremely indigent millions of India and a desire to use this knowledge and his experience in India for their benefit. During the Prince's tour, the whole of the Indian Press frequently deplored that he was allowed to see only decorations and shows, and not the wretched slums of the several cities which he visited and the scenes of poverty and misery which they would present. We were sorry that he gave audience only to big men, officials and Rajas blowing their own trumpets, but never condescended to see poor men or hear their grievances. The whole of India will be very much pleased to hear that, either owing to the cry of the Press or on account of his own innate nobility, the Prince has thought it necessary to inform us that he is not unaware of the miseries of India's poor men.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE NEWSPAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE PUNJAB FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 24TH MARCH 1906.

The following is from the Tribune (Lahore), of the 21st March 1906:—

"There is a widely prevailing fear among our countrymen, educated as well as uneducated, lest the unbroken succession of pomp and pageantry and continuous displays of splendours in the Native States should give our future Sovereign a false notion of the wealth and prosperity of the Indian population. It is reassuring to learn from the Prince's own remarks that there is no need of apprehension on this score.

"We hope that the terrible fact that if the rainfall is scanty in one season only, even after a succession of years with normal harvests, the people are at once brought face to face with starvation—we hope this significant fact suggested pregnant reflections to—is Royal Highness.

"Indians, on their part, have been very favourably impressed (if we may so put it) by the gracious Royal pair whose evidently sunny natures so well fitted our sunny land."

The following is from the same paper (Lahore), of the 24th March 1906:—

"Much comment has been caused in educated Indian circles in the United Provinces by the greater importance given to the Aligarh College compared with the Central Hindu College of Benares in the Royal tour. The Prince only paid a flying visit to the latter and received the address of welcome in the quadrangle without leaving his motor. His Royal Highness could not spare time to look at the new handsome range of buildings, see class work, or inspect any of the special features of the institution. At Aligarh College, however, His Royal Highness spent no less than 4 or 5 hours and went minutely into everything. Why this difference? We know how odious such comparisons are, but since a great deal of dissatisfaction has been created among a large section of the population owing to the invidious distinction, the comparison cannot be shirked, however disagreeable it may be. Of course the Prince would have been only too glad to show the same amount of favour, so to say, to the Benares as he has done to the Aligarh institution. But those who had the ordering of the tour were so tactless (or perhaps it was intentional) as to treat the two differently."

Writing of the Prince of Wales's speech at Karachi before sailing the Observer (Lahore), of the 24th March 1906, says:—

"That speech of His Royal Highness was practically his last utterance on Indian soil; it was addressed not only to the members of the Karachi Municipal Committee but to the entire population of this country, being, so to say, his 'farewell message' to India. In that truly noble utterance, His Royal Highness spoke of the benefit that he had derived by his visit to this Dependency, and hoped that it would enable him to understand Indian questions better than formerly. In echoing that hope, we eagerly look forward for its realisation. The future alone can show how far these expectations will be fulfilled. But the tour has already awakened a new interest in Indian affairs among the English people, and we pray that the personal knowledge of her affairs acquired by the next Emperor and Empress at a comparatively high financial cost may result in some substantial good to our country."

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE NEWSPAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE UNITED PROVINCES FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 24TH MARCH 1906.

The Sipahi (Cawnpore), of the 20th March, expressing satisfaction at the Prince of Wales's visit to Baluchistan, where His Royal Highness should have seen something of the martial spirit still lingering among the people, says that his visit to India could hardly have enabled him to learn the true condition and feelings of the Indians. He was, throughout his stay in the country, surrounded by Government officials, and had little occasion to come in contact with the people or their non-official representatives. We would have learnt much about India if he had visited Benares during the session of the Indian National Congress and had talked with its leaders, but the British authorities here would not allow him to do so. The writer, however, hopes that His Royal Highness, who is India's future emperor, will not forget her.

The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 22nd March, says:—The last station visited by Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales during their Indian tour was Karachi, the picturesque and pretty capital of the remote province of Sind. In some respects it is a fitting termination of the Royal tour. After the bustle and crowds of Bombay, the cities of Northern India and Calcutta, the quiet of Karachi was a welcome change, and the words of farewell were spoken in an atmosphere of calm and to an undemonstrative people. The Prince of Wales spoke feelingly and sincerely, and we have no doubt His Royal Highness has been equally impressed by the magnitude of the Indian Empire and the loyalty of the people. We respectfully and regretfully bid Their Royal Highnesses farewell. Our regret is edged by a feeling of disappointment that it was not found possible to arrange that the Royal tourists, who visited so many places in the United Provinces, should honour the capital city with a visit. Almost every provincial capital, with the exception of Allahabad, has been visited. We have been told that the omission of Allahabad from the programme of the tour is not due to the neglect or omission of the Local Government. The Government did suggest that the capital should be visited, but the idea did not find favour with the higher authorities. That was still more unfortunate. Apart, however, from the local disappointment, we share fully the gratification which the Royal visit has caused to all Indians. It would be unreasonable to expect any tangible result from the Royal visit in the administration of the country, but it is by no means a small thing that the King-Emperor and his son and heir should feel a direct and a sympathetic interest in the affairs of this country and its people. The King-Emperor rules, though he does not govern, and the personal knowledge of the Royal Family by the largest and most important dependency of the Empire is a factor in the future of the country that cannot be overlooked.

The Indian People, (Allahabad), of the 22nd March, says:—For four months the Heir-Apparent to the British Empire, with his Royal spouse, was a guest of India, travelling from place to place of these vast dominions, seeing men and manners, taking the leading part in a multitude of functions, some interesting, others merely formal, and making such observations as opportunities afforded. Since India became a direct appanage of the Crown in 1858, the relations between the Royal family and this country have tended to become more intimate. Several years, however, elapsed before it was found practicable to arrange that a member of the Royal Family should pay a visit to this country. The late Queen Victoria the Good, after the part that Her Majesty took in drafting the Royal Proclamation of 1858, felt more and more drawn towards India, and early in the seventies of the last century Her Majesty was in a position to sanction the visit of her second son, the late Duke of Edinburgh, to this country. This was followed in 1875-6 by the visit of the Prince of Wales, now the King-Emperor. That was the crowning event of the connection between the Crown and India. The Prince was not accompanied by the Princess, but still his visit produced an enthusiastic outburst of loyalty which has not been since equalled. The Prince of Wales returned to England charmed with his visit, and the impression that he carried with him was so favourable that some years later his brother the Duke of Connaught was actually sent out to serve in this country. That was the culmination of the relationship between India and the Crown. No member of the Royal Family has yet served in any of the self-governing colonies, between whom and the parent country the relationship of race is far more intimate than between India and England. The Duke of Connaught served here for some years, mixed freely with the princes and the people, and carried with him the warmest sympathy for and attachment to this country. And it was this attachment that induced him to come out as the representative of his Royal brother, the King-Emperor, at the Delhi Coronation Darbar. The Duke of Connaught was followed by the Duke of Clarence, who would have been Prince of Wales had he been living to-day, and whose affianced bride is to-day Princess of Wales. And now the Prince of Wales, following the example of his father thirty years ago, has travelled through India and spent four months in the country, and has now set his face homeward, richer by the pleasant experiences he has gained in this country and impressed doubtless by the character of the people and their wonderful loyalty.

The present position of the connection between India and the Royal Family is this: while every member of the Royal Family, including the Heir-Apparent, is free to visit India, the Sovereign may not personally honour this dependency with a visit. It must be remembered that every part of the Empire, excluding the United Kingdom, is in the same position as India so far as the visit of the Sovereign is concerned. The late Queen Victoria went on the Continent and to the south of Europe for the benefit of her health. His Majesty the King-Emperor also travels in Europe, but it has become the recognised practice that beyond Europe the King may not go. The Prince of Wales may travel over the whole world, but the King cannot go to Canada, Africa, Australia, or India. It is profitless to enquire into the why or wherefore of this custom. On the whole, it is wise, for it is difficult for the King to visit his worldwide Empire. But from nowhere is the response quicker or warmer than from India when some personal relations are established between the Royal Family and this country. For instance, there is a widespread feeling in India, apart from the political aspect, that it would be a great advantage, if a member of the Royal Family could come out to India as Viceroy in the same manner that the brothers and sons of the Moghal Emperor ruled the various provinces of India as Governors and Viceroys. We cannot conceive that any Royal Viceroy would drive the country so hard as Lord Curzon, because whereas that young politician tried to play the Great Moghal, a scion of the Royal Family would be naturally above such a temptation. Had the Duke of Connaught been Viceroy of India for ten or twenty years we feel assured he would have done a great deal to raise the status of the people and earn their gratitude. This kind of speculation, however, does not help us very far, as there is not the remotest chance of members of the Royal Family being associated in the work of Government in the present constitution. The people of England are loyal, respectful, and they maintain the Royal Family in a position of dignity, but they will not give a jot of power in their hands. So far the change that came over the constitution long ago is irrevocable and the existing arrangement is, on the whole, for the best. But India has had such bad luck in the lottery of administration that it almost seems it would be a change for the better if an exception could be made in the case of this country, and a member of the Royal Family appointed Viceroy of India.

Indian People.—From the Indian point of view there is something more to be said about the Royal visit. Is the visit undertaken from the purely English point of view, or are some concessions made to Indian notions as well? In ceremonies the Prince conformed to Indian customs as far as possible, while in the cordiality of manners he was unaffectedly English. Everywhere he displayed a marked contrast to the insular fridity of the English and was perfectly at ease wherever he appeared. We understand that the visit of the Prince of Wales has no political significance, just as the Prince himself has no share in politics. English publicists regard the Royal visit to India as nothing more than a gigantic hunting expedition, though in the present instance the most important hunting trip has had to be abandoned. But the people of India associate a Royal visit with more substantial blessing. The Prince has given four donations to four religious institutions, and a similar donation to the Aligarh College, which is the luckiest educational institution in this country. We know fully well that the visit of the Prince of Wales will make no difference in the administration of the country, but the people have a hereditary notion that when the King or his son appears among his people blessings follow the auspicious visit. Alas! those days are gone beyond recall. While the Prince of Wales was here every one spoke and wrote glibly about the loyalty of all classes of the people. But we know what such testimonials are worth. There will be the same tendency to characterise freedom of speech as disloyalty and to belittle every agitation, however earnest. Newspapers will be pounced down upon as soon as they slip ever so little, and there will be the same contemptuous disregard everywhere for the people of the country, specially the educated classes. In spite of all these discouraging facts, the Royal visit is certain to be productive of some good, for when the Prince of Wales and his wife hear the people of this country or their representatives abused they will be disposed to ask themselves whether the people who treated them so well are really so bad as they are represented.

26TH MARCH 1906.

Belfast Evening Telegraph.—The tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales through India has now come to a close, and the Prince has written Lord Minto a letter, in which he says that the Princess and himself leave India with much regret. He says their reception and welcome throughout the country has given them intense pleasure, and that all the arrangements were excellently planned and admirably carried out. He further states that they were specially delighted at visiting the great native Princes, and were greatly impressed with their affection towards King Edward, and with their loyalty to the Throne. He declares that they were profoundly impressed "with the affectionate enthusiasm of the thousands who welcomed us, and made us feel at home." He, moreover, adds that the Royal party travelled no less than 8,800 miles by railway alone. He visited the famine camp, and was convinced of the earnest desire of the authorities to save life and mitigate distress. He had seen every unit of the army, and it was a pleasure to witness the fine physique, training, and fitness of the troops. His Royal Highness also paid a special tribute to those Princes who have reduced their local forces in order to contribute to the defence of the Empire. The tour occupied altogether over four months. The Prince and Princess landed in Bombay on November 9th last, when they were met by Lord and Lady Curzon, and by the great Indian Chiefs, who, accompanied by their picturesque retainers, bodies of troops, Indian and European, and a vast crowd of natives, gave them a welcome never to be forgotten. It will be remembered that the President of the Bombay Municipality, a distinguished Parsee, read an address on the occasion in which, in addition to expressions of loyalty, great pleasure was uttered at the visit of the first Princess of Wales to set foot on the soil of India. In reply, the Prince stated that he had inherited from his father and the late Queen-Empress a love for India and the Indians. He had learnt to associate the name with qualities of kindness, loyalty, courtesy and bravery. Further, a splendid bodyguard of young Indian Princes—the Imperial Cadet Corps—afterwards escorted the Royal procession along its five-mile route through the city to Government House. Subsequently Their Royal Highnesses visited Wadia fire temple, where the high priest invoked a blessing on them. The greatest popular demonstration probably of the whole tour took place when the Princess drove out alone to the Town Hall to receive the welcome of Indian ladies. Never before had such a ceremonial taken place in India. School girls sang the National Anthem and scattered flowers in the way as the Princess approached the steps of the hall, where quaint Parsee, Hindu and Mohammedan rites of blessing were performed, the leading Bombay ladies taking part in the ceremony. Within the hall, gorgeous with Eastern magnificence, the Princess sat on the Peacock Throne, surrounded by ladies in splendid native costumes. Their excitement and delight were intense. Addresses in Urdu, Gujarati and Marathi were read by three great native ladies, and the Princess's reply, in which she said one of the chief objects of her tour was to see as much as possible of her Indian sisters, was received with great enthusiasm. Songs of good wishes were sung, one lady flung a shower of real pearls over the Princess as she passed through the hall, and a superb album, illustrated with types of Indian beauty and containing the words of the addresses, was presented to her. The Prince, while in Bombay, laid the foundation stone of the new docks, which are to cost three millions sterling, and will, when finished, be amongst the largest in the world. Since then Their Royal Highnesses have visited almost every part of India and Burma, and everywhere were the recipients of the greatest and heartiest of welcomes. The people of India understand how much they have obtained under British rule, and know how to appreciate their privileges. They are better off than ever they were before, and they have no wish to change their form of government for that of any other, or come under the rule of any other nation. They are quite contented and happy as they are, and they perceive that any change would be more likely for the worse than for the better. Before we went to India the Mohammedans were the dominant race in the most of the country, and judging from their history both in India and other lands as well as from the fierce riots that have occurred in recent times in Bombay over such matters as cow killing, we can easily imagine what a state the population would be in if we had never gone to that country. In fact, India owes to us her peace and prosperity; we have given her even-handed justice; we have bridged her rivers, built roads and railways, and established extensive irrigation works. We have also practically conquered the great enemies of India, namely, plague and famine, enemies by which her population has been devastated again and again from time immemorial and we have developed her trade and commerce in a marvellous manner. This will be apparent when we state that her exports have risen from fourteen million rupees in 1834 to two hundred and forty-five millions in 1902. Further, in recent years the military defences of India have been rendered complete. The Khyber Pass has been secured, and strategic railways, military roads and fortifications provided on the North-West Frontier at a cost of ten millions sterling. In the three years preceding November 1902, twenty millions were spent on railways, and two millions on irrigation, and as Sir Henry Fowler has said in the House of Commons—"There is no civilised Government in the world with so small a debt as India, and the way in which the Indian officials have grappled with the famine has no parallel in the history of India or any other country in the world." Then in order to give stability to exchange a gold standard of coinage has been recently established, and has already done much for India. Lord Curzon's administration, too, has conferred incalculable benefits upon the people, and we are not surprised to learn that the native potentates declare that they would never accept the yoke of Russia, and that in the event of the latter attempting to gain a foothold in India the people would rise as one man to repel the invasion. It is very satisfactory that such a feeling should exist, and that it does so speaks volumes for our management of the affairs of the country. It is likewise most encouraging that the Prince and Princess of Wales should have met with such a hearty welcome during their extensive travels from all creeds and classes. Indeed, the memory of the late Queen is still dear to millions of our Hindu fellow-subjects and our present King and Queen are also most popular. There are still some important questions claiming settlement in India such as extension of self-government and the employment of educated natives in the public service, but we do not doubt that by the application of the same judicious management in the future as in the past these will gradually solve themselves in the right way to the great advantages of the teeming millions concerned.

Rangoon Gazette.—The following message has been received from His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales to His Excellency the Viceroy:—

Dated the 19th March 1906.—It is with much regret that the Princess of Wales and I leave India to-day. From time to time in speeches or in letters to various local authorities I have endeavoured to express our sincere gratitude for the labour and affectionate goodwill which have been so freely bestowed upon us by all classes. I hope that these expressions of appreciation made while the events were fresh will have assured our most kind hosts in various parts of India that their reception and welcome had given us intense pleasure and satisfaction. But now that we are leaving the shores of this great Empire I wish to assure you that the arrangements made by various departments, both of Government and of local authorities, have been in every way admirably planned and successfully carried out.

In the first place I desire to express my gratitude for all the trouble devoted to what has proved to be an excellent and successful programme for our stay in India. I was especially delighted to have had an opportunity of visiting several of the great Indian Princes and of becoming personally acquainted with other Ruling Chiefs, whose capitals we were unable to visit. I have thus gained some insight into the administration of their respective States. I am deeply grateful for the generous hospitality and marked courtesy to us, but I was still more impressed by the sincere expressions of loyalty to the Throne and of personal affection to the King-Emperor.

We know, of course, how greatly our visit has added to the labours and anxieties of Governors and Lieutenant-Governors and local administrators, and we are all the more grateful for the cordial welcome which we received at every Government House. But greatly as we appreciated the goodwill and most effective efforts of the authorities to make our visit to each place pleasant and instructive, the feature which most profoundly impressed us was the spontaneous and affectionate enthusiasm of the thousands and hundreds of thousands who have welcomed us and made us feel at home in our progress through India.

As regards the departments on which so much extra work has been involved, we are grateful to the various sanitary authorities for the arrangements which have enabled our large party to travel from one end of India to the other without sickness, though unhappily our route has passed through infected centres.

I cannot speak too highly of the railway authorities on whom so much of our comfort depended. All the lines have vied with one another and have succeeded in making our journey smooth and restful and all have been absolutely punctual. It might interest you to know that we have travelled over 8,800 miles by train alone.

I have been struck with the working of the police and with the manner in which the huge crowds which have everywhere gathered to welcome us have been handled. It is a great satisfaction to the Princess and myself to know that on such occasions there has been practically no loss of life nor serious accidents, and we are especially happy to have noticed absence of violence or rough usage.

I also had the opportunity of inspecting a famine camp in which I was deeply interested. Everything that I saw convinced me of the earnest endeavours made to save life and mitigate the sufferings of those who were compelled to seek refuge in the camp.

I am glad that I was able to be present with my friend Lord Kitchener at the manoeuvres of the largest army which has ever been assembled during peace time in India, and also at reviews at Rawalpindi and Secunderabad and at parades elsewhere. I have seen almost every unit of the army in this country. It was a pleasure to see the fine physique, good training and general military fitness of the British and Indian troops. I had always heard of the grand traditions of the Indian army and I have had ample proof that the same old spirit inspires all ranks to-day. I am proud to feel that the King has honoured me by making me Colonel-in-Chief of nine regiments of the Indian Army and I have thus become personally and directly associated with the different classes of which that army is composed. At Lahore and in those Native States which we visited I had opportunities of seeing the Imperial Service Troops, and I was struck with their workmanlike appearance and quickness on parade. I am sure that you will appreciate the action of those Princes who have consented to reduce the number of their local troops in order to contribute to the defences of the country a military force or greater efficiency and more adequately equipped. I have no doubt that as time goes on, and their circumstances permit, other Indian Princes will adopt a similar policy. I noticed everywhere the keen spirit which seemed to animate the whole of the army and the general striving towards efficiency and readiness to take the field. The important development of the transport service will, I am assured, largely contribute to the end.

We are both genuinely sorry that our visit to India has now come to an end. We shall never forget the affectionate greetings of India and Burma. Everywhere we found the same loving regard for the late Queen-Empress, the same loyal devotion to my dear father, and the same kind and enthusiastic welcome to ourselves. So long as we live, we shall remember India with feelings of warm gratitude and sympathy. We hope that the visit which has involved so much labour and anxiety on your Government will, under God's providence, be fraught with benefit to India. We wish you and all who are in authority under you Godspeed in your great work. We wish for the Indian people immunity from famine and pestilence, steady progress in agriculture and industries, and a safe and natural advance in social conditions.

It is a great pleasure and satisfaction to the Princess and myself to have within five years received your hospitality and that of Lady Minto while you held the high positions of representing your Sovereign in Canada and in India. I heartily wish that every success may attend you in your arduous and responsible duties.

His Excellency sent the following reply: To His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. Dated the 24th March 1906. The Viceroy and Government and the Princes and people of India deeply appreciate the gracious message why Your Royal Highness has conveyed in Your Royal Highness's letter of the 19th March. His Excellency begs respectfully to express the strong feelings of gratitude and devotion which the visit of Your Royal Highness and the Princess of Wales has evoked among all classes and sections of this great Empire, and his warm personal appreciation of Your Royal Highness's kind expressions towards Lady Minto and himself.

Rangoon Gazette.—The noble words in which His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales conveys his farewell message to the Viceroy will be read everywhere in the Indian Empire with feelings of deep appreciation. The message is modest and simple, as one would naturally expect from one of the first gentlemen in the world, and its sincerity is so obvious that it cannot but go straight to the heart of the vast audience whom His Royal Highness addresses through the Viceroy. We are sure the recent visit, the political significance of which can hardly be over-estimated, will have happy results for England and this country. His Royal Highness has not failed to strike the true note when he says: Greatly as we appreciated the goodwill and most effective efforts of the authorities to make our visit to each place pleasant and instructive, the feature which most profoundly impressed us was the spontaneous and affectionate enthusiasm of the thousands and hundreds of thousands who have welcomed us and made us feel at home in our progress through India.

Times.—Aden, March 24th. The Prince and Princess of Wales and the Duke and Duchess of Connaught have arrived here. The Duke and Duchess and Princess Patricia breakfasted this morning with the Prince and Princess of Wales on board His Majesty's cruiser Terrible. The Prince and Princess sailed this afternoon without landing. The Duke and Duchess of Connaught landed at noon, lunched at the Residency, unveiled a statue of Queen Victoria, and visited the tanks in the afternoon. At 8 o'clock in the evening Their Royal Highnesses, who had received a most hearty welcome, sailed northwards.

27TH MARCH 1906.

Standard.—The banners of the morning were streaming in folds of flying crimson across a sky of pearl as the luxurious special train of the Great Indian Peninsula Railway slowed up outside the cantonment station. I threw down the window-shutter and looked out upon a sheet of water, a floor of smooth and polished turquoise, edged with a blood-red border where the flaming light had caught and strained the shallows. It was the great tank, or artificial lake, which lies just outside the Nizam's capital of Hyderabad.

The city was all astir, for the Nizam had brought out his troops and his household retainers to do honour to the Shah-zada, and the townspeople and many visitors from the countryside were in the streets. So one of the most picturesque of Indian towns was seen at its best. Nowhere, except perhaps in Peshawar and in Bombay, had one seen more diverse types assembled. Hyderabad is the premier Mahomedan State of India—the only one, indeed, of any importance—and Islam was very variously represented. Fresh from the south, with its plump, cheerful, swarthy little men and women, we were here once more face to face with our old friends from the far northern Border, hook-nosed Pathans, tall Punjabis, Mahomedans, Rohillas, Afridis, and Afghans. The Hyderabad sovereigns have long drawn their mercenaries from all Musulman India and beyond it. Here we saw companies of the Nizam's famous "Arab" irregulars, their heads enwrapped in loose-hooded turbans of saffron yellow, which is the Hyderabad court colour. Arabs these men are called; but many of them had the thick lips, the woolly hair, and the ebony skin of Africa. There were the Nizam's regular troops in baggy red breeches, with crooked sword-bayonets, oddly reminiscent of the French infantry of the Second Empire days; and alongside these relics of the past, with their obsolete Enfield rifles, were other Hyderabad battalions armed with Martinis, and finally His Highness's Imperial Service Cavalry, with magazine carbines and all the best modern equipment, a corps quite able to hold its own with the picked regiment of British Indian Lancers which come down from Secunderabad to act as the Prince's had escort.

There is much that is reminiscent of Turkey in this, the largest Moslem capital outside the dominions of the Padishah. Gone are the days when scarcely a man walked in Hyderabad without arms in his hand or about his person. Yet you still see the peasant coming in from the wilder rural districts of the Deccan with his brass-barrelled hollow-butted gun over his shoulder, and the yeoman or small squireen with a broad curved yataghan, in a scabbard of faded velvet, belted to his side, and a whole magazine of knives, daggers, and flint-lock pistols in his leather girdle. Here, too, you see many men and boys in they red fez or turban, which is an uncommon headgear in the rest of India; and sometimes you observe that it completes the costume of a portly gentleman in a black frock coat, adorned with an order or two, who might be a Pasha or Effendi in Cairo or Constantinople. In the intervals of waiting, the soldiers sit on the heels of their deplorable shoes and smoke cigarettes, and slouch about, as they do in Monastir and Salonika. Suddenly they spring to attention, and present arms; and the civilians, frock-coated officials, and all prostrate themselves, with an ultra-Oriental salaam, heads knocking the ground, as when in Stamboul the Sultan drives forth to the Selamlık; for a yellow-painted landau dashes by, and in it is seated a gentleman with side whiskers, and sharply-cut, rather Semitic features—a little gentleman, inconspicuously dressed, who looks about him with the eye of a king. You do not need to be told that it is His Highness the Nizam, sole and autocratic ruler by the grace of God and the Government of India, of a territory as large as Great Britain, and of more people than the inhabitants of the Dominion of Canada and the Commonwealth of Australia taken together.

It is a long walk through Hyderabad, for the city is larger even than its population of 450,000 would lead you to imagine. Past white-walled bungalows and public buildings, set back in roomy gardens, under high, mediæval-looking arches through furlong after furlong of the painted hatches of the bazaar, you come at length to the far end of the town, where the Faluknama Palace is perched on high. About the story of this Palace there is once more the smack of the Nearer, or the Older, East. It was built, out of his modest savings, by one of the Ministers of the last Nizam—not, of course, the great Sir Salar Jung, who was everything that was honourable and distinguished, but another somewhat less precise. The Nizam's favourite Sultana cast the eyes of desire upon this delectable abode, and pointed out to her lord that it was far too good for a subject, and, at any rate, much better than the old Palace down below in the town. So the Minister was informed that he would have to sell the pleasure-house to his master, and, sorely against his will, he complied, receiving, as some say, its full equivalent in rupees, and as others aver considerably less. However this may have been, the Light of the Zenana soon tired of the toy. After a few months it was abandoned, and it has never been regularly occupied since. Except when the Nizam entertains guests of State, it lies upon the hillside empty and silent, with its saloons filled with French furniture and gilding and glass-lustre chandeliers—a monument of reckless expenditure and uncalculating caprice.

From the terrace of this same Palace, there is a prospect which is hard to beat. At the foot of the hill, the great city, with its suburbs, spreads out over many miles of country, a dim blur of groves and gardens, with the lanes of small dwelling-houses hidden by the leafage, and only here and there the outlines of a palace or the bulbous domes and white shafts of a mosque, showing among the date-palms and mango-trees. Beyond the suburbs and the sparkling azure lakes, lies the grey-brown Deccan table-land, crossed by jutting ridges and ragged masses of isolated rock. On one of these eminences you make out the remnants of walls and towers and ramparts, which are the colossal ruins of the fortress-palace of Golconda, that famous stronghold of the earlier Mussulman dynasty, which the Moghul Emperors eventually extinguished. India has many hill-fortresses; for in its centuries of warfare no potentate, whether he was Emperor, King, or feudal noble, could deem himself safe unless he could shelter his wives, his treasures, and his faithful followers behind some impregnable fastness builded upon a rock. There is one such, a marvel of inaccessible situation and defensive ingenuity, at Daulatabad, the cave-temples of Ellora, in the far corner of the Deccan.

But Golconda is the most impressive of all: perhaps the most impressive castle ruin in the world. Its size is prodigious: Kenilworth or Warwick would go into a corner of the vast space of boulder-strewn hill enclosed within its crenelated walls. Whole blocks of dwelling-houses and nests of courts and alleys were scattered here and there among the ramparts and bastions and fortified terraces: the great stone-stepped path that leads through them to the palace-rooms at the summit of the hill is like the main street of a town. The fortress seems built to hold, not merely a garrison, but a people: as, indeed, it did in the long siege of 1687, when for eight months, Abdul Hasan, the last of the Kutab Shahi Kings, held out against the hosts of Aurangzib. The defence is a fine romantic story of heroism, treachery, and valorous adventure. But in the end the Moghuls prevailed; and it is the descendant of the Moghul's lieutenant, the Nizam-ul-mulk, the Viceroy of the Deccan, who rules over Hyderabad to-day as the premier Prince of India under the Imperial Crown of Britain.

"If the Nizam goes, all is lost." So wrote the Governor of Bombay to the Resident at Hyderabad in the crisis of the Mutiny. But the Nizam did not go. He stood faithfully by us, remembering that we had saved his house when all Mahomedanism was being swept out of India by the Mahratta flood. The fidelity of the Deccan princes has been rewarded by leaving them in a position of quasi-independence such as no other ruling Chief in India enjoys. We have always paid them the compliment of keeping pretty nearly the largest concentrated force in India in their dominions. At Secunderabad, which is an outlying suburb of Hyderabad, the Prince of Wales was able to review some nine thousand troops, including four British regiments and three batteries of Royal Artillery. But we do not interfere more than we can help with the Nizam's internal policy, and we leave him to carry on his domestic administration by the aid of his own subjects. Except a professor or two there is hardly an Englishman in His Highness's employ, and only a single official has been "lent" him by the Government of India. That the principality, under such circumstances, should be as well managed as our own Provinces, or even as some of the other Native States, is not to be expected. But for thirty years the Nizam's predecessors were guided by the counsels of Sir Salar Jung, the greatest of native Indian statesmen in modern times, who introduced and carried out salutary reforms in every department. There has been a considerable falling-off since his death, and Hyderabad in recent years has not been exactly a model State, nor is it so at present. But it is improving. The Nizam has his faults. He is said to be somewhat indolent, dilatory, and self-indulgent, and a little too orientally "casual" in his ways. But he is also understood to be a capable man, with some natural ability and considerable force of character, honestly desirous of doing his best for his twelve millions of subjects, of whom the most part are peasants painfully striving to squeeze a subsistence out of a hard and unfruitful soil.

The Nizam is a personage in India outside his own dominions. For Mahomedanism, if it has lost its old political predominance, is still a great force in India. It is the faith of one person out of every five in the country. The King-Emperor rules more than half the Mahomedan population of the world, the Sultan of Turkey coming a very long way behind him. There is one province—that of the North-West Frontier—which is almost entirely Mahomedan, the Hindus being an unimportant minority. In the Punjab Mahomedans are numerous, and they are to be found scattered everywhere down to the extreme south, especially in the towns. In Eastern Bengal there are some twenty-seven or twenty-eight millions of them, and here they increase more rapidly than the Hindus; for the Mussulman, with his varied diet, has a better physique than the pale and grain-feeding Brahmanists, and, moreover, he does not believe in child-marriages, nor does he think it wrong for widows to re-marry. The high and growing proportion of the Mahomedan population in Bengal is one of the hard nuts for the Bengalis to crack. It is also an elementary fact which is not, I think, generally appreciated in England.

By race these Bengal Mahomedans are akin to the Hindus, and that, indeed, is true of the great majority of their co-religionists outside the Frontier province. Most of them are descended from Hindus who were converted during the long period of Moslem rule. They exist as a standing argument against that modern doctrine which ascribes everything to race, and nothing to environment, education, social conditions and custom. Islam has developed the character of the Indian Mahomedan somewhat at the expense of his intellect. He is simpler, braver, more masculine, more devout, in a rough, practical, straightforward fashion, but he is less subtle, less ingenious, less acute, and far less capable of assimilating the methods of modern education. He makes a first-rate soldier, a good policeman, inspector, or watchman, and he does fairly well in any post where courage, fidelity, and a certain self-respect are requisite; he has a distinct aptitude for trade, and as a shop-keeper he is frequently very successful. He is a convenient man to have as butler or personal servant, for in the first place he is in moderation honest, and secondly, he is not under the tyranny of caste rules, and can serve food to a Christian without a qualm.

But the Hindu beats him at the office and the desk, and in the class-room. This is one of the reasons why there ought not to be direct appointments to the Higher Civil Service by competitive examination in India. It is quite certain that in this contest the babu and the Brahman would beat the Mahomedan out of the field. Most Indian Mussulmans cherish in their hearts some memory of the days when their fathers were the masters of India, and they believe that, if ever the English power were shaken, they would regain their old predominance. In the meanwhile the Mahomedans will endure being the subjects of a Christian race, whose character they respect, and whose religion they can understand. But to the feeble tribes of idol-worshippers, as they consider them, they protest indignantly that it would be an outrage to ask them to yield obedience.

Englishmen, for their part, find it easy to get on with the children of Islam. They have no difficulty in liking men who have good manners without servility, and who possess some of the open-air qualities and tastes we ascribe to ourselves. The Hindu, with his glib tongue, his pliant brain and back, his fantastic social rites, and his incomprehensible religion, puzzles and annoys us. But the Mahomedan is apt to be too conservative and obscurantist, too haughtily contemptuous of modern progress and modern learning, and too much under the influence of an obsolete system of education. The Mahomedan gentleman is just the man we should like to see taking a prominent part in our provincial administration. The difficulty is to get him there; for Mahomedans of the better class are still rather disposed to regard Western knowledge as at once impious and vulgar, tending to disbelief in the Koran and the neglect of the classical literatures of Persian and Arabic.

There is, however, a reforming movement in Indian Mahomedanism. Some very able and high-minded members of this community, of whom the best was that really excellent man, the late Sir Syad Ahmad Khan, have seen no reason why a good Mussulman should not also be educated up to the best modern standards. So they have instituted the Aligarh College, where some hundreds of young followers of the Prophet annually receive what may be called an English public-school training. In this college, which has an English principal, the young Mussulman is brought up as much as possible like an English school-boy or under-graduate. He has his lessons and his lectures, his games, his boarding-house, his class-rooms, and his playing fields. Athletic pastimes are cultivated with zeal, and there are not many cricket clubs in India that can take on an Aligarh eleven with any confidence.

It is bringing on the young Mussulman a good deal. But this youth has a sister. She, too, sometimes gets educated in these days. She learns French and music, and reads English novels. But in due course she is married, and is shut up for life in the mitigated captivity of the zenana. There are bold innovators in the Mussulman community who go so far as to suggest that married women, in these days, might be treated like rational human beings and allowed rather more liberty than is given to habitual criminals in the West. And there is even one Mahomedan family of high rank and unquestioned orthodoxy who permit their ladies to go about unveiled and to talk to male persons, European and others. But in spite of the reformers, Mussulman emancipation moves but slowly, and it does not seem that any substantial progress is being made in getting rid of the peculiar domestic institution which is the real bar to genuine intimacy between ourselves and the people of India. It is difficult to come into quite friendly and confidential relations with a married man when you will never be permitted to see his wife, and may not even allude to her in the course of conversation.—SIDNEY LOW.

Times of India.—The gracious letter addressed by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales to His Excellency the Viceroy, on the eve of his departure from India, breathes the same generous appreciation of all that was done to facilitate the Royal progress that was frequently privately expressed in the course of the journey. The burden of preparation was no light one, both for heads of the administration and for the local officers directly affected. Nor was the expense to individuals in many cases small. It was obviously impossible for all these services to be recognised in the Honours list, but to the private acknowledgments previously made is now added this assurance to "our most kind hosts in various parts of India that their reception and welcome had given us intense pleasure and satisfaction." And on the other side it should be said that the Prince and Princess are of those whom, quite apart from their Royal station, it is a pleasure to serve. Even on Royal tours little accidents will occasionally occur, but these were accepted with the cheerful equanimity of wide travellers. The special reference to the work of the Sanitary Authorities, the Railway Companies and the Police, most thoroughly deserved, is the more acceptable because the work of these services is so rarely adequately recognised. Again, His Royal Highness has taken the opportunity to re-assert his conviction that the old spirit of the Indian Army inspires all ranks to-day. The physique, equipment, and military fitness of each branch of that Army was brought vividly before Their Royal Highnesses at every stage of their progress. So too was the fighting value of the Imperial Service Troops, who already contribute nearly an Army Corps to the striking arm of the Empire, and will grow in numbers and value as the Chiefs reorganise their obsolescent military retainers. Every one who noticed with what visible emotion Their Royal Highnesses bade farewell to India at Karachi will recognise that the Prince of Wales spoke from the heart when he said "So long as we live we shall remember India with feelings of warm gratitude and sympathy." That feeling is not on one side. India will remember the visit of Their Royal Highnesses with a deepened loyalty inspired by their genuine kindness, their unfaltering generosity and appreciation, their unfailing sympathy with every class in this vast and varied dependency.

Times of India.—In his reply to the address presented by the Municipal Council of Karachi, the Prince of Wales took occasion to say a few words by way of farewell to India and her people, says the Indian Social Reformer. They were spoken on his own behalf and that of the Princess, and will find an echo in the hearts of all sections of our population. It will give universal pleasure that Their Royal Highnesses carry such affectionate impressions of their visit to this country. And it is only due to them to say that the obligation is mutual and that if we have done our best to give them a cordial welcome, Their Royal Highnesses, too, have shown themselves greatly willing to be pleased with the efforts made to make their sojourn pleasant and interesting. It is a mistake to suppose that the popular love and loyalty to Their Royal Highnesses is based on any expectation of favours to come. It is a hypothesis and not a fact that the Indian people or any Eastern people for that matter associate loyalty to the Sovereign with some immediate or prospective reward. The truth, on the contrary, is that nowhere in the world is loyalty more absolute of all consideration than in India. No other proof is needed than the state of the administration in some Native States and the devotion in which the Chiefs are held by their people. However unhistoric it may seem to us, with the mass of people loyalty to the Sovereign is required by the fact that sovereignty in their firm belief is the gift of God. For the just exercise of his authority he is responsible alone to his Maker. It is the duty of subjects to obey him and to honour him and not to judge him, much less to condemn him.

The Gujrati Punch writes:—The tour of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales is at an end. Their Royal Highnesses bade farewell to Indian shores on Monday, amidst usual honours. The reply of His Highness the Prince, to the address of welcome presented by the Karachi Municipality, was characteristic of His Highness's profound love for India, genuine interest in the welfare of Indians, and cosmopolitan sympathy for all, irrespective of caste, creed or colour. His Royal Highness showed his deep and unfaltering sympathy for the wants of the needy toiler in the field and did not forget to remember him, even in moments of gorgeous pomp and pagantry, when all around was absorbed in glitter and brilliancy. The tour has been happy, successful and fruitful in its rich results. Though it has lasted for about six months, it has strengthened the link between India and England to the extent of prolonging India's connection with her for six hundred years. Everywhere, Their Highnesses have evinced their inherited and large-hearted sympathy. Everywhere they have displayed their love and affection towards the teeming millions of India. Everywhere the Prince has shown that the true blood of Queen Victoria, the mother of Great Britain and India, runs in his veins. Whenever opportunity offered itself, the Royal guests never failed to express their sense of gratitude to the natives of India for their generous hospitality and warm-hearted welcome. In their deeds, as also in their words, Their Royal Highnesses have vindicated their title to be the most promising couple in the Royal families of Europe. Wherever they set their sacred foot, they have planted seeds which will in the fullness of time yield an abundant harvest. Wherever they exhaled their sweet breath on the soil of India, they brought with them many pleasant recollections, and left happy memories. Throughout the tour the noble-minded simplicity was as much conspicuous as the Royal dignity, the large-hearted nobility as much conspicuous as the unaffected humility, and the deep sympathy as much conspicuous as their profound affection.

28TH MARCH 1906.

Civil and Military Gazette.—The following telegram from Aden is published from His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales to His Excellency the Viceroy, dated the 24th instant:—"On leaving the last place in Indian territory we must again thank you and the people of India for the kindness which we have received and which will never fade from our memories."

Civil and Military Gazette.—The Prince of Wales is to be awarded the Gold Medal of the Zoological Society in acknowledgment of his kindness in handing over to the Society the collection of Indian fauna which was recently presented to him by the Government of Nepal. This, remarks Punch, disposes, once for all, of the rumour that His Royal Highness intended keeping them at Marlborough House and dispensing with a watch dog. Thirty years ago when King Edward, the Prince of Wales, presented the mammals and birds which he had brought home from his Indian tour, they excited so much interest that the Society's income from visitors during that year was £8,000, larger than usual. The collection included an elephant, two tigers and two leopards. In 1877 the Prince of Wales was presented with the Zoological Society's Gold Medal at Marlborough House.

Daily Mail.—Cairo, Tuesday, March 27. The Prince and Princess of Wales will be received with great pomp on their arrival here on Thursday from India. The Khedive, Lord Cromer, the Ministers, the Sirdar, the high officials, and the officers of the British Army will welcome their Royal Highnesses at the station.

The Prince will drive to the Abdeen Palace with the Khedive in a gala carriage escorted by a guard of honour. The Princess with Prince Mohammed Ali, will follow in another carriage similarly escorted.

During their stay the Prince and Princess will visit the barrage and the ruins of the Sakhara pyramids, and on Friday will attend Bedouin races and a military tournament.

On Sunday the Prince lunches with General Bullock, Commandant of the British troops, and the Khedive gives a state banquet in honour of his guests on Saturday. Lord Cromer gives a banquet and reception on Tuesday.

29TH MARCH 1906.

Daily Telegraph.—Bright, calm weather prevails in the Red Sea. His Majesty's third-class cruiser Pyramus, forming part of the escort of His Majesty's Ship Renown, anchored off Suez roads at 10-30 this morning, hours before she was expected. Wireless communication was established shortly afterwards with the first-class cruiser Terrible, which is keeping company with the Renown, and the latter, it is announced, will reach Suez at two o'clock.

The Duke of Connaught, who is travelling on the Prinz Regent, is due here to-morrow morning. The Prince of Wales will probably await his arrival, but the remainder of the Royal party will proceed to Cairo this afternoon.

Suez, Wednesday (6-30 p.m.). His Majesty's Ship Renown, with the Prince and Princess of Wales aboard, drew into Suez Roads, in close company with the cruiser Terrible, at 1-50 this afternoon. A fresh breeze had sprung up during the morning, and there was a fairly heavy sea running.

By courtesy of the Suez Canal officials I was enabled to go out on one of the company's steamers and meet the warships some distance down the gulf. Both vessels looked as spick and span as though they had just been turned out of dry dock. The four-funnelled Terrible, with her graceful white and blue lines, looked especially imposing, making the Renown by comparison appear somewhat top-heavy.

Owing to the unexpectedly early arrival of Their Royal Highnesses no representative of either the Khedive or His Britannic Majesty's Government was in the port to receive the illustrious guests. These officials came by special train from Cairo, which arrived fully three hours after the Renown and Terrible had anchored. Immediately on the arrival of the special train Mansfield Pasha and Mr. De C. Findlay, representing the Earl of Cromer, and Major Watson, Aide-de-camp to the Khedive, proceeded on board the battleship.

Their Royal Highnesses are in excellent health. The journey up the Red Sea has been very hot, but the sea was smooth until yesterday. The breeze has now stiffened and communication with the shore is unpleasant.

It has been decided that the Prince and Princess of Wales shall leave by special Khedivial train at 12-30 p.m. to-morrow, and arrive in Cairo at 5-20 p.m. Guards of honour from the Pyramus will be drawn up at Cairo station and received by the Khedive and the Earl of Cromer, with the Ministers of State and other high officials.

Mysore Herald.—Mr. J. D. Rees, M.P., writes as follows to The "Times":—

Sir,—Your readers must have greatly appreciated, as I have, the admirable telegraphic reports upon the Royal tour of your special correspondent. But I venture to suggest that he errs somewhat in placing the Native Princes and States. On the 17th instant he says, "The Nizam prides himself on being the premier Prince of the Indian Empire," and proceeds to give unimpeachable statistics in support of his implied or explicit adoption of this claim. I believe, nevertheless, that the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda and the Maharaja of Mysore, who also enjoy hereditary salutes of 21 guns, are not inferior in personal and political rank. Hyderabad is no doubt the largest, wealthiest and most populous State, but it hardly follows that its ruler is "the premier Prince of the Indian Empire."

In like manner, upon the occasion of the Royal visit to Mysore, your special correspondent, while most justly extolling the administration, says, "It is perhaps the only Native State in which it can be truly said that the duties of Government are discharged with an integrity and efficiency that compare not unfavourably with the administration of British India. It has earned the title of the Model State."

No doubt it is of all the protected States that one in which the administration most nearly approximates to British types and standard, as it is also the only one which has for half a century actually been administered by the British Government.

Nevertheless, if Native States are only regarded as well administered when British methods are adopted, there is little to say for the policy of preserving them, which was wisely and deliberately adopted when the results of Lord Dalhousie's annexations became known—a policy of which the renditions of Mysore was the most ample and conspicuous illustration.

It will suffice to give that State all the praise it has so well earned without, by implication, disparaging others, which have more or less preserved their own individuality. This becomes every year more precious in proportion as it becomes more rare, being seriously impaired, or even deliberately destroyed sometimes, by Residents, more often by Ministers, from British India, who gain an ephemeral and conventional reputation by imposing British methods as a matter of course, welcome or unwelcome, upon Native States, our guarantee of the integrity of which extends, or should extend, not merely to the qualified independence of the ruler, but to the predilections, prepossessions, and prejudices of the ruled. Nor is a Native State of much use for purposes of comparison with British India, if its administration is reduced to the identical types and standards prevailing in our own territories, nor are these invariably more acceptable than those of the individual State concerned.

There was a time, when Travancore, for instance, was known as the Model State, though its strong and fascinating individuality was, then at any rate, unimpaired, and I do not know when and why that prosperous and beautiful principality (and the sister and somewhat similar State of Cochin) fell below Mysore, for instance, in respect of the essentials of good Government. The last census report suggests many good reasons for giving these two States a very high place in all India, and they, and probably others, may reasonably take exception to the somewhat dogmatic decision in this behalf of your very able correspondent.

Times of India.—Her Royal Highness, the Princess of Wales, has been graciously pleased to accept a copy of the two songs from "Rustom and Sohrab" (by Mr. K. N. Kabrajee) dedicated to His Excellency the Right Honourable Lord Lamington. The following letter has been received from Sir Walter Lawrence, G.C.I.E., Chief of the Staff of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales:—

Prince of Wales's Camp, India, 21st February, 1906.—Dear Mr. Kabraji,—I have handed to the Princess of Wales the bound volume of music which you were so good as to send and am directed to express Her Royal Highness's best thanks for it. With my best wishes for the recovery of your health, I am yours sincerely. (Signed) Walter Lawrence.

His Excellency the Governor has also graciously accepted a bound volume of the music from Mr. K. N. Kabrajee.

30TH MARCH 1906.

Standard.—Suez, March 29. The Prince and Princess of Wales, with their escort, landed this morning, and proceeded to Cairo, in the Khedivial train. The station was beautifully decorated with British and Egyptian flags. Despite the rain, large crowds of European residents and natives were present, and cheered Their Royal Highnesses most heartily.

Cairo, March 29. The Prince and Princess of Wales arrived here to-day, and were received at the railway station by the Khedive, Lord Cromer, Sir Reginald Wingate, and other distinguished persons. Their Royal Highnesses drove direct to the Khedivial palace.—Reuter.

A Reuter's Special Service telegram says that the Prince, wearing a General's uniform, drove with the Khedive, who was in the uniform of a Field-Marshal. The Princess, in a white dress and toque, was in the second carriage, with Prince Mohammed Ali Pasha, the Khedive's brother. Each carriage was preceded by four running footmen.

The whole route was decorated with flags, and the streets were lined with British and Egyptian troops, which, with a cosmopolitan crowd behind them, consisting chiefly of Arabs in long flowing white and blue robes and red fezes, made a highly picturesque ensemble.

Their Royal Highnesses were enthusiastically greeted at all points on the route.

Standard.—"You will see many things and people in India," said the Member of the Council, "but do not forget the Man who Matters."

"Meaning thereby?" I inquired.

"Meaning the cultivator of the soil. India, recollect, consists mainly of him."

That is a fact which nobody who wants to get any grasp of the conditions of Indian life should for a moment ignore. It is also one of the reasons why, to the ordinary tourist, the customary autumn trip is so extremely unsatisfying; for it gives him little real insight or information in return for long and dusty railway journeys, poor food, and hotels, with a few exceptions, contemptibly inadequate. He goes in at one of the two great sea-gates, and emerges at the other, having in the interim spent more or less time at Delhi, Agra, Benares, and perhaps at Madura, Conjeveram, Ellora, and Ahmedabad, with a run up to Simla or Darjiling for a look at the snow ranges. He will have seen some interesting towns, some wonderful tombs and temples, and ancient monuments, and some picturesque scenery. But of the Indian people he will know little more than when he set out from home. For the Indian people do not live in the great cities. Their habit is in the country, to which five-sixths of them belong; the overpowering majority of them are villagers.

But with the life of the village it is not easy to come into contact, in any sense, without the benevolent assistance of those who conduct the local administration. The visitor who is without such aid can hardly even set eyes on a rural hamlet, except from a distance; he will not know how to approach it. There are no railway stations at the villages; their only access, as a rule, is by fieldpaths or jungle tracks or at the best by cutchra roads, narrow lanes, deep in sand or mire, along which a horse may travel, but not a carriage with wheels and springs. If you would seek out one of these communities, you must get the Collector to send his Tehsildar or other qualified native assistant to pilot you to the clump of thatched or mud-walled dwellings; you must let him summon the headmen and have out the principal inhabitants for your inspection, to elucidate the working of the primitive but yet rather complicated little social organism. Or better still it is to have a good friend who being himself Deputy Commissioner or Settlement Officer, will endure the burden of taking an irresponsible, inquisitive, spectator into his camp when he goes his rounds. Then you see the Man who Matters—governing man and governed—at first hand, and begin to realise the difference between the semi-Europeanised, sophisticated India of the towns and the India of two hundred and fifty million peasants. To go into camp with a Settlement Officer is, indeed, among the most delightful and instructive experiences that a visitor to India can enjoy; and a few days so spent, under kindly and competent guidance, will teach him more of the life of the villages, which is the life of the people, than many weeks passed in other and less informing ways.

They differ among themselves, these Indian villages, and it would be strange if they did not, seeing how various is the outward aspect and climatic character of the vast country they cover. In the far south the tiny thatched huts are buried deep in a tropic growth of bush green vegetation, and the little half-naked, brown people paddle about in their wet rice fields in the shade of dense palm groves or in rank growths overlooking blue salt-water lagoons—turquoises set among emeralds. It is like passing from Sicily to Poland to travel to the northern plains, and make acquaintance with the villages of the Panjab, standing bare and gaunt, over a wide, naked area of sun-scorched plain.

But, widely as they vary, the Indian peasants have some points in common. One is that they are essentially villagers—men of the village, in the literal sense. They do not live in scattered farms, each isolated amid its own arable and pasture. The farmer, be he owner or tenant, lives by, but not on, his land. His house, his sleeping-place, and eating-place, the lairs of his cattle, his children, and his women, are in the crooked wynds of the hamlet. His fields lie outside, and he goes to them to work in the daytime, returning, like his beasts, his buffaloes, and cows and bullocks, after sun-down. In Indian terminology, technical and colloquial alike, the word village has a meaning rather like that of the old English township: it signifies not only the cluster of houses, farmsteads and sheds for animals, but also all the lands belonging to, or cultivated by, the owners and inhabitants of the settlement. The Indian peasant, almost universally, is a gregarious, social animal.

Thus it ensues that whatever he may suffer from other causes, he is at least spared the burden of solitude. On the contrary, he has abundant humanity about him; he is never denied the society of his fellows. He is the member of a community, still to a large extent self-contained, self-centred, and separate from the rest of the world, as he has been from the beginning.

Wars and revolutions have swept over the land; dynasties come and go; new laws are made by one set after another of alien law-givers in their turn. Through it all the rural unit endures with indestructible vitality. Famine, plague, robber raids, the march of great armies, might blot one village, a dozen villages, a whole circle, out of existence. But the system maintains itself with persistency which Nature confers on her own simpler organic forms.

"So careful of the type, it seems,
So careless of the single life."

Twenty-two hundred years ago a certain Megasthenes spent some time in Hindustan as agent for Seleucus at the court of Chandra Gupta, the Hindu King of the lower Ganges region, and subsequently set forth his Vision of India for the benefit of the reading public of ancient Greece. His account of the Indian rural communities has been preserved, and it might almost pass for a description of a village in the United Provinces to-day. What struck the Greek investigator is precisely that which impresses the modern visitor. He found that the tiny republic—so he called it, adapting his language to Hellenic ideas—was a complete society, with its various classes and orders, its aristocracy, and its helots, and its regular hierarchy of officials, each having his own appointed duties to perform towards the common-wealth. So it is still all over India, though the social structure is better articulated in some provinces than in others.

Megasthenes might well have visited one of that very same group of fairly prosperous hamlets into which I was taken by a well-qualified official guide one bright morning in the early spring. A short journey across the fields from the carriage road brought us to the village boundary, that is, to the outside limits of the land which the inhabitants tilled. Here we came upon one or two of the peasants at work among their fields of ripening wheat, and barley and oil-seed. They were looking forward to the gathering in of the rabi, or spring crop, which the Indian farmer sells, whereas the Kharif, or autumn crop, is that which he eats. These peasants accompanied us into the interior of the little nest of cottages, and presently we had all the principal inhabitants standing in a semi-circle before us in front of the village well. In the midst was the zamidar, whom we must call, for want of a better word, the landlord, though properly he is only the rent receiver and rent collector responsible to the State for the payment of the revenues and land tax, and entitled to make his profit by letting the land to tenants. There are zamidars of all sorts and kinds, enormously wealthy proprietors, like some of those in Bengal and the United Provinces with vast estates and huge incomes, who own carriages and motor-cars, and shine resplendent at official and viceregal entertainments in ropes of pearls and collars of diamonds. One such, gentleman was pointed out to me at Lucknow who was understood to wear ten thousand pounds' worth of jewellery on his dress hat. Another had subscribed several lakhs towards educational and charitable institutions; whilst a third had expended an almost equally large sum in the purchase of a necklace for a nautch-girl much in vogue. At the opposite pole from these affluent personages are such zamidars as may be seen in some parts of the Punjab, who are simply peasant proprietors, or yeoman, working on their own holdings of a few acres with their own hands.

The zamidar in this village was of the medium kind, a small squireen, only a little elevated above his tenants. He was a civil, shrewd little man, a Brahman by caste, wearing a checked cotton pyjama suit and canvas shoes as a proof of superiority, I suppose, to his peasants, who went bare-footed and bare-legged. He showed us his house, which was built of brick, with an upper storey, and a small courtyard, from which the women's apartments opened; for, of course, the zamidar had sufficient social status for his women to be purdah-nashin.

Master and man answered all questions quite freely; nor did they appear to sustain any embarrassment from the presence of numerous onlookers and auditors. There can be few secrets in an Indian community. Everybody seems to be perfectly well acquainted with everybody else's business and his private affairs, if private they can be called. The official inquisitor has no delicacy in putting questions, and the people, so far from resenting the interrogatories, answer with alacrity, and even pride. It is evidently a compliment to be singled out to give information publicly in the sight of one's kinsfolk and neighbours.

On this occasion we had all the village notabilities paraded for our inspection. We saw the tambardar, or headman, the patel, or accountant, and the chokidars, or watchmen, clothed in a shabby uniform, and armed with a long staff for the terror—more or less qualified—of evil doers. We were shown the village barber, the potter, sitting at his wheel, with his rows of black plates and jugs baking in the sun before his hut, the blacksmith, the carpenter. Then we were taken to the square tank, under the shade of the mango trees, where the village waters its beasts, and bathes, and washes its clothes, and empties its slops. On its bank we are shown a white-washed shanty, which is the village temple, with its own hideous image of Siva, smeared with red paint, and the customary symbol, and its own private priest, who has a grant of the manorial land in return for his ministrations.

At one end of the village is a cluster of huts, rather smaller and poorer than the rest. We ask what this is, and are told, briefly, that it is where the coolies live, the chumars, or leather-workers of the North, the mahars of the West, the pariahs of the South, the sweepers and others, who do the menial work of the hamlet. There is hardly a village in India so poor that it has not its contingent of these helots, who discharge various necessary offices, such as clearing away (and sometimes eating) the carcasses of dead animals, and removing ordure. These outcasts, of course, have their own well, for it would never do for them to contaminate the water touched by their superiors; they have their own little temple, or, perhaps, only their own shapeless block of stone and sacred tree, so that they can perform their devotions apart; and they are expected "to keep themselves to themselves," so that we observe they do not join the group which gathers round us, but stand and gaze from a distance. There is a village school to which the children of the tradesmen, artisans, and cultivators are sent. But if the boys from the coolie huts were received at this seat of education the others would leave at once; pariah children and caste-people's children must not sit on the same benches. Riding into a village in the Punjab with a district officer and his very intelligent and well educated native assistant, I asked the latter whether the inhabitants of the coolie suburb were Hindus. "No," he replied, with some indignation, "they are not Hindus."

Here the magistrate intervened, and said that these people certainly were Hindus, though of low caste. But the native gentleman (himself, by the way, a member by birth of the baniya or merchant order) declined to admit it. "They are not Hindus," he insisted, "they are chumars." In the old days, these pariahs were practically serfs, compelled to labour for the community for something less than a bare subsistence. Now they have their rights, like other people, and, if not properly rewarded for their services, and treated with reasonable civility, they will go on strike, and reduce the village to great inconvenience, especially if there is an epidemic of cholera or cattle plague threatening.

The village has persons of other professions, who could, perhaps, be spared more advantageously than the menials. I was introduced to one man who was described as the local money-lender. In outward appearance he differed very little from the cultivators; but he had one of the best houses in the place, and was, I believe, prosperous. He seemed on excellent terms with the peasants, and fulfilled, I have no doubt, a useful function, for what is the ryot to do when the crops have failed, or partially failed, owing to a deficient rainfall? In former times when rent and taxes were paid in kind—so much of the actual produce of the soil—the landlord and the sirkar suffered with the farmer in a bad year, even if they made up for it by plundering him ruthlessly in a good one. In these days payments are in cash, and they are fixed and rigid; the rupees must be forthcoming, whether or not the ryot can sell his rice and barley, and even when he has none to sell. So, if the harvest has fallen short, or the bullocks are dying for lack of forage, or a dowry and a suitably expensive marriage feast have had to be provided on a daughter's wedding, the peasant goes to the sowkar and gives a mortgage on his farm. Perhaps he redeems it in a year or so, if times are good; perhaps he never redeems it at all, and goes on, year after year, paying an ever-increasing burden of interest, until at length he defaults altogether and the farm is sold over his head. A few years ago it looked as if, throughout a large part of India, the farmer would become a mere drudge, labouring for the benefit of the absentee landlord, the money-lender, or the small banker, who was the real owner of the land. But most of the local Governments have passed laws rendering it difficult or impossible to pledge the tenants' interest as security for loans, and so it is hoped that the wholesale indebtedness and expropriation of the peasantry will be checked.

Next to debt and famine, litigation is the worst evil from which the Indian agriculturist suffers. He is a disputatious, argument-loving creature, constantly quarrelling with somebody over something, usually land or some of its many incidents. He generates an atmosphere in which the lawyer, the nikil, the native pleader, flourishes amazingly. In the old days these disputes adjusted themselves, more or less, by faction fights, fierce local feuds, and savage private vendettas. Now we have stopped all that. Ink is shed instead of blood; angry farmers and graziers, contentious landlords and tenants, have it out with one another in the law courts, wasting their substance in suits and appeals, to their own ruin, and to the profit of the swarm of babu practitioners who are to be found everywhere. When the contest is once fairly entered upon, it will go on very often till one or the other combatant is pumped dry; and the Government, by multiplying the minor civil courts and making resort to them easy and superficially cheap, has rather encouraged than curtailed this ruinous indulgence.

More perhaps might be done to promote the settlement of disputes by an inexpensive form of arbitration. A very useful experiment has been made in this direction in the native State of Patiala, in the Punjab, a territory of Jat, Hindu, and Sikh villagers, among whom lawsuits used to rage with epidemic fury. The Settlement Commissioner, Major F. Popham Young, induced the Council of Regency to allow him to constitute Panchayats, or local committees, in each district for the adjustment of civil disputes and claims for the recovery of debt, and the system has been successful beyond the expectations of its founder. No greater benefit could be conferred on the Indian cultivator and landowner than that of inducing them not to waste their substance and their energies in the law courts.—Sidney Low.

31st MARCH 1906.

Graphic.—Our special Artist writes from Aligarh:—"The Tiwana Lancers, formerly known as the 18th Bengal Lancers, are composed mostly of Punjabi Mahomedans, Beluchis, and one Company of Sikhs, all excellent fighting men, and some of the best horsemen in India. They are devoted to their officers and the regiment, and Colonel (now General) Richardson, who has made the regiment what it is, may well be proud of them. The Prince has done them the honour of accepting the Honorary Colonelcy. Hence their selection to come to Aligarh on their way to Delhi to act as escort. His Highness the Aga Khan is the supreme head of a large sect of the Mahomedans, namely, the Khojas, who look upon him as a god. He is a direct descendant of the Prophet, and is acknowledged as such, and where ever Islam flourishes, whether in East Africa, Persia, Turkey, Afghanistan, India, or Arabia. He is a cultivated man of thirty or forty—indistinguishable from an English gentleman in speech or dress. He is a fellow-guest with me here, awaiting the Prince's visit to the Mahomedan College—one of the many objects to which the Aga Khan has devoted part of his great wealth. He is very advanced in thought, and quite a man of the world. It is reported of him that once, when lamenting his many responsibilities, he exclaimed 'It is not all beer and skittles to be a god!'"

Queen.—The Sacred Monkeys of India.—Among the strange sights witnessed by the Prince of Wales during his recent tour not the least interesting was that of the sacred monkeys of Benares. As we know, the Prince visited the famous temple in the suburbs of the holy city and fed the animals with sweetmeats and maize. These comestibles, sold on the spot, are bought by tourists and sightseers, just as visitors to our Zoological Gardens purchase "food for the animals" at Spiers and Pond's refreshment stalls. The origin of monkey-worship in India goes back to legendary times, when Hunooman, now honoured as a god, is said to have brought an army of monkeys to assist Rama, King of Oude, then leading an expedition to Ceylon for the recovery of his wife, Seeta, basely carried off by Ravana, who had been his guest. There is no historic evidence for the story, though some authorities believe the expedition may have taken place, and that the monkey army consisted of the wild jungle tribes of Central India. Be this as it may, for time out of mind these monkeys have been protected and venerated by the Hindus, who fed troops of them in temples and sacred places and allowed the wild ones to plunder the produce of field and garden. This, however, is gradually being changed, and though the natives do not attack the monkeys which ravage their crops they will endeavour to frighten them away. Instances are known where natives have sought the help of Europeans to rid them of some of these troublesome visitors. They are, however, careful not to let such things be generally known, for the shooting of one of these monkeys is looked upon as a serious offence. In his Beast and man in India Mr. Lockwood Kipling tells an amusing story of an English magistrate who shot one by accident, and went by night with a lantern to bury the body, feeling almost as guilty as if he had committed a murder.

School World.—The tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales in India has doubtless been the occasion of many geographical lessons. Incidentally, we have learnt much of our fellow-citizens in the East—of the origin of the Sikhs, for example, and of the interests to be found in the history of Rajput and other Indian Chiefs. Among other hosts of the Prince has been the Maharajah (magnus rex) of Mysore. That is one of the still independent States of India, as independent of the British Empire, that is, as any but the frontier States of the north. Its international relations are controlled by the British Government, and its rulers must behave themselves according to British ideas; and it was only in 1881 that Mysore was restored to its native ruler after a sequestration of fifty years. But now it has "a sort of representative assembly, which meets annually for a few days to lay before the ruler the petitions and grievances of the various classes, and to hear from his own lips a paternal explanation of the measures proposed by his Government." That is where we were in the fourteenth century. When will Mysore move on? and whither?

Sphere.—The Prince and Princess of Wales bade good-bye to India on March 18, sailing from Kurrachee on board the Renown, on which the band struck up "Auld Lang Syne," as the vessel steamed slowly from the shore. Lord Lamington signalled the Bombay Presidency's farewell from the troopship, Dufferin, which accompanied the Renown to sea.

During their sojourn the Prince and Princess have travelled by railway alone in India and Burma 8,807 miles, and have spent twenty-eight nights in the train. The Prince has deli-tered fifty speeches and performed a multitude of ceremonies. Notwithstanding these arduous endeavours the Princess has omitted only one engagement, and that at the earnest solicitation of her doctor. From the first she set herself to understand and gain the sympathy of her own sex, and in this she has been wholly and delightfully successful. Especially into the women's hospitals of India has the Princess brought the sunshine of her sympathy. Wherever she has stayed she has without delay sought out and visited the sick and suffering behind the purdah. The province and freemasonry of women remain the same in all ages and countries, and if her route through India had been marked by this alone it would have been difficult to estimate the good that has been done thus unobtrusively; but the Princess has also been able to see much of the country that the almost interminable public engagements of the Prince rendered it impossible for him to visit.

SELECTION FROM NATIVE PAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE BOMBAY PRESIDENCY FOR THE WEEK ENDING 31ST MARCH 1906.

Parsi.—25th March 1906.—“The Royal Visit is over, and by the time these words are in print the Prince and Princess of Wales will be far away from the land where they have spent four strenuous and, let us hope, at the same time happy months. Vast as is the Imperial domain they have toured through, no other land of similar area could show such striking contrasts and so many aspects of beauty and romance. The variety is infinite—from the fierce Beluchi to the loquacious Bengali, from the Bombay business-man to the mediæval Rajput, from the laughter of Burma to the sadness of an Indian famine camp. But if there was wonderful variety in scene, there was more wonderful unanimity in welcome. From every side came the same story of joyous enthusiasm. Much may be done in India by a remarkably complete administrative machinery; but the touches of popular enthusiasm that no despotism can command and without which the escorts, the bunting and the salaams lose all power to gratify, were never wanting. And the people's enthusiasm was not foolish or in vain, for throughout their long tour the Prince and Princess never failed in graciousness of demeanour and displayed in full measure the Royal gift of being able to say the fitting word on every occasion. Often their task must have been arduous, but they never willingly caused the smallest disappointment. One popular desire was strongly brought out in all comments on the tour—and that was the very prevalent wish that a member of the Royal Family should permanently reside in India.”

Indian Social Reformer, Muslim Herald, Gujarati Punch.—“At every stage on their way homeward, their Royal Highnesses have taken occasion to renew their acknowledgments and appreciation of the welcome accorded to them in India and Burma....The moral effect of this historic tour and the impressions left by it are bound to be extremely favourable to the creation of a fuller feeling of fellow-citizenship among the British and Indian races. There are unmistakable signs that the visit has quickened British interest in all matters concerning India. The special correspondents of the English journals, who accompanied the Royal party, have been feeling the pulse of public opinion in many matters, and their information, we may be sure, will not rest unused on their return to their native land. The ardent sympathy of almost every retired Anglo-Indian of any note with our aspirations, is a most happy feature of the situation. Altogether the visit of the Prince and Princess to India bids fair to be the beginning of a new epoch in her relations with the British nation, brighter and happier than any that has gone before.” [The Muslim Herald and the Gujarati Punch write in a somewhat similar strain].

Praja Bandhu.—25th March 1906.—The Bombay correspondent of the Praja Bandhu writes:—“The conclusion of the tour has been the occasion for reviewing it in all its varied aspects from its commencement, and has brought into active play the fertile and reflective brains of many a journalist. Conspicuous amongst these has been the Editor of the Times of India, to whom the tour indicates two things. In the first place, it establishes the unswerving and deep-seated loyalty of the Indian people beyond a shadow of doubt, and secondly it proves that this loyalty is the direct result of the increasing prosperity of the people under the British rule. As regards the first of these inferences I am not disposed to join issue with your contemporary. The recognition of the loyalty of the Indian people has so consistently proved to be barren of any substantial or concrete benefits to them that it has totally ceased to gratify them. As regards, however, the other conclusion which your contemporary has taken upon itself to draw, it is an inference which no Indian who cares to examine matters from the Indian point of view will feel inclined to endorse. To my mind the admitted loyalty of the people to the British Crown is to be regarded as the offspring of a few advantages, which connection with a civilized Government necessarily brings in its train, coupled with the conviction, which is as firm as any conviction could be, British Government must continue, irrespective of its resulting in our increasing prosperity or tending to drain the country of its existing resources. As regards the devotion to the person of the Crown, the peculiar constitutional position of the Emperor and the consequent absence of any direct responsibility for the numerous reactionary measures the country has at present been subjected to solely account for the continuance of that substratum of loyalty, which is found implanted in the Indian breast. The dominant desire of every Indian mind in connection with the visit of the Prince and Princess was to enable them to acquire, at first hand, information bearing on the real condition of the Indian masses. Now that this desire of theirs has remained unsatisfied, our only hope lies in the utterance to which the Prince gave expression at Karachi only a few days back, intimating that amid the brightness and splendour of the receptions accorded to them, they had not forgotten the miseries and the toils which are so frequently the lot of the Indian people. Whether we are destined to be equally disappointed in the hopes we entertain regarding some permanent reduction in taxation, as a living and lasting recollection of the auspicious visit recently closed, it will be premature and unwise at this stage to declare.”

Kcsari.—27th March 1906.—The Prince of Wales having bade final good-bye to India, a hot controversy is raging among English and native journalists about the sentiments of the rulers and the people towards one another. An Anglo-Indian contemporary has expressed it as its opinion that if there had been real discontent in the land, it would have manifested itself on some occasion or other during the Royal tour. As there was no such manifestation, it is concluded that the Indians are contented. But the explanation of the fact that the people, in spite of their discontent, did not mar the festivity of any ceremonial or reception in honour of the Prince, is to be sought in the separation of executive authority from the seat of sovereignty. The work of showing sympathy with the people rests with our sovereign, but that of exercising authority over the people and crushing them under the levelling roller of British administration rests with other persons. Under these circumstances, the expedients of a Royal visit or an Imperial Darbar will not avail in any way to remove or conceal the discontent prevailing in the country. We admit that the Prince feels true sympathy for the Indians and that it will increase with time. But if Lord Curzon nullified the benefits of the Queen's Proclamation by dubbing it “an impossible” charter, what more can we expect from Royal sympathy?

Parikshak Karnatak Vaibhava.—The Prince of Wales,

our future Emperor, who had come to this country to receive homage from the Native Princes and Chiefs and be entertained at feasts and banquets, left for England on the 19th instant. In the opinion of the British press the Prince's visit to India has immensely benefited the Empire and enhanced the loyalty of the Indians to their sovereign. To us it appears that the visit has only entailed a great loss of money on our Chiefs and people. If this circumstance is, in the opinion of the English people, calculated to increase our loyalty to England, we think that the latter object can be gained by merely sending annually a picture of the Prince to be taken in procession all over the country. But British statesmen, being fully aware of our helplessness, care nothing for our loyalty or otherwise. Their only object in organising the Prince's visit to India was to create in the minds of other nations an impression that the visit has augmented the loyalty of the Indians to England. [The Karnatak Vaibhav writes in a similar strain and adds:—The Prince has come and gone and has promised to tell his father that the Indians are happy. A few people affect regret at his departure, but, in our opinion, the tour has merely entailed a waste of money on the country. The people were suffering from famine at the time of the visit, but neither the Prince nor his advisers thought fit to seize the opportunity of relieving the distress caused by that calamity. It is, however, a relief to know that the tour ended without any hitch occurring to mar its progress. This shows how loyal the Indians are.]

Gujarati,—25th March 1906.—The Royal tour has ended and Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales are already on their way home. During their stay in India many a work of public utility has, it is true, been started, but at the same time we cannot lose sight of the fact that large sums of money belonging to this poverty-stricken country have been squandered in connection with the visit. People of every class, colour and creed from the Tashi Lama of Tibet to the ordinary Brahmin of India as well as Native Princes, Chiefs and Sardars, have made their obeisance to their future sovereign, and swarming crowds of people have yearningly gazed upon the Royal pair. From these outward demonstrations of loyalty a studied attempt is being made to prove that the Indian people have been gratified to see the Prince and Princess in their midst, that both the countries are now inseparably united together and that the people of India have become devotedly attached to the crown. We do not think, however, that such surmises have any foundation in truth. It is no doubt a fact that the people have exhibited their loyalty and devotion to the Royal Family in a remarkable degree, but when it is argued that this outburst of loyalty was the result of their contentment with the existing system of administration, we cannot help asserting that this is nothing but a bold endeavour to throw dust into the eyes of the people of England. Their oriental love of hospitality has naturally made the Indians accord to the Royal couple a right loyal welcome. But they have not thereby shown that they are in love with the rulers of this country. The question, therefore, naturally arises as to what has contributed to the success of the Royal visit. The people of India firmly believe in British justice and in the promises of Her late Majesty the Queen contained in the Proclamation of 1858. Their firm faith in the latter makes them believe in the hope that one day England will deal justly by this country. It is this sentiment alone that has made the Royal tour an unprecedented success. But so long as the rights and privileges enjoyed by other nations are not conferred upon the Indians it would be impossible for them to entertain any love for their present rulers. It is surely a pity that the King-Emperor should be debarred by the British constitution from taking the initiative with a view to confer some boon upon the Indians in commemoration of the successful visit of his son and daughter-in-law to this country.

Kal,—30th March 1906.—The saddest event of the past week was the departure of the Prince of Wales from this country. The Indian heir-apparents of olden times were born in the country, lived among the people and did not go to other countries except for making conquests. But now everything is changed. The personage whom we call our future Emperor lives in another country and spends only a very few days among us. Owing to this circumstance, the people's attachment to him is not enhanced as much as it should be. When any one lives among us only for a few days, we naturally look upon him not as one of ourselves, but as a stranger. It is, therefore, doubtful how far the people's attachment to the Prince of Wales has been increased by his brief sojourn in this country. Many newspapers are praising the Indians for the affectionate sentiments manifested by them towards the Prince. If, however, the English were to examine how far these sentiments of affection are sincere, they would be disappointed. In order to strengthen their rule in this country, they have, among other things, to foster the feeling of loyalty among the people, and it is, therefore, to their interest to proclaim that the Prince's visit has increased the loyalty of the Indians, though this might not really be the case. As a matter of fact, however, it is impossible that a foreign prince should win the hearts of 39 crores of people in the course of a very short visit to their country. Englishmen are fond of asserting that the Indians are attached to their rule. The fact of the Prince's safe return to England is cited as a proof of the attachment of the Indians to their British masters, and it is concluded that the present system of administration needs no improvement. The Indians are discontented, but at present they do not wish to show that feeling in any unlawful manner. But Englishmen like some thick-skinned animals, whose sensibility can be roused only by the penetration of a sharp nail in their body, are not alive to the existence of discontent among the people of India and will not admit it unless there is some violent cataclysm. Discontent manifested in mild language is not felt by them at all. They are thus driving the Indians to desperate measures and are themselves labouring under a false sense of security when as a matter of fact they are standing on a volcano which is smouldering within.

Jam-e-Jamshed, 30th March.—“We trust that Sir Sultan Muhammad Aga Khan's very fair, able and enlightening contribution in the current number of East and West will persuade his critics to be a little more fair and just in their estimate of the young nobleman, and to recognize that in him their country possesses one of the most precious and valuable of assets. In his article the Aga Khan speaks with all the weight of authority derived by a long and intimate acquaintance with the people of all creeds and classes and as such, his opinions, expressed in this article, ought to appeal to the consideration of all honest and sincere well-wishers of India. The Aga Khan is almost merciless in his criticism of the arrogance and the high-handedness of the 'superior' community. He lends his testimony to the existence of a deep-seated despondency and even despair among the Bengali population, Hindu and Muhammadan, in consequence of the partition of their province. And knowing of the existence of this despondency, this grief, this resentment, he could not but be struck by the spontaneity and the whole-heartedness of the reception accorded to the Royal visitors. There was a loving look on every face, and on the night of the illuminations, when the Royal couple drove through the city, the Aga Khan declares, 'tears of joy ran down the faces of old men and young Bengali lads, who probably were students that had been agitating several weeks before'. The Aga Khan then proceeds to make some scathing obserrations regarding the haughty and overbearing attitude of Englishmen in general towards the natives of this soil. He speaks here both as a patriot and a loyal and devoted subject of his sovereign. There is a no greater or more ardent admirer of the British rulers of India than he is. But that doesn't blind him to their defects. He knows the responsibilities of his position, the responsibilities that rest on him as a faithful and honest exponent of the thoughts, the views, the wishes of his countrymen; and it is to be trusted that those who have made it a rule of their lives to disbelieve anything and everything that is being said against the British in India, both official and unofficial, to sneer at the representations of native politicians and publicists, would do well, as much in the interest of England as of India, to hearken to the words of good advice that he has addressed them. Surely Sir Sultan Muhammad Aga Khan is no political agitator in the sense in which the political agitator is now-a-days taken by the Anglo-Indian. He loves the British, he wishes them well, and they cannot do worse than ignore his counsel, and refuse to mend their attitude towards the people where so staunch, true, devoted a friend and well-wisher has found that it sorely needs to be mended." The Rast Gofstar also writes in a similar strain.]

The Subodh Sindhu (Khandwa), of March 28th, has an article enquiring what benefit the people of India will derive from the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales to India. Ramechandra abandoned his kingdom with the object of saving his subjects from the oppression of Rakshasas, and at the end of a 14 years' journey at the sacrifice of his personal comfort destroyed Ravana and other Rakshasas and returned to his kingdom. Did the Royal journey in India benefit the people even to a millionth part of what Ramechandra's journey did? The visit of Their Royal Highnesses was spent in amusement and festivities. How could they therefore see the miserable condition of the people of India?

The Andhraprastika, of the 28th March, referring to the Royal message conveyed to His Excellency the Viceroy, wishes that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales should, whenever an occasion arises, actually do good to the country in the spirit in which he expressed his sense of gratitude and signified his affectionate goodwill towards the subjects for their loyalty and devotion to the throne. It hopes that His Royal Highness would sympathise with the 30 crores of people in India who are as much his subjects as the English and govern the country, in fullness of time, in such a way as to enhance its material prosperity.

Sudazsamitran, 27th March 1906.—Alluding to the letter written to the Viceroy by the Prince of Wales when he left the shores of India, the Sudazsamitran, of the 27th March, says:—We need not say how gratifying it is to think of the desire expressed by the Prince of Wales to see our countrymen free from poverty and in improved agricultural, industrial and social conditions. His sympathy to the sons of India may lead him to plead their cause to his father, who may be gracious enough to grant them a portion at least of what they are contending for. Under the condition of the British Government, the Parliament is all-powerful, and the King can do nothing directly whether for or against us. But since the parliament is only a machine, in the hands of the Ministers, our Sovereign may influence them and thus ultimately the Parliament, to do what he wishes. So it cannot be said that the goodwill of the Imperial family is of no value to India. The loyalty of the Indians is of no recent growth. It is almost an instinct with them. Our British rulers have had no experience to doubt our loyalty. The present Emperor was as strongly impressed by our love to the throne when as Prince of Wales he visited this country, as his son now is. Every British statesman has, whenever an opportunity occurred, praised our attitude to the Government. But education and a public feeling are growing among us, and we are in a position to understand that it is the duty of the rulers to love their subjects as much as it is the duty of the subjects to be loyal to their rulers. It is only fair that in return for our genuine loyalty, the British Government should take us more into its confidence and satisfy all our legitimate needs and aspirations.

The Sicadasi, of the 28th March, writes to the same effect. This paper observes that in spite of the proud and unsympathetic conduct of most Anglo-Indian officials, the people of India are aware of the sincere love which the Royal family, the British Ministers and the British people in general have for India, and that as a result of the recent visit of the Prince of Wales, a reduction of taxes and also of the military charges may be hoped for.

The Riyaz-ul-Akhbar (Gorakhpur), of the 28th March, referring to the attitude which the Porte adopted towards the late demands of the European Powers re Macedonian affairs, and that of the Belgium Government regarding the expatriation of a certain (Turkish) offender, says that the Sultan has evidently now changed his policy, and means no longer to yield to the European Powers in every matter. Recently England has asked Turkey to remove her troops from Akaba (in the Sinaitic Peninsula), on the ground of its being a part of the Egyptian dominion; but the Sultan has refused to comply, boldly asserting that Egypt is under his suzerainty, and no foreign Power has right to interfere.

The Bharat Jivan (Benares), of the 26th March, referring to the speech which the Prince of Wales made at Karachi on the eve of his departure from India, says this speech would seem to show that His Royal Highness has learnt something of the true condition of the poor people of this country. If so, the editor would earnestly pray His Royal Highness to induce the King-Emperor, his father, to ask his new ministry to deal with India justly and generously.

The Naiyar-i-Azam (Moradabad), of the 26th March, is greatly disappointed to find that no special concession has been made to the Indians in honour of the late visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to this country. The Indians should, however, think themselves fortunate that the Prince of Wales has evidently carried with him a good impression of their loyalty and of the hearty reception they accorded to him everywhere.

The Citizen (Allahabad), of the 26th March, says:—There has been some heart-burning in certain quarters in the United Provinces by the greater importance given to the Aligarh College compared with the Central Hindu College of Benares in the Royal tour. The Prince paid only a flying visit to the latter and received the address of welcome in the quadrangle without leaving his motor. His Royal Highness could not spare time to look at the new handsome range of buildings, see class work, or inspect any of the special features of the institution. At the Aligarh College, however, His Royal Highness spent no less than four or five hours, and went minutely into everything. Of course, the Prince would have been only too glad to show the same amount of favour, so to say, to the Benares as he had done to the Aligarh institution. But those who had the ordering of the tour were tactless enough to make such an invidious distinction.

The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 20th March, says:—We earnestly hope the farewell letter addressed by the Prince of Wales to the Viceroy will be carefully read and pondered over. We think it is one of the most remarkable communications ever penned, and bears a stamp of earnestness and sincerity which there is no mistaking. A few extracts from this impressive letter are worth bearing in mind. Of his tour the Prince says, "the feature which most profoundly impressed us was the spontaneous and affectionate enthusiasm of the thousands and hundreds of thousands who have welcomed us and made us feel at home in our progress through We are both genuinely sorry that our visit to India has come to an end. We shall never forget the affectionate greetings of India and Burma. Everywhere we found the same loving regard for the late Queen-Empress, the same loyal devotion to my dear father and the same kind and enthusiastic welcome to ourselves. So long as we live we shall remember India with feelings of warm gratitude and sympathy. . . . We wish for the Indian people immunity from famine and pestilence, steady progress in agriculture and industries and a safe and natural advance in social conditions." This is very gratifying, but will the sympathy of the Prince help the people of India in any way? The people will remain where they are so far as the Government is concerned, though they have the best wishes of the Prince.

2ND APRIL 1906.

Madras Mail.—Referring to the termination of the Royal Tour, the Indian Social Reformer remarks:—"The moral effect of this historic tour and the impressions left by it are bound to be extremely favourable to the creation of a fuller feeling of fellow-citizenship among the British and Indian races. There are unmistakable signs that the visit has quickened British interest in all matters concerning India. The special correspondents of the English journals who accompanied the Royal party have been feeling the pulse of public opinion in many matters, and their information, we may be sure, will not rest unused on their return to their native land. The ardent sympathy of almost every retired Anglo-Indian of any note with our aspirations is a most happy feature of the situation. Altogether, the visit of the Prince and Princess to India bids fair to be the beginning of a new epoch in her relations with the British nation, brighter and happier than any that has gone before."

3RD APRIL 1906.

Daily Telegraph.—Cairo, Monday Night. The Prince and Princess of Wales are having a busy time here, every day being marked for displays, receptions, etc. Saturday morning was spent in visiting points of interest in the city, and late in the afternoon the Prince was present at Abbasseyeh at a particularly attractive military tournament.

Their Royal Highnesses were present at Divine Service yesterday morning, conducted by the Very Rev. Dean Butcher. Subsequently they visited the Delta barrage in the Khedivial yacht.

To-day the Prince and Princess made the excursion to Sakhara, and returned by way of the river, arriving late in the afternoon. They dined privately at the Abdeen Palace to-night.

The review of Bedouins to-morrow at Ghezreh promises to be the most interesting event of the Royal visit. Bedouins from every quarter of the country have been collected and brought to Cairo, with their racing camels and horses. Cool weather still prevails. I learn that the Prince and Princess are greatly enjoying their visit, their only regret being that it is too short.

4TH APRIL 1906.

Daily Telegraph.—Cairo, Tuesday Night. The Prince and Princess of Wales went on shooting excursion this morning, and obtained a fairly good bag of quail. They lunched with Monsieur de la Bouliniere, the French Diplomatic Agent, and Madame de la Bouliniere, the following being the guests in addition to Their Royal Highnesses: M. Smyrnoff, Russian Diplomatic Agent; Count de Valdrome, First Secretary to the French Agency; the Earl and Countess of Cromer; M. de Vaurienneux, French Commissioner of the Caisse de la Dette; Count and Countess de Serionne; and M. Maspero, Director of the Antiquities Department.

This afternoon the Prince and Princess attended the Bedouin camel and pony races at Ghezreh, at which the Khedive was also present. There was a record crowd of natives, residents, and tourists, some 4,000 persons entering the grand-stand enclosure, whilst a heterogeneous throng, estimated at 15,000, surged around the precincts of the racecourse. The general display of horsemanship and Bedouin sport, in which several thousands took part, was most striking.

This evening the Royal party are dining privately at the Abdeen Palace, and a long programme of entertainments has been arranged for to-morrow, including a visit to the Pyramid of Cheops, which is to be illuminated at night.

El Sayed El Bakri, a descendant of the Prophet, and the most influential religious Sheik in Egypt, has addressed an open letter to the Prince. After a long introduction he reminds His Royal Highness of the words of King Edward at the opening of Parliament to the effect that the granting of a Constitution to the British dependencies has always led to the prosperity and happiness of those dependencies as well as to the strengthening of the ties uniting them with the Empire. The letter concludes by asking the Prince to endeavour to make the occasion of his visit to Egypt an opportunity of fulfilling the promise given by Great Britain at the beginning of the occupation of Egypt, to grant this country representative government.

Madras Mail.—A meeting of the General Committee of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales's Reception Fund was held at the Senate House yesterday with Sir George Arbuthnot in the chair.

SIR GEORGE ARBUTHNOT, in opening the proceedings, said that they were assembled to consider the following Resolutions adopted at a meeting of the Executive Committee:—

"That, in the opinion of the Executive Committee, the most appropriate method of dealing with the balance, estimated at Rs. 15,000, would be to utilise it for the endowment of one or more scholarships for the Victoria Technical Institute, but that before taking any steps to carry out this scheme, Lord Ampthill should be requested to be good enough to ascertain whether this method of dealing with the funds would meet with the approval of His Royal Highness, and, if so, whether he would be graciously pleased to allow the scholarships to be designated 'The Prince of Wales Scholarships.'

"That a meeting of the General Committee be convened for Tuesday, 3rd April, and that the Resolution with reference to the disposal of the balance should be submitted for their approval and that they be invited to authorise the Executive Committee to finally pass the accounts when audited."

SIR GEORGE ARBUTHNOT said that, personally, he thought that they could find no better method of disposing of the funds than by endowing one or more scholarships in connection with the Victoria Technical Institute, an institution in which His Royal Highness was very much interested. The only other alternative proposal, which had been made by two or three people whose letters he had before him, was that a portion of the Fund should be devoted to the support of the Victoria Caste and Goshia Hospital.

MR. G. NARAYANASWAMI CHETTY moved that Rs. 5,000 out of the amount be devoted to endow two beds in the Victoria Caste and Goshia Hospital in the name of Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales and that the balance of Rs. 10,000 be spent for the endowment of scholarships in connection with the Victoria Technical Institute.

MR. A. C. PARTHASARATHY NAIDU seconded the motion.

SIR V. C. DESIKACHARIAN pointed out that when the funds were so small it would be unwise to fritter them away by dividing them between two or three institutions. Some people took exception to giving any portion of the Fund to the Victoria Caste and Goshia Hospital, on the score of its being an institution open only to caste people; whereas the Technical Institute was absolutely non-sectarian.

MR. SERRIER HUSSAIN SUMM pointed out that the Goshia Hospital was an exceedingly useful institution and deserved to be helped. Such help as they could give, he had no doubt would meet with the approval of His Royal Highness.

At the suggestion of Sir George Arbuthnot, the following Resolution was unanimously adopted:—

"That as only two methods of disposing of the funds have been suggested at the meeting, viz., that the estimated balance of Rs. 15,000 be utilised for the endowment of one or more scholarships in the Victoria Technical Institute, (2) and that Rs. 10,000 be utilised for such purpose and Rs. 5,000 be allotted to the Victoria Caste and Goshia Hospital for the maintenance of two beds in the name of Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, that Lord Ampthill should be requested to be good enough to ascertain whether these methods of dealing with the funds would meet with the approval of His Royal Highness, and, if so, which he would select, and whether His Royal Highness would be graciously pleased to allow the Victoria Technical Institute scholarships to be designated 'the Prince of Wales's Scholarships.'"

The meeting then terminated with a vote of thanks to the Chair.

5TH APRIL 1906.

India Telegraph.—Cairo, Wednesday Night. The Prince and Princess of Wales passed the whole of this morning en qualité de touristes, visiting the most interesting bazaars, and making a number of purchases. In the afternoon they were the guests for five o'clock tea and a reception of Mr. Iddings, the American Diplomatic Agent and Consul-General. The Earl and Countess of Cromer were present, as were also Admiral Sigbee and the officers of the American flag-ship Brooklyn, General and Mrs. Bullock, the Sirdar and Lady Wingate, and others.

Their Royal Highnesses have now left for the Pyramids. Dinner is being served in the historical Chalet built by the late Khedive Ismail Pasha for the Empress Eugénie at the foot of the Great Pyramid of Cheops. They return early, and leave by special train at 11.45 to-morrow morning for Port Said where they will embark immediately on His Majesty's ship Rennet.

5TH APRIL 1906.

Guardian.—Now that the Prince and Princess of Wales are near their return to England, with no remarkable public preparations made here for their return, one reflects again, as one has had occasion to reflect often during their Indian tour, how very small has been the interest shown at home in the tour, as compared with the interest taken in the tour that the King made thirty years ago. Everyone must have noticed the difference. There have been, no doubt, constant pictures in the illustrated papers; but considering the far greater number of illustrated papers now, the amount of space which was given up to the King's tour by the one or two papers that existed then was proportionately quite sensational. Of course India is much nearer now; the to and fro of Indian civilians and officers serving in India has made the country seem far less distant and unknown; writers and travellers and photographers have dulled our sense of strangeness. Again, the Prince of Wales is less in the public eye than his father was as Prince. The King does not leave so much interest over for another as Queen Victoria had begun to do by the time that he went to India. But I fancy that in the end the real reason for the comparative lack of interest in this tour is that it had not behind it the ulterior motive that the earlier tour seemed to have.

It was in the winter of 1875-6 that the King was in India. The great business of the session of 1876 was the adding of the title "Empress of India" to the style of Queen Victoria. It is to say the least quite likely that Disraeli saw to it that there was plenty of enthusiasm here about the tour, in order that upon the wave of it his proposal of the new title might be a success. It was a hobby of his, the Queen as a mighty Oriental Sovereign, and he would have been delighted if he could ever have contrived that she should go to India. It is easy to confuse causes and mere antecedents in such a matter, but it is curious at any rate that there should have been that enthusiasm about the tour with this hobby of Disraeli's taking shape the next year. It is a little token of the interest that was taken to find people even after thirty years remembering details of it—the Prince's visit to the shrine in Ceylon where Buddha's tooth is preserved, and the riding of Lord Lytton on a white elephant with gilded tusks which had carried Warren Hastings. Of course the adding of the Imperial title to the Crown was not entirely Disraeli's affair. There is no doubt that Queen Victoria had long desired it, and possibly in this fact, too, is some explanation of the working up of the interest in the Indian tour. Queen Victoria, indeed, desired more than this. She wanted the title of "Imperial" for her children. The Duke of Edinburgh had married a Russian Princess, who, as a Royal and Imperial Highness, claimed precedence over the British Princesses. She did not get it, but still the Queen turned the more readily to the idea of making our own Princes and Princesses Royal and Imperial Highnesses. It was a very unpopular idea, however, and it was dropped.

Times of India.—In summarising the results of the tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales through India, we remarked that the lessons of the progress do not lie on the surface, nor can they be appreciated by those who do not know the East. An admirably-written article in the current number of East and West records the impressions of His Highness the Aga Khan, gathered partly from what he saw and heard in Calcutta, and in a measure from what he was told by friends and adherents in other Indian cities. No one is better qualified to be heard on such a subject, because the Aga Khan is in touch, in quite a unique degree, with every shade of opinion in the country, and his impressions will commend themselves to all thoughtful men. Thus he recognises that the deep resentment felt in Calcutta at the partition of Bengal might have affected the reception of the Royal visitors. But like all who studied the demeanour of the masses assembled on the maidan and along the route to Government House, he was struck by "an affectionately expectant, an intensely joyous look on the face of every individual in that vast crowd. Had every individual of that vast crowd expected his nearest and dearest relative back home from a long journey, he could not have looked different." Visitors from Europe could not understand the absence of vocal expression; nor could they be brought to recognise that cheering is alien to the Indian but the Aga Khan rightly noticed that "What no frantic cheering in Europe ever equals, namely, the 'look of love', was freely given by the crowds of Calcutta to their future Emperor and Empress." The Aga Khan also succeeded in doing, what is so hard for the Westerner to accomplish—in learning the real feeling which animated these impassive throngs. On the night of the illuminations he walked, disguised as an ordinary native, through the principal parts of the city. Of his experiences he says:—

The scene that night I shall never forget. Tears of joy ran down the faces of old men and young Bengali lads who probably were students who had been agitating several weeks before. Amongst one large group I went up to an old man, a Mahomedan, who seemed deeply affected. His grey beard was wet with the tears of joy he had shed, and his moist eyes shone with that happy satisfaction which one so rarely sees on the faces of very old men. I went up to him and enquired why he shed tears and why he looked so happy. He turned round, and told me with an expression I can never forget, "I went to see them arrive the other day. His first glance (and his whole bearing all these days has only confirmed it) has shown that he is a "Man," and that he looks upon us as men. Oh, how good is to have a Man who does feel that we are human beings. After all those "Lord Sahibs" who seemed to feel like superhuman beings and to consider us vermin and reptiles as they drove through our streets, this sight is a blessing. I cry for joy that the heir of the Indian Empire and his Consort do consider us human." The hundreds who surrounded the old man, with one voice said "shabash, shabash," and looked as if they instinctively agreed with the old man.

The Aga Khan's conclusions are that politically, and especially with the masses, the visit has done immense good; the people have been deeply impressed by the constant manifestation of the Royal gift of sympathy, whilst the parades and reviews have brought visibly before all the essential unity of India and her loyalty to England. Like many another man of affairs who watched this tremendous manifestation of love and loyalty for the Royal House of England, the Aga Khan raises the question whether we can have a Royal representative of the Sovereign, above politics and not responsible, in this land. We fear not. It would be the certain and natural tendency of the people to regard the Royal representative as the head of the Government, and gradually to associate him with administrative acts, some of which are bound to be unpopular. This is an end which none desire. The time has not yet arrived when the mass of the Indian people can understand the subtleties defining the position of a constitutional Sovereign. Until it does, there is the considerable risk of dragging the members of the Royal House into the political arena in any plan for a Royal Viceroy.

Morning Post.—The occasions in men's lives of which one can say determinedly "This cannot happen thus again for a whole generation" are so few and can touch so few of us, even when they do happen, that one may be pardoned for taking any such too seriously of which, when it occurs, fate chances to make us interested spectators. Yet for that pardon one felt there was no need to ask when watching the great ship which had hung for five months about the shores of India slip her moorings to them for the last time, and steal down the long harbour from Kiamari towards the open sea. She had come to India in the hot still haze of a November morning, wrapped in the smoke of guns; she left it at the close of day, under the sunset's glories, cleaving a wind that spread out her splendid flags against the emblazoned cirrus of the sky, and swept after her, like some wild flight of birds, the white and amber wings of a great fleet of fishing boats, which had set sail to fling to her, across the blue water, their last farewells.

The Prince of Wales was leaving, never, probably, to return; the warship that bore him, with years briefer than those of a man, was still less likely again to make acquaintance with these unfamiliar seas. Looking thirty years ahead one could dimly wonder what strange shape of ship would bring the next English Prince who came to show himself to his Eastern subjects, and to what new people would he be brought, a people begun with aspirations which are to-day but in their green beginnings, vigorous with determinations which are as yet but dreams.

There are those in India who seek excuse for their own inertia by speaking of the immobility of the East, but however that epithet may have been justified of the past, the man who now uses it must live blind to the significance of what is nearest to him. At home, where our modes of locomotion, of sanitation, of education, and of government are in a continual flux, we may indeed talk of immobility, for even where in any serious conception of life changes may be noticed we refer them complacently, and in most cases with reason, to the swing of the pendulum. The spirit which is stirring the East owes, however, none of its energy to the impetus of recoil; its dynamics are of another order, and though drawing its origin, and, in some respects, its character from the West, its final development is likely to be not only undirected by Western influence but even in opposition to it. The cause of which is, and it is rather curious, that the West has turned the thoughts of the East back upon its own sources of wisdom, half forgotten and almost wholly fallen into neglect; and it is from the purity, the ardour, the sage humanity of these that the inevitable reconstruction will be undertaken and not from the uncertain and excited modernity which we have achieved.

But in India at present it is very easy to lose sight of the re-Easternising of the East in the very obvious symbols of its inspiration which the West has set upon her. The vegetation of fifty years has blotted out the old heroic landmarks once to be seen from the Ridge of Delhi, and factory chimneys have grown up out of the greenness in a double sense to take their place. At Agra one views the white loveliness of the Taj relieved against the dense smoke of commercial animation, and wonders how long its marbles will stand unstained in such a polluted sky; while at Cawnpore the visitor seeks distraction from the unsightliness of its pathetic memorials in the inspection of manufactories as modern and as thriftily conducted as any to be found at home. This is the New India to the touring eye, and new it is, with many issues which will require adaptation and adjustment to, and with a bearing and disturbing influence, on the old conditions which have scarcely yet begun to make themselves felt. But deeper than this, with no teeming chimneys to advertise its advent, no promise of prosperity to interest the speculator, no visible disturbance of things as they are, the real New India has come into being, its newness not of commerce, nor of policy, but of thought, of faith, and of aspiration. Yet even in the common visible life of India a great change may be noted by comparing the records of the King's tour thirty years ago with that of his son. Even in the Native States—indeed, one may say, especially and significantly in the Native States—the old barbaric splendours are dying out. They were resuscitated, it is true, in token of a loyal and royal greeting, but they had everywhere an air of resuscitation, of things unearthly; and even the gorgeous elephants, her own particular beast, seemed to bear something of the relation to modern India of the men in armour to the City in a Lord Mayor's Show.

Some measure of the degree to which India has altered in a generation was indicated by the presence of the Princess of Wales. Thirty years ago the idea of a woman in such a position would have been exceedingly unwelcome, and it cannot be said to have commended itself to the native mind when the recent Tour was planned. India is some way still from having any further use for its women than it has had for centuries, in the most domestic relations, and in affairs of State it finds an extreme difficulty in conceiving her at all. Even Native Rulers, who are so ultra-modern in their manners that they make one feel antique, have no desire to extend their modernity in the direction of their womankind, and many were the grave doubts expressed by Indians distinguished by their breadth of view as to the wisdom of the Princess's participation in the Tour, and it was instructive and amusing more than once to be confronted with the native's deep-seated antipathy to seeing that royal beast the elephant offer to a woman, however distinguished, the honour of his assistance.

One hardly knows whether it speaks more for the ability of the Princess or for the tractability of the Indian mind that long before the Tour was ended not only had all misgivings disappeared but they had been converted into an enthusiastic appreciation, which was a surprise even to those who had hoped for it. Save at Calcutta, where there was a legacy of reasons that made for failure, Her Royal Highness's purdah parties were the greatest success, and her immediate and immense popularity with all the women with whom she thus came in contact, helped, no doubt, to the so rapid conversion of tacit opposition into outspoken esteem. To romantic India, which sets such store by a gracious presence and a regal manner, the Princess made, of course, an indelible appeal; but it was not so much what they saw of her as what they learnt, that excited the admiration of the peoples of India. It was her sympathy, her untiring interest, her determination to understand, which woke an unexpected attention and won a quite surprised regard. The astonished realisation that she was interested in them, that she desired to penetrate beneath the cold official contact to their more intimate concerns, that she welcomed every opportunity however fatiguing, of direct and complete knowledge, in the acquirement of which she did not count fatigue, was what first of all and most of all turned their hearts to her.

As far as the Prince was concerned they, as is the manner of the East, could not separate, in their homage, loyalty from affection. But with her, the loyalty was only a reflected lustre, and on their affections she could make no claim; so that the fashion in which she drew all India to her feet was solely and wholly a personal triumph, and a triumph won in the face of the most considerable forces of oldenry and prejudice which were arrayed against her. "We loved in the Great Queen," said an old chief full of years and honours, "her justice and her greatness but most of all in your Princess we have loved her love." That summed up to feelingly the spoken sentiment of a score of others that one may leave it as typical of the sentiment she inspired, a sentiment which must count for much in any assessment of what has been achieved by the Royal tour in India.—(H. F. PROVOST BATTERSBY).

6TH APRIL 1906.

Daily Telegraph.—Cairo, Thursday, April 5. Indifferent weather prevailed at Cairo for the last day of the Royal visit. The special train was due to leave at 11-45 this morning, the Khedivial car being placed at the disposal of the Prince and Princess. There were present at the station to bid farewell to Their Royal Highnesses the Sirdar and Lady Wingate, General and Mrs. Bullock, Sir Vincent Corbett, Mohamed Ali, the Earl and Countess of Cromer, Mr. Findlay, Mr. Allan (British Consul), and Captain and Lady Valda Maclell. The departure was quiet, and after a cordial leave-taking the train left punctually. A considerable crowd of interested spectators lined the route from the Palace.

April 5. Port Said. The Royal train arrived here precisely on time. Enormous prosperous delta towns and statio Native bands made good a Anthem wherever the train stopped, and offerings of bouquets and baskets of straw berries were made by natives. The Prince and Princess expressed high delight with their visit.

On arrival at Port Said Their Royal Highnesses embarked immediately on the Renown, and preparations are already in progress for putting to sea in company with His Majesty's battleship Terrible.

An informal reception was held this morning at the Abdeen Palace of officials who had conducted to the pleasure and comfort of Their Royal Highnesses, and the Prince presented the managers of the railway and Wagons-Lits with handsome souvenirs.

Guardian.—6TH APRIL 1906.—When I wrote last night of the lack at present of any public preparations for the return of the Prince and Princess of Wales from India the words may have recalled to some people one of the least happy indications of what was behind the King's tour of thirty years ago. I was saying that enthusiasm about that tour was followed rather significantly by the addition of the Imperial title to the Crown in the year of the King's return. There was a fairly obvious sign of what had been at work in the inscription on an arch that was erected at Southampton. It was "Welcome to our future Emperor," and many who were not otherwise inclined to object to the change thought this was carrying toadyism rather far. One of those who did object was Lord Shaftesbury, but he laid himself open by an apt quotation (apt quotations always seem to provide their own riposte) to a retort in kind. He said that he had always been taught the words "Fear God, honour the King." Wherein was nothing about emperors. Lord Cairns replied that he had also been taught "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's."

Standard.—What is to be the future of India? What will our own position be in the coming time? How long will it be possible for a remote and somewhat inattentive European democracy to maintain an autocratic control over three hundred millions of Asiatics. These are questions which can scarcely fail to occur to any person of intelligence who makes some survey, however hasty and superficial, of our Eastern Empire. In the East itself he will seldom find them asked, and still less often answered. The English in India are, for the most part, too busy to think. They have their day's work to do, and in every department, the vineyard is large, and the labourers are few; and there is the hot weather to tax their energies and frequent holidays and intervals of leave to dissipate them. The Anglo-Indian—civilian, soldier, or man of business—is, as a rule, content to toil strenuously in his own corner of the field, to make his money or earn his promotion as speedily as may be, and go home. The future of India commonly interests him but little. A sailor, paid off at the end of a voyage, does not greatly concern himself with the subsequent career of the ship he has left.

But the few who have leisure and inclination to look about them are not inclined to give a definite and succinct reply to such interrogations as those just suggested. The wisest men speak least dogmatically. They know how many factors there are in the problem and how few of them we fully understand. All one can say is that great changes are likely to pass over India before this century has grown from childhood to middle age; but what form these will take, or whether they will lead, is not as yet in the least clear. The Awakening of Asia may affect India less rapidly than Japan, more slowly.

perhaps, than China, but in the end fundamentally. We have been preparing the ground ourselves in all sorts of ways. We have given India what it never enjoyed until within the past half-century: to wit, peace, absolute internal tranquillity, security for life property and the fruits of industry, and the universal rule of law. We have welded the sub-continent together by means of swift communication, canals, bridges, roads, railways, and telegraphs.

Before the Mutiny it meant a long and difficult pilgrimage for a man from the south to reach the north, or even for a Bengali, let us say, to make acquaintance with the Punjab. Lord Lawrence told Sir John Strachey that when he was a young man he was thought to have performed an extraordinary feat because, travelling day and night, he reached Delhi a fortnight after leaving Calcutta. Any native can now accomplish the journey in thirty hours for a very few rupees. Thus India still sundered as it is by caste, and class, and race, is beginning to draw together in a manner which never could have been possible in the earlier ages. Ideas circulate as well as human beings. That which is said or written in Poona to-day may be known in Peshawar and Travancore to-morrow. The results are for the moment seen most clearly among the educated minority, whom we have taught in our schools. But the circle is slowly extending, and in due course the peasant in his village will read the newspapers as the trader in the towns does already.

We have not only knitted India together by steam and electricity: we have also used the same agencies to connect it with the alien world. Europeans of all sorts, not to mention Americans, come to India, and some of these miscellaneous visitors and sojourners do not inspire the native mind with any particular respect. At the same time the natives themselves are travelling. Many quite humble persons—coolies, artisans, Sikh policemen, traders—have been far afield, to China, to the Straits, to South Africa, to Mauritius; others besides Rajas and students for the Bar have found their way to Europe. Much of the mystery which used to surround us has been stripped away. Our home life, our politics, our faction struggles, our social questions, are examined with keenly inquisitive glances by many intelligent natives. The Anglo-Indian will often tell one that these investigators do not greatly count: they are only "Congress-wallahs," more or less de-nationalised babblers of no real importance. But even if that be true, we must remember that such persons can talk and write, and their words are read and heard by many who carry more weight than themselves. Are we wholly justified in concluding that modern Radicalism and Socialism deal with ideas unintelligible to the masses of the Indian artisans and agriculturists? We used, I remember, to say the same thing about Russia a few years ago, when it was the received opinion that the professors of the universities and the "intellectuals" of the town could not make the echo of their voices heard in the villages. Events have shown that this view was erroneous. Our belief in the conservatism and irresponsiveness to agitation of the docile, kindly, authority-loving Indian peasant may require some qualification.

We are pouring the new wine of Western progress into the Eastern vessels. Modern industrialism is coming in, slowly, it is true, but quite perceptibly. India, with its abundant natural resources, and its reservoir of cheap labour, must sooner or later take its place among the manufacturing countries. It has assimilated the factory system, and the process has begun by which the villager, the tiller of the soil, the small independent cultivator, is turned into a unit in the urban labour army. Round Bombay, Calcutta, Delhi, Agra, Cawnpur, and other cities, the factory chimneys are rising, and the black coal smoke is pouring into the air. I have described some of these industrial developments already; and one cannot but feel that what has been seen, the mills, the jute factory, the mines, the metal works, the power stations, are only the beginning of much greater things. India needs capital; but capital is coming from abroad, and the native is even beginning to relax his caution and supply it himself. The country will not be quite the same when its captains of industry are numbered by thousands and its factory hands by millions. Industrialism is creating new wants, and a new standard of living; but it is sowing and germinating new ideas as well.

Whether these movements will bring the rulers and the ruled closer together or draw them further apart is, again, another question which few would essay to answer with any confidence. There are those who will hold that an Indian who takes to Western ways and habits must naturally begin to look at life from a Western standpoint. But others warn us that an Oriental may learn all about the use of a magazine-rifle, a dynamo, a sewing machine; he may wear serge trousers instead of a cotton apron, and even exchange his turban for a bowler hat; he may play cricket and ride a bicycle, and sit on a committee; he may do all these things and yet remain an Oriental at heart. "East is East and West is West and never the two shall meet." But in these days, we have seen some reason to distrust generalisations about race and nationality; it may be that "environment" is more than either; and it is even possible that the heart and thinking apparatus which work under a brown skin are not in essentials so different as we used to believe from those which are cased by a white integument.

For practical purposes, however, the question of questions is one that is not often spoken. How long shall we be able to go Europeanising, industrialising, Westernising the Indian native, "raising him," as we put it, "to our level," and yet keep him under our paternal despotism. Some pessimists I know think that we are sounding the knell of our own supremacy: we are teaching the native so much that he will presently learn to do without us.

To a certain extent this is true. As time goes on, no doubt we shall find the natives doing many things for themselves which we have done for them. The administration of the country is largely in native hands already, and I suppose we must look forward to seeing more and more educated natives taking responsible office in the public works department, the sanitary, judicial, medical, and educational branches, until eventually we shall have little left for Englishmen but the highest posts in the Army and the Civil Service. In business too, the natives are treading on our heels. Much of the banking, the supervision of manufactures, the export and import trade will probably pass over to them, as they get to know more of the methods of modern commerce. I am told that there are export houses in Calcutta even now where the real business and financing, the placing of orders, and giving of credit, is transacted by the Hindu broker, who is nominally no more than the firm's agent or managing clerk. In due course, this important personage will get in touch with foreign buyers himself, and will have his own agents and correspondents in England and Germany, and so he will be able to dispense with the services of his European partners and ostensible employers. What the Parsis have accomplished in Bombay, the Hindus and Mahometans may be able to do elsewhere. Here is a natural Swadeshi movement which we can hardly counteract.

It does not follow that we need fear it, or that it will be fatal to our political predominance—so long as our military strength remains unimpaired, and so long as we keep control of the supreme administration. That, it must be remembered, is the ultimate source of our power. Our position in India has no parallel in ancient or modern times, for the Roman Empire, with which we sometimes like to compare it, was quite different. The nearest analogy is that of the Manchus in China; for they, like ourselves, are a small body of foreigners, an alien official colony, able to rule a vast congeries of Eastern peoples, because they have the threads of the administration in their hands. Most Oriental countries have been governed in that way, though the experiment has never been performed on such a scale as in India and in China. But the Tartars, and Persians, and Afghans, and even the Mahrattas were just as much foreigners to the bulk of their Indian subjects as we are.

The point that differentiates our rule from that of every Eastern dynasty is that we are migrants, not settlers. It is to some extent an element of weakness; but it is also the prime and main source of our efficiency and strength. In all the other cases, the masculine conquering race has established itself in the country, and presently it has suffered that deterioration which seems, as if by a law of Nature, to overtake every despotic monarchy in the East. The Moghuls might be masters of India to this hour if they could have bred a succession of Babers and Akbars; and the "Nabobs" of John Company, in the eighteenth century, if they had been cut off from home and allowed to create an hereditary oligarchy in India, would have degenerated no less surely than their predecessors. It is the uniqueness of our situation that we can supply India with a constant fresh infusion of that Northern vigour, which has so often been able to conquer an Eastern people, and has invariably waned and weakened when it has settled down to govern it.

The Manchus, weak and corrupt as they are, have held China for close on three centuries. There seems no reason why we should doubt our own ability to maintain our rule in India for an indefinite period, if we do not shrink from the burden and remain strong enough to beat back aggression from outside. The danger that threatens, so far as it is not a military danger, may develop among ourselves rather than among our subjects. We are giving the Indian peoples two things they cannot themselves provide—a strong and honest administration and the force to resist anarchy and external attack. These are great benefits; but it is by no means certain that they are recognised by the majority of those upon whom they are conferred, and it is even probable that our labours will be less appreciated as time grows on, and as a larger proportion of Asiatics become imbued with a feeling of racial self-consciousness. The task of governing India may grow not easier, but more arduous; we may have to deal with a rising discontent among the ambitious, articulate, semi-educated classes, perhaps an increasing volume of agitation; and there is the possibility that an electorate, absorbed in its own affairs, might at length grow impatient of the constant effort, the unceasing vigilance, the ill-requited sacrifices, cast upon us by the duty of managing and protecting the great Dependency. The gravest peril to our dominion in India is that which might arise from ignorance, carelessness, and weakness at home. The journey of the Prince of Wales will have been specially valuable if it has served in any degree to awaken the English people to a deeper sense, not only of the splendour and interest of their Empire in Southern Asia, but also of the difficulties and responsibilities which still lie before them in that quarter of the world.—(SIDNEY LOW.)

Pioneer.—Bombay, 6TH APRIL.—A meeting of the Royal Visit Entertainment Fund Committee was held last evening. The surplus income was reported to be between three and four lakhs, and it was resolved to hand it over to Government towards the proposed Museum.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE PAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE BOMBAY PRESIDENCY FOR THE WEEK ENDING 7TH APRIL 1906.

Praja Bandhu, 1st APRIL. "Before Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales left the shores of India His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales had the gracious consideration to send a kind message of farewell to His Excellency the Viceroy. It has been universally appreciated. Evidently Their Royal Highnesses have been markedly pleased with their visit and vividly impressed with the life and surroundings in which they moved about for four months. All those who saw the Prince and Princess land at Bombay remarked that Their Royal Highnesses were visibly affected by the spontaneity of the loyal welcome of the huge crowds collected to honour them, and this experience of Their Royal Highnesses found expression in all the Prince's speeches, and is also given its place in the farewell message. Their Royal Highnesses's wish that the Indian people might get 'immunity from famine and pestilence, steady progress in agriculture and industries, and a safe and natural advance in social conditions' is deeply touching. We are grateful to Their Royal Highnesses for their gracious kindness and earnestly hope and trust they will not forget the people of this vast dependency when they are called upon in course of time to fill the most responsible position in the British Empire." [The Gujarati Panch also writes in a similar strain.]

Prabhat, 23RD MARCH.—"All Sind will rejoice at the honour Mr. Mules has received at the hands of His Highness the Prince of Wales in being created a Member of the Victorian Order. The oldest European official in the province, he is also the most popular and the most loved of them all. Public honours are not unoften bestowed on men whom the people have every reason to regard with contempt or dislike, and hence their value is not always very great. But in the present case the honour really sets the Royal seal on true sterling merit. We offer our hearty congratulations to the noble recipient and sincerely desire that he may receive a still better recognition at the hands of the Government whom he has represented so very worthily during the space of three and thirty years. He is one of the few European officials who have contributed materially to raise British rule in the estimation of Sindhis and helped to neutralise the discontent caused by the bad policy and serious blunders of others. He is, therefore, in every way deserving of Government patronage."

Bhala.—1st April. We spared neither pains nor money to accord a hearty welcome to the Prince and Princess of Wales. We did not mind the sufferings of our own children from starvation and even sold our belongings for the purpose of giving grand banquets in Their Royal Highnesses's honour. We gave proofs of our servitude and intellectual weakness by decorating our streets with flags and bunting on the occasion of their arrival in our midst. But what have they done for India in return is a question that has been discussed both by the Anglo-Indian and the Native Press. The sober organs entertain a hope that since his Royal Highness has personally witnessed the miserable condition of the Indians, he will, sooner or later, feel disposed to ameliorate their hard lot. There are strong grounds to expect this at his hands, because he is tender-hearted and has on several occasions reiterated his promise to bring the condition of the Indian people to the notice of the King-Emperor. There are several scurrilous newspapers which, on the other hand, describe the Royal Visit to India as a needless undertaking, inasmuch as the Indians did not obtain a single political concession as the result of it, but, on the contrary, were put to a heavy outlay. But in making such comments, these papers seem to have lost sight of the fact that in undertaking the Indian tour His Royal Highness simply wished for change. If he wished to make any concession to the people of this country, he could as well have granted it first and then started on his tour. Supposing that His Royal Highness.

as he travelled through the country, was moved to pity by the sad plight of the Indians, how could he better their condition, when the real rulers of India are other persons. We still think that the recent Royal tour will tend to the advantage both of England and India. It will be advantageous to the former because Englishmen will in future be able to trample upon the Indians and to plunder them with redoubled vigour without the risk of destroying their loyalty to the British Crown. The tour will be beneficial to India, inasmuch as it will have taught the Indians to depend upon their own efforts for their welfare instead of placing reliance upon Royal tours for its promotion.

Vrittanta Chintamani, Mysore, MARCH 31st, 1906.—Referring to the advantages of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales's visit to India, the Vrittanta Chintamani, of the 31st March, says:—In former days Royal visits were associated with largesses and remission of taxes and other benefits conferred on the people. The visit of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has also benefited the people in an indirect way; the decorations all over the cities visited by the Prince gave work and wages to the poor people at a time when famine and high prices were prevalent. Honours and medals were distributed among deserving personages. Our future King gained a personal knowledge of the true condition of the people. He has seen that the rich and prosperous are only a handful, while the number of those living from hand to mouth is infinitely great. He has also learnt the wants of the people that required an instant remedy, and how the redress of their grievances would increase the loyalty and devotion to the British Government. In his farewell speech His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales said that something would be done at present to check the existing distress in the land, and that growing distress will be permanently remedied in course of time.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE NEWSPAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE PUNJAB FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 7TH APRIL 1906.

The Panja-i-Faulad (Lahore), of the 28th March 1906, writing about the Royal tour in India says that His Royal Highness is as ignorant of the real condition of the people of this country as before. This is due to the fact that he was surrounded by such men as were neither the representatives of His Majesty's subjects nor felt real sympathy with them.

The Sadiq-ul-Akhbar (Rewari) of the 24th March 1906 writing on the same subject hopes that His Royal Highness will not forget the loyalty shown by the Indians, and acquaint his august father with the feelings of his subjects with a view to urging responsible ministers to do justice to the people committed to their charge.

10TH APRIL 1906.

Times of India.—The Special Correspondent of the Times, in summarising his impressions of the Royal Visit to India, says:—Surely no spectacle could appeal more strongly to the human imagination than that which the Prince and Princess have seen spread out before them whilst they have been passing in continuous review for more than five successive months all these vast and varied countries with their still more vast and varied populations alien in race, alien in tongue, alien in faith, over which they will some day, in the natural order of things, be called to reign. In his first speech delivered on landing at Bombay His Royal Highness said that as, in visiting India, he was but treading in the footsteps of the King-Emperor, his father, so he hoped that his children and his children's children would carry on the precedents thus established and make themselves personally acquainted with this splendid portion of the Imperial heritage. This is a promise of which the fulfilment cannot fail to bear excellent fruit both for India and for the Empire. The present visit must have been an experience of intense interest and of great practical value to the future Sovereign of India. There can be equally little doubt that it has been profoundly appreciated by his future subjects, who have everywhere and on every occasion welcomed his presence amongst them with demonstrations of respect, and even of enthusiasm, far more effusive than might have been expected from races on the whole rather prone to Oriental apathy. The Prince and Princess, on their side, have not only responded with Royal graciousness to these exhibitions of popular good-will, but they have constantly sought to enlarge as far as possible the circle of Indian gentlemen and ladies who could be admitted to the privilege of personal intercourse with them. The "pardah" receptions held by the Princess for the benefit of those Indian ladies from whom their social laws require the most rigid seclusion from all contact with strangers of other sex will leave memories no less abiding than the frank and easy conversations into which the Prince has frequently led representative members of the various sections of Indian society.

Nor have Their Royal Highnesses confined themselves to the more formal opportunities of intercourse afforded by State functions and ceremonial receptions. Only the other day, for instance, since she returned from Benares to Lucknow, the Princess drove out, unannounced and attended only by Sir Walter Lawrence, to visit a neighbouring village and see for herself something of the domestic life of the Indian peasantry. Another pleasant feature of the Royal visit has been the anxiety shown by many of the native gentry to commemorate it in some tangible shape by works of philanthropy or public utility, and to bring it home to the inhabitants of districts in many cases altogether remote from the Royal itinerary by public entertainments or by distributions of alms and food to the poor. In this and many other ways the beneficent influence of the Royal visitors has indirectly extended far beyond the area actually covered by their travels. On the political significance of the visits paid by Their Royal Highnesses to the great feudatory princes of the Indian Empire I have repeatedly had occasion to dwell during the progress of the tour. As far as the people of India are concerned, they have this, at least, in common that like all Oriental peoples, they prefer outward and visible signs to mere abstract conceptions and the actual presence, amongst them of the Heir-Apparent to the Throne, accompanied by so gracious a consort as the Princess, has helped to quicken, as nothing else could, their perception of the ties which unite them to the far-off island that has emerged so mysteriously out of the Western seas to control and shape their destinies.

There is one other feature of the Royal tour to which attention should, I think, be drawn before I conclude, and that is the encouragement which the signal proofs given by Their Royal Highnesses of the interest they take in every phase of Indian life, must afford to the great Civil Service of India. We are apt at home to forget what the Government of such a country as India means, though it is perhaps the greatest administrative achievement which the world has ever seen, and it is an achievement which would be impossible without the high standard of efficiency and devotion to duty to which the Indian Civil Service has attained. It is a service which undoubtedly holds out some high rewards and has built up a few world-wide reputations. But there are and always must be a large number of men in its ranks who spend their lives in work as arduous and responsible as can fall to the lot of any man struggling for the benefit of an alien people committed to their care, not only against prejudice and ignorance, against famine and pestilence, against the hardships of isolation and exile, and often of prolonged separation from those nearest and dearest to them, but sometimes even against the obloquy of cruel misrepresentation, even on the part of their fellow-countrymen, and who can never hope to emerge from relative obscurity or to grasp any of the richer prizes of their service. It can be no slight consolation for them to know that the work in which they play so strenuous a part has been brought directly under the notice of their future Sovereign, and that he will come home with a deeper and fuller appreciation of the large and really splendid share they take in bearing the white man's burden for the benefit of the whole Empire.

The Special Correspondent of the Standard writes:—

The Prince's tour has on the whole successfully accomplished the purposes for which it was undertaken. It was not planned to amuse or entertain the public at home, but to produce certain results, clearly conceived though, of course, never precisely formulated in India itself. That country, in all its sections and geographical divisions, has been accustomed from time immemorial to purely personal rule, nor do the vast majority of Orientals even now understand any other system. The Governor-General in Council, the Cabinet, the Secretary of State, the Imperial Parliament, are incomprehensible abstractions to them. "The golden link of the Crown" is a bond of the utmost practical value in keeping together the heterogeneous provinces and the miscellaneous nationalities of India. The people believe that the King-Emperor, the Kharo-Rind, is the supreme source of authority, and that the various high personages with whom they are more or less directly in contact, Commissioners, Lieutenant-Governors, the Viceroy himself, are no more than his servants, high placed but ordinary mortals like themselves. The sentimental reverence attaching to Royalty in the East is something of old but we are not fairly transcended in the West. No body can have imagined, as I have done, with the native crowd in all the great cities of India during the Royal entries and processions, with at being keenly conscious of this fact. To merely look upon the face of the Shahzad is an emotional experience for the Indian peasant. The tour was carefully planned so as to give this opportunity to as many people as possible, and there is, with one or two exceptions, not a province or native state in which tens of hundreds of thousands of people have not travelled from their homes and poured into the streets of the local capitals to see the Prince and Princess pass by, and to go back to their villages and talk for years to come, of the grandson of the great Queen whose name is revered in every cottage and the son of the King, whose personality is also becoming exceedingly well realised throughout the peninsula.

So much for the people. As regards the native Princes, the great and minor feudatories, and the native aristocracy generally, the effect has been equally marked. Many of these chiefs and rulers, it must be remembered, are imbued with a pride of birth which is as justifiable as any feeling of the kind can be; for a man whose ancestors were kings before Bourbons or Hohenzollerns were heard of, or one in whose veins runs the blood of the Mahomedan Emperors, may have some excuse for thinking something of his race. It is among the standing difficulties of our situation in India that the power of these high-born personages is not, and never can be, quite equal to their pretensions. In recent years they have, to a large extent, reconciled themselves with the facts. The descendant of the rajas or of the Kings of the Carnatic is well aware that certain great officials in India, among perhaps from the middle classes, are far more influential than themselves; they treat the Residents with deference, the Governors and Viceroys with the respect due to their status. Yet it is a great satisfaction to them to be placed, once in a way, in personal contact with the Imperial Throne through its future heir, and not merely through its representatives. There is not a reigning Chief—and almost every reigning Chief of importance, except those of the extreme south, was visited or received—who does not regard the attentions paid to him by the Prince of Wales as an honour far greater than any that could be conferred on him by the Government of India.

The tour was reasonable; it came at the close of a period during which opinion in India has been in a somewhat restless and offervent condition. For this there have been several causes. India, like every other part of Asia, has felt the dynamic shock caused by the Russo-Japanese war. The defeat of the Muscovite power has been overshadowed in the bazaars by the revelation that a purely Asiatic State has met and mastered one, which is regarded, in India at least, as purely European. The East, in fact, is supposed to have for once challenged the West and won. Erroneous as the deduction may be, it has had the curious effect of causing a certain mental disturbance, especially among the semi-educated class in the Indian towns—an emotion, of course, eagerly cultivated by the agitators who make it their business to preach a vague discontent with British rule. The Swadeshi movement, ostensibly economic in its origin, has been energetically taken up by the same faction, who contrived to associate it, skilfully enough, with the local opposition to the division of the immense Province of Bengal into two administrative districts. There were some apprehensive Anglo-Indians who feared that the disaffection was not confined to the professional politicians and the journalists of the vernacular Press; they thought it might have touched the masses. The best answer to these suggestions was the whole-hearted demonstrations of welcome which the Prince received from the swarming thousands who crowded the streets, not only in Bombay and in the up-country capitals, like Delhi and Lahore, but in sun-baked Madras and Mysore, and in the Bengal metropolis itself. Politics is still skin deep with the Indian populations; but loyalty is an instinct, though it requires the visible presence of some one very near the Throne itself to call forth its amplest manifestations.

The Daily Telegraph's representative says:—

A link has been established such as the conventional West cannot, perhaps, entirely understand. Man to man, the Prince and his future subjects have met, bread and salt have been eaten, and among the multitudes of Hindustan a vague sense of loyalty to an unknown source of future authority and honours has been exchanged for a real and ineffaceable memory of a man among them. Nor is this all—perhaps it is not even the most important result of the long and arduous work of the past four months. There could hardly fail to have arisen in the mind of the common people of India a feeling that, so far at least as they were concerned, the final authority for all that humanly speaking affected their daily lives and duties, their property or their misery, their fame or their abundance, centred at Simla or in Calcutta. Theoretically it is possible that the dependency of the Indian Government upon that in London is, to an infinitely small extent, recognised by the Indian ryot and taxpayer. But it is also clear that the small proportion of the huge population of India which does grasp this fact has of late been able also to understand that in this very Government at home there are changes to be reckoned with, bitter discussions of view, discontinuity even of policy. The Prince has made his visit out here in such a manner that not the slightest political fault has been left in doubt as to the impassable gulf that yawns between the varying Ministers and Cabinets of home, and the warring interests of military and civil India, on the one side and on the other the impassive continuity above all the disputes of the political arena of the only thing that the East understands and bows down before—the Imperial Throne and dynasty.

This is no small matter. It is a matter of history that Duke

12TH APRIL 1906.

William of Normandy secured England by a single act—the conversion of a long series of feudal peoples, with no interests or duties beyond those expected by an immediate overlord into a state bound together from shore to shore by a personal tie also to the King's own person. This in a way is no unfair illustration of what the Prince has done by his visit to India. The old proverb that the road to Delhi is long has too often been adapted to a new rendering, though indeed London is to-day nearer the remotest part of India than under Aurangzeb were the two capitals of Delhi and Daulatabad. This personal proof of the interest and affection which the King-Emperor feels in his great feudalities in Asia comes at a time when it was needed. Administration and development will do much. Perhaps in European eyes nothing else is needed to fulfil the expectation or definition of good Government. But in the East, the eye-hunger for a sight of him in whom the majesty of Empire is one day to be embodied is a demand that cannot safely be neglected, and the Prince of Wales has deserved well of the wider Empire by sacrificing much to gratify it. Those who have been round the long course with him will never forget the crowding millions in whose grey lives the sight of the son of their great White Emperor will remain the greatest of all events. Once back again in their villages, the story will never grow old, and the link that has been forged this winter will bind to the Crown the affections of far more than the lucky village pilgrim to Benares, or Peshawar, or Mandalay, who with his own eyes saw the King's son drive by.

11TH APRIL 1906.

Daily Graphic.—["Through India with the Prince." By G. F. ABBOTT. (ANOLD)].—Not the least part of Mr. G. F. Abbott's achievement in writing an extremely readable record of the tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales in India is that the publication of his story has anticipated the Prince's return to England. That is undeniably smart journalism; but we should be doing Mr. Abbott grave injustice if we left the impression that his work has no other qualities than those usually associated with the phrase that we have used. His is not only smart journalism; it is good journalism. Its author has had to traverse an immense amount of country. If he had been from London to Paris, from Paris by the express to Constantinople, down to Athens, across to Sicily, up through Italy to Vienna, and through Berlin to Moscow and St. Petersburg and home to London by way of one or two other capitals, he still would have done no more travelling than he did in the train of the Prince. He would have seen far fewer memorable sights and places; and his impressions could have been far less novel and unexpected. We may now begin to see the difficulty of his task in writing about all these things; in always keeping an eye and ear open for the things that were novel and surprising; in contriving as far as possible to see things and write things in a fresh and original way, and, where possible, from a new point of view; and to do all this without leaving out any of the essential facts. Mr. Abbott was acting as correspondent for the Calcutta Statesman. He had, therefore, to write for an audience which would be critical of details; and which would have an eager nose for mistakes. It also wanted something worth reading; it did not want to be told what it had heard before; and it wanted its daily bread of information served out before it had time to grow stale. We have recited the difficulties of Mr. Abbott's task, only to say that he triumphantly overcame them all. He wrote fast—that is evident—and at times he had to crowd in information. But, on the other hand, haste sometimes stimulated him, as it will stimulate the good journalist, to eloquence; and he is always unaffected and nearly always entertaining. He has written a good book; and no one will write one about the Prince's journey that will be easier to read.

Pioneer.—With the boom of the guns from the ramparts of Manora, and the interchange of greetings between the King-Emperor and the Viceroy of India, the curtain falls on the last scene of one of the greatest events in the modern history of India. Whilst the Prince of Wales was amongst us it was too early to express an opinion on the nature of the services rendered by any particular department of the State in connection with the arrangements for the Royal tour; but now that His Royal Highness has left our shores in safety, the time has arrived when public attention can justifiably be drawn to special services rendered on this occasion by the Indian Police force—to give praise where it is most due—to set forth the claims to public estimation which the Department has now established for itself—and if possible to secure appropriate official recognition of the work done both by individual officers in special instances, as also by the force as a whole whenever they were called on to perform duties in connection with the Royal visit. The past six months will always mark a great epoch in the history of the Indian Police force, since the series of successes achieved prove beyond all shadow of a doubt that the training and discipline of the force has advanced to a degree beyond the conception of those unconnected with the Department. The recently issued report of the Indian Police Commission made unfair capital out of the admitted shortcomings of the Department. One can only presume that this step was forced on them by the absolute necessity for securing the adequate realisation of the necessity for reform in certain essential respects, and, though they succeeded in inducing the Government of India to make appropriate grants, their action has certainly resulted in the police being somewhat unfairly thrown back as it were in public estimation. All doubts on this point may now, however, be removed. Nothing could have been better than the tact, judgment, temper and smartness displayed by the police generally in connection with the performance of their duties on every occasion during the recent Royal tour. Not only does the force as a whole pass out of the test with much credit to itself, but in some instances they did so extremely well that they were a source of pride to all who witnessed their arrangements and methods of dealing with the vast crowds which they were of-times called upon to control. It has in fact been the severest test of its kind to which the Indian police have been subjected within the knowledge of the present generation. Not only has the force been required to deal with the Royal visit, but it has, in addition, in the northern provinces at all events, supplied contingents for keeping the ground and for general duty at numerous military camps of exercise and to deal with enormous religious gatherings such as the late Kumbh Mela at Allahabad. The whole of their duties were cheerfully and efficiently performed, and the Police are in fact to be heartily congratulated on the series of successes achieved. It is to be regretted, therefore, that the official recognition of all their excellent work did not take a more substantial and real form than the mere issue of formal letters acknowledging the services rendered. As His Royal Highness proceeded on the triumphal progress throughout the land he scattered his Royal favour in the shape of honours and titles as advised by his counsellors or the rulers of the Provinces visited by him, whilst others who were in any definite way associated with the management of the various functions and receptions were presented with mementos of a more private and personal nature. In so extended a tour it is obviously impossible to please everybody, and there is no doubt that many most deserving persons have inadvertently been omitted, but nevertheless there has been much heart-burning in respect to this distribution of honour, and for this there appears to have been good cause. There may be some doubt whether a system of distributing personal mementos in comparatively large numbers, in preference to the distribution of official honours on a more select and deserving a scale, for services of a public rather than a private nature, is at all a sound one. The distinctions made are in many cases invidious, and it operates unfairly in cases of those who render exceptional services, and it is entirely wrong that officers who have had to bear the whole brunt and worry of the business should be grouped with and be disposed of along with those who were present in some cases merely as the ornamental heads of departments, and in many other cases were practically as much visitors as the Royal party themselves. This certainly has been the case with the Superintendents of Police outside of the Presidency cities. The services rendered generally by the Police in India has been recognised by the K.C.V.O., bestowed upon Sir Harold Stuart, C.S., who holds charge of the Criminal Intelligence Department with the Government of India, and in Bombay and Calcutta the Commissioners of Police have received Victorian Orders of the 5th Class. In all the other great Provinces of India, the acknowledgment has been limited to the presentation of private souvenir to the Superintendents of Police and souvenir medals to the City Kotwals, and as such are on a par with the presentation of a pin to Mr. Leno after a performance at Sandringham, or of the medals usually presented to the private servants of the Royal household on the occasions of visits from members of other Royal families. The late Queen-Empress's kitmutgars were in some instances covered with these insignificant decorations received from half the crowned heads in Europe. The compliment paid to the Indian Police has therefore been a very doubtful one. Local Governments, we understand, have compensated police drawn for duty from out-districts, and have in some instances warmly acknowledged the services rendered, but a mere empty recognition of this nature by a Local Government is not sufficient. The tour cannot in any sense be regarded as a mere provincial episode. It was an event of national importance and distinctly of an Imperial nature. It was really the sequel to the great Coronation Durbar where the loyal Chiefs of India assembled to do homage to their King and hear the proclamation announcing to them and all his Indian subjects the assumption of His Majesty of the title of Emperor of India. This act has now in a manner been ratified by the formal visit to this land of his royal son and heir. The Royal visit has, therefore, been regarded by the Indian people in the nature of a visit of the King-Emperor himself, and the spontaneous, loyal and respectful acclamations of the crowd in Bombay, Agra, Calcutta, and Benares proved the depth of feeling which had been kindled in the breasts of his Indian subjects. The Prince's visit to each place attracted enormous crowds, and in Calcutta and Benares the number which had to be dealt with certainly went into millions. The entire responsibility for controlling the movements of these immense assemblages rested with the police. Nor was this all, for, apart from the work done in public, the primary responsibility for guarding the person of His Royal Highness was also vested in the force, and probably nobody outside the Department will ever know or realise the amount of anxiety, strain, and work this involved. They had a difficult task to fulfil, for, whilst in no way relaxing their vigilance, it was essential that their presence should not be felt, and then in the jostle for places and the natural endeavour of all classes of officials to bring themselves to the fore, the officers of police had to keep out of evidence and in the background. It is this circumstance which must be so galling to men in their position, who have borne the whole brunt of the burden of the day, who would have suffered had anything gone wrong, and who are conveniently forgotten when the show is all over.

The unfairness of the position assumed by the Civil Service in keeping officers of the Department out of rewards justly due to them has in no instance been more clearly demonstrated than in the present, where honours and rewards which ought to have gone to officers of the force have gone to civilians who occupy or were appointed to posts which should have been held by policemen. Even the exceptions prove this charge, for the only local officers of police who have been permitted to partake of the crumbs which have fallen from the rich man's table have been the Commissioners of Police, who do not happen to be departmentally subordinate to local Magistrates of the Provincial Inspectors-General of Police. And yet the police arrangements in all our other great cities were in no way behind those in the Presidencies. In Agra, Lahore, Peshawar, Mandalay, and Benares, the crowds were just as heavy, and the police had in some cases a far more difficult task in arranging for events both on land and water than in the Presidency cities where the roads are broad and the people accustomed to the regulation of street and carriage traffic, and the police have a far stronger force of European constables than is the case in the Provinces. But the conduct of the police and the excellence of their arrangements throughout the tour elicited nothing but unstinted praise from all who took part in these proceedings. The failure therefore to obtain appropriate recognition in many of the instances referred to can only be attributed in the first place to the position occupied by the Superintendent of Police in relation to the District Magistrate, and in the second to neglect on the part of their own Inspectors General, whose business it was to see that good work received adequate recognition. It is in any case evident that the Royal advisers are in this respect more to blame than His Royal Highness himself.

It is not too late even yet to remedy so obvious an error. But as it is not the first occasion in which the force has been left out in the cold, those who have its interests at heart should lose no time in pressing its claims to Government. The Coronation of the King was commemorated in England so far as the police were concerned by the issue of the Coronation medal to all members of the force who had the honour of serving on duty on that occasion. A formal visit of His Majesty to any of the great cities in the United Kingdom is also as a rule made the occasion of a similar honour to the stalwart boys in blue. But in India things are done differently. It would appear that the average amount received in rewards by the rank-and-file of the Punjab Police who did such excellent work at the Delhi Durbar amounted to the somewhat extravagant figure of about four annas per head! Their services and the services rendered by the police from all over India who did duty on that occasion were, it is true, acknowledged in a general order by the Governor-General in Council, and Mr. Brown received a C.I.E., but that was all. The force received no decoration, and beyond the knowledge that they had done their duty and have received the thanks of the Viceroy they have nothing to show that they had ever been on duty at all on so auspicious an occasion.

The issue of a special police medal for Delhi as also another for the recent Royal visit to British India to all policemen, who were on duty on these two occasions, would not be out of place, and would satisfy all ranks more than hundreds of letters of acknowledgment, or the disbursement of any sum in money. It would be a practical way of showing that their efforts had been appreciated and recognised by the great Sirkar whose salt they eat. They would be permanent mementoes of the great occasions and would result in the recipients thereof taking a pride in their profession: it would stimulate others to do their duty faithfully and well so as to ensure selection for such duties in future, and would go a long way towards the fostering and development of a most desirable esprit de corps, and would in any case be nothing but a just, and appropriate, and on the whole, a very economical recognition of the valuable services rendered. Another and even a less costly honour which might well be conferred on the force is the change of its title from that of the Indian Police Force so the Imperial Indian Constabulary. The force was originally raised on the lines of the Royal Irish Constabulary, and its duties are in many respects very similar. The occasion for the change is an appropriate one, and the compliment could be justified—even at the risk of incurring the wrath and displeasure of such local Governments as still consider the Department a plaything of their own, wherein to dump down members of the Civil Service who cannot be provided for elsewhere, or to be cut down and otherwise experimented with at pleasure. In any case, in whatever form it may please the Government of India to demonstrate their appreciation of the services rendered by the Indian Police on these occasions, every member of the force who had the honour of serving on the occasion of the Royal visit may console himself with the reflection that the work of the force not only elicited the praise of the public Press, but that the Prince of Wales himself on leaving the country was graciously pleased to place on record an appreciation of the manner in which they had performed their duties, for, in his farewell letter of the 19th March to the Viceroy, His Royal Highness says:—"I have been struck with the working of the police and with the manner in which the huge crowds which have everywhere gathered to welcome us have been handled. It is a great satisfaction to the Princess and myself to know that on such occasions there has been practically no loss of life nor serious accidents, and we are specially happy to have noticed the absence of violence and rough usage." These cannot be empty words, and it may be hoped that the police will receive their proper share of the plums in the next Birthday Honours, and that the recognition will extend to all ranks of a force who have, when tried, acquitted themselves so well and are a credit to the Government and the country to which they belong.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE NEWSPAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE UNITED PROVINCES FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 14TH APRIL 1906.

The Agra Magazine for March says:—"The grand and hearty reception which Their Royal Highnesses have met everywhere, and to which they have themselves testified by published letters, falsifies the uncalculated assertions of disloyalty which are directed at us by modern Anglo-Indians. The so-called disloyal section—namely educated India—united with the masses and the aristocracy to give them a loyal reception.

The Royal visit has been beneficial to India in many ways. It has inspired the subjects with a renewed feeling of attachment to the British Throne, it has given them a unique opportunity for expressing their gratitude for the innumerable blessings of the British Raj, it has stimulated among them the popular sentiment of founding institutions for the good of the country, and lastly it has helped them to realize that their interests are as dear to the heart of the Royal family as those of any other country in the Empire. The universal expression of welcome with which Their Royal Highnesses were received has not failed to impress them with the genuineness of their loyalty of which Indians are justly proud. The public institutions which have been raised in their honour will continue to remind us of the auspicious visit.

The mere idea of having seen the Heir to the Throne, their future King and Ruler, will satisfy the popular imagination for a long time to come, and the festivities connected with the visit will make an indelible impression upon the young minds of the children.

But what we, Indians, hope is that Their Highnesses too will carry with them a love of the country, a sympathy with the aspirations and feelings of the Indian people, a desire to promote their interest even amidst conflicting forces. Whether we have succeeded in kindling such enthusiasm in Their Royal Highnesses, is yet to be seen. But we have grounds for this hope seeing that what little has fallen from their lips during this memorable tour has given an impression that their feelings are with us, and that our interests are safe in their hands.

15TH APRIL 1906.

Pioneer.—Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales have graciously accepted a copy of the "Life of Colonel James Skinner," written by his grandson, Mr. Stanley E. Skinner, who had the honour of presentation to Their Royal Highnesses some time ago at Delhi. The "Life" is in two handsome volumes specially bound for presentation, and it has been acknowledged by signed photographs of Their Royal Highnesses. Mr. Skinner will shortly place in the Church at Delhi, which was built by his grandfather, a memorial tablet to the Officer's of Skinner's Horse who fell on active service.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE NEWSPAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE UNITED PROVINCES FOR WEEK ENDING THE 21ST APRIL 1906.

The Zul Quarnain (Budaun), of the 14th April, publishes a communication purporting to be a farewell address given by India to the Prince of Wales. India telling His Royal Highness that he conferred a great honour on her by visiting her, says that her children in general, notwithstanding their extreme poverty, spared no pains and money, even though the latter might have been obtained by loan, to give His Royal Highness a fitting and royal reception. Her Chiefs too left no stone unturned to show His Highness the utmost hospitality, making as valuable and rare presents to him as could possibly be expected, and receiving titles in return. But it was much to be regretted that His Highness did not in his turn confer any Royal boon on Indians who have to lead a very miserable life, of which His Highness has learnt nothing, he having always been surrounded with splendour, and not allowed to see the real condition of terrible misery and indigence in which they pass their days. In conclusion, India, bidding a hearty farewell to His Royal Highness, prays him not to forget her, loyal and faithful as she always has been to the British Crown, when he ascends the Throne.

23RD APRIL 1906.

Westminster Gazette.—The Corporation of London to-day determined unanimously to give a grand dejeuner in honour of the return of the Prince and Princess of Wales from their Indian tour. This will take place in the Guildhall on the 14th instant. It is understood that the entertainment will be similar to that given to Their Royal Highnesses on their return from their tour around the world. On that occasion, it may be remembered, a brilliant gathering assembled in the library at the Guildhall, where an address was presented by the Corporation. Subsequently a move was made to the large hall, where an elegant dejeuner was served. The Lord Mayor presided, and the company was a thoroughly representative one. The toast list was brief, but the Duke of York, as he then was, delivered a lengthy speech in reply to the toast of his health, in the course of which he counselled Great Britain to "wake up if she did not wish to be outdistanced by her commercial rivals."

28TH APRIL 1906.

Our Home.—The city of Benares, which is the holy city of India, was visited by the Prince and Princess of Wales towards the conclusion of their long tour in Britain's Eastern dependency. But there is no doubt that the remembrance of Benares will live long in the memory of Their Royal Highnesses. The ancient and sacred city carried out its welcome, its schemes of decorations, which were not only characteristic but unique. Triumphant arches were erected, decorated with the famous brass work and embroidered cloths of Benares, and others were designed to represent the different trade guilds of the city. At each of them prominent members of the guilds were stationed. Then, too, in the sacred city, as was befitting, models of the Hindu gods and goddesses were used in the decorations, and representatives of Sadhus and Sanyasis were gathered at important places along the line of route of the Royal procession. These men are the religious teachers who wander over the country and who are fed by the charity of the people. It is regarded as an honour to give food, probably by placing rice in the holy men's begging bowl, to one who devotes himself to a religious life. These men are welcomed wherever they go, and often bring much joy and instruction to households by their recitation of the stories of heroes and heroines of the past. The most important personages in the procession were mounted upon elephants; that on which the Prince and Princess rode was most gorgeously caparisoned; and scarcely less impressive was the great animal ridden by the Maharaja of Benares. Elephants seem to be the animals which best sustain the dignity of an Oriental procession; they lend themselves to decoration just because they are so big, and they appear to realise the important part which they are called upon to play. Thousands of loyal and enthusiastic people of India's holy city gave Their Royal Highnesses a most enthusiastic welcome.

30TH APRIL 1906.

National Review.—Before discussing the hateful political incidents of the past month, we would direct our readers' attention to an inspiring episode which, though it may have attracted less attention than it merits from that portion of the Press which thrives on diurnal excitement, is an event of the utmost importance in the history of the British Empire. It will leave a permanent imprint on the minds of myriads of our fellow subjects long after more notorious matters have been buried in oblivion. Needless to say we refer to the Royal visit to India which has now drawn to a close. According to all accounts the tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales has not only been an unclouded success from the spectacular and popular point of view, but occurring as it did at a time when a series of regrettable incidents had tended to impair the prestige of the Indian Government, it has borne political fruit of inestimable value. Indeed it is no exaggeration to say that the presence of the Heir Apparent among his future Indian subjects has left the British Raj stronger than it was six months ago. Before leaving Karachi on March 19, the Prince, in replying to a farewell address from the municipality, gave eloquent expression to his impressions and to those of his gracious consort—who enjoys the distinction of being the first Princess of Wales who has ever trodden on Indian soil. They left "this wonderful land" with feelings of "gratitude and affection." We have seen enough to make India a living reality to us . . . and to implant for ever in our hearts sympathy and interest in all that affects our fellow-subjects in India, of whatever creed or race. While enjoying the "brightness and splendour" with which they have been received by "thousands of cheerful and happy faces," they remembered "the hard lives led by those in the trying climates of the plains, and we know the miseries which beset the patient and hardworking peasant when the rains do not come in due season." The Prince had gained knowledge "which with future study and observation will enable me to try and understand some of the problems of British administration," and had been deeply touched by "that feeling of loyalty to the Crown and devotion to the person of the King-Emperor which has been displayed ever since we first set foot on Indian soil. We have also been greatly touched by the evident memories of affection towards my dear brother, which still remain in the hearts of those with whom he was brought into contact during his stay in India some sixteen years ago. In our farewell we can truly say that our visit has been to us an unending and unbroken series of happy and most instructive experiences."

The special correspondent of the Times, whose admirable chronicle of the Royal progress has kept the British public informed of its successive stages, contributes an instructive appreciation of the tour from the Indian standpoint to the Times of March 20. "That it would be a magnificent and stately pageant, such as could be produced on no other stage in the world but India, was a foregone conclusion," upon which it would be unnecessary to dwell further, all the more as it would be futile "to convey by written word any adequate impression of the kaleidoscopic series of picturesque and brilliant scenes which for more than four months have passed from day to day before our eyes." Perhaps the magnitude and infinite variety of "this wonderful Indian panorama," might be brought home to untravelling Englishmen by the reminder that whereas it was hardly possible to make a railway journey of twenty-four consecutive hours in Great Britain, the Royal travellers had covered no less than eight thousand miles by rail, besides making a sea voyage of two thousand miles from Calcutta to Rangoon and thence back to Madras; and yet in spite of these arduous exertions they have been compelled to leave unvisited whole regions of the sub-continent of scarcely inferior interest to those they had seen. Nearly every Indian province is territorially equivalent to an average continental State, while some surpass in population and equal in area first-class European Powers. Thus Western Bengal alone contains a population approximating that of the German Empire, and the total population of India substantially exceeds, while its area surpasses, that of the whole continent of Europe, excluding Russia. "It is farther from Bombay to Peshawar than from London to Vienna, and from Calcutta to Quetta is a longer journey than from Madrid to St. Petersburg." Still more bewildering is the diversity of climates, countries, and peoples. The Prince and Princess of Wales had passed from "the warm and humid zone" of the western coast around Bombay across the "parched and sun-scoured table-land where the black shadow of famine too often hangs over the country, and a few inches of rain make all the difference between starvation and plenty, to the wild mountainous borderland of the North-West Frontier, close up under 'The Roof of the World,' where summer and winter mark the extremes of heat and cold." They had traversed the densely populated plains of the delta of the Ganges, the deserts of Western Rajputana, and the desolate plateau of the rock-strewn Deccan, while in Burma and Madras they had enjoyed "the splendid luxuriance of tropical vegetation under the influence of regular trade-winds and steady rainfall." They had been greeted by Pathan and Beluch tribesmen "with strongly marked Semitic features, by Mussalman Punjabis and Bengali Hindus, by smiling Burmans with slanting Mongolian eyes, and by dark-skinned Tamils of the old Dravidian stock."

The writer cannot refrain from expressing his astonishment that Englishmen who have spent a large part of their lives in India should beguile the home public by decanting on public platforms and in Parliament of "the Indian people" as though our Eastern Empire were inhabited by a homogeneous race "united by those bonds of common descent and language, and faith and customs, which combine to make up a nation." There are three races in India which, according to every anthropological test, differ more widely than do Swedes from Italians, or Prussians from Portuguese, while the cleavage between them is as deep as that which divides any two European nations; according to last year's census there are one hundred and twenty-four vernacular languages, and though the religious divisions may be less numerous, "they are proportionately deep," while the caste system of the Hindus alone opens up such a bewild-teristic of the occasion and could not be entirely neglected in an accurate picture of the tour. Mr. Abbott, with a somewhat too easy smartness, declares that "the one ceremony that did not bore me was one at which I was not present," and goes on to state that the second durbar he attended was also the last, and that he preferred to study Calcutta and its people rather than attend the Royal functions. One would imagine from his tone that he felt like a sort of Younghusband at Lhasa, making a first discovery of Calcutta and its million inhabitants; the supposition being that the readers of the Statesman did not know as much about their own city as he could tell them after two days' sojourn in the place.

But quite apart from that, this attitude on the part of a special correspondent towards the functions he was deputed to report raises a question of journalistic ethics. The correspondents with the Prince enjoyed numerous valuable facilities at the expense of the State; and is one of them at liberty to say "This is a very good opportunity of seeing India without much cost to myself, but I have no intention of giving any attention to the tour proper, because ceremonies bore me." If the Royal proceedings had no interest for him what was he doing in that gallery? In any case the globe-trotter's impressions of India have already been greatly overdone; and by neglecting the opportunities special to the occasion Mr. Abbott reduces himself to the level of a very ordinary tourist. He has done nothing that was not vastly better done before in G. W. Steevens's "India." For instance, he says of the Taj at Agra:—"It is a work perfect of its kind, but it is of a kind which fails to arouse my enthusiasm. It makes me think of Euclid or of a toyshop. The Taj seems to me to need a glass case." That is a criticism which if it harms anyone or anything will certainly not injure India's "white wonderin marble."

Now let us see what Mr. Abbott has to say about our own city of Lahore. Here is his description of the native city:—"A labyrinth of tortuous alleys" (it could not be a labyrinth if the alleys were not tortuous) "dusky and dusty, creeping mainly between tall tottering houses which often shake hands overhead or even kiss each other across the street. Gloom and silence sleep together in these crooked lanes, you say to yourself, until a sharp corner brings you into the bazaar and its multifarious pandemonium.... I cannot even attempt to draw a coherent description of a thing the very essence of which is delicious incoherency. But here are some of the component parts of the picture which unfolds itself to my eye as I cautiously worm my way through the dust,—silversmiths and blacksmiths, book-shops and cook-shops, cobblers, tailors, smells, sweet or savoury, and smoke rising from under simmering pots. Women squat outside the shops calmly, with trays of sugarcane pieces, or fruit, or paper flowers, or trinkets before them." That surely is poor picture-writing. Compare it with Rudyard Kipling's wondrous vision of the City of Dreadful Night. For the rest, Mr. Abbott devotes the greater part of his chapter to the "beggars" as he calls the jakirs and yogis. It is true enough that these naked and dirty creatures are unsightly and insanitary—an example of idleness defiled into a religion; but Lahore is not more remarkable for their presence than other places; not nearly as remarkable as Benares or the other holy cities of India. Why the author should regard them as the outstanding feature of the Punjab capital is not apparent. "A dismal howl," he says, "is borne to my ears on the cold night air. Beggars again!" We should think more likely that it was merely a chowkidar expressing his nocturnal emotions in the customary manner.

4TH MAY 1906.

Daily Dispatch.—Some of the newspaper correspondents who accompanied the Prince and Princess of Wales on their Indian tour have now returned, and are full of enthusiasm over the magnificent way in which they were entertained, not only by the official classes there, but by the Native Princes.

"Everywhere," said one of them to me to-day, "we were treated as guests of honour, but it was the Maharaja of Gwalior who showed us the heights to which Indian hospitality can attain. On arriving at the station we were met by His Highness, and driven in splendid carriages to our camp, about a mile distant. Our baggage was brought up immediately by a train of bullock carts. In our tents we found the most exquisite furniture, all bearing the stamp of a well-known London firm. The bath-rooms were luxuriously provided with soaps and scents, all from Bond-street, as though they were intended for the reception of society beauties instead of men, many of whom had seen a dozen campaigns."

"It was a most enjoyable trip in every way. The Prince and Princess were at first delighted with the country, and seemed as if they could not see enough of it. But this fervour naturally cooled down under the paralysing effect of a continuous round of social engagements."

7TH MAY 1906.

Daily Express.—To-day, majestically escorted by the Channel Fleet, the Prince and Princess of Wales will arrive at Spithead, and to-morrow will be seen again in the capital of the Empire. Two feelings will predominate in the hearts of the people at the conclusion of this memorable journey. First they will feel the legitimate pride which such Imperial embassies never fail to evoke—a deep and virile pride in the marvellous prosperity which has attended the efforts of the nation in building up the vast dominions which are united in loyalty to the Crown and the Union Flag. India, the continent upon which every great conqueror has turned ambitious eyes, acknowledges the sway of the British people, and tenders homage to them through their royal representative, the Prince of Wales. None of us—not even the humblest of us—should ever fail to remember our personal share in owning and ruling a quarter of the earth's surface and population. India is not only the King's India, and the Government's India but the business man's India, the clerk's India, the working man's India.

But the Prince of Wales is more than our Imperial Ambassador. He is our Prince in a more direct, intimate, and homely sense. He comes among us, not as an autocrat surrounded by a bodyguard, but as a prince, a gentleman, and a man who has nothing to fear wherever he goes. Our relations with royalty are like nothing ever before known in the history of the world. Unfettered by any laws, our loyalty needs no spur, and lèse majesté could not be punished here, because it does not exist. All the members of the Royal Family deserve our hearty gratitude for the untiring efforts and remarkable judgment with which they weave the "web of Empire" and promote our interest among other peoples. To-day in every part of the kingdom Englishmen will echo with genuine feeling the words of our second National Anthem: "God bless the Prince of Wales."

Globe.—The safe arrival of the Prince and Princess of Wales at Portland finishes in an entirely successful manner an expedition which has gone without a single hitch, great or small, from first to last. When the Royal tourists embarked some six months ago, there seemed only too much likelihood that embarrassments would arise through causes beyond their control. Plague was raging terribly in the North-West; there was a change of Viceroys just before they landed at Bombay; in some great provinces experts detected indications of approaching famine and its horrors. Later on, the change of Government at home added to the perplexities of the situation, while the so-called "partition of Bengal" presented native agitators with an opportunity for airing their disloyalty. But their rabid talk was not of the slightest avail to move the people at large away from their spontaneous resolve to give their illustrious visitors a hearty welcome. Wherever they went, whether to the Afghan frontier or the far remote Mandalay, their reception testified, not only to their own personal popularity among His Majesty's Asiatic subjects, but to the continued growth of loyal sentiment among all conditions of men. The natives have, it is clear, come to the conclusion that no greater misfortune could befall their country than the withdrawal of the ruling race. They recognise that it would not only deprive them of the certainty of inflexible justice and wise administration, but would be instantly followed by racial and religious struggles for supremacy throughout the peninsula. And in that perception, they accorded to the British Shah-zadah and his Consort a homage as deep-seated as spontaneous, which we feel assured will ever remain one of their pleasantest remembrances.

Morning Leader.—Our Portsmouth correspondent telegraphs:

The arrangements for the reception of the Prince and Princess of Wales on their return from their Indian tour have been completed, and Portsmouth is preparing to give the Royal tourists an enthusiastic and loyal welcome.

The Renown, with her escort, the Terrible, is expected at Spithead this afternoon, and will be received by the Channel Fleet under the command of Admiral Sir A. K. Wilson.

The Prince will not, however, receive any visits till the Renown is alongside the jetty in Portsmouth Harbour to-morrow morning.

At eight o'clock the warships in the harbour will dress with flags, the yards will be manned, and as the Renown starts from her moorings towards the harbour the guns of the fleet and the land defences will boom forth the royal salute.

There will be a gathering of distinguished naval and military officers to greet the Prince and Princess in the dockyard, and guards of naval men and marines will be mounted.

The Mayor of Portsmouth and the corporation will present an address of welcome from the citizens of the port. The royal train is to leave for London at three o'clock.

The Renown reached Portland yesterday.

Prince Edward and Prince Albert of Wales are to meet their parents at Portsmouth, and if the weather is fine they will probably go out to the Renown to-night.

The Renown is due at the South Railway Jetty at 11 to-morrow morning. On the jetty guards of honour will be stationed.

King Edward spent the early part of yesterday morning over his correspondence, says a Reuter Paris telegram. He left the Embassy at eleven o'clock and drove to the English church in the Rue d'Aguesseau to attend morning service. The King occupied a seat in the choir of the church. The congregation included the staff of the British Embassy, the members of the royal suite, and prominent personages in the British colony in Paris.

In the afternoon the King drove out to the Chevreuse valley. His Majesty returned in the evening to the British Embassy, where he dined with the members of the suite and a few friends.

The King leaves Paris for London via Calais at a quarter past eleven this morning. His Majesty has bestowed various decorations and gifts on the officials of the detective police attached to his service during his stay in Paris.

The special steamer Inviola with King Edward and suite on board, will leave Calais at three o'clock this afternoon, and is to arrive at Dover at about four o'clock. A royal train will be in waiting at Dover to convey the party to London.

Morning Leader.—The Prince and Princess of Wales have not set foot in England after their tour in India, before the first of the books relating the story of their journey has made its appearance; but this particular volume is far from being the conventional record of pomps and ceremonies that one associates with such an occasion. Mr. Abbott had the good fortune to represent a Calcutta Liberal paper, the "Statesman," and therefore was at liberty to say exactly what he thought about the royal progress through India. It is hardly surprising to find in his book an impression that all these displays, durbars, and minor ceremonies of every description thoroughly bored the more intelligent of those who took part in them, left the masses of India absolutely untouched, and wasted a good deal of money that could have been spent to much better advantage in a land suffering from scarcity, amounting in places to famine.

The only class who seem to have been quite in their element were the native princes, who had a good opportunity for vying with each other in display, and for impressing the heir to the Empire with their "loyalty." The spirit in which some of these semi-potentates regard their responsibilities is exemplified by Sindhia's remark made to the author:

Famine is an everyday occurrence, while the Prince's visit is an event unique of its kind.

Upon these grounds he declined to follow the good example set by the Maharaja of Jaipur, and devote a portion of his entertainment fund to relieving his subjects' misery; but it, as we can well believe, the Prince preferred the course pursued in Jaipur, it would have been better to avoid entirely the parts of the country affected with scarcity, as Ajmer was avoided.

Mr. Abbott's point of view is tersely expressed:

This was the second durbar I assisted at, through no fault of mine, and I hope it will be the last I shall feel under the necessity of inflicting on the reader.

Similarly at the time of the visit to Calcutta, he records a yard-long list of entertainments, and then decided to spend his time in studying Calcutta and its people "for that might be instructive and even entertaining." Thus the royal visit bulks very small in this book, which is ostensibly devoted to the Prince's tour, and instead we get a moving panorama of all the provinces and peoples of India, from the independent mountaineers of the North-West Frontier to the sleek and oily Babu of Calcutta, and from the silk-clad, laughter-loving Burman to the dreamy, plaintive peoples of Southern India.

In this field of study, Mr. Abbott is at his ease, and displays a sympathy which is elsewhere absent from his book. He is naturally interested, too, in such abstract questions as the effect of Japan's victory over Russia upon Indian feeling:

Dreams are now dreamed in Hindustan of a new civilisation, wholly Eastern and untainted by the coarse materialism of the West, to which India will supply the thought, China the ethics, and Japan the artistic expression.

It is a curious irony to find such a reflection resulting from the journey of India's future overlord.

Standard.—In these days royalty travels so often and so far that the journeys of kings and princes make less impression than was the case only a few years ago. Many things, for example, have happened since the Prince of Wales left the shores of Britain last October to begin his tour in the East. There have been political shocks and agitations, as well as those of Nature; ministries have risen and fallen, nations have once or twice seemed on the edge of war, and one great State, at least, was threatened with revolution. Royal movements, too, have been frequent, and the attention of the world has been attracted to the tour of the Duke of Connaught in South Africa, the interesting mission of Prince Arthur to Japan and his homeward voyage, and the visit of His Majesty the King to South-Eastern Europe. The Prince of Wales himself has been in Egypt and Greece since he left India. Nevertheless, the significance of His Royal Highness's progress through our Eastern Empire should not be undervalued; and the ceremonial welcome which is being prepared for the Prince by the City of London shows that the mercantile and financial community understands and appreciates the service which the Heir to the Throne has rendered. There is a natural temptation to see in the journey of the Prince and his consort through India a series of events and episodcs chiefly of personal and picturesque interest. But those who are acquainted with Indian politics and the conditions of Indian society are well aware that the visit had other and more serious aspects. India, just now, in common with the rest of Asia, is in a transitional state. The new world and the old have come into contact, if not exactly into conflict, here as elsewhere. Modern progress, modern industrialism, and modern mechanical inventions have begun to affect the ancient fabric of Eastern society, and to threaten changes in institutions and customs which have survived through the wars and revolutions of centuries. All the invaders and conquerors of India, from the Scythians to the Mahrattas, left the substratum of society—the millions of the peasantry—almost untouched; the common man lived under Warren Hastings very much as he had lived under the contemporaries of Alexander the Great. But the locomotive, the telegraph, the spinning-machine, the power-loom, and the printing-press are doing more to modify his habits and mould his thoughts than the great kings and great soldiers of the past. The railway alone has done much to break down caste distinctions, to soften local differences, and to give to the inhabitants of the various states and provinces a dim consciousness of unity such as they never before possessed in the whole course of their history. Nor can it be doubted that the awakening of Japan and the result of the Manchurian war have made their influence felt within our own Eastern territories, as in every other part of the Asiatic continent. What direction these shifting and crossing currents will ultimately take, it would be hazardous to predict. In the meanwhile, there have been many signs of a certain ferment in men's minds in India—a certain restlessness on which the agitators and the demagogues are only too eager to play. In such circumstances, nothing could be more valuable than to emphasise, in a dignified and striking fashion, that stability and reserved force of which the Imperial Throne is the symbol. To the great majority of the inhabitants of India it is something more. Whatever may be their attitude towards the Government, they are Monarchists by sentiment and tradition. They believe in personal rule, and "the divinity that doth hedge a king" still shines in their eyes with a lustre that it, perhaps, no longer retains in the West. The journey of the Prince of Wales was worth taking if only because it showed that the people of India, in all their ranks and gradations, are loyal to the Throne. Nowhere did the royal travellers fail to receive a cordial and even demonstrative welcome; and the enthusiasm was nowhere more pronounced than in Calcutta itself, the centre of the Swadeshi agitation and the home of the most virulent native critics of the administrative system under which India lives. Nothing could have been more timely and serviceable than the appearance among the Indian people of the representative of the Power and the Dynasty which stand above all local politics and sectional differences. The lesson was well and gracefully taught by the august visitors, not without much labour and considerable strain to themselves, for a succession of pageants and public ceremonies, prolonged over several months, in the intervals of constant travelling, and amid many rapid changes of scene and climate, was a more trying experience than often falls to the lot of royal personages, even in these exacting days, when royalty is always expected to be hard at work. The cheerfulness, tact, and unfailing good temper of the Prince and Princess carried them through the protracted ordeal, and left pleasant memories among all classes of their future Indian and Anglo-Indian subjects, which will endure for many a year to come. It is only right that they should be received on their return with the tributes that are due to those who have carried out a truly Imperial mission with ability and success.

8TH MAY 1906.

Birmingham Daily Post.—The return of the King almost coincident with that of the Heir-Apparent and his Consort, marks once more the full tide of social and political life in the capital. Queen Alexandra, it is true, yet lingers in sunny Italy, in company with Princess Victoria, but the arrival home of these members of the Royal Family is not likely to be long delayed. Much interest naturally attaches to the return of the Prince of Wales from his tour of the Great Dependency, and it is impossible to evade reminiscence of the similar journey made by his present Majesty thirty years ago. On that occasion, whether it is that the world generally was more quiescent then than now, or whether the enormously-increased facilities for the diffusion of news make things seem livelier to-day, the visit of the Heir to the Throne to our gorgeous Asiatic appanage riveted public attention more closely than has that just concluded. We do not attribute any importance to this. The loyalty of Indian potentates and people to the British Crown was never more conspicuously displayed than during this tour. Everywhere the Prince and Princess have been received with the utmost enthusiasm. The best that India could give—and India's best is something to remember—has been freely offered, and, it is satisfactory to note, as frankly and cordially accepted. In this respect, indeed, the Prince of Wales is the true son of his Father, who may claim, if anyone may, never to have made a diplomatic mistake in his necessarily extended intercourse with royal and political personages, both at home and abroad. Fresh examples of the unerring employment of this wonderful faculty might doubtless be found could we but know the complete history of events in high diplomatic quarters during the past few weeks. We need not, however, indulge in speculation, inasmuch as the results, presumably, are sufficiently apparent. At the present moment Great Britain, so far from retaining her former position of splendid isolation, has, thanks largely to the consummate diplomacy of King Edward, more than half Europe at her back in the dispute with Turkey. Germany, as expressed by her Press, disclaims any intention of taking up an attitude hostile to this country, and the allegiance of France, Russia, and Italy is beyond dispute. We must needs, therefore, look upon the stay of our Monarch on the Continent as having accomplished the dual aim of combining business with pleasure to a degree supremely successful. On the one hand, accordingly, we see the bonds of Empire more strongly forged by the Royal tour in India, and on the other we cannot overlook the fact that to-day England stands more prominently forward than for many years previously as the leader among European States. Thus we may fairly draw the conclusion that the holidays of Royalty nowadays tend not only towards the consolidation of Empire, but also to the extension of international influence.

Daily Graphic.—The Prince and Princess of Wales are sure of a loyal and hearty welcome on their return from the East, and the British public will recognise that the Indian tour has been no mere pleasure trip. Their Royal Highnesses, who left England on October 19th, have been travelling in India and Burma ever since, seeing more of the country than was possible when the King, then Prince of Wales, visited India thirty years ago. From the Khyber Pass, of stirring memories, to Mandalay, the Heir to the Throne has everywhere been received by the Indian princes and the people with unmistakable signs of loyalty. There is no doubt that the bonds between the Indian people and ourselves have been strengthened by the Royal tour, and the unfailing tact and courtesy of the Prince in his reception of the representatives of the great families of India. The tour has been marked by many brilliant reviews, banquets, and receptions, but the loyalty of the Rajas and of the people to the British Crown must have gratified the Prince as much as it has pleased all well-wishers of the Indian people. In bidding farewell to the Viceroy, the Prince said that he would never forget the greetings of India and Burma, or the "loving regard of the people for the King." That regard has doubtless been strengthened by the Royal tour, and the arduous journeyings of the Prince and Princess should bear fruit in the future.

Daily Mail.—There are people who profess to believe that the office of princes is a splendid sinecure. Those who affect this heresy would do well to study the recent record of members of the Royal Family. The King has just returned from a holiday, in which we may be sure that the business of State formed part of his pleasure, and that in Greece, as well as in France, and Italy, the influence of his strong personality will not be without advantage.

The Prince and Princess of Wales, who are back from a more extended tour, have earned peculiar distinction as travellers. They have seen more of the Empire than any of their predecessors. Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and Canada were the countries of their first Imperial mission. India, Burma, and Egypt have completed the pilgrimage. In these Colonies and dependencies they have spent more than a year, and have been brought into close personal association with the people, and with those who are directly responsible for their government. They have seen not merely historic cities, but the conditions of life among their future subjects. The Indian tour differs in many respects from the Colonial. The people are widely divergent in thought and in custom, and it is not easy to generalise about a continent with three hundred million inhabitants. But as to the effect of the Royal visit there can be no doubt. The personal element appeals with overwhelming force to the Hindu, and the very presence of the Prince and Princess supplied that incentive to Oriental sympathy and imagination.

A native station-master expressed in my hearing the popular sentiment—in words that would sound profane on other lips—"We cannot see God but we can see the Shahzadah." An American bishop with a quarter of a century's experience of India interpreted the feeling in Western phraseology: "The people have been greatly interested. But what is of greater importance than passing curiosity is that when the Prince and Princess come to the throne the natives of India will always remember that they came among them. That is a valuable asset for the future." As for the Princess—her interest and her energy have never flagged, and her eagerness to learn and to see with her own eyes the life of the Hindus has won the affection of the zenanas. The women of India declare that she is indeed—as she said in Bombay—their "sister," for "did she not leave her children in order to come thousands of leagues to see us."

That the journey has involved no little endurance may be inferred from the mere record of travel. Eight thousand eight hundred and seven miles by rail in India and Burma; twenty-eight nights—to say nothing of days—passed in trains; changes of climate—from the damp furnace of Bombay to the snows of Quetta—these are facts that may give a faint idea of the physical strain. To this the Prince added no fewer than fifty speeches, and a multitude of ceremonies that often kept him busy till midnight. Despite these exertions and the wear and tear of fugitive travel. Their Royal Highnesses have been in excellent health—better, indeed, than many of the members of their suite.

In six arduous months the Prince kept every appointment save one—and that a state banquet which his physician sternly forbade him to attend, as he was but recovering from a slight attack of gastritis brought about by very indifferent fish. This record is conclusive testimony to his powers of endurance, as well as to his eagerness to discharge the duties of his high position. There have, of course, been intervals of rest, which His Royal Highness devoted to sport. He shot his first tiger in the State where the King won his first pelt; but, greatly to his disappointment, his opportunity of following big game on an elephant in Nepal was destroyed by an outbreak of cholera. The Army, too, gave him recreation as well as pleasure, for at Rawal Pindi he saw troops that must have appealed strongly to the military instincts of his race.

On the frontier the keen interest of the Princess was not less remarkable than that of His Royal Highness. The journey through the Khyber—that bare and rugged desile upon every crag of which history, from the time of Alexander the Great, is written in blood—greatly impressed the Royal visitors. And at Quetta—under the guidance of General Smith-Dorrien—they completed their experience. From the snow-crowned barrier they looked into the forbidden land of the Afghans, and realised in the distant outpost of Chaman how great is the charge committed to the wardens of the Empire.

These are among the memories that the Prince and Princess bring back to England—memories that life weaves into experience for the rulers of States. And not less vivid than these views of the frontier will be the memory of those vast multitudes who, from Bombay to Calcutta, and from Madras to Quetta—in Native States and in provinces under our rule—watched with growing enthusiasm the progress of the son and daughter of the Shahzadah. That is, indeed—as the Bishop said—a valuable asset for Prince as well as for people.

To this company of the Odyssey must be added the Duke of Connaught. He too, is back from travels extending from the Cape to the Zambesi and the Great Lakes. The Duke is eminent as a soldier, and has proved his capacity by hard work in India and other parts of the Empire. South Africa, with its recent echoes of strife, must have awakened memories and have shown how dark and dangerous is the path that the soldier makes for the Statesman. He has seen a State in transition, and has realised some difficulties that are not visible from the Clock Tower of Westminster.

Prince Arthur follows in the steps of his father. He, too, is a soldier, and has entered on the toil of princes. His visit to Japan has shown him in a new light, for to win the admiration of our allies one must be diplomatist as well as courtier. The Japanese have long desired to welcome a member of the Royal Family, and even hoped that the Prince and Princess of Wales would extend their tour eastward as far as Tokio. In Prince Arthur of Connaught they found a worthy substitute. From Japan to Canada—and in six months the circle of the world had been made by members of the Royal Family.

Evening Standard and St. James's Gazette.—The Prince and Princess of Wales are sure to have a hearty welcome on their return to London this afternoon. The enthusiasm will be due in a measure to the popularity of the Royal Family, but in a greater measure to the general consciousness that a notable undertaking has been performed in a manner worthy of the traditions of British rule in India. Strong as are the ties of loyalty and interest which bind the Colonies and Dependencies to the Empire, they cannot but be strengthened by such visits as the King paid to India many years ago when he was

Prince of Wales, and as his son, following in his footsteps, has just completed. The Englishman at home, many as are his opportunities of realising the personalities of government, never loses an opportunity of seeing his rulers. How much stronger must be the desire of the peoples who, living under the British flag thousands of miles away, have so few chances of seeing any personification of the overlordship they recognise!

Morning Advertiser.—The King's return to London will be followed by the return of the Prince and Princess of Wales to-day. The King has not been very far away, and his absence has not been associated with any of his ceremonial duties. The Prince and Princess left London on the 19th of October, more than six months ago, and have been far, and during the greater part of the time have been engaged in a Royal progress through India and Burmah, which, whatever amusement and interest it may have afforded (and no doubt they were very great), was in the main a ceremonial affair, of the highest consequences to the Empire. That it can have been altogether free from worries and anxieties is hardly to be supposed, but neither to the Prince nor to the Princess has the performance of a public duty ever seemed irksome, and it may well be hoped that they return as much reinvigorated and refreshed as if they had undertaken and pursued this great tour for pure pleasure. The solid, serious importance of their journey remains none the less great. It has been a complete and most brilliant success. They have done for India what no one else could have done, and have done it as well as possible. The great Indian Empire which we administer is made up of many heterogeneous elements, and much of the nature of our rule and influence among its divers princes and peoples must remain a mystery to those of us at home who have never been brought in actual contact with it. But that the British Raj gains incalculably from the visible presence among those who willingly submit to it of a Prince and Princess who come so near to the personification of it as the heir apparent of the Emperor of India and his consort is beyond all doubt or question. In India men have it constantly before their minds that they are under no careless or callous government, but the deep personal interest in them which has been shown by the Prince and Princess of Wales brings home to them more completely and truly the sense that the great power they acknowledge is something more than the cold beneficence of a remote abstraction, and sympathetic and gracious as well as just and stern. The Prince and Princess have doubtless also found that they had much to learn, and the Empire has been strengthened by the close touch into which they have been brought with so large and important a part of it. The welcome they will receive to-day however, will be something more than an acknowledgment of the brilliant success with which they have performed an arduous public duty. We are very glad to have them back again; and London and the whole country has innumerable grounds for giving them a most hearty welcome home.

Newcastle Daily Chronicle.—His Majesty King Edward arrived safely at Victoria Station yesterday, and the Renown, with the Prince and Princess of Wales on board, left Portland for Spithead. Thus both King and heir apparent are welcomed back after their wanderings in foreign climes. The Prince and Princess of Wales may claim, of course, the greater fame as travellers, for they have been away for some six months, during which they have rendered their features familiar to thousands of our Asiatic subjects and stimulated the loyalty of the millions dwelling in our vast Indian dependency. The fact that there was a change of viceroys when they arrived at Bombay, and that other causes compelled the modification of their touring arrangements, threatened to deprive the royal visit of the full success all hoped it would achieve. Luckily it was not marred by any untoward incident, and from first to last its results have been everything that could be desired. King Edward and Queen Alexandra have in their turn not only enjoyed a very pleasant holiday, but it has been fruitful of good things. We have only to turn to the reception which His Majesty met with in France to realise how splendidly the cause of the entente cordiale has been promoted by him.

Western Daily Mercury.—Portsmouth was disappointingly normal in its general demeanour during the forenoon. The weather, indeed, has been quite sufficient to account for this. It was of that character to call forth all the philosophy of a Mark Tapley. Ashore it was bleak, drizzling, grey, and altogether as dismal as the dreariest misanthrope could have desired. At sea a dense smother of steamlike mist obscured the range of vision to most perplexing limits. People shook their heads and agreed that it was a great pity. For the Prince and Princess of Wales it was a most cheerless home-coming, and for themselves it meant the disappointment of an imposing pageant spoiled. During the early morning it was reported that the fog was so heavy down Channel that the Renown and the Terrible, together with the whole of the Channel Fleet, would continue to lie snug in Portland Roads until it had cleared. But rumour is never more a lying jade than in connection with such occasions as these.

In the afternoon Portsmouth awoke from its humdrum routine as if by magic. The occasion of this sudden bustle of excitement was a report that the Channel Fleet had come into Spithead from Sandown Bay, where it had been anchored. The foreshore from the old saluting battery to Southsea Castle became crowded with spectators. Flags in profusion were brought forth and run aloft. The finishing touch to this gala-like transformation was put by the breaking forth of the sun from behind the pearl-like shroud which had thus far obscured it, into a large and widening lagoon of clear blue sky.

Yet the crowds on the sea front had to long possess their souls in patience before their curiosity was satisfied. True, the drizzle-laden sea fog of the morning had thinned considerably but there was not enough wind to disperse the vaporous banks altogether, and the horizon remained narrowed down to within half a league until about four o'clock. Then the haze slowly withdrew into the offing, and looming shadows of the Spithead Forts came stealing forth in clear outline with the Isle of Wight shores beyond dawning to twice their normal proportions in the illusive atmosphere. The rolling-up of the sea smother revealed a little string of destroyers cautiously approaching Portsmouth from the eastwards, but no signs of the Channel Fleet.

Still it was definitely known that Sir Arthur Wilson had left Portland early in the morning, and that the Renown and Terrible were following the Battle Squadron some hours astern. So the ever swelling crowd settled itself down to wait and to stare. Those who had glasses glued them to their eyes with the fixity of stone images, and those who had not, bartered with longshoremen for a peep through quaint wooden telescopes of the Nelsonian period. In the saluting battery a group of khaki-clad gunners were getting the twelve-pounders ready to war forth their adamantine welcome on the morrow. The railway jetty station was patched into gaudiness with flags and red baize. Few people knew that on that bedecked platform during the drizzle of the earlier day had quietly alighted from a saloon attached to an ordinary train Prince Edward and Prince Albert, and Princess May.

The juvenile Royal trio were met by the Commander-in-Chief and Lady Archibald Douglas, and driven to Admiralty House, where they will stay until the Renown comes into harbour to-morrow.

It was somewhere about five o'clock when a wreathing of brownish smoke from beyond the long, low spur of Bemburgh

Point sent a cry of "Here they are" running through the crowd. Almost immediately afterwards the procession of grey warships, but dimly silhouetted against the misty silver gleams of sea and sky, came drawing out into view. Changing course so as to wheel round the Nab lightship, the phantasmal pageant grew rapidly in size and distinctness. They were in column of line ahead. Admiral Wilson, in the Exmouth, led one division, being followed by the battleships Prince George, Ocean, and Swiftsure, and the cruisers Dido and Juno. Rear-Admiral Groome, with his flag in the Albemarle, led the second division, and following him were the battleships Illustrious, Montagu, and Glory, and the cruiser Topaz. With the faultless precision of station-keeping which is so infallibly characteristic of a British war squadron, this stately fleet came gliding across the Spithead tide dance. Then, when they were looming large enough for the red distinguishing rings on their funnels to be almost discernible to the naked eye, the towering vessels again swerved from their course. A few minutes more and a string of bunting soared to the signal yardarm of the Exmouth. Simultaneously a fountain-like jet of spray burst from the stem of every ship, followed by an abrupt halt. The leviathans swung in leisurely unanimity. The stream of the tide tautened their cables, and the premier fleet of England lay at rest. Then came another long spell of waiting for the great event of the day—the arrival in the Portsmouth roadstead of the Royal battleship-yacht and her consort. The watchers lining the sea-front were like the little peach in the popular song, they grew and grew. Many a time and oft did they sight the Renown before she came into view at all. Every shadow that came shaping out of the hazy remoteness set loose a babel of tongues only waiting for the provocation to cheer.

A frequent interchange of bunting was carried on between the battleships. The coastguards on look-out duty at various points were ceaselessly appealed to as to the meaning of all this signalling, but they merely pursed their lips and looked profound, scorning with contemptuous silence the occasional audible doubts as to whether they understood all the flag-talk themselves. There was something really dramatic in the suddenness with which the Renown made her appearance after all. It still wanted half an hour to sunset gunfire, when, before the staring multitudes fairly realised it, there she lay plain in view as a frosted silver carving, emerging elfin-like from out of space. Doubtless the fact of her being white-hulled was the explanation for this sudden revelation of her presence. She had blended so illusively with the dimness of the horizon down to the point when she suddenly leapt forth, as it were, like the swift dawning of a magic picture upon a blank screen. Then, indeed, did the far-reaching concourse give loose to its voice, and for full five minutes there swept forth such a volume of cheering as must have reached to the Royal battleship herself.

Headed by a Trinity pilot yacht of such dwarf-like proportions as not to be noticeable, and followed at a cable's length astern by the towering, four-funnelled cruiser which has so faithfully kept her company in her far wanderings, the graceful Renown came along in brave style towards the anchorage. Through a powerful glass it became possible to presently detect the figure of the Prince on the fore bridge in the undress uniform of a British admiral, wearing his boat cloak, with the Princess by his side warmly swathed in dark apparel.

Before the vessel brought up they descended to the quarter-deck, beneath the awning over which they were lost to view from the shore. The Royal standard flew from the main, the flag of an admiral from the fore, and the white ensign from the peak of the Renown.

All the vessels of the Channel Fleet manned ship as she came swiftly threading her way across the placid green sea.

No salute was fired, by the express wish of the Prince, that no formal courtesies should be paid until landing time to-morrow. The Renown and Terrible steamed steadily on until about midday between the Spit Fort and the entrance to Portsmouth Harbour, and a considerable distance ahead of where the Channel Fleet lay. Here both ships let go their anchors simultaneously, taking up positions abreast of each other. The clocks ashore were chiming the hour of seven as the Royal war-yacht and her escort came to rest. Once again the crowd gave vent to its demonstrative loyalty before deigning to disperse. Then a few minutes later the sunset gun rolled forth from the old Victory. All flags vanished from the stirless pageant as to the touch of a vast invisible hand. Simultaneously an array of riding lights winked forth, and the first brief act in the Royal welcome home was finished.

Later the Channel Fleet weighed about half-an-hour after the Renown had anchored, and proceeded further up the Spithead anchorage, so as to be in position to salute and man ship to-morrow, when the Royal battleship proceeds into the harbour.

The King, on board the special turbine steamer Invidia, arrived at Dover at 4.5 yesterday afternoon, and was loudly cheered by the thousands of spectators who had gathered on the pier to witness His Majesty's arrival, hats and handkerchiefs being waved. The King, who was standing in full view under the captain's bridge, acknowledged the salutations. He was wearing a dark overcoat and a bowler hat, and looked well.

As His Majesty stepped ashore rousing cheers went up from the crowd awaiting his arrival.

Passing through a guard, furnished by the Buffs, he was met by Colonel Owen, in the absence of General Grant, the Mayor of Dover, Mr. W. W. Burkett, and Captain Chambre, the King's Harbourmaster, being also among those present.

9TH MAY 1906.

Daily News.—The weather to-day has been superb. From an early hour all Portsmouth has been agog, the return of the Prince and Princess having been made the occasion almost of a public holiday. The jetties at Gosport, the Hard at Portsea, the floating bridge and the piers and the esplanade at Southsea were packed with masses of struggling humanity. Only a privileged few were permitted within the Dockyard, where the landing took place. Silhouetted against the sky-line to the southward were the hulls of the Channel Fleet in two lines, with the Renown and her consort, the Terrible, leading.

As the time for moving off approached, the men on each of the battleships massed "forwards," the handy men in blue serge and white straws making a pleasant contrast to the scarlet tunics and pith helmets worn by the Marines. Exactly at half-past ten the big guns in No Man's Fort spat out the first shots of welcome.

Two torpedo-boat destroyers darted hither and thither, and Submarines A 11 and B 4 performed interesting evolutions, circling round to the wonderment of the thousands of sightseers.

At 11 o'clock the Renown and the Terrible weighed anchor preparatory to entering the harbour, this fact being communicated to the fleet by a salvo of guns from the Castle Fort at Southsea. In a moment the two lines of battleships were spurting fire and smoke in a general salute, during which the two cruisers moved off, led by the Trinity pilot-boat, Irene. Inside the harbour Nelson's old flagship, the Victory, Quorn, Blake, Sutlej, Colossus, Euchantress and the Alberta added their share to the general din with shots of greeting. All along the shore ringing cheers could be heard.

Slowly the leviathans passed up by the harbour station and on to the railway jetty in the dockyard. The Prince and Princess could clearly be discerned on the bridge. With them, peering over the nettings and looking intensely happy, were the little princes and princess. On the jetty itself, thickly carpeted with red baize, were ranged a guard of honour of 200 men, 100 sailors from the Excellent, and 100 marines from Forton Barracks.

As the Renown came alongside the Royal Marine band struck up the National Anthem, the Prince, who was in his uniform as Vice-Admiral of the Fleet, standing on the bridge meanwhile at the "salute." The three little princes gravely followed the example of their father.

The Terrible came up to the wharf, and in passing she "manned ship," the band playing the National Anthem. Then, led by the band, the hundreds of men massed on deck and clustering on the ladders, the netting, and the fighting tops sang lustily "God Bless the Prince of Wales," followed by hearty cheers.

When the red-carpeted gangway was brought in board on the Renown, the Prince and Princess came aft under the awning to receive their friends. The first to go aboard were the Prince and Princess Alexander of Teck, who were greeted most affectionately. The Duke and Duchess and Prince Francis of Teck followed.

Before the Royal party left the ship the Mayor and Corporation of Portsmouth went aboard and presented an address of welcome.

The Prince, replying, said: "The Princess of Wales I desire to thank you sincerely for the kind words with which you in the name of the inhabitants of Portsmouth welcome us to-day on our return to England. We earnestly trust that the good results which you anticipate from our visit to India may be realised. We are thankful to God that we have returned in safety to our beloved country, and in the enjoyment of that good health with which we have been blessed during our travels."

The Princess looked extremely well, although dressed in a sombre black costume with a black picture hat.

At the last moment a handy-man rushed down the gangway with the Princess's paroquets, which had nearly been left behind, and the train moved off amid more gunfire and ringing cheers.

Their Royal Highnesses with their children arrived at Victoria Station at five o'clock, and were met by the King and several other members of the Royal Family.

His Majesty drove into the station in the uniform of a Field Marshal. The Duke and Duchess of Connaught and Princess Patricia, Prince and Princess Christian and Princess Victoria, Princess Henry of Battenberg and Princess Ena, the Duke and Duchess of Fife, the Duchess of Argyll, Lord Spencer, Lord Roberts, Lord Tweedmouth, Lord Curzon, Mr. Herbert Gladstone, and Mr. John Morley were also present.

Prompt to time the train came into the station, the engine bearing the Prince of Wales' feather in front. The band played "God Bless the Prince of Wales," and as Their Royal Highnesses stepped on to the platform cheers were raised from those in the station and from many onlookers perched high on neighbouring roofs. Some time was spent in affectionate greetings before the Royal party drove off. A large throng had gathered outside the station, and the cheers which they raised were taken up all along the route, via Hyde Park Corner and Piccadilly, to Marlborough House.

The King, on leaving the station, went to Buckingham Palace.

At first there was a suggestion of making the return to London a replica of that from Australia, when the Royal travellers arrived amid all the observances of full State ceremonial, including the lining of the route through the metropolis by troops. But the idea was found in some respects to be impracticable, and was abandoned. As a sort of compromise between a State and private reception it was determined to line the route with police, to post guards of honour at the arrival station and at Marlborough House, and to supply a captain's escort of Royal Horse Guards.

All the clubs and many of the business and private houses along the route were resorted to by sightseers, and several buildings were flying flags or displaying bunting with the word "Welcome" inscribed upon it.

Globe.—After six months' absence in that wonderful Asiatic Empire which Anglo-Saxon energy, enterprise, and courage have built up and cemented together, the Prince and Princess of Wales yesterday received a welcome which, whether for heartiness or for spontaneity, has seldom been surpassed. It was a demonstration of genuine popular affection, with no small measure of gratitude for good work well done added. From beginning to end, the Royal travellers have loyally discharged every tittle of duty included in an extensive programme, and amplified many of the original items at no slight inconvenience to themselves. There was no symptom of perfunctoriness in this campaign of courtesy, but, at the same time, due care was taken to preserve that atmosphere of exalted authority which is so essential in the case of the proud Indian aristocracy. There is no more delicate task than that on occasions of the sort, Maharajahs and Nawabs are ever on the watch to detect infractions of dignity or of etiquette. There have been Viceroy's who made it their constant practice to flout Indian sentiment of that character, and to conduct themselves at Durbars and other receptions in a supercilious and contemptuous manner. No such blame can be charged against the illustrious tourists who gladdened London yesterday. While courteous to a degree in the performance of the difficult labour with which they were entrusted, they were never unmindful for a moment of the dignity attaching to them as representatives of the King-Emperor. And the result is that the great Indian nobles and the great Indian masses have jointly testified in numberless ways that their personal attachment to the Throne of England has received a revivifying and strengthening stimulus of an enduring character. There is no question about that; Anglo-Indian and native journals are at one in asserting that the Royal tour has produced an excellent effect throughout the peninsula itself, and to quite an equal degree in Burmah.

Naturally, and necessarily, it was accompanied by a good deal of what superfine people pretend to despise as "glitter." It would show much closer knowledge of Asia and her multitudinous nationalities and creeds were they to applaud the observance of pomp and ceremony on all occasions of the sort. Asiatics, whether in India or elsewhere, always expect that from their rulers; and when it is withheld, they attribute the omission either to parsimony or to indifference to the longings of the ruled. But charm of manner is of even greater consequence than splendour of display when coupled, as during the Royal itinerary, they carry all before them. It would be both invidious and difficult to apportion between the Heir Apparent and his fair Consort the degrees in which their possession of this natural gift won for them respectively the love as well as the homage of three hundred millions of human beings. While the great feudatories were, perhaps, chiefly impressed by the warm yet dignified cordiality of the Shahzadah, and the evident sincerity of the feelings he expressed behind the purdah, it is well known that the Princess's charm of manner created the deepest impression. Many anecdotes are current on that phase of the Royal tour; all reflect the highest credit on the gracious tact of the illustrious lady when catechised by the secluded beauties of the zenana. As their wont is when personally visited by European ladies of high or low station, they frequently touched this or that article of Royal raiment, and made mental notes of whatever added, in their opinion, to her attractiveness. And so, there was unbending on both sides, and it is a safe prediction that the children and grandchildren of the purdah ladies will treasure in their minds that they are descended from those who, years ago, were honoured by a personal visit of the Shahzadah's Consort.

The six months' peregrination was, in short, a brilliant success from first to last; that will assuredly be the pronouncement of history. Who can sufficiently admire the solicitude shown by the Royal travellers in abandoning their projected visits to Cashmere and other interesting localities included in their original scheme of itinerary when they learned that the visit might entail suffering on the visited? They displayed the same consideration for the poorer States and their rulers when they made it known that no gifts of a costly character, such as are customary at durbars, would be either looked for or accepted. For a short time, some of the great chiefs took it almost as an affront that the immemorial custom of presenting nuzzurs was to be violated. But when it was explained to them that the coming infraction of etiquette had for its purpose the saving of semi-bankrupt treasuries from collapse, and the prevention of the fiscal extortion which would otherwise have had to be employed, they recognised that the British Raj had established a new and better tradition than had hitherto existed. But space would be lacking to mention in detail the many ways in which the Royal missionaries have conferred lasting benefits, both on the people of India and on the nation which has made itself responsible for their just and kindly governance. This much may be said, however: now that they have returned to English life and its unceasing obligations, they will have the pleasure of remembering that, when they quitted the land of their long sojourn, there was every prospect of economic prosperity and political tranquility from the Afghan border to Cape Comorin.

Lancashire Daily Post.—After six months or more of "the golden climes and starry skies" of India, moving continually amid scenes of the most splendid pageantry, it must have seemed peculiarly English to the returning Prince and Princess to encounter a fog in the channel on Monday and to be accompanied by rain with sunshine yesterday. But in the spirit in which Mr. Kipling makes one of his famous Soldiers Three sigh upon the burning Indian plains for the peculiar and composite smells of Vauxhall, we do not think the Royal couple appreciated their climatic welcome less because it was not in its best holiday garb. For they knew well that the kindly welcome of a whole people awaited them and the cheers of the thousands which broke out here and there were but typical of what millions would have raised could they also have been present. The Prince and Princess of Wales have been slowly gaining in the esteem and confidence of the nation by the display of those characteristics which have made their august parents so universally revered and beloved, while they in turn have but carried on the noble tradition of their parent, whose memories are the priceless heritage of a whole people for all time.

It might be said that we could not now have rulers of the type that immediately preceded them; that the times have changed and that the rulers must necessarily change with them. That would, of course, be true. But there is nothing in the Constitution to prevent the country being afflicted with a "roi fainéant," with a mere pleasure-seeker, possessed of a rooted incapacity either to rule himself or others. But that distressing prospect lies wholly beyond the political horizon so far as it stretches to-day. There is no flattery in saying that the Prince of Wales is showing already the aptitudes for making a monarch of the great type of his royal father. The effect of his tour in India, "spatchcocked" though it was by mischance between two such disturbing native issues as the Army reorganisation and the Bengal partition schemes, has had only a beneficial effect. It has obviously deepened the personal attachment to himself and the loyalty to the Throne of all the feudatory chieftains, as well as drawn closer the ties to the British Suzerain of the other heads of Indian States. Divided as the country is into hostile and often factious races and religions, with the caste system to render the cleavage still more sharp and rigid, with social and political ideals many of them offering the greatest obstacles to a true solidarity, the deeper sentiment of country in the people seems working through to a political unity which may in time overleap all these barriers and present us with an India in all essentials homogeneous. The problem whether this new political fusion, best typified perhaps in the Indian National Congress, tends to engaging the anxious thought of many high Anglo-Indian officials. Some see in it a pointed menace to the British rule. They speak of the unrest which the Japanese victories have excited and find sinister confirmations of their forebodings in the intercourse between some of the natives and the Japanese. Their conclusions, quickened by their fears, offer as the only remedy a policy of reaction.

But if the mischief existed other than in the imagination of the alarmists, such methods would only have the effect of seating it deeper. Their outlook is so narrow that they are unable to perceive that what is going on in India is going on under different forms in almost all countries where individual liberty is restricted. It is part of the vast world-movement inspired by the examples of the great free countries and brought to a head by a larger, more penetrating, and more exigent civilisation. The Prince of Wales, in one of his speeches, suggested the true remedy. Promote in every form—educationally, morally, and materially—the true interests of the Indian people. Prepare them for undertaking larger responsibilities. Let them co-operate more fully in the making of the laws, and they will co-operate more effectively in seeing that they are obeyed. It is a great deal to know that His Royal Highness has come back to his native country with ideas widened by his tour. Mere breadth of view is not always synonymous with sound convictions. But the Prince of Wales has cultivated a habit of thoughtful inquiry into social conditions. He is moved by a desire to see a greater personal well-being among all the peoples that own allegiance to the British Throne. His high position gives him unusual powers of initiative, and perhaps even greater powers of stimulus. We have no doubt, judging by his public utterances, that these powers will always be exercised, as are those of His Majesty, for the greatest good of the greatest number; for all, in fact, that makes for what is broadly called the public weal. Personal liking deepened by a sense of the seriousness with which the royal couple view their responsibilities and their readiness to make due sacrifices to adequately discharge them, entered into the warm feelings yesterday of the nation in greeting their safe and happy return.

Morning Post.—After an absence of some seven months their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales arrived in London yesterday, and, after a warm-hearted reception by the members of the Royal Family at Victoria, drove to Marlborough House amidst abundant signs of public congratulation.

All Englishmen cordially welcome their Royal Highnesses, and are happy to believe that their tour in India was a complete and triumphant success and has added fresh ties of personal affection to the bonds of loyalty and respect which unite the Crown of England to the King's Indian subjects. The incidents of the Royal tour were fully and graphically described in these columns at the time when they took place, and as each event passed our readers were enabled to see how valuable was the Royal visit as a means of presenting to the people of India the personal reality of the rule of the King of England over India.

Amongst the many interesting episodes of the Royal progress, none was more significant than the journey of the Prince of Wales at the Khyber Pass, in which he was escorted only by a bodyguard of Afridi tribesmen. The confidence thus shown in the devotion and chivalry of these warlike mountaineers must have appealed very strongly to the minds of those of our Indian fellow subjects, for whom the rule of England in India means nothing more than the personal sovereignty of a distant overlord. It also appealed strongly to Englishmen at home, and helped them to realise the source and secret of English power in India. On all occasions the Prince showed himself a worthy successor to his illustrious grandmother, whose sympathy for her Indian subjects was not the least of the qualities which made her great amongst English Sovereigns. He appeared, too, as a worthy son of King Edward, whose tour in India is remembered with gratitude and affection by vast numbers of the Indian population. The reception of yesterday is a testimony not only to the affection and admiration entertained for the Prince and Princess by the people of London, but to their keen appreciation of the manner in which Their Royal Highnesses carried out those important objects for which their great journey was undertaken.

Newcastle Daily Chronicle.—On their arrival at Portsmouth yesterday, the Prince and Princess of Wales were accorded a loyal and enthusiastic greeting. The weather, according to reports, was peculiarly favourable to spectacular displays which enhanced the effect of the welcome given to the Royal couple. As Their Royal Highnesses left England on the 19th of October last, they have thus been absent over seven months. After a pleasant voyage they landed at Bombay on the 9th of November meeting with a most demonstrative reception. Mention of the fact that they were received by Lord and Lady Curzon reminds us that during the stay of the royal visitors important changes have taken place in India. In Bombay the Prince and Princess received several influential chiefs in audience, attended many social functions, at which they met representatives of the services and, before leaving the City, laid the foundation stones of a museum to be erected as a memorial of their visit. On leaving Bombay they began what, in the truest sense of the phrase, was a royal journey. The object of their visit to our Eastern Dependency was, of course, to enable Their Royal Highnesses, by a sojourn in the country, to gain personal knowledge of one of the most important parts of that Empire over which, in the natural order of events, they will be called upon to reign. In making the journey which came to an end yesterday the Heir Apparent followed the example set by King Edward, whose visit to India thirty years ago is still remembered as an event which did much to strengthen the ties between the vast populations of our Indian Empire and the seat of Imperial authority and influence. Hardly less remarkable was the reception given to the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, who visited India in 1903 for the purpose of attending the Coronation Durbar held at Delhi, as the representatives of the King and the Royal Family—a function whose scale and grandeur made it the most impressive event in India's recent annals.

Now that they have visited our Eastern Dependency the Prince and Princess of Wales have personal knowledge of all the most important of British possessions. During their stay in India they have visited all the chief centres. It was, of course, impossible for the Royal tour to include the whole of India, but a too exacting regard for the practicable was not allowed to rob the trip either of its utility or impressiveness. The journey was not confined to those Provinces where, comparatively speaking, travelling is easy. The frontier Provinces have also been visited, and in no quarter did the Royal travellers meet with a more hearty greeting. It is, of course, in the outlying regions where our rule is weakest, owing not only to the nature of the country, but owing to distance making contact with the central government less real. There is no region under the British flag where the pioneers of Empire have done a more notable work than in the frontier Provinces of India. Great administrative changes, involving far-reaching consequences, of which we have heard but little, have been resolved upon and carried out. The most recent illustration of projects of that kind was the creation of the North-Western Frontier Province in 1901, which was formed out of the trans-Indus districts of the Punjab, and included the districts of Peshawar and other centres, with several political agencies responsible for the maintenance of order in the tribal country surrounding them. It is only when some issue is raised which becomes a matter of party controversy that we hear of what is being done in India. Perhaps we hear too little. During their sojourn in the East the Prince and Princess of Wales will have added much to their stock of world knowledge, which is much more valuable to those called upon to rule than a mere knowledge of books. They will have been brought into touch with Indian sentiment and opinion, and have come home with enlarged views of men and things. In the course of the Royal tour the Prince has delivered many speeches, and his utterances have produced an excellent impression. He has identified himself with the sports of the Indian nobility and exhibited a lively interest in all that pertains to the welfare of the country. In short, the journey which terminated yesterday will go far to popularise and strengthen British rule in India.

Pall Mall Gazette.—If the official ceremonial with which the Prince and Princess of Wales were welcomed home yesterday was simplicity itself, the popular greeting was unmistakably hearty and spontaneous. It was not merely pleasure at seeing our popular Prince and Princess home once more that inspired the people both of Portsmouth and of London to turn out and cheer. The public have felt, as they have read the accounts of the seven months' tour of the future Emperor of India and his Consort, that they have been doing the Empire's work, and that in two ways. In the first place, the actual visit has brought home the reality of the Imperial connection, in a way which mere abstract ideas can never do, to millions of British subjects. And, furthermore, the personal interest in the Empire which such a tour implies serves—or should serve—as a valuable stimulus to the curiosity and the patriotism of many of us who never realise—or, apparently, attempt to realise—what the Empire is.

Times.—The weather was most propitious yesterday for the disembarkation of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales and for their reception at Portsmouth and journey to London. The bitter winds of the past few weeks have disappeared, and, with brilliant sunshine, the bunting flying ashore and afloat gave an aspect of brightness to the historic town and its environs. The ships both at Spithead and in the harbour had been dressed over all with the white ensign at the mastheads at 8 A.M., but it was not until nearly 11 o'clock that His Majesty's ship Renown lifted her anchor and, preceded by the Trinity yacht Irene and followed by His Majesty's ship Terrible, slowly rounded the Spit buoy and turned to enter the channel leading to Portsmouth. The fleet at Spithead now thundered forth their salute, the advance welcome of the many that Their Royal Highnesses received yesterday, the sound of the guns announcing the completion of their prolonged tour. Tempted by the fine weather and the opportunity of greeting their Royal Highnesses after so long an absence, a multitude of people thronged Southsea beach to see the vessels pass. As the flotilla neared Portsmouth the ships in the harbour were manned and a Royal salute was fired by the ships and the garrison saluting battery. It was just 11-15 when the Renown, flying the standard of the Prince of Wales, passed between the point battery and Fort blockhouse steering for her berth at the south railway jetty, and her white hull came into full view of those assembled there. The harbour at this moment presented a very bright and stirring scene. As the ship neared the jetty a Royal salute was given by the guard of honour, the band playing the National Anthem. The Prince and Princess, with their four elder children. His Royal Highness in the uniform of a vice-admiral, were observed on the forebridge, the children seemingly greatly interested in all that was going on.

Meanwhile full preparations were being carried on the dockyard for the reception. The harbour station and south railway jetty were decorated and a guard of honour was mounted on the latter consisting of 100 seamen from the Excellent and 100 Marines from Forton Barracks, with the band of the Royal Marine Light Infantry. Awaiting the arrival of the Renown were Prince Francis, Prince and Princess Alexander, and the Duchess of Teck, Lady Douglas, Lady Settle, Miss Douglas, and many other ladies, Lord Winchester, Lord-lieutenant of Hampshire, Admiral Sir Archibald Douglas, Commander-in-Chief at Portsmouth, Lieutenant-General Sir Ian Hamilton, General Commanding-in-Chief Southern Division, Major-General Sir H. H. Settle, D.S.O., commanding Portsmouth Defences, Rear-Admiral C. H. Cross, commanding Portsmouth Reserve Division, with their respective staffs, Rear-Admiral Sir H. D. Barry, Admiral-Superintendent of the dockyard, Brigadier-General E. S. Browne, V.C., Commanding 11th Infantry Brigade, Engineer Rear-Admiral J. Pitt, Commodore the Hon'ble W. G. Stopford, Captain A. G. Tate, Captain of the Dockyard, and the other principal officers of the dockyard, and captains and commanding officers of ships in the harbour.

As soon as the Renown was berthed Prince Francis and Prince and Princess Alexander and the Duchess of Teck, Lord Winchester, the Commander-in-Chief and Lady Douglas, Lieutenant-General Sir Ian Hamilton, Major-General Sir H. H. Settle and Lady Settle, and the other rear-admirals and general officers proceeded on board. After greeting the members of the Royal Family Their Royal Highnesses descended to the quarter-deck and received their other visitors. Now took place the most impressive incident of the morning. At 11-45 the Terrible came up the harbour, the whole of her crew of nearly 1,000 men manning the ship, and as she slowly passed the Renown, the crew, accompanied by their band, broke into "God Bless the Prince of Wales." This was followed by three hearty cheers.

After luncheon the same officers mustered on the jetty as were present in the morning. The Mayor and Corporation attended in full state and proceeded on board to present an address of welcome. The Prince of Wales handed to the Mayor a written reply as follows:—

"To the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of Portsmouth.

"Mr. Mayor and Gentlemen,—The Princess of Wales and I desire to thank you sincerely for the kind words with which you in the name of the inhabitants of Portsmouth welcome us to-day on our return to England. We earnestly trust that the good results which you anticipate from our visit to India may be realized. We are thankful to God that we have returned in safety to our beloved country and in the enjoyment of that good health with which we have been blessed during our travels."

Royal honours were rendered when Their Royal Highnesses disembarked just before 3 o'clock, the ships being manned and Royal salutes fired by the ships at Spithead and in the harbour and by the garrison, and guards parading and bands playing the National Anthem. The Prince having inspected the guard of honour and taken leave of the principal officers and ladies, the Royal party entered the train, which left punctually at 3, the crew of the Renown manning the rigging and giving three hearty cheers, twice repeated, on their departure.

During the absence of the Renown no sickness, no accidents, and no deaths have occurred, and all on board are full of their most delightful cruise.

After "divisions" on board the Renown yesterday morning the Prince, in saying "Good-bye" to the officers and men, said:—

"I have never served in a better, smarter, or cleaner ship, or with a better behaved ship's company, and I have served in a good many. I am pleased to tell you that the Admiralty have approved of ten days' special leave to the officers and men of the Renown and Terrible. I wish you all a good time and again I say 'Good-bye.'"

The arrival in London last evening of the Prince and Princess of Wales after an absence of nearly seven months during which period they have completed by a tour through India the task which they began in 1901 of personally visiting every important part of the British dominions, was made the occasion of a great demonstration of loyalty and cordial good will on the part of enormous crowds which had assembled in the neighbourhood of Victoria Station and the thoroughfares through which Their Royal Highnesses passed on their drive to Marlborough House. The route was lined with police; guards of honour were posted both at the station and at Marlborough House, and a captain's escort of Royal Horse Guards attended the Royal travellers. Like the leave-taking on October 19, the reception of Their Royal Highnesses at Victoria was attended with little ceremonial, and occupied less than a quarter of an hour. But the reception could not well have been more cordial or enthusiastic, and the same may be said of the welcome accorded them by the crowds which thronged the streets through which they subsequently passed.

The King who was last to exchange parting salutations with Their Royal Highnesses on their departure, was the first to welcome them on their arrival. His Majesty, who wore the uniform of a Field-Marshal and was attended by Lord Althorp (the Lord Chamberlain), Lord Acton, Colonel the Hon'ble H. C. Legge, and other members of his suite, arrived at the station from Buckingham Palace at ten minutes to 5. He was loudly cheered by the assembled spectators, and as the carriage entered the station a bar of the National Anthem was played by the band of the Grenadier Guards, a detachment of the 3rd Battalion of which regiment formed a guard of honour inside the station. The Princess Royal and the Duke of Fife, the Duke and Duchess of Connaught and Princess Patricia, Prince and Princess Christiana with their two daughters, Princess Victoria and Princess Louise of Schleswig-Holstein, Princess Louise (Duchess of Argyll), and Princess Henry of Battenberg and Princess Ena had preceded the King, and received His Majesty on the crimson-carpeted platform. Before the arrival of the train the King conversed for some minutes with Princess Henry and Princess Ena, who had just returned from Chatham.

Only those possessing the requisite credentials had been allowed to pass the barriers erected at the end of the platform, where a large body of police was stationed. Amongst the privileged spectators within the enclosure were the Secretary of State for India, the Home Secretary, the First Lord of the Admiralty, Lord Curzon, Lord Roberts with his daughters, Lady Ellen and Lady Edwina Roberts; Lady Lansdowne, Lady Langatock, Lady Waterford, Lord Farquhar, Lord Knollys, General Sir Dighton Probyn, V.C., Lord and Lady Ampthill, Admiral of the fleet Sir John Fisher, First and Principal Naval Aide-de-Camp to the King, Sir Fleetwood Edwards, Lord and Lady Chesham, Lord Wenlock, Lord Revelstoke, Mr. Brodric, Sir Walter and Lady Lawrence, the Hon'ble Sidney Greville, Lady Curzon-Wyllie, Canon Teignmouth.

Shore, Mr. Felix Schuster, Sir Maurice Holzmann. Chevalier de Martine, Sir John Maxwell, Lieutenant-General Sir Laurence Oliphant (commanding the London District), with the members of his staff, and the following representatives of the India Office—General Sir John Gordon, Sir John Edge, General Sir Alexander Badoock, Sir William Lee-Warner, Sir David Barr, Sir Dennis FitzPatrick, Mr. Finlay, Lieutenant Colonel Sir W. H. Curzon-Wyllie, Mr. G. Scott, and Mr. Thompson. The railway company was represented by Lord Cottesloe, the chairman, Sir Arthur Otway, the deputy-chairman, Lord Bessborough, and Lord Henry Nevill, directors; and the police authorities by Mr. Henry, the Commissioner, and Major Wodehouse.

The Royal train arrived punctually at 5 o'clock. The King at once stepped forward and entered the saloon, where he privately greeted the Prince and Princess of Wales. In the same saloon were Prince Francis, Prince and Princess Alexander, and the Duchess of Teck. In a few minutes the King and the Prince and Princess of Wales stepped out upon the platform, where they were greeted by the other members of the Royal Family and the assembled company. After the exchange of salutations the King and the Prince of Wales inspected the guard of honour, the band playing meanwhile "God Bless the Prince of Wales." The Prince of Wales wore an Admiral's uniform, and the Princess was in mourning. Both looked extremely well. Before entering their carriage the Prince and Princess shook hands with every member of the reception party and exchanged a few words with Mr. Morley, Lord Curzon, Lord Roberts, and a few others.

At a quarter past 5 the Prince and Princess of Wales with their children entered an open carriage and set out for Marlborough House. The carriage was drawn by four bays and had postilions and outriders, and it was surrounded by an escort of the Royal Horse Guards. As they left the station the band again played the opening bar of "God Bless the Prince of Wales" and loud cheers greeted their appearance in view of the general public. The cheering was continued along the entire route, which was by way of Grosvenor-place, Hyde Park-corner, Piccadilly, and St. James's street. The King left the station a minute or two after the departure of Their Royal Highnesses, and was again loudly cheered. His Majesty returned to Buckingham Palace.

Mr. William Forbes, the general manager of the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company, travelled in charge of the train from Portsmouth, and Mr. George Wright, the station superintendent, had charge of the whole of the arrangements at the station. A handsome basket of flowers had been placed in the Royal saloon by the railway authorities.

A meeting of the special committee appointed by the City Corporation to carry out the arrangements for the reception and entertainment of the Prince and Princess of Wales at the Guildhall on Thursday, the 17th inst., took place at the Guildhall yesterday. Mr. Deputy Millar Wilkinson, the chairman, presiding. It was decided to spend a considerable amount on the decoration of the line of route taken by the Prince and Princess through the City—namely, Fleet-street, Ludgate-circus, Cannon-street, King-street, and Queen-street to the Guildhall, the return journey being through Queen Victoria-street and along the Thames Embankment. Nearly 900 guests will be invited. Among those to whom invitations will be issued will be the members of the Cabinet and the late Ministry. After the Prince has been presented with an address of welcome in the Guildhall Library shortly after 1 o'clock, a déjeuner will be served in the Great Hall, where the Lord Mayor will officially congratulate Their Royal Highnesses on their safe return home.

Yorkshire Herald.—The Prince and Princess of Wales received a cordial welcome home yesterday on their return from the protracted tour in the Indian Empire. During the seven or eight months of their absence Their Royal Highnesses have travelled over 30,000 miles and have witnessed many interesting and memorable scenes. Needless to say they were everywhere received throughout India and the dependent States with the greatest loyalty and enthusiasm, and doubtless lasting good will result from the visit, while it is certain that a deep impression has been left on the minds of the Royal travellers of the vastness of the Empire and of the greatness of the task which lies before them when they are called upon in the course of events to rule over so magnificent a heritage. There is already the best evidence that the Prince of Wales realises in a practical spirit the importance of the responsibilities which will devolve upon him. He also knows the needs of the Empire, not only from his early voyages as a naval cadet, but from his later tours to Australasia and India. On his return from his Australian tour he gave expression to his conviction as to the necessity for developing our Colonies in the now familiar phrase, "Wake up, England." This testified to the practical commonsense view he had taken of the relations which ought to exist for their mutual benefit between the Mother Country and the Colonies. It was very natural that, after visiting a growing nation of enterprising Britons, His Royal Highness should look at the matter from the business point of view. In India, on the other hand, we do not know whether there is the same opportunity for commercial enterprise and development. There we imagine the things that have impressed themselves mainly on the Prince and Princess are the vastness of the Dependency, the immensity and diversity of its population, the gorgeousness of its ceremonials, and the marvellous achievements of the handful of British officials and others in ruling the Empire of the Great Moghuls and in gaining the loyalty and the confidence of its peoples in spite of all their racial, social, and religious differences.

12TH MAY 1906.

Army and Navy Gazette.—The arrival of the Prince and Princess of Wales from their long tour in our Indian Empire is an event of great significance. They have traversed that empire from end to end, and though a change of viceroys took place before they landed in Bombay, and there has been the peril of plague and famine, everything has gone off well, and there has not been a hitch from beginning to end. Everywhere the Prince and Princess have had a loyal and enthusiastic welcome among the chiefs and the people of India. The Suzerain Princes have vied with one another in their efforts to do honour to the illustrious visitors. A marvellous change has passed over the country since the present King visited it so many years ago. The material prosperity of the country has grown, railways have been extended, and manufactures have been developed. The military forces of the Indian Empire have increased in efficiency, and are still making rapid progress in that direction. They are now much nearer to real preparedness for war than they possibly could have been a few years ago, and every week sees some further step towards that desirable end. Though there are some disquieting elements in the country, the princes and people of India are loyal to the British Raj, and that is the most satisfactory impression which the Prince and Princess have brought back with them from their long tour.

Morning Post.—To the animatograph entertainment of life in the Army and Navy at present being held in the Polytechnic Institute, Regent-street, is now added scenes from the tour of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales in India. The pictures from an excellent series, and are invaluable in illustrating a journey of great historic interest. The views include the state entry of the Prince and Princess into Gwalior, accompanied by native rulers on elephants, and other interesting scenes depict the entry of the Royal party into Calcutta.

Onlooker.—With the return of the Prince and Princess of Wales from India (writes a correspondent) comes an interesting, if belated, budget of letters full of the Royal doings out there, with the most glowing accounts of the success of the tour. The Prince won all hearts by his act and kindness, to say nothing of his sportsmanlike qualities. He was regarded there as the "Prince of sportsmen," and his wonderful shooting prowess evoked the strongest admiration. The Princess, too, who at home is quite content as "understudy" to her ever-young and lovely mother-in-law, blossomed out as both beautiful and "briny." She was immensely admired and appreciated and her clothes and jewels (even in that wonderful land of oriental gems and magnificence) were considered fully in keeping with the position of the future "Empress of India." Her Royal Highness was also admired for her sensible outlook on life. She had read up everything on India and the Empire most thoroughly—(it must have involved months of previous hard study)—and had everything relating to the country at "her finger ends," and surprised many with her knowledge.

She was always so bright and fresh and keen—which, when one considers the endless travelling, touring, sight-seeing functions and ceremonials, was the more wonderful; especially as (like any young mother) she felt the long parting from her children most keenly, and told someone how she missed them, and remembered their tears when she said good-bye.

Saturday Review.—The Prince and Princess of Wales landed at Portsmouth on Tuesday. English people in the bulk persist in being neither informed nor imaginative as to India. As for the mixture of imagination and information, which is the ideal union for a true imperialist, it scarcely exists so far as the attitude of the public towards India is concerned. Hence the Royal visit to India has—there is really no denying it—fallen flat in this country. Papers complain that they have not been repaid in circulation of public interest for their outlay on special correspondence—it has been almost as expensive for them as a little war. Happily, the visit has had a very different effect in India itself, and this after all is the main thing. On the whole it has aroused lively interest and even enthusiasm throughout India.

18TH MAY 1906

Morning Post.—Surely, in spite of relapses, this nation makes progress. It is a thousand years since a King Edward first reigned over all England. It is more than six hundred years since another King Edward while engaged in the settlement of Wales, where he had established his authority, bestowed the title of Prince of Wales upon his eldest son born at Caernarvon. The idea of that King evidently was to associate the heir to his crown with the good government which he was endeavouring to establish in what was then representative of his Empire, his rule over a race which had been forced by the hard process of fighting to admit his authority. In the present day the Welsh are as faithful subjects of King Edward as the English and as stubborn in their tenacity of the principles of representative government. The separation of Wales from England is as unthinkable as a convulsion which should create a channel of the sea from the Dee to the Severn. But the mission of a Prince of Wales is the same as it was six hundred years ago, to represent his father in those regions whose tie with Great Britain is the link of Empire, of an Empire so much vaster than Edward I. could have imagined. Moreover, the Prince of Wales of our time makes it his mission to set before the King's people a conception of Empire as high as it is given to mankind to conceive. Five years ago, when he came back from a journey in which he had visited the great communities of British race established in regions which to the first of his rank were beyond the bounds of knowledge, and which to our grandfathers were the ends of the earth, he came back and told his countrymen at Guildhall that what our kinsmen and fellow-subjects in the King's dominions beyond the seas were looking for was an awakening of this nation. Great Britain was to realise the greatness of the duties laid upon her and to gird up her loins for their performance. Those words have not been forgotten; perhaps they were not spoken to ears altogether deaf.

Yesterday the Prince, returning from another journey, gave some account of another part of the Empire, which makes other calls upon the people of this country and upon the people of Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, who, living British lives, cherish the ideals of life, conduct, and character, which have grown up in these islands during the thousand years that separate the Seventh from the Elder Edward. He described his journey from Bombay to the Khyber hills, from the Indus Valley to Calcutta, and to the river of Mandalay, thence to Madras with its historic associations of the beginnings of British rule, and then across the hills and plains of Central India to the wild mountains that overlook the desert beyond Peshin.

The description of the journey was made to convey the great facts about the Indian Empire. The Prince reminded his hearers that India is a vast area as large as Europe without Russia, that its three hundred millions are more diversified in race, in speech, and in the religion than the peoples of Europe, and that the Government is carried on by the incessant hard work of a handful of British administrators and by the loyal devotion of a number of Indian princes. He said enough to bring home to every mind the variety of conditions with which Indian administration has to deal, and to hint for the thoughtful how great is the gulf, fixed by conditions which can never be essentially changed, between the British administrators of those countries and their native populations. Having thus surveyed the nature and the difficulties of the task imposed upon Great and Greater Britain, and having thus, so to speak, brought the problem into focus, the Prince pronounced the word which is the key to its solution—sympathy. "I was struck," said the Prince in the fine central passage of his speech, "with India's immense size, its splendour, its numerous races, its varied climate, its snow-capped mountains, its boundless deserts, its mighty rivers, its architectural monuments, and its ancient traditions. I have realised the patience, the simplicity of life, the loyal devotion, and the religious spirit which characterise the Indian peoples. I know also their faith in the absolute justice and integrity of our rule. I cannot help thinking from all I have heard and seen that the task of governing India will be made easier if we on our part infuse into it a wider element of sympathy." This was the keynote of what was rightly described as a great speech, and it led up to an accordant conclusion: "I cannot but think that every Briton who treads the soil of India is assisting towards a better understanding with the Mother Country, helping to break down prejudice, to dispel misapprehensions, and to foster sympathy and brotherhood. Thus he will not only strengthen old ties but create new ones, and so, please God, secure a better understanding and a closer union of hearts between the Mother Country and her Indian Empire." The words of the Prince of Wales found an echo in the minds of their hearers and a response in those who spoke after him. Mr. Balfour dwelt on the value of contact between East and West for both those of the East and those of the West. He deprecated the subordination of Indian problems to party differences in this country. Mr. Morley, in a brief speech which well represented the attitude of responsible British statesmen, went straight to the point and singled out the winged word "sympathy" in the Prince's speech as the counterpart of that other winged word spoken five years ago.

The Government of India, as was truly said yesterday, is the most stupendous undertaking that has ever been committed to any governing race. There are thinkers, and those among the most observant of India, who believe that the task which the British race has undertaken in India is impossible, and that the only possible result of British administration must be in time to unite the peoples of India in an effort to get rid of it. Whether that is a true forecast it is impossible at the present day to know. But it is certain that if the British race is to succeed in its mission the work must be carried on without rest or pause, and that not Great Britain alone, but the great British Colonies, must take their share of it. It is equally certain that the task can be carried on with hope of success only in the spirit which breathed in the speech delivered yesterday by the Prince of Wales. In that spirit it is being carried on and will be carried on. There is no room in the vocabulary of the British administration of India for the word impossible, or, if the word is to be permitted at all, it must change its normal meaning and be used to describe what Britons have done before now and that what so long as the race remains worthy of itself they will achieve again in the future. If the Elder Edward could have been told that in a thousand years another Edward would be Emperor of three hundred millions of Indians, and if the first Prince of Wales could have been told that in six hundred years another Prince of Wales would bring from India as the watchword of that Empire the word sympathy, they would surely have thanked God for the destiny of their race and have prayed that it might for further centuries retain its strength, its devotion to work, and its faith in duty.

Birmingham Daily Post.—Some very notable speeches were made at the Guildhall yesterday. The gathering was in the truest sense a welcome home to the Prince and Princess of Wales on returning from their protracted Indian tour, but more than this, there were attached to the proceedings phases which stand out prominently in any attempt to estimate the social and political importance of their memorable journey. In the first place, mention was made of the fact that the tour undertaken by Their Royal Highnesses was one of duty and patriotism. It marked the completion of the mission originally entrusted to them by King Edward. The journey in the Ophir, and the seven months' wandering in our greatest dependency have enabled the Heir-Apparent to acquaint himself with almost every part of the Empire over which, in the normal course of events, he will one day be called upon to rule. And in no portion of British territory is it more—if, indeed, equally—important that the direct representative of the reigning house should be brought into personal and immediate relations with his future subjects. The Indian Empire, as Mr. Balfour well said, has been kept together by sentiment and loyalty. Vague institutions of a constitutional character, of which the people of India have no experience, will arouse no such feeling. It must be inspired by one whom they know to be the great Sovereign of a great Empire or his blood representative. The teeming millions of India attach overwhelming importance to caste and symbols. No matter how wisely they may be governed, or how closely an Administration affects them, they will invariably be quick to differentiate between the son of their Emperor and the official representative, the Viceroy. The latter to them is no more and no less than the symbol of power, whereas a member of the Royal House typifies in intimate and unmistakable fashion the close relationship that exists between India and Imperial Sovereignty. The Prince of Wales has been impressed by this national characteristic, as manifested in the "proofs of genuine devotion and personal attachment to the King-Emperor" at every place they visited where His Majesty went thirty years ago. In Mr. Balfour's words, His Royal Highness's journey brought home to the people of India something they could feel and understand. The attitude of the lower orders was emphasised by the great feudatory potentates, with whose loyalty, personal allegiance to the Crown, nobility of mind, chivalrous nature, and great power for good the Heir-Apparent seems to have been immensely impressed. There is more in this than appears on the surface. The acts of homage rendered by native Princes would never have been accorded any Viceroy, and we may discern from this experience the accuracy of Mr. Balfour's claim that the Prince of Wales has successfully performed "a great Imperial work." Doubtless the secret of the success attained by His Royal Highness lies in the fact of his having grasped the idiosyncracies of the different races of India, their creeds, faiths, customs, and habits. Sympathy, according to Mr. John Morley, is the secret of our power in the dependency, as justice and clemency constitute the corner-stones of our strength. Throughout their tour the Prince and Princess of Wales gave the fullest play to this sentiment, whether they were mingling with the happy and prosperous or visiting the famine-stricken districts. Need we wonder, therefore, that the tour marked an epoch in the lives of Their Royal Highnesses and the people of India alike.

Birmingham Gazette and Express.—Yesterday the Prince of Wales received the congratulations of the City of London on his safe return from his Indian tour. The speech which he made five years ago when he came back from his memorable journey to the great self-governing Colonies is still remembered, and the interesting summary of his impressions of India with which he favoured the company in the Guildhall yesterday will take its place beside that notable utterance. Both speeches were, if we may say so, lessons in the art of thinking Imperially.

The Prince referred to these two journeys as together constituting a mission entrusted to him by the King. We may take it that such visits to all the provinces of the Empire were designed by His Majesty as part of the training calculated to make the Heir to the Imperial Throne more competent to fulfil the duties of that august position. The country will not fail to appreciate the high sense of duty that prompted the Prince's ready acquiescence in the wishes of the King. We can readily believe that the Prince and Princess have found enjoyment as well as interest in their travels; but we know also that they possess a thoroughly English taste for home life; and that it must have been no small sacrifice to separate themselves for seven months from their children. "Our tour," said the Prince, "was a tour of duty and patriotism, not of sport and pastime."

The spirit in which the Prince and Princess addressed themselves to their task was warmly reciprocated by all classes of the inhabitants of India. A Royal visitor who is everywhere welcomed by festivities is, of course, at some disadvantage as an observer of the condition of the people. But the Prince of Wales is shrewd enough to make allowances; and his report of what he saw and heard is genuine and important testimony of the success of British rule. Perhaps the most interesting of his observations was that of the impression he received during his visits to the feudatory princes of "their loyalty, their personal allegiance to the Crown, their nobility of mind, their chivalrous nature, and their great powers of doing good." When we recall the earlier history of many of these dynasties, we cannot but take pride in the character which the princes of to-day have acquired from the example of the British governors.

It is long since any politician has thought it right to apply to British rule in India any other test than that of success in promoting the prosperity of the Indian people. In applying this test the fair comparison is not between the condition of the people as it is and some ideal state of perfection, but between the condition of the people as it is to-day and as it was in the centuries of disorder and misgovernment that preceded the British occupation. We need not be alarmed by symptoms of discontent, no system has ever been so fortunate as to produce an absolutely contented people. There are dissatisfied democrats in India, just as there are dissatisfied Socialists in England; but the verdict of an impartial observer must be that the Indian system, though it be like all other achievements of human prudence, short of perfection, is at least as well adapted to the needs of the Indian people as the British Constitution to those of our own people. India has the advantage of being governed by highly-trained experts, not by politicians trimming their sails to the inconstant winds of popular favour; and while we cannot be surprised that ambitious natives who feel themselves capable of appearing to advantage in a free Parliament, if they had one, look with envy upon our democratic institutions, we in our turn sometimes see reasons to envy them their freedom from the mischief of the triumphant demagogue.

Daily Chronicle.—An interesting speech on his recent Indian tour was made by the Prince of Wales at the Guildhall yesterday during the dejeuner to which the City entertained His Royal Highness and the Princess of Wales on their return to England.

After expressing "deep appreciation" of the hearty welcome to Their Royal Highnesses, the Prince referred to their previous "memorable tour to our sister nations beyond the sea," and added:—"The conclusion of our visit to the great Indian Empire may, I think, be regarded as the completion of the mission originally entrusted to us by the King. It is a great satisfaction to us that we have been privileged to visit almost every part of the British Empire."

They had thus accomplished what had been the ambition of their lives. Having mentioned the fact that their railway journeys in India covered nearly 9,000 miles, and that they spent twenty-eight nights in "our comfortable train," the Prince continued:—"From the day of our brilliant reception on landing at Bombay, until the moment of our departure from Karachi, we were welcomed everywhere with a display of enthusiasm and affection which profoundly touched us, and the memory of which will never fade from our minds. We were still more impressed by the unmistakable proofs of genuine devotion and personal attachment to the King-Emperor."

"Although welcomed everywhere by happy, holiday-making crowds, which thronged the gaily-decorated streets, we did not forget the misery and poverty which, alas, existed in certain districts afflicted by famine through which we passed. When at Gwalior I had an opportunity of inspecting a famine camp and saw with sad interest, but with satisfaction, the excellent arrangements effectively carried out for mitigating the sufferings of upwards of 6,000 men, women, and children, who were there employed, fed, and cared for."

"Our visits to several of the great feudatory States will always be reckoned among the happiest and most interesting of our experiences. We were received by the respective rulers and their peoples with the warmest enthusiasm, with all the gorgeousness and circumstance of old Indian customs, and by them entertained with magnificent hospitality. I enjoyed social intercourse with many of those great Princes, and I was impressed with their loyalty and personal allegiance to the Crown, their nobility of mind, their chivalrous nature, and the great powers which they possess for doing good."

"In several of these States the Imperial Service troops are an important feature. They are raised, equipped, and maintained by the Princes themselves, to be placed at our disposal in case of war. Though these States supply their own officers, these regiments are under the guidance and inspection of British officers. It is to be hoped that this excellent movement may be extended throughout all the feudatory States."

"No one could possibly fail to be struck with the wonderful administration of India. Time did not permit of our leaving the beaten track for the interior of the country, and thereby gaining an insight into the machinery of that most efficient organisation the Government of a District. But we had opportunities of seeing at the head-quarters of the Presidencies and of the different provinces the general and admirable working of the Civil Service. At the same time we realised that it is a mere handful of highly educated British officials—often living a hard and strenuous life, frequently separated from their fellow-countrymen, and subject to the trials and discomforts of the plains,—who are hand in hand with representatives of the different races in the administration of enormous areas, and in the government of millions of people."

"During the month of December, in the neighbourhood of Rawal Pindi, I had the pleasure of staying with Lord Kitchener in his camp of manoeuvres, and witnessed operations on an extended scale between two armies, numbering in all over 55,000 men, terminating in a review and march past of the largest force ever brought together in India in time of peace. I was struck with the general fitness and splendid appearance of the British troops, with the physique and power of endurance of the native Army, and the dash of its cavalry, while throughout the Army I found an earnest desire for increased efficiency and for readiness to take the field. I was especially glad to have the opportunity of being associated with our magnificent Army in India under such practical conditions. I am proud to say that during my tour I was able to inspect 143,000 troops."

"Having seen several colleges and other educational institutions in different parts of India, I gained some slight idea of the efforts which are being made to place within the reach of all classes a liberal education. Let me take as an example the great Mohamedan College and School at Aligarh, which is supported and controlled by the private enterprise of Mohamedan gentlemen from all parts of India. A residuary system, similar to that at Oxford and Cambridge, has been adopted. At the same time athletics are not neglected, and in all schools and colleges there is much emulation in cricket and football. Undoubtedly such institutions must materially affect the formation of character in future generations."

"If I were asked to name any general impressions which I have formed during this exceptional, but all too short experience, they would be that I have learned to appreciate the fact that India cannot be regarded as one country. We talk casually of going to India. But the majority of us perhaps do not realise that it is a continent with an area equal to the whole of Europe without Russia, containing a population of 300,000,000 of diverse races, languages, and creeds, and of many different grades of civilisation."

"I have realised the patience, the simplicity of life, the loyal devotion, and the religious spirit which characterise the Indian peoples. I know also their faith in the absolute justice and integrity of our rule. (Loud cheers.)"

"I cannot help thinking, from all I have heard and seen, that the task of governing India will be made the easier if we, on our part, infuse into it a wider element of sympathy. I will venture to predict that to such sympathy there will be an over-abundant and genuine response. And may we not also hope for a still fuller measure of trust and confidence in our earnest desire and efforts to promote the well-being, and to further the best interests of every class."

Proceeding to refer to some of the historic places visited during the tour, including Delhi and Lucknow, the Prince said that Colonel Bonham, one of the few survivors of the siege of Lucknow, was present among them that day. Although he was wounded three times during the siege, the colonel is still fit and well, and noted as the Prince's guide at Lucknow.

"I am fully aware," said the Prince in conclusion, "how impossible it is to gain accurate and intimate knowledge of so vast a country by a visit of only four and a half months. Yet,

I would strongly suggest to those who are interested in the great questions which surround the India of to-day to go there, and learn as much as is possible by personal observation on the spot. And I cannot but think that every Briton who treads the soil of India is assisting towards a better understanding with the Mother Country, helping to break down prejudices, to dispel misapprehension, and to foster sympathy and brotherhood. Thus he will not only strengthen the old ties, but create new ones; and so, please God, secure a better understanding and a closer union of hearts between the Mother Country and her Indian Empire." (Prolonged cheers.)

Daily Express.—There are some fine touches in the speech of the Prince of Wales at the Guildhall yesterday, which will go straight to the heart of every man and woman in the country; indeed, there are so many of these touches that the speech may be pronounced, not only the finest which the Prince of Wales has delivered, but one of the finest which any public personage has uttered for some years past. There is, first, the reverent recognition of the Providence of the Almighty in bringing the Prince and Princess of Wales home in safety. There is, next, the affecting reference, in the simplest and the sincerest words, to the family ties which mean as much to a prince as to any other man. And, finally, there is the message of thanks to the people for having given the use of H.M.S. Renown. We venture to think that no prince could have spoken with a finer appreciation of the true import of regal duty and dignity.

The speech will surprise the subjects of some foreign monarchs accustomed to the language of autoeracy. When the ruler of a minor country speaks in paternal phrases to the subjects among whom he lives, the simplicity of the address is merely in keeping with the smallness of the State; but when the heir to the throne of an immense empire speaks of his gratitude, and acknowledges the honour done to him, the citizens of other empires may well ask themselves what remarkable influence is that by which can be upheld so high a position with none of the trappings of Continental royalty. Such relations are fitting between the greatest ruler and the foremost people of the world.

On the one hand, there is no arrogance; on the other, no fawning. Ruler and nation are both conscious of their dignity and worthy of one another; and hence it is that the humblest subject is able to approach the King or the Prince without fear or awkwardness, for the King is the grand representative of the people, and the Prince is the Emperor's eldest son. By such simplicity, kindness, and statesmanship our present and our future ruler are endearing themselves to the country.

Daily Mail.—The Prince of Wales's speech at the Guildhall yesterday, summing up his impressions of India and the reflections which those impressions inspired, was worthy of a historic occasion. The banquet in the City marks the conclusion of the great mission entrusted to His Royal Highness by the King, and celebrates the round of ceremonial visits which he has paid during the past five years to the various States of the British Empire.

After a reference to the mission which Prince Arthur of Connaught has carried out by his visit to the Emperor of Japan and to the Dominion of Canada, the Prince of Wales gave a brief outline of his five months' tour through India. He referred in the happiest terms to the loyalty, distinction of mind, and chivalrous integrity of the great feudal Princes of India. Such utterances will serve to strengthen the reciprocal feeling of goodwill between the British Royal Family and the Indian Princes, and show how great has been the change since the days when the zeal and energy of the native Princes passed too often disregarded in England. His Royal Highness had words of generous recognition for the faithful and devoted service of the Indian civilians, who, far from their native land, maintain in their adopted country the proud traditions of their race, and bear unflinchingly enormous responsibilities. Of the Indian Army he spoke in terms of the highest admirations for its fitness, earnestness in the cause of efficiency, and readiness to take the field.

But the true purpose of the speech was its appeal to the Englishman to study India on the spot, to tread Indian soil, to show sympathy with India, and thus secure "a closer union of hearts between the Mother-country and her Indian Empire." Foreign critics of that Empire and of its British administrators detect in the absence of sympathy between the ruling race and the ruled its greatest weakness. They may be right or they may be wrong, though it is significant to find so able and experienced an Indian civilian as Sir F. S. P. Lely making precisely the same point in his volume of essays on India, and urging that the time has come for England to revise her methods and meet the cry of the Indian people, "Let us have rulers who know us." We cannot doubt that the Prince's words will be taken to heart in India as well as in England when he pleads for a wider element of sympathy on the part of the governing race. British civilians have always dispensed justice and fair dealing between the different creeds and subject races, and that this can be said is in itself a noble tribute to their administration. But the outward manifestation of human feeling, affection, and personal interest in the ruled has sometimes, we fear, been wanting; not because the Englishman is really cold and unfeeling, but because, being by nature averse to emotional display, he hesitates to make a parade of his true sentiments.

The India of to-day is advancing with giant strides towards prosperity, and though, as the Prince of Wales pointed out, there is yet much poverty and misery, a great future lies before this vast dependency. Boundless possibilities open before a territory so richly endowed with natural wealth and inhabited by so sober, hardworking, and peaceful a population. But for India to be a true source of strength to England, the Prince of Wales's plea for a union of hearts must be realised. It is a reminder to us that there can be no lasting tie between nations except one of love and an appeal for something more than up-right and impartial administration.

Liverpool Courier.—There is naturally a wide difference between the speech delivered by the Prince of Wales on his return from India and that in which he described his impressions of the Colonies. In the latter, while expatiating upon our diverse and far-reaching possessions, he emphasised the commercial aspect, and his famous exhortation to "Wake up" has no doubt had a useful effect in a variety of ways. Similarly, though less directly, his interesting description of the feeling with which his journeys in India have inspired him must bear good fruit. His appeal for a wider sympathy in dealing with Indian affairs will not be lost upon us. Mr. Balfour, in his suggestive remarks, hinted that a sense of our ignorance tended to keep us from blundering about India. It certainly prevents us, as he said, from making Indian questions matters of party politics. But the truest sympathy is that which is founded upon knowledge, and there is no reason to fear that when we come more fully to understand our great Dependency and to appreciate its conditions, we will treat our Indian subjects any less fairly than we have done in the days of our ignorance. The Prince of Wales's speech will perhaps bring to many the extent of that ignorance, though when we think of the vastitude of the country, the multitudes of its populace, the diversity of races, tongues, and religions, it must seem doubtful whether the stay-at-home can ever attain to anything like an adequate realisation of what India comprehends. In his valuable and educative volume, "A Vision of India," which has just been published, Mr. Sidney Low deplors the indifference of the average Englishman to all that concerns India, and he mentions the argument which Mr. Balfour employed yesterday, that we may gain by relying so much upon the man on the spot, who knows and understands. Mr. Low reminds us, however, that a sovereign democracy cannot permanently delegate its powers. It is very necessary that this should be remembered. However great the task may be, it is therefore essential that the people of this country should be instructed in Indian affairs. We may send out wise men to the East, governors in the best sense, but we cannot cast aside our own responsibility, and we cannot perform the duty which is laid upon us unless our understanding is wide and our sympathy informed and alert. The Prince of Wales's speech should help to waken us up to seek out knowledge. If it has this effect the benefit will be ours and India's.

Morning Reader.—It is a fact not without significance that of all the dependencies of the Empire, the greatest, and in some respects at least the most important, occupies the least space in the public eye. "The majority of us," as the Prince of Wales said yesterday, "perhaps do not realise that India is a continent with an area equal to the whole of Europe without Russia, containing a population of 300,000,000 of diverse races, languages, and creeds, and of many different grades of civilisation."

It was not wholly the consciousness of how ruinous the application of his economic theories would be to India that led Mr. Chamberlain to ignore the great dependency in his fiscal speeches. He knew that the omission would be little noticed by the majority of his countrymen. The politician concerned to make out a case for the maintenance of our present swollen armaments may find the Indian frontier a useful argument. The Minister who desires to avoid the full odium of their costliness may snatch exultantly at an opportunity to shift part of it by a financial device on to the shoulders of the heavily-burdened Indian taxpayer. The English manufacturer may see in an insincere denunciation of sweating the poor Indian a chance of forcing his Government to step in and relieve him of the inconvenience of the poor Indian's competition. For the most part, "the brightest jewel in the British Crown" attracts very little attention even from the British House of Commons; and there are few more ironical phrases in the language than that which describes the average British member of Parliament as a member for India.

It may be urged that this is not wholly to be lamented, and that the benevolent despotism of the Indian Government, unhampered by home interference, is the administration best calculated to promote the happiness of the people. It would be most unjust to ignore the greatness of the work—to which the Prince of Wales yesterday bore eloquent testimony—accomplished for India by its British rulers. But there are signs more significant than pageants and durbars that a time is approaching when Indian problems will assume another form than that which they have presented in the past. They have been serious enough. Plague and famine, poverty not to be conceived by Europeans—they still exist a black background to the pomp and vanities of the Viceroy's Court. The "Forward" policy, a huge military establishment, an enormously costly Civil Service, have not lessened these evils. The Prince told his hearers yesterday some part of what British Government has done for India; he could not tell them what it has cost India. But educated Indians know, and their number is every year increasing. Already, slowly but certainly, a strong Indian public opinion is forming. It cannot always be overridden and outraged, as over the partition of Bengal, for the sake of administrative convenience. It cannot permanently be suppressed by the simple process of illegally arresting its spokesmen and arbitrarily prescribing its public expression.

It is in this connection that the advice given by the Prince of Wales yesterday, and endorsed by Mr. Morley, is of such value for the future guidance of Indian policy. "I cannot help thinking," said the Prince, "that the task of governing India will be made the easier if we on our part infuse into it a wider element of sympathy."

That is the hope for the future of the British Raj—that the natural aspirations of patriotic Indians, even when they happen to conflict with bureaucratic ideals, shall not be treated as mere rebellious perverseness; that Indian policy shall no longer be regarded as a matter with which the Indian peoples have nothing to do, except to pay for its execution; and that the spirit of the Administration shall be inspired less by the desire to do everything for the people more by willingness to allow the people to do something for themselves. Such an "element of sympathy" in the Government will do more for India than the best efforts of the most benevolent despot. On its development the future depends. If it is not forthcoming, British rule may not cease to exist in India. It will cease to deserve to exist.

Morning Post.—The ancient and historic Guildhall can rarely have been the setting of a more impressive scene than that which was enacted within its walls yesterday. Thirty years ago, almost to the day, His Majesty, then Prince of Wales, honoured the Corporation by attending a banquet on his return from India. Since those days the facilities for rapid travel have greatly increased, and five years ago the Prince of Wales was the guest of the Corporation on the occasion of his return from a prolonged journey, in the course of which he had visited almost all our important Colonies, and had become personally acquainted with the sister nations beyond the seas in both hemispheres. Yesterday, as five years ago, accompanied by the Princess of Wales, he was entertained by the Corporation of the City of London on his return from a journey through India, in the course of which he had trodden in his Royal father's footsteps, but covered much more ground, for, as he himself said, he travelled no less than 9,000 miles in India by rail alone. On an occasion like this the City stands for the whole country, and among the 800 guests were representatives of all parties in the State, of all professions, and all creeds.

The day was dull, but the crowded streets, gaily decorated throughout the route in the City with flags and loyal mottoes, gave a warm welcome to the Royal couple as they drove, preceded by outriders, in an open carriage drawn by four horses ridden by postillions, from Marlborough House. While awaiting their arrival the other guests assembled in the Library, the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs having driven in state from the Mansion House, and being received at the Guildhall by the Reception Committee, headed by Mr. Millar Wilkinson, its Deputy Chairman. The Lady Mayoress was presented by Mrs. Millar Wilkinson with a bouquet of pink carnations.

The Library itself was profusely decorated with red and pink roses, and several of its bays on either side had been boarded over and draped with Indian muslins for the use of the lady guests. At the far end beneath the great stained-glass windows was a dais, on which the Chair of State was placed, and here having entered in procession, preceded by the Reception Committee and the City officers, the Lord Mayor took up his position to receive the guests. He wore his State robes of black satin with heavy gold embroidery, the Lady Mayoress being in black net over white satin, while she had over her shoulders a white feather bon, and on her head a black hat trimmed with roses and blue ribbon. Beside the Lord Mayor were his Sheriffs, Alderman Smallman and Mr. Bowater. By quarter past eleven o'clock guests began to arrive rapidly. Among the first was Mr. Ian Mactoll who engaged in conversation with Mr. J. Ellis, M.P., Under Secretary for India, the earliest representative of the Government to put in an appearance. Sir E. Cornwall, M.P., the ex-chairman of the London County Council, in the scarlet uniform of a Lieutenant of the City, next appeared, and a loud cheer greeted the ex-Lord Mayor, Sir J. Pound, who was accompanied by Lady Pound. A warm reception was given to five of the Ober-Burgomasters of German cities, now on a visit to this country. They had ignored the instruction of "morning dress", and were in evening dress, each wearing his chain of office. Sir J. Dimsdale, in a black robe trimmed with sable, the official garb of the City Chamberlain, was followed by the Chairman of the County Council. Mr. Spicer, who was in Levee dress, while Lord Cheylesmore, in General's uniform, wore over his shoulders his chain of office as Mayor of Westminster. Sir E. Clarke, M.P., whatever views his constituents may take of his speeches in Parliament, was the recipient of a hearty welcome on his reappearance in the City after his long absence through illness. He wore Levee dress.

At about twenty minutes to one o'clock the members of the Ministry began to arrive in rapid succession. The first was the Marquis of Ripon, wearing the ribbon of the Garter, and, like all his colleagues and the members of the late Ministry, Privy Councillor's uniform. The Prime Minister wore the sash of the Order of the Bath, Mr. John Morley the badge of the Order of Merit, and Earl Carrington the insignia of St. Michael and St. George. Mr. Asquith, Lord Tweedmouth, and the Earl of Creve, as well as Mr. S. Buxton, wore no Orders. Lord Amphil, like Lord Curzon who came shortly after him, and was warmly welcomed, wore the light blue white edged ribbon of the Star of India. Lord Curzon had been preceded by the Marquis of Londonderry, wearing the Garter, Lord Ashbourne, and Mr. Chamberlain, who had as fine a reception as Mr. Balfour—the best of the day. These old colleagues all greeted the ex-Viceroy warmly. Lord Stratheona, too, had a hearty greeting, as did Field-Marshal Sir G. White, who was in full uniform and wore the ribbon of the Bath. Members of the present and late Cabinets were soon in animated conversation which was joined in by Lord Knollys and the Archbishop of Canterbury, both of whom were wearing the insignia of the Victorian Order. Mr. Brodrick's uniform was crossed by the white-bordered yellow ribbon of a German Order, and he was soon earnestly talking to Lord Tweedmouth. The Ministerial circle was enlarged by the accession of Mr. Bryce, the last to arrive, except Mr. Lyttelton, who did not come until the Lord Mayor had left the dais to receive his Royal guests.

The scene, the electric light being used to dispel the gloom of a dull day, was very brilliant. Military uniforms mixed with the dark blue and gold of the naval officers of the Renown and Terrible, and the Privy Councillors' gold embroideries stood out against the clerical garb of the Primate and the Archdeacon of London, the President of the Wesleyan Conference, and others; the light and dainty colours of the ladies' dresses helped to tone down the brighter hues of military uniforms, while here and there a vivid dash of colour was supplied by the uniforms of four Indian officers, and the scarlet of the aldermen was made even more vivid by comparison with the blue of the Common Councillors' robes.

Just after a quarter-past one the trumpeters sounded a fanfare, and all rose to their feet. The Royal guests, saluted by a guard of honour of the Hon. Artillery Company in the courtyard and in the corridor by men of the same corps, had arrived. The band struck up the National Anthem, and then the procession appeared. It was headed by Under Sheriffs Tickle and Langton, who were followed by the Reception Committee bearing their wands and by the City officials; then came the Sheriffs, preceding the Lord Mayor, on whose arm was the Princess of Wales. She wore a dress of black lace over white silk, the bodice trimmed with black jet. Round the neck was a magnificent chain of diamonds, brooches of the same gems sparkled on the bosom, and two Orders were also worn. The toque was white, trimmed with black lace and white feathers. The Prince of Wales, in admiral's uniform, wore the light blue sash of the Star of India, and escorted the Lady Mayoress. As they reached the dais, greeted by the low obeisances of the other guests, the Princess of Wales graciously acknowledged the presence of the statesmen of both parties, shaking hands with the Prime Minister, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Mr. Morley, Mr. Chamberlain, the Marquis of Ripon, and the Marquis of Londonderry. Their Royal Highnesses having taken their seats, the Princess of Wales on the Lord Mayor's left and the Prince on the right hand, the Town Clerk called for order. He read the minute of the Court recording the resolution that an address should be presented to their Royal Highnesses, dated April 23rd, an address which should recognise "the great national importance of their visit to the Indian Empire," and then the Recorder, Sir F. Fulton, advanced to the table, on which were deposited the Mace and Sword, and read the following address.

"To their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales.

"May it please your Royal Highnesses,

"We, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London, in Common Council assembled, rejoice to offer to your Royal Highnesses our warmest welcome on your safe return from your recent memorable visit to the Indian Empire of his Most Gracious Majesty the King.

"We have watched with the profoundest interest the great Imperial progress of your Royal Highnesses through his Majesty's Eastern Empire, with its infinite diversity of countries and peoples, and we respectfully congratulate your Royal Highnesses on having, by your unremitting efforts and your kindly dignity and courtesy, so greatly strengthened the ties which bind the races of India in loyal attachment to the Throne of this Empire, and of having thereby added to the well-being of India and the happiness and prosperity of her people.

"The honour your Royal Highnesses have done us in attending here to-day and accepting our loyal welcome recalls to our recollection the journey which our beloved King—then Prince of Wales—also made throughout India more than thirty years ago, with the result of deepening the attachment of the Indian people to their Sovereign, and of the reception which the Corporation of London was privileged to offer His Majesty on his return to this country.

"We heartily thank your Royal Highnesses for accepting the public welcome home offered by us on behalf of the citizens of London, and we pray that your Royal Highnesses may, in God's good providence, be vouchsafed many years of health and happiness in which to enjoy the memories of so eventful and successful a tour, undertaken for the furtherance of the best interests of this great Empire.

Signed by order of the Court,

JAMES BELL, Town Clerk."

Guildhall, 17th May, 1906.

This done, the concluding words being greeted with repeated cheers, he handed the address to the Lord Mayor, who presented it to the Prince of Wales.

In a clear voice, which rang through the hall, the Prince of Wales acknowledged the address as follows:

"My Lord Mayor and Gentlemen,

"The Princess of Wales and I beg to thank you for the hearty welcome which you offer us on our return home at the conclusion of our visit to the great Empire of India. As a citizen of London I fully appreciate the honour you confer upon me.

"It is gratifying to us to hear how, in the capital of the Empire our progress has been watched with sympathy and interest, and to think that on this occasion your ancient and historic Corporation receives us as it received my dear father on his return from India exactly thirty years ago.

"We recognise with gratitude that we were privileged to make this most eventful and interesting tour, and we are deeply thankful that Providence has vouchsafed to us health and a safe return." (Cheers.)

On this Mr. Millar Wilkinson said: "I beg to move that the address of this Court and the answer of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales thereto be entered on the journals and printed on the minutes of the proceedings sent to every member of this Court."

There were cries of "All," and the motion was unanimously agreed to. Mr. Millar Wilkinson, as mover, and Alderman Sir Whittaker Ellis, as seconder of the address, were then presented to the Prince of Wales, as were the two next senior Aldermen present. The general company then proceeded to the Great Hall, while the Royal guests left the doors for the withdrawing-room. Before doing so the Prince of Wales shook hands with the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Prime Minister, the Marquis of Ripon, the Marquis of Londonderry, Mr. Balfour, Mr. Chamberlain and others.

When the Royal procession entered the Great Hall all the guests were standing. It passed round the Hall greeted with cheers. On the Lord Mayor's right sat, successively, the Prince of Wales, the Lady Mayoress, Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, Mr. Morley, the Marquis of Londonderry, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Brodick, Lord Tweedmouth, Mr. Lytton, and Mr. Bryce; on his left, the Princess of Wales, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Mr. Balfour, the Earl of Crewe, Mr. Chamberlain, the Marquis of Ripon, and Lord Ashbourne. Others present and not hitherto mentioned included General Sir J. Gordon, Sir J. Lyle Mackay, Sir P. Hutchins, Sir J. Edge, Sir W. Lee Warner, and Mr. J. F. Finlay, all members of the Indian Council; Sir W. Curzon Wylie, Sir H. S. King, M.P., Sir A. Fraser, Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal; Commodore the Hon. Hugh Tyrwhitt, Captain Campbell, and other officers of his Majesty's ships Renown and Terrible; the following members of their Royal Highnesses' Households: Lady Katharine Coke, Lord Wenlock, Sir W. Carington, Sir A. Bigge, Sir C. Cust, the Hon. Derek Keppel, Commander Godfrey-Faussett, Viscount Crichton, the Earl and Countess of Shaftesbury, Lady Eva Dugdale, Captain the Hon. C. W. Fitzwilliam, Mr. Wallington, Sir W. Lawrence, Major H. D. Watson, Major Roberts, and Colonel Bonham; the Earl and Countess of Lichfield, the President of the Royal Academy, the Chairmen of the Stock Exchange, the Baltic, and Lloyd's, the Commissioner of Metropolitan Police, the Masters or Prime Wardens of the twelve great Livery Companies, the Chairman of the Metropolitan Water Board, Sir D. Brownrigg, the Hon. R. Guinness, Sir A. de Rutzen, the Lord Mayor of York, the Chief Rabbi, Sir W. Collins, M.P., Major Coates, M.P., Mr. Causton, M.P., Mr. Hedges, M.P., Mr. Keswick, M.P., Mr. A. C. Morton, M.P., Sir J. Puleston, Sir Roper Parkinson, and Sir W. Soulsby.

The design on the cover of the menu was a reproduction of that used on the reception of the King at the Guildhall on his return from India. The character of the ornamentation was Indian, the insignia of the Prince of Wales being introduced at the head of the design. Beneath was shown the Star of India the Royal Arms, and the Arms of the City of London, each encircled with a garter containing their respective mottoes. In the border at the foot of the design were the arms and crest of the Lord Mayor, and in the middle of the border on either side were the arms of Alderman and Sheriff Smallman and Sheriff Bowater.

The Lord Mayor who was received with cheers, rose and said: "Your Royal Highnesses, my Lords, Ladies, and Gentlemen, —I have the great honour to propose 'The Health of His Most Gracious Majesty the King, Emperor of India.' It is exactly thirty years since this hall was the scene of a great festivity on his Majesty's return from his visit to India. The deep loyalty for the Throne and the touching personal affection for the Sovereign which then characterised the people of India still prevail in undiminished degree—(hear, hear)—and I feel convinced that the tour of his Majesty in 1876 and the visit of the Prince and the Princess of Wales this year will ever be kept alive in the retentive memories of our fellow-subjects in the East with the happiest results. I give you, with profound respect, 'The Health of His Majesty the King, Emperor of India.'" (Loud cheers.)

The toast was drunk upstanding, the guests singing the National Anthem.

The Lord Mayor then gave the second toast. He said: "Your Royal Highnesses, my Lords, Ladies and Gentlemen,—I now rise to propose to you the toast of 'Her Majesty Queen Alexandra, Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, and the other Members of the Royal Family. I feel certain you will accord it the heartiest reception. We are hoping that in a few days the Queen will return to this country in excellent health after her recent stay on the Continent, and that among the members of her family she will find consolation for the great loss she has sustained by the death of her venerable and illustrious father. We are gratified in again having in England the Duke and Duchess of Connaught at the conclusion of their visit to South Africa. Their son, Prince Arthur, is on his way home from his very interesting mission to Japan. But my Lords, Ladies and Gentlemen, our special pleasure and interest in this toast to-day naturally centre in the presence of their Royal Highnesses the Prince and the Princess of Wales as the guests of the City of London on their safe home-coming from their historic visit to the Indian Empire. (Cheers.)

"It is now four years and more since a similar company to this assembled in this ancient hall to welcome Their Royal Highnesses on their return from that great Colonial tour which did so much to bind together the varied interests of Great Britain and her Colonies, and we recollect that famous and statesmanlike speech—(hear, hear)—of the Prince of Wales, in which he summed up with such admirable skill the impressions and the lessons of his visit to our kith and kin across the seas. (Cheers.) Their Royal Highnesses are now once more in the heart of the capital of the Empire, having brought to a gratifying close a tour in the East of profound interest to themselves, as well as of vast importance and consequence, not only to the people, they visited but to those throughout the King's dominions, who followed with the keenest concern—in spite, perhaps, of some political and electoral distraction—those vivid and graphic narratives of the Royal progress for which they were indebted to the newspaper Press. (Hear, hear.) I take upon myself in your name to assure their Royal Highnesses that we are immensely delighted to see them again in the City of London, and profoundly grateful that, in a tour of such protracted duration they invariably enjoyed that excellent health which we know they possess, and suffered no undue fatigue in the exact carrying out of the details of an expedition involving great personal endurance and much physical strain. (Hear, hear.) In all the four months of their healthy outdoor life in India—in spite of the great variations of climate, passing from the intense heat of Bombay, Rangoon, and Madras in an abnormally hot year, to the extreme cold of the Punjab Frontier—the Prince and the Princess never had a day's indisposition and never missed the precise and punctual performance of every engagement to which they were committed. (Hear, hear.) Their tour, from first to last, was one of duty and patriotism, and not of sport or pastime. Although the Prince of Wales—keen all-round sportsman as we rejoice in knowing him to be—had some big game shooting, he suffered great disappointment through the enforced abandonment of what would have been a fortnight of almost unique sport in Nepal, owing to an unfortunate outbreak of cholera. Their Royal Highnesses charmed and gratified every one by the intense interest and enjoyment which they exhibited in everything they witnessed, and in all those manifold preparations for their comfort which high and low—natives as well as Anglo-Indians—had made with such infinite pains and no little self-denial. (Cheers.)

"Whether in their intercourse with the great Native Princes or rulers of India or with the humblest classes of the community they manifested a kindly, tactful, and sympathetic disposition which won all hearts. (Cheers.) The King's visit thirty years ago was memorable and remarkable, but, thanks to the great improvement effected since then in the means of rapid communication from place to place, their Royal Highnesses were privileged to make a more extended survey of the places of absorbing interest, and fascination in our great Empire in the East. I will not anticipate what his Royal Highness may say of this great historic visit, but I venture to think that it will have increased and intensified the deep attachment of the people of India to the British Crown and shown them once more that the Royal House takes the keenest personal interest in all that concerns their happiness and their welfare. I now conclude by congratulating the Prince and the Princess of Wales on their returning safe and well from their eventful tour to that happy domestic and family life at home which so much attracts them, and by expressing the hope that their visit to India, like their visit to the Colonies, may be fraught with blessing to every class of the people over whom our beloved and gracious King bears rule. (Cheers.) I gave you 'The Health of Her Majesty Queen Alexandra, their Royal Highnesses the Prince and the Princess of Wales, and the other Members of the Royal Family.' (Loud cheers.)"

The toast was drunk with great enthusiasm, cheer upon cheer being raised, while many rose and waved their handkerchiefs. The Prince of Wales, who was received with loud and prolonged cheering, said:

"My Lord Mayor, my Lords, Ladies and Gentlemen,—I wish to thank you, my Lord Mayor, with all my heart for the kind words in which you have proposed this toast, and I am much touched by the very kind and hearty reception which this distinguished company has given to it. My Lord Mayor, your feeling allusions to the Queen remind me how the recent sorrow of my dear mother was the one cloud which for a time overcast the brightness of our stay in India. On the other hand, one of our happiest experiences has been the glad and unexpected meeting with the King and Queen on our homeward voyage in the Mediterranean. (Cheers.) With reference to your kind allusions to the other members of my family I should like to say what a great pleasure it was to us that by a curious coincidence we met the Duke and Duchess of Connaught on their way to England after their very successful visit to South Africa. (Cheers.) As the Lord Mayor has reminded us, we are all looking forward to the return of my cousin Prince Arthur, who, I believe, is expected to arrive at Liverpool to-morrow. (Cheers.) I know that the country has followed with interest the incidents connected with his special mission to Japan and his subsequent visit to Canada. It must be very gratifying to his parents, as it is to us all, to hear that he has everywhere won golden opinions in carrying out his important duties. (Cheers.) The Princess of Wales and I wish to express our deep appreciation of the hearty welcome we received on our arrival in England last week and again to-day here in the City of London. The seven months' absence has been to us a happy and interesting experience. (Hear, hear.) Still, we rejoice to be home again—(cheers)—and are thankful to God that He has spared us to return to our children and to those that are dear to us. (Cheers.)"

"It is nearly five years ago that the Princess of Wales and I were entertained by the Lord Mayor and the City of London in this ancient hall on the termination of our memorable tour to our sister nations beyond the seas. We are met here to-day under similar circumstances, and the conclusion of our visit to the great Indian Empire may, I think, be regarded as the completion of the mission originally entrusted to us by the King. (Cheers.) It is a great satisfaction to us that we have been privileged to visit nearly every part of the British Empire. (Cheers.) In thus accomplishing what has been the ambition of our lives the Princess and I desire to express our sincere gratitude to the country for having enabled us to make this long voyage in such a fine vessel as the Renown. (Cheers.) No less warmly do we thank the Government of India for the admirable arrangements for our railway journeys of nearly nine thousand miles, which were made with every possible consideration for our convenience and safety. It may perhaps interest you to know that we spent twenty-eight nights in our comfortable train. From the 9th of November, the day of our brilliant reception on landing at Bombay, until the moment of our departure from Karachi on the 19th of March, we were welcomed every where with a display of enthusiasm and affection which profoundly touched us, and the memory of which will never fade from our minds. (Cheers.) We were still more impressed by the unmistakable proofs of genuine devotion and personal attachment to the King-Emperor. (Cheers.) At every place we visited where my dear father had been thirty years ago the event was spoken of with the keenest interest and pride, not only by those who remembered seeing him but also by the younger generation. Although we were welcomed everywhere by happy, holiday-making crowds which thronged the gaily-decorated streets we did not forget the misery and poverty which alas! existed in certain districts afflicted by famine through which we passed. (Hear, hear.) When at Gwalior I had an opportunity of inspecting a famine camp, and saw with sad interest, but with satisfaction, the excellent arrangements effectively carried out for mitigating the sufferings of upwards of 6,000 men, women, and children who were there employed, fed, and cared for. (Cheers.)"

"Our visits to several of the great Feudatory States will always be reckoned among the happiest and most interesting of our experiences. We were received by the respective rulers and their peoples with the warmest enthusiasm, with all the gorgeousness and circumstances of old Indian customs, and by them entertained with magnificent hospitality. (Cheers.) I enjoyed social intercourse with many of these great Princes, and I was impressed with their loyalty and personal allegiance to the Crown, their nobility of mind, their chivalrous nature, and the great powers which they possess for doing good. (Cheers.) I might mention that in several of these States the Imperial Service troops are an important feature. They are raised, equipped, and maintained by the Princes themselves, to be placed at our disposal in time of war. Though these States supply their own officers, these regiments are under the guidance and inspection of British officers, and it is to be hoped that this excellent movement may be extended throughout all the Feudatory States. (Cheers.) No one could possibly fail to be struck with the wonderful administration of India. Time did not permit of our leaving the beaten track for the interior of the country, and thereby gaining an insight into the machinery of that most efficient organisation, the Government of a district. But we had opportunities of seeing at the headquarters of the Presidencies and of the different Provinces the general and admirable working of the Civil Service. (Cheers.) At the same time we realised that it is a mere handful of highly-educated British officials, often living a hard and strenuous life, frequently separated from their fellow-countrymen, and subject to the trials and discomforts of the plains, who are warring hand in hand with representatives of the different races in the administration of enormous areas and in the government of millions of people (Cheers) During the month of December in the neighbourhood of Rawal Pindi I had the pleasure of staying with Lord Kitchener in his camp of manoeuvres, and witnessed operations on an extended scale between two Armies numbering in all over 55,000 men, terminating in a review and march past of the largest force ever brought together in India in time of peace I was struck with the general fitness and the splendid appearance of the British troops, with the physique and power of endurance of the Native Army and the dash of its Cavalry, while throughout the Army I found an earnest desire for increased efficiency and for readiness to take the field (Cheers) I was specially glad to have this opportunity of being associated with our magnificent Army in India under such practical conditions (Cheers) I am proud to say that during my tour I was able to inspect 113,000 troops (Cheers) Having seen several colleges and other educational institutions in different parts of India, I gained some slight idea of the efforts that are being made to place within the reach of all classes a liberal education (Hear, hear) Let me take as an example the great Mohammedan college and school at Aligarh which is supported and controlled by the private enterprise of Mohammedan gentlemen from all parts of India A residential system similar to that at Oxford and Cambridge has been adopted At the same time athletics are not neglected, and in all schools and colleges there is much emulation in cricket and football Undoubtedly, such institutions must materially affect the formation of character in future generations

"If I were asked to name any general impressions which I have formed during this exceptional but all too short experience, they would be that I have learnt to appreciate the fact that India cannot be regarded as one country. We talk casually of going to India But the majority of us perhaps do not realise that it is a continent with an area equal to the whole of Europe, without Russia, containing a population of 300,000,000 of diverse races, languages, and creeds, and with many different grades of civilisation I was struck with its immense size its splendour, its numerous races, its varied climate, its snow-capped mountains, its boundless deserts, its mighty rivers, its architectural monuments, and its ancient traditions I have realised the patience, the simplicity of life, the loyal devotion, and the religious spirit which characterise the Indian peoples I know also their faith in the absolute justice and integrity of our rule (Cheers) I cannot help thinking, from all I have heard and seen that the task of governing India will be made the easier if we, on our part, infuse into it a wider element of sympathy (Cheers) I will venture to predict that to such sympathy there will be an ever abundant and genuine response (Cheers) May we not also hope for a still fuller measure of trust and confidence in our earnest desire and efforts to promote the well being and to further the best interests of every class? (Cheers) In speaking of my impressions I should like very briefly to record a few of those scenes and incidents which will be to us of lasting value

"Would that I were able in any way to picture our arrival in Bombay amid the greetings and hearty acclamations of its cosmopolitan population, dressed in every conceivable colour, and all beneath the clearest blue of an Eastern sky Quitting Bombay in tropical heat, my thoughts carry me from there over hundreds of miles almost as far as from London to Constantinople, to the rigorous climate of the Khyber Pass The Union Jack, floating over the fortress of Jamrud, reminds us that British protection is guaranteed to the caravans that pass twice a week to and from Afghanistan throughout this twenty-five miles of neutral territory. At Lundi Kotai, the further entrance of the Pass, five British officers and a regiment of

Afridis—that tribe which only a few years ago was fighting against us—now garrison this lonely outpost of our Indian Empire To the historic stronghold of Ah Musjid came the leading Khans, each bringing offerings of goodwill in the shape of the pick of their flocks of sheep and the finest specimens of their honey. Contrast such wild and semi-civilised scenes with Delhi and Agra, those centres of artistic wealth and of priceless architectural monuments, for the preservation of which and the great care bestowed upon them universal thanks are due to the late Viceroy, Lord Curzon (Loud cheers) Imagine us next at Gwalior, and later on at Benares making our public entry under conditions impossible in any other part of the world mounted as we were on elephants, gorgeously caparisoned, and passing amid escorts and troops clothed and equipped in all the picturesqueness of medieval pageantry But among all these varied and striking impressions none have stirred our hearts as did the Ridge at Delhi and the grounds and ruins of the Lucknow Residency (Cheers) They recalled with vivid reality those glorious heroes and those thrilling deeds which will for ever make sacred the story of the Indian Mutiny I think you will all be interested to know that Colonel Bonham, one of the few survivors of the siege of Lucknow, is present here among us to day (Cheers) Although he was wounded three times during the siege, I am glad to say he is still fit and well and was good enough to act as our guide when we were at Lucknow in December last (Cheers) The new year saw us in Calcutta the capital of India, and the second largest city of the British Empire where our reception was most cordial and sympathetic Here I had the satisfaction of laying the foundation stone of the Queen Victoria Memorial Hall a great and national memorial—the inception of which is chiefly due to Lord Curzon—(Cheers)—to be a treasure house of relics and records of the life and reign of our late beloved Sovereign, whose memory is held in loving veneration by every race throughout the Continent of India (Cheers)

"If time permitted I should like to dwell upon Burma so different as it is to India in the nature of its people and in its social characteristics, to speak of the famous golden pagoda at Rangoon, of the interesting sights at Mandalay, and of three delightful days spent on the great River Irrawaddy Let us change the scene to Madras and its historic associations, so closely connected with the foundation of our Indian Empire Let us pass thence through the hot plains of Southern India, journeying northwards through Benares, the metropolis of Hinduism, with its sacred river and famous shrine, until at length we re-enter the region of frost and snows at Quetta, with its outpost at Chaman, another gateway in that wild and mountainous district which constitutes our North west frontier of India Leaving Quetta we retrace our steps through that triumph of engineering skill, the railroad through the Bolan Pass, and descending from an altitude of 5,500ft. we pass through the burning plains of Sind and reach Karachi, the rapidly growing port of that province And here we bid farewell to the country where for many months we had found a second home and for whose people we shall preserve a lasting affection (Cheers) But these are mere first impressions I am fully aware how impossible it is to gain accurate and intimate knowledge of so vast a country by a visit of only four and a half months Yet I would strongly suggest to those who are interested in the great questions which surround the India of to day to go there and learn as much as possible by personal observations on the spot. (Hear, hear.) I cannot but think that every Briton who treads the soil of India is assisting towards a better understanding with the Mother Country, helping to break down prejudice, to dispel misapprehension, and to foster sympathy and brotherhood (Cheers) Thus he will not only strengthen the old ties but create new ones—(cheers)—and so, please God secure a hear.) I will tell this illustrious assembly what in my opinion that is. It is when His Royal Highness, after recounting in eloquent and picturesque language all his experiences, said that it might be that what we needed to perfect our work, to further it, were wider elements of sympathy. (Cheers.) I am bound to say that from my own tolerably short experience of Indian Government when the Prince of Wales talks of the wider elements of sympathy I believe he there recognises that sympathy is the secret of our power in India, exactly as justice and clemency are the corner-stones of our strength in that dominion. It is the true secret of our power. All that has fallen from Mr. Balfour commands my entire agreement and accord, but I will only say this, that though sympathy is the supreme duty, nobody can deny that in India sympathy has also to meet with supreme difficulties. It is no easy thing in dealing with so many nations and races of different creeds, of different faiths, old customs, old habits—it is no easy thing to get into strict sympathy with all these heterogeneous populations, but that is a duty that has got, at all events, to be persistently attempted. (Hear, hear.) It is quite true that this diversity of faith and race draws a veil down between the intercourse of any Western and an Asiatic, and I think Lord Curzon used the right phrase when he said: 'Who can be sure that he knows the mind and the heart of these millions of heterogeneous people, between whom and ourselves this veil of mystery drops? However that may be, the attempt must be made, and I for one most ardently welcome the language which has fallen from His Royal Highness, because I believe it will have the effect all over India and in this country of doing much to unite the Government and the governed. You can only unite the Government and the governed, in the peculiar circumstances between ourselves and the population of India, by sympathy. (Hear, hear.) The Government of India, of which I will only say one word, is complex and very cumbrous, and it may be that, not in our time perhaps, but before any very long time, the great fabric which was erected by the Act of 1858, which transferred the government from the East India Company to the Crown, may have to be revised. But that is not certainly for my day. I will only say this, that the key to good government in India and to the steadfast and successful working of the machine must depend upon a good and right understanding between His Majesty's Government at Whitehall and the agents of that Government at Simla. And this is the last word that I have to say. It is my happy fortune to be able to assure this illustrious assembly that the excellent and helpful accord between the Secretary of State and the Governor-General have never been more complete than that which I am glad to say reigns between the present Secretary of State and the present Governor-General. (Cheers.) In the Governor-General's name, and in the name of that great host of his fellow-workers, I beg to tender you their thanks for the toast that you have just drunk.' (Cheers.)

Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, who was received with cheers, said: "May it please Your Royal Highnesses, my Lords, Ladies, and Gentlemen,—The toast which I have to propose is one, happily for me, and happily for you, which requires few words of commendation. It commends itself. The City of London is always ready for true public services. It always greets with loyalty every member of the Royal House, and it also is ever ready to acknowledge any useful public service brilliantly performed. On the present occasion it can combine these two motives in one—(cheers)—and I am sure that not only this distinguished company, but the whole mass of our fellow-countrymen, from one end of the island to the other, are indebted to the Corporation of the City, for in this splendid manner welcoming the Prince and Princess of Wales on their return for the great public service they have rendered. (Loud cheers.) The Lord Mayor maintains untarnished and undiminished the best traditions of the chair he fills. (Hear, hear.) He has shown us how splendidly he can exercise the office that he holds, and I am sure you will all with one accord thank him for his hospitality and drink to his very good health." (Cheers.)

The Lord Mayor in reply said: "Your Royal Highnesses, my Lords, Ladies, and Gentlemen,—On behalf of myself and the Corporation of the City of London, I need only say how pleased we are and how honoured we feel to have had the privilege of entertaining Your Royal Highnesses to-day. I am sorry that the abominable English weather has not treated you as it ought to have done. It has deprived me to a large extent of the voice which I ought to have had on this occasion. I hope, therefore, you will excuse my shortcomings. Allow me to thank you very much for your hearty good wishes for my health." (Cheers.)

Their Royal Highnesses, with the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress, then withdrew, and after a brief stay in a withdrawing-room, when more members of the Reception Committee were presented, they left the Guildhall amid the cheers of the assembled crowds, and drove back, welcomed all along the route by large numbers of the people, to Marlborough House.

Newcastle Daily Chronicle.—Nearly five years ago, the Prince and Princess of Wales visited the Guildhall and received the congratulations of the ancient City of London on the happy conclusion of their memorable colonial tour. Yesterday Their Royal Highnesses enjoyed once more the hospitality and felicitations of the City fathers on their return from travels quite as arduous and fruitful of good results. Some attempt was made to brighten by decorations the route along which they passed from Marlborough House to the historic hall solemnly guarded by Gog and Magog. Truth to say, however, the genius of street decorations is not ours, and the German mayors at the present moment the guests of London must have smiled at the poverty of the effect produced in comparison with the elaborate displays to be witnessed on occasions in Germany. As a great nation we can nevertheless afford to despise the attributes of the circus and country fair and fall back upon what is of much greater importance—the spontaneity and sincerity of the welcome accorded to the august travellers who have come home after wanderings, more extensive than those of Ulysses, undertaken in the best interests of the British Empire. Such a procession as that seen yesterday could only by hyperbole be termed a pageant. A few policemen, an escort of glittering Royal Horse Guards, a number of carriages containing the Prince and Princess and the officials of their household, and all is said. The sole unfamiliar and exotic feature of the scene was provided by the two mounted Indian orderlies, who in the rich trappings of their native uniform rode by the side of the Royal carriage.

The character and objects of the Prince and Princess's journey through India have been already so fully discussed on previous occasions in these columns that it would be a superfluity further to enlarge upon them. In a speech of considerable length, testifying to his increasing ability as a public speaker, His Royal Highness, however, completed in a very vivid fashion the impression created by his sojourn in the "mystic East" and the 8,000 miles of territory traversed by him during the six months which followed his landing at Bombay and closed with his farewell to India at Karachi. It was said of Burke that, without having set foot in the vast dependency administered by John Company and Warren Hastings, he had managed to obtain an extraordinary insight of the country and the natives to enable him to deal with his theme in the finest spirit of sympathy. This fine sympathy was admirably displayed by the Prince of Wales, who nevertheless warned his hearers to acquire it. Englishmen must see India for themselves. It is a fact that inasmuch as it is not given to everybody to be a Burke, the only way really to understand India is to tread its soil and study the country and population on the spot. The appeal made by His Royal Highness is that Britons who can afford the luxury of distant travel, and who are interested in promoting the cohesion of our diversified empire, should go to far Ind and help to break down prejudices, to dispel misapprehension, and to foster sympathy and brotherhood." The Prince himself, with the gracious partner of his wanderings, has done much in this direction. In a vigorous bird's eye flight description he took his audience yesterday from the tropical heat of Bombay to the rigorous climate of the Khyber Pass, and from the semi-civilised scenes of Lundi Kotal to the artistic wealth and monumental grandeur of Delhi and Agra. His rapid survey, which included Burmah, "delightful days on the Irrawaddy," Madras, and Benares with its sacred rivers and famous shrines, was illuminated by references to the great events which have furnished dark yet glorious pages to the annals of India's occupation by the British and the whole was pervaded by a deep feeling of sympathy which could not but react on all those privileged to listen to him. Stronger evidence could not have been adduced to prove that the Prince of Wales understands India, and that in understanding it he has also been understood by the multitudinous and diverse peoples with whom he has been brought into personal contact.

The country owes a great debt to the Prince and Princess of Wales, who have put a girdle round the British Empire and stimulated loyalty and community of brotherhood. The debt is not one which any citizen is likely to forget, nor will omission be made of the thanks due to other members of the Royal family for the services rendered by them. Newly returned are just now the Duke and Duchess of Connaught from a visit to South Africa which has produced excellent effects in that portion of the British Empire, and their son Prince Arthur of Connaught has for some time been employed on an important mission abroad, culminating in a most interesting journey to the court of Great Britain's ally, the Mikado. It should be now the turn of the Prince and Princess of Wales to take a well-deserved period of rest, and to refresh themselves after their long absence and severe labours in the joys of home and society of their children. Their presence is, moreover, needed in this country, as it is well that the heir to the throne and future Queen should remain in close touch with the nation and its affairs. While both the Prince and Princess of Wales are, it is needless to remark, extremely popular with all classes in this country, it cannot be denied that they are somewhat overshadowed by the powerful personality of King Edward and the fascination which Queen Alexandra has always exerted. During the lifetime of the late Queen-Victoria, her habits of seclusion necessarily drove her son the Prince of Wales and daughter-in-law the Princess into almost absolute prominence. This state of things no longer exists in the case of a jovial King and charming Queen, who at home and abroad have brought the Royal prestige to its most brilliant point. It seems therefore desirable that the Prince and Princess of Wales should take the conspicuous place which belongs to them.

Pall Mall Gazette.—The last Chapter in the story of the historic tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales in India was written yesterday, when the city welcomed the illustrious travellers home with traditional hospitality. The Prince of Wales has, evidently, not wasted the vast opportunities for observation which his travels have afforded him. Two lessons he has learnt in India about India. First, there is the great truth of the vastness of the land and the diversity of its peoples. "I learnt," he said, "to appreciate the fact that India cannot be regarded as one country." Then, the Prince has seen enough to make him feel that British rule, founded though it is upon absolute justice and integrity, would be all the easier for us to exercise if it were also inspired by "a wider element of sympathy." Perhaps the suaviter in modo is not precisely the most prominent characteristic, not merely of Anglo-Indian officialdom, but of the Englishman always and everywhere. At all events, no harm, but only good, can come of bearing in mind, and putting into practice, the suggestion the Prince made yesterday. And it is one that will certainly be appreciated highly by our native fellow-subjects.

Sheffield Telegraph.—When the Prince of Wales was fêted by the City of London after his return from his Colonial tour, he told the country that the great lesson which had been impressed upon him by the eager life of the young nations he had been visiting was that it was time for John Bull to wake up. There was no such catchy phrase in the speech which he made at the banquet in his honour given at the Guildhall yesterday; but the speech was none the less of real interest, and alive with the impressions of the Indian tour from which the Princess and he have just returned. He could hardly say that the lesson of that tour also was "Wake up." Unlike Prince Arthur of Connaught who is due to arrive in Liverpool to-day after a notable embassy of peace, the Prince of Wales did not extend his journey to Japan. There he would have mixed with a people of abounding energy, who, after a sleep of many centuries, have "waked up" to some purpose. There receptivity, their enthusiasm, put us to shame; but it is otherwise with that "Middle East" which the Prince of Wales has visited. In a fine poem, Mr. William Watson has contrasted the restless fuss and enjoyment of a collie taken out for a walk with the proud restraint and calm of the household cat, and he has seen in the conduct of the two pet animals a type respectively of East and West—of Occidental restlessness and Oriental calm. If the restlessness made its mark upon the Prince's mind after the Colonial tour, he has returned now impressed by India's wonderful calm and patience.

So he comes back to England, and appeals to his fellow-countrymen this time to display, not more energy, but more sympathy. He tells us of "the patience, the simplicity of life, the loyal devotion, and the religious spirit" which characterise the inhabitants of our great Dependency; and he assures us that, if we give them our sympathy, we shall reap a rich reward in their response. The words bear the stamp of a statesman. They show that the Prince of Wales has got to the root of things; that he has not looked on India merely with the tourist's eyes. He saw the great buildings; but he saw also the teeming multitudes that had made them possible. He heard the cheers of the holiday crowds; but he heard also the far-off cry of poverty and famine. India is not a thing that you can sum up in a sentence. To know it as it is, you must have lived in it, and given your heart to it. But the Prince has seen enough with his shrewd, observant eyes to enable him to understand the difficulty of understanding it. India is not one: she is many. As the Prince told the brilliant gathering at the Guildhall yesterday, few of us realise that India is not so much a country as a continent. She is equal in superficies to the whole of Europe with Russia left out; and the millions of her population belong to many diverse races and worship many diverse gods. Edmund Burke once said that the British Empire in India was an awful thing; and he was right. It means that Britain, in that far-off land, sways the destinies of more than a fifth of the human race. The task is one that may justly be described as awful—awful in its possibilities, awful in its responsibilities.

Englishmen have won the loyalty and the confidence of these swarming millions by reason of two natural virtues—love of justice and love of truth. But, to complete the work, as the Prince of Wales reminds us, we need love of another kind—love, not for abstract virtues, but for the people themselves. For that, and nothing less, is what sympathy means. You cannot get to the heart of a people unless you have first given your heart to that people. It is well for England that so many of her sons who have gone to bear rule in India have given to the people of India that last and best gift. But for that, our influence on India would have been transient indeed. While we talk of the unchanging East, and we quote glibly Matthew Arnold's lines about her "patient, deep disdain," we need yesterday's reminder that the unchanging East will yield to sympathy what she has never yielded yet to her conquerors by force of arms. But it is not enough that the men on the spot should bring to their great task of government enlightened intuitions and an enduring sympathy. It was not for sympathy on the part of the rulers of India that the Prince of Wales pleaded, but for sympathy on the part of the people here at home. Too often we are unsympathetic because we are ignorant, and the Prince of Wales urged all who have the means and the leisure to visit India to make their way thither, and learn something of its places and its peoples. And if Englishmen who can would only take his advice, it would be vastly to the good, provided always, of course, that they are not content with mere globe-trotten impressions. To the vast majority, however, a visit to India is impossible. The greater reason, then, why we should try to bridge the distance by means of books and sober reflections.

10TH MAY 1906.

City Press.—The event of the week in the City has been the reception of the Prince and Princess of Wales at the Guildhall. We need say little about it here—the proceedings, as reported in another part of our issue, speak for themselves. The popular interest in the occasion was shown by the crowds that assembled on the line of route, the greetings which Their Royal Highnesses received, and the numerous decorations within the City with their loyal mottoes. The civic programme was, as nearly as possible, in accordance with the precedent set when the Prince and Princess returned from their Colonial tour between four and five years ago, and with regard to the whole function it may be said that it was worthy of the best traditions of the City and the Corporation. It is a curious coincidence that, if the reception had been a couple of days later, it would have fallen on the anniversary of King Edward's reception thirty years ago on his return from a similar visit to India when Prince of Wales. A good many of those present at the luncheon would be able to call to mind the festivities on that occasion, though a considerable proportion of the guests of that day have passed away. Those who remain, and are able to take part in the activities of business and official life, have witnessed many changes at home—in the main, we hope, for the better. There have been greater changes still in other parts of the world, and even the "unchanging East" has not been exempt from them. In one respect, however, the City has certainly not changed—and the same may be said of the country generally—it is as loyal to the throne as it has always been: to the King as in former days to his august mother. As the heir to the throne, the progress of the Prince through our Indian Empire has been watched with genuine sympathy and interest, and every step of the way the Prince and his consort have been followed by the best wishes of all classes of the community. As a matter of fact, the congratulatory reception at the Guildhall was really a national event, and so, of course, it would be understood by Their Royal Highnesses and so also it will be recognised throughout the United Kingdom. We are not sorry that in his speech at the luncheon the Prince was able to speak of his Indian tour as "the completion of the mission originally entrusted to us by the King," for travelling has its dangers, and we are glad to have the heir to the throne and the Princess safe at home.

Outlook.—Not the least admirable result of the Prince of Wales's many voyages are the speeches he makes on his return. If he travels with much of the zest of Homer's many-counselled wanderer, he reflects upon his travels with something of the breadth of Thucydides. At Guildhall on Thursday last his words had just the touch of statesmanship and eloquence which made his earlier utterance famous on returning from the Colonies. "I cannot help thinking, from all I have heard and seen," he said, with an insight which was warmly acknowledged by Mr. Morley and Mr. Balfour afterwards, "that the task of governing India will be made the easier if we, on our part, infuse into it a wider element of sympathy." That is profoundly true. English sympathy goes out a little too readily to the malcontents who air their grievances in this country, too slowly to the men who bear the brunt of administration all over the world; and Mr. Balfour spoke strongly to the point when he urged the importance of confining discussion in Parliament as far as possible to matters which its members understand. Englishmen of England can really take no better example of the tone and spirit in which they should approach the many problems of Imperial rule than the Prince of Wales has set them in this speech. It will, we are sure, be welcomed with warmth and gratitude by the Viceroy, the Commander-in-Chief, and all the Indian servants of the Crown.

Saturday Review.—The City's welcome home to the Prince and Princess of Wales from their Indian travel was magnificent, West-rivalling East in splendour. It is one of the compensations of the party system that when without a discordant note, or a thought of party, our leading statesmen join in celebrating an event like this, the effect is the more excellent. If English people think—or shout—Empire ordinarily, they really feel it on such an occasion. Nothing could be better than the speeches on Thursday at the Guildhall, the Prince of Wales's homely touch recalling "my dear father's" visit to India thirty years ago being particularly happy.

Spectator.—On Thursday the Prince and Princess of Wales were entertained by the City of London at luncheon at the Guildhall. No one who reads the Prince of Wales's speech will think us guilty of the crime of flattery—almost the greatest of crimes in regard to Princes—when we say that it was conspicuous for charm, good feeling, and good sense. After a felicitous tribute to the great feudatory Princes for "their loyalty, their nobility of mind, and their chivalrous nature," a well-merited appreciation of the splendid work done by the Indian Civil Service, and an acknowledgment of the high qualities of the British and Native Armies in India, the Prince made a tactful reference to the great Mohammedan College and School at Aligarh. At a moment when there has been friction with a Mohammedan Power, the Prince did good service by thus calling to mind how we have helped and encouraged the best influences at work among the adherents of Islam in India. After noting the essential fact in regard to India—namely, that India is not a country but a continent—the Prince insisted that the task of governing India will be made easier "if we on our part infuse into it a wider element of sympathy." In a passage full of picturesque detail the Prince described some memorable scenes and incidents in his tour. What seems to have struck him most forcibly was his visit to the North-West Frontier, where, as he tells us, he saw a regiment of Afridis, "that tribe that only a few years ago was fighting against us," garrisoning Landi Kotal.

This reference to the peaceful conditions which now reign on the border was most happy, and will, we trust, act as a warning to those restless spirits in India who cannot leave well alone, but who, infatuated with the desire to alter the status quo, would risk hostility with the tribes in an effort to bring them more directly under our control. The Prince ended his admirable speech by a suggestion that all who can should follow his example of making a first-hand acquaintance with India. Mr. Morley echoed the Prince of Wales's appeal for sympathy, and though pointing out that in India sympathy had to meet with supreme difficulties, declared that it was none the less the true secret of our power. We may add that though sympathy is essential, we must never forget that justice and insight are also of paramount importance. We must be careful that sympathy shall never be one-sided, for, if it is, it may obscure justice.

Yorkshire Herald.—It is not always recognised, perhaps, how many and varied are the activities of the British Royal Family, and certainly it is not often that the truth is given such vivid embodiment as it was, quite spontaneously in the speech of the Prince of Wales at the London Guildhall. Five years before the Prince and Princess had been entertained by the City Corporation on the termination of their memorable visit to the colonies. Now, in completion of the mission originally entrusted to them, they celebrated the conclusion of a trip to and through India, involving a railway journey of some nine thousand miles, and enabling Their Royal Highnesses to boast that they have made the acquaintance of nearly every part of the British Empire. To this splendid record we have, in our survey of Royal activity, to add several interesting coincidences. In the Suez Canal the Prince met his uncle, the Duke of Connaught, returning from a most successful tour in South Africa. In the Mediterranean he unexpectedly encountered His Majesty the King, enjoying a cruise undertaken for the benefit of his health and that of the Queen but pretty certain to leave behind at various points those beneficial influences which are inseparable from the King's journeyings; while His Royal Highness's return to his native land only briefly preceded that of Prince Arthur Connaught, who has discharged a notable mission to Japan and won innumerable friends in Canada. It remains only to recall the circumstance that thirty years ago welcome was given in the City to the Prince's august father, newly returned from his own travels in the Indian Empire.

The Prince of Wales has himself to thank that his speeches are always looked to for something in the nature of light and leading. In the present instance there is nothing so electrifying as the "Wake up, England" of five years since, but there is much that is interesting, while some passages have undoubtedly importance. Their Royal Highnesses, as was only to be expected, have been profoundly impressed by the wonderful country in which "for many months they found a second home, and for whose peoples they will preserve a lasting affection," and with charming effect the Prince passes in rapid review the principal places visited, the more impressive and interesting of the strange sights which were presented to their gaze, and the magnificent pageants in which they took a prominent part. With the skill of an artist he invests his pictures with something of the glamour of the east, and his glowing descriptions cannot fail to awaken in many hearts and minds the ardent desire to make that personal acquaintance of our great dependency which His Royal Highness esteems as of such value for the amicable relationship of governments and governed. "Every Briton who treads the soil of India," says the Prince, "is assisting towards a better understanding with the mother country, helping to break down prejudice, to dispel misapprehension, and to foster sympathy and brotherhood." And it is noteworthy that to the silken tie of sympathy His Royal Highness attaches the greatest importance. While modestly disclaiming any exaggerated significance for first impressions of so vast a country formed in a visit of only four and-a-half months, the Prince lets it be known that he has arrived at certain conclusions. He has realised, as he informs us, the patience, the simplicity and love, the loyal devotion, and the religious spirit which characterise the Indian peoples. He knows also their faith in the absolute justice and integrity of our rule, and the conviction has grown within him that these traits and qualities may be deepened and heightened, that this favourable disposition towards us may be promoted if we on our part infuse into our government a wider element of sympathy.

We do not gather that His Royal Highness has any set complaint to make respecting our rule in India. He recognises, indeed, that we are prompted by an earnest desire to promote the welfare of the people; he has marked the practical effect which we endeavour to give to that wish in various directions, but he pleads, as we take it, for the cultivation of a more finely sympathetic temperament, which may respond with greatest readiness to the currents of thought and of sentiment of the numerous races with whom we have to deal. And in this connection we need to note what His Royal Highness cites as his general impression formed during his recent experience—that India cannot be regarded as one country, but that attention must be had to its different languages and creeds, to its varied grades of civilisation, to its separate races of people. Here is the lesson which the Prince has learned in his tour of splendour and of wonders, and which he submits for the consideration of those who are most nearly concerned in the government and management of India. It is very simple; yet in its very simplicity, in its truthfulness of perception, in its applicability to every day need and aspirations, in its wideness of reach, and in its promise of fruitfulness, it is worthy of the Prince who may sometime rule a mighty empire.

23RD MAY 1906.

Civil and Military Gazette.—A correspondent writes: When His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales pleads for the better understanding of India and Indian conditions at home, one cannot help wondering whether he believes that his own action shows evidence of the clear knowledge he advocates.

What is the exact meaning of a solemn State service in Westminster Abbey in thanksgiving for the safe return of the Prince and Princess from India? Does it not imply that the travellers had been journeying in savage and heathen lands beset with perils, to pass through which unscathed is something to be thankful for? When the King or the Prince visit Ireland, they do not have national thanksgiving services on their return, nor when the King travels on the Continent, ascends Vesuvius in eruption and goes as far afield as Greece. The Prince did not, I believe, think it necessary to attend a State service of thanksgiving after his tour through the colonies a few years ago—so evidently the duration or extent of his travels has nothing to do with the reason; it is the sort of country that counts. By all means have private thanksgiving to any extent, but a State service of thanksgiving seems to me a left-handed compliment to India.

26TH MAY 1906.

United India and Native States.—The Statesman referring to the Prince of Wales's speech at the Guildhall says: "It is commonly assumed that a visitor in the position of the Prince of Wales, hampered by ceremonial and hemmed in by the artificiality of a series of public receptions, has few or no opportunities of seeing things as they really are. To a great extent, no doubt, this is so; but the statesmanlike utterances of His Royal Highness at the Guildhall show that he at any rate is under no delusions on this subject, but that during his recent tour in India he succeeded in penetrating through the veil of pomp and ceremony and in gaining a glimpse of the reality behind. There is every reason to hope that this Royal appeal, as it might almost be called, will prove fruitful of a saner appreciation of their duties and responsibilities by those whose lot it is to watch over India's destinies."

30TH MAY 1906.

Civil and Military Gazette.—A thick fog enveloped the Channel when, on May 7th, the Renown, escorted by the Terrible, brought the Prince and Princess of Wales back to English shores, which they had left seven months before. The two warships, which had anchored at Weymouth, left their moorings at one o'clock in the afternoon, but so dense was the haze, and so cautiously had navigation to be conducted, that it was not until late in the evening that they arrived at Spithead, where they were to lie till the following day, when Their Royal Highnesses were to land and proceed to London.

Princess Edward, Albert, and Henry, with their sister, Princess Mary, had arrived at Portsmouth early in the afternoon as the guests of Sir Archibald and Lady Douglas at Admiralty House, in order to be on the spot to greet their parents. During the afternoon they embarked in the Admiral's yacht, Fire Queen, and proceeded out of the harbour in the hope of meeting the fleet and the Renown in the open, but on standing out to the Channel the yacht encountered the dense blanket-like screen which hid everything from view, and it was deemed advisable to return to Portsmouth at once. Shortly after six o'clock the Renown was sighted emerging from the fog and heading for Spithead, the Trinity yacht, Irene, leading the way, the escorting cruiser, Terrible, bringing up the rear; the Channel Fleet being on the move in the same direction, but at some distance astern.

It was not until sunset that the fleet came to anchor at Spithead, but the arrival was made the occasion of a very picturesque ceremony. The Renown and Terrible had taken up their positions when the Channel ships came in from the eastward in two lines; one being headed by the battleship Ernmouth, flagship of Admiral Sir A. K. Wilson, Commander-in-Chief of the Channel Fleet, and the other by the Albemarle, flagship of Rear-Admiral Groome. Following them, each vessel flying masthead flags, came the battleships Prince George, Ocean, Swiftsure, Illustrious, Montagu, and Glory, and the cruisers, Dido, Juno, and Topaze.

As they approached the Renown, which flew the Prince of Wales's standard at the main, every ship was manned and the powerful fleet circled round the white-hulled vessel, firing a salute of 21 guns, and, passing round to the appointed anchorage, anchored for the night in such a position that the Renown remained at the head of one line and the Terrible at the head of the second, the two Admirals' ships coming next.

The Royal travellers received a warm welcome from the people of Portsmouth on landing.

The morning broke warm and hazy, but the sun soon dispelled the mist, and on a sea of magical beauty Admiral Wilson's fine fleet, together with the commissioned war-ships in Portsmouth Harbour, made themselves gay over all with flags. Only the Renown and the Terrible remained undecorated, but they stood out from the rest of the drab fighting ships by reason of their glistening white paint and green waterline.

It was soon after breakfast time that the Prince's three sons, with Princess Mary, came joyously out of Admiralty House, and boarded the Admiral's barge, eager to rejoin their parents. The run out to Spithead was made in glorious weather and when the Royal children saw the Prince and as soon as the barge was alongside the Renown, the children ran quickly up the gangway, and were greeted most affectionately by their parents. In an hour's time they were on the bridge, plying the gold-laced officers with a multitude of questions, picking out the ships of the Channel Fleet with the aid of marine glasses, and behaving as naturally and as excitedly as any children would do who had been reunited with their parents after a long separation.

Suddenly there were movements on the flag-bedecked fleet. Bluejackets and marines took their stations on deck.

The Renown clanked up her anchors slowly and at half past ten the first salute came booming from No Man's Fort. Soon the warship was steaming her way to the harbour and the Channel Fleet thundered out a resonant farewell from the guns, while the bands played and the massed men in scarlet and blue cheered vociferously.

Led by the Trinity steamer Irene, the white-painted battleship passed Southsea pier to the roar of the Garrison Artillery. A tug steamed up to her port side to assist her in the passage of the narrow neck to the harbour, and the old three-decker, Victory announced the crossing of the harbour bar. The salute was taken up by the Reserve Fleet ships in the harbour, and it was to a continuous roar of firing that the Renown came to rest at the railway jetty.

On the red-baized platform were a distinguished group of naval and military officers, with guards of honour of Marines and bluejackets, and the band of the Royal Marine Light Infantry. The ships in the harbour included the Blaze, which arrived home the previous night with the nucleus of the crew to commission the Queen, the Sutlej and the Colossus. The Admiralty yacht Enchantress and the old Royal yacht Albert joined in the general welcome, dressed rainbow fashion; their crews lining the decks and cheering.

Among those who were on the jetty to welcome Their Royal Highnesses home were the Duke and Duchess of Teck, Prince Francis, Prince and Princess Alexander of Teck, Lord Crichton, Sir William Carrington, Admiral Sir Archibald Douglas (the Commander-in-Chief), General Sir Ian Hamilton, General Sir H. H. Settle, and the officers of the garrison.

Brilliant uniforms and brilliant weather combined to enrich the spectacle with beauty. Just as the Renown was successfully warped up, the Terrible passed on her way to her moorings close by. The crew had manned the rigging as well as the decks, and as the cruiser swept by the bridges her band played God bless the Prince of Wales, in which the crew joined heartily finishing up with hearty cheers. It seemed a spontaneous outbreak. At any rate, it was a picturesque incident by which to close a long period of escort duty.

The Prince and Princess lunched on board the Renown, and at three o'clock the Royal train of the Brighton and South Coast Railway was alongside the ship in readiness for the journey to London. The Mayor of Portsmouth, with the aldermen and councillors, were in attendance in their robes, and on board the Renown presented an address of welcome to the Prince and Princess, which alluded to the "devotion to the best interests of the British Empire which led Your Royal Highnesses to undertake a visit to India." The Prince handed to His Worship the following reply:—

"The Princess of Wales and I desire to thank you sincerely for the kind words with which you, in the name of the inhabitants of Portsmouth, welcome us to-day on our return to England.

I earnestly trust that the good results which you anticipate from our visit to India may be realised.

"We are thankful to God that we have returned in safety to our beloved country, and in the enjoyment of that good health with which we have been blessed during our travels."

When the special train steamed into Victoria Station as five o'clock was striking, a brilliant company was assembled on the platform. The King had arrived about ten minutes before, and all the members of the Royal Family who are in England were present to welcome the Prince and Princess.

The Princess of Wales was particularly affectionate in her manner as she embraced Princess Ena of Battenberg. Her congratulations upon the Princess's approaching marriage were evidently very cordial, for the latter blushed with pleasure as the Princess of Wales kissed her and took occasion to whisper laughingly in her ear.

Lord and Lady Roberts and their daughters were there, Lord Curzon, Mr. Brodrick, ex-Secretary for India, and, of course, Mr. John Morley, the present Secretary of State. Then there were Lord Amphil, and many old friends, such as Sir John Fisher, Lord Wenlock, the Hon'ble Sydney Greville, and the Hon'ble Derek Keppel.

Of course, the guard of honour—supplied by the Grenadiers—had to be inspected, and this took some little time, but at last the private greetings and official duties were concluded, and the Prince and Princess drove away in an open landau, escorted by a detachment of Horse Guards. Facing their Royal parents in the carriage were the two elder Princes and Princess Mary between them; and it was to them perhaps that the progress through crowded streets and the Mall to Marlborough House was of most interest.

The returning wanderers met with a very cordial reception from the people who had—many of them—waited for hours on the pavements in order to catch a sight of the Royal couple.

King Edward tried to take a secondary place in the spectacle; unostentatiously following his son at a considerable interval along the same route as far as Buckingham Palace, and without any escort. He was loudly cheered, but the warmest feeling was reserved for Princess Ena, who drove away with her mother.

Pioneer.—After seven months' absence from England the Prince and Princess of Wales arrived once more in home waters on the 7th May, when the Renown brought them to Portsmouth, where the Channel Fleet gave them a loyal welcome. Their Royal Highnesses did not at once land, however, as it had been arranged that they should disembark on the following day when His Majesty, who had just returned from his Mediterranean tour, would meet them at Victoria. The weather at the time of the arrival of the Prince and Princess was not all that could have been desired; fog and haze prevailed in the Channel, and this was the cause of bitter disappointment to the children of Their Royal Highnesses, who were thereby prevented from meeting their parents as soon as they arrived.

Prince Edward, Prince Albert, Prince John, and Princess Mary arrived at Portsmouth early in the day, and were entertained by the Commander-in-Chief and Lady Douglas at Admiralty House. In the afternoon, all impatience and in the highest of spirits, the young Prince and the Princess were taken on board the Commander-in-Chief's yacht, the Fire Queen which immediately headed for the Channel in order to meet the Renown.

Unfortunately the Fire Queen ran into the fog, and on this populous highway of the sea it was not deemed advisable that any risks should be taken, and the yacht headed back to Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal children were greatly disappointed, but they consoled themselves at Admiralty House by a vigorous game of "romps," and later were taken to see from afar the Renown and the Terrible, her escort, slowly steam up to their anchorage off Spit Fort, followed later by the Channel Fleet.

It was a splendid spectacle, and many hundreds of people on Southsea beach watched the arrival. The waters of the Solent had hardly a ripple as the battleship yacht with her escort came up on the horizon. There were no salutes.

Fog had delayed the escorting squadron, and it was not until half-past seven that long lines of black smoke betokened its approach. Admiral Sir Arthur Wilson led the way on his flagship, the Exmouth, then followed the Albemarle (the flagship of Rear-Admiral Groom), Prince George, Ocean, Swiftsure, Illustrious, Montagu, and Glory, with the cruisers Dido, Junco, and Topaze.

As the fleet neared the Renown a signal fluttered from the flagship, and presently spits of red flames shot from each warship side, followed in a few seconds by the dull boom of the saluting guns. The forts were silent.

No official visits were paid to the Prince and Princess, but torpedo-destroyers were busy carrying despatches to and from shore. The Channel Fleet was moored in two lines, and during the evening put on their searchlights, a brilliant web of flashing lights, which drew many people to the beach and the piers.

Soon after eight o'clock next morning the Royal barge from the Renown was seen entering the harbour, and half an hour later she was steering for Spithead with the Princess Mary and the Princes Edward, Albert, and Henry, who had spent the night at Admiralty House.

On the stroke of eleven the Royal yacht weighed anchor and, led by the Trinity vessel Irene, headed for the harbour.

As she moved away from her position at the end of the line of war vessels, a Royal salute was fired, and the crews, manning ship, gave ringing cheers, which reverberated far across the water. When the last echo had died away, the firing was taken up by the guns in the fortifications which guard the approach to the harbour, and the great white battleship steamed majestically ahead to the accompaniment of booming cannon. Scarcely had the Renown passed through the narrow waterway when the old flagship Victory paid her tribute of welcome with another salute, and all the vessels of the Portsmouth Reserve fleet followed suit.

As the yacht approached the dockyard jetty Their Royal Highnesses, with their children, became visible, standing on the fore-bridge, and both the Prince and Princess were eagerly scanning the crowd of distinguished persons who had assembled to welcome them. Now and again friends were recognised, and the Princess waved her hand in greeting.

The crew of the cruiser Terrible, as she steamed close to the Renown on her way up harbour lining the sides of the ship and mustering in the rigging, sang "God Bless the Prince of Wales," and, waving their caps, cheered vigorously.

At half-past two the officers and the guards of honour re-assembled on the jetty in readiness for the departure for London, and a quarter of an hour later the Mayor of Portsmouth, Sir George Couzens, with the members of the corporation, drove up and went on board the yacht to present their address of welcome.

They were received in the State apartments, and the Prince of Wales's reply, which was handed to the deputation, was as follows:—

"To the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of Portsmouth.

Mr. Mayor and Gentlemen,—The Princess of Wales and I desire to thank you sincerely for the kind words with which you, in the name of the inhabitants of Portsmouth, welcome us to-day on our return to England. We earnestly trust that the good results which you anticipate from our visit to India may be realised. We are thankful to God that we have returned in safety to our beloved country and in the enjoyment of that good health with which we have been blessed during our travels."

Ten minutes later Their Royal Highnesses and party entered the special saloon train, which was in waiting on the jetty, and left amid ringing cheers from the crew of the Renown, led by Captain the Hon'ble H. Tyrwhitt, and another Royal salute.

Quite as enthusiastic as Portsmouth's welcome was the reception of the Prince and Princess at Victoria. The Prince's train was not due from Portsmouth till five o'clock, but an hour earlier every point in the station that commanded a view of the platform was occupied by eager spectators. The platform itself was, of course, reserved for the privileged few. A cheer from without signalled the arrival of a guard of honour of the 3rd Battalion, Grenadier Guards, under the command of Major Corry, with band and colour. These were soon followed by a travelling escort of Royal Horse Guards. Carriages came thick and fast bearing those anxious to greet Their Royal Highnesses. Earl Roberts came with his two daughters, Lady Aileen Roberts and Lady Edwina Roberts. Lord Curzon represented the line of Indian Viceroy. The Marchioness of Lansdowne came, also associated with another famous Viceroyalty. The present Secretary of State for India, the Right Hon'ble John Morley, was present, as well as his predecessor, the Right Hon'ble St. John Brodrick. Other departments of State were represented by the Right Hon'ble Herbert Gladstone, Lord Tweedmouth, and Sir John Fisher. Amongst others present were Lord Wenlock, Lord Revelstoke, Lord and Lady Amphil, Lord and Lady Chesham, the Hon'ble Sidney Greville, Lieutenant-General Sir Laurence Oliphant (Commanding the London District), Sir Fleetwood Edwards, Sir David Barr, Sir John Edge, the Chevalier de Martino, and Canon Teignmouth Shore.

The appointed hour drew near, and Royal carriages rolled swiftly into the station. Prince and Princess Christian came, with Princess Victoria and Princess Louise of Schleswig-Holstein, the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, with Princess Patricia, and Princess Henry of Battenberg, with Princess Ena.

The Duchess of Argyll drove up alone. Then some time still before the train was due, came the King. His Majesty, who wore a Field-Marshal's uniform, had driven in a pair-horse carriage, accompanied by Lord Althorp, the Lord Chamberlain.

On every accessible part of the station the crowd was packed thick. A train at an adjacent platform had its windows filled in with a mosaic of faces, and from its guard's van, a carriage truck and even the engine peered a host of eager spectators.

Two minutes before its time the engine of the Royal train with its Prince of Wales's Feathers and motto, "Ich Dien," above the buffers, came slowly into sight round the curve. The band of the Grenadier Guards played the National Anthem, and the train had hardly come to a standstill before the King entered the Prince's saloon. His Majesty remained within some minutes, affectionately welcoming the Prince and Princess. Then, while the Grenadiers played "God Bless the Prince of Wales," Their Royal Highnesses alighted and exchanged hearty greetings with the members of the Royal family and others upon the platform. The Prince of Wales, who looked bronzed and in the best of health, wore an Admiral's uniform, while the Princess, still in complete mourning for the King of Denmark, was attired in black costume with black boa and toque. Some moments were spent in chat, and then Their Royal Highnesses entered an open landau drawn by four bays with postilions in dark blue and white. On the front seat were Prince Edward, Prince Albert, with little Princess Mary carrying a big bouquet between them. A similar four-horse carriage followed, in which were Sir Arthur Bigge, the Hon'ble Derek Keppel, and Lady Eva Dugdale. In other carriages were the Earl and Countess of Shaftesbury, Viscount Crichton, Sir Charles Cust, and Mr. Dugdale. Preceded by red-coated outriders and escorted by the Royal Horse Guards, Their Royal Highnesses' procession passed out of the station, while a roaring cheer rose from the crowd without, and the deep boom of the Royal Artillery guns in St. James's Park sounded a salute of welcome.

A cordial reception awaited the Royal party along the route from Victoria Station to Marlborough House. British flags were run up to welcome the Heir-Apparent and his Consort, but there was not a breath of air to lift them from the poles from which they were hung. Apart from the escort of Royal Horse Guards and the troops at Victoria, the only soldiers on duty were the guard of honour of Scots Guards drawn up, with their band and pipers and the King's colour, in the courtyard of Marlborough House, which was reached by the Prince and Princess of Wales by twenty-five minutes past five.

In a leading article on the Royal visit to India the Times, after referring to its result in strengthening native loyalty to the crown, remarks that there is another view of the tour. "The Prince and Princess," continues the Times, "may be truly said to have also gone on a mission to their countrymen at home. They have set a splendid example of taking pains to know and understand the Empire, to get outside of the narrow and incurious parochialism which is perhaps the greatest danger that the British Empire has to encounter, and to realise the diversity of conditions, of manners, of creeds, and of social conceptions under which human life can be conducted just as ethically, as nobly, and as happily as under the forms in which these things exist among ourselves. Nothing is so discouraging, so humiliating, and so fitted to induce an almost despairing pessimism as the blank refusal of large sections of the British people to admit any catholicity of view, or to take the least trouble to understand that the conditions which they think right in this country are not necessarily conditions which are right or possible in other portions of the Empire. Sheer ignorance is at the bottom of this hopeless provincialism; and our deplorable systems of education leave people called educated absolutely content in their ignorance and positively hostile to any attempt to disturb its deadly self-complacency. The Prince and Princess of Wales have set the example of thirst for Imperial knowledge. They have gone to learn at first hand something of the conditions of life imposed by history, by race, by creed, by economic forces, by all the things, in short, which make men as they are and not otherwise—the things against which Legislatures and Governments exhaust their puny efforts in vain. This Indian tour is only the completion of an Imperial study. The Prince and Princess have seen with their own eyes all the great self-governing colonies as well as the great dependency from which they have just returned. For the vast majority such a grand tour is impossible. But it is not impossible for any among us to profit by the lesson, and to do according to our means and opportunities, what the Prince and Princess have done upon a royal scale. Here at home, in time probably wasted on frivolities, it is possible and easy for everyone to acquire as much Imperial knowledge as would make him worthy citizen of the Empire, and at the same time a much better citizen of the United Kingdom than he is at present.

"There is no reason except mental sluggishness and supercilious Pharisaism why any man at the present day should fail, as most do deplorably fail, to reach any sort of comprehension of the varying conditions in which the problems of life have to be solved throughout the Empire.

"If the continuing miracle of the British Empire confronts critics at home and abroad, it is because there are latent qualities in the race very imperfectly developed by education and choked at home under layers of convention, which assert themselves abroad when Englishmen are forced to rely upon their mother wit and native energy. Then they speedily realise the actual conditions, and adapt themselves thereto while their stay-at-home countrymen are too apt to regard them as reprobate and to view all their actions with profound suspicion."

SELECTION FROM NATIVE PAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE BOMBAY PRESIDENCY FOR THE WEEK ENDING 2ND JUNE 1906.

Gujarati, 27th May 1906.—"It will be admitted on all hands that Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales produced an excellent impression on the minds of the people of India by their graceful and high-minded behaviour towards all those who came in contact with them and by the very felicitous and sympathetic language in which they replied to the numerous addresses of welcome with which they were presented in the course of their extensive tour. It speaks volumes for the keen insight, sagacity and power of appreciation of His Royal Highness that he should have drawn an accurate picture of the Princes and people of India and unerringly laid his finger upon the weakest spot in the prevailing system of administration. He paid a handsome tribute of praise to the loyalty, nobility of mind and chivalrous nature of the great Princes of India. We have always been of opinion that even the British Government might usefully learn from them something of their noble courtesy her." We, in India, join the one into living touch with the Dean in this thanksgiving. 'To serve' 'I serve.' A nobler motto, prince, every minister and every ought to be the motto of the people. The kings and officers servant. There is no reality the servants of the people. of the Governments, not perfunctory. That king and Service must be done with heart and soul are the worthy minister that serve the people. His Royal Highness the Prince representatives of the sincere servant of God. The visit of of Wales appeared to be of incalculable benefit to India. the Prince to India. Indian Press was far from satisfactory. The tone of the address of the Lord Mayor of London, he before His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, he speech, in which he dwelt upon his experiences of India and among himself and the Princess of Wales) had been well said that there would never fade from his mind; that they were comedies, the nobility of mind and chivalrous nature of the princes and the people of India with kindness, affect, been impressed by the loyalty, personal allegiance, the nobility of mind and chivalrous nature of the princes. His Royal Highness observed that no one to be struck by the wonderful administration of India, the noble work of the Civil Service and the government of of people by a mere handful of highly educated and hard British officers. His Royal Highness was proud to say he was struck with its immense size, its splendour, its many races, varied climate, snow-capped mountains, boundless rivers, architecture of monuments and hoary traditions. He realised the patience, simplicity of life, devotion and religious spirit which characterised the Indian peoples. His Royal Highness had the evidence of the faith of the Indian people in the absolute justice and integrity of the British Rule. It is for the good of England that His Royal Highness visited the country leisurely, that he made a railway journey of 9,000 miles and spent 28 nights in comfortable railway trains and saw with his own eyes, caught with his own ears unmistakable evidences of Indian loyalty and good faith. His general impression of the Indian people and his opinion as to the best mode of governing India are highly interesting. He says:—

"I cannot help thinking from all I have heard and seen that the task of governing India will be made easier, if we, on our part, infuse into it a wider element of sympathy. (Cheers.) I will venture to predict that to such sympathy there will be an ever abundant and genuine response. (Cheers.) May we not also hope for a still fuller measure of trust and confidence in our earnest desire and efforts to promote the well-being and to further the best interests of every class?"

This opinion coming as it does from a Prince who had rarest opportunities of observing the people in India, has been productive of much good and we already see a wide element of sympathy in the Anglo-Indian public opinion. But we are afraid that this sympathy is of a transient and temporary nature and before long there may be a relapse to the former state of things. Symptoms are not wanting of such relapse. If the officials in India are one-hundredth as good, generous and sympathetic as His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, the British Empire can be made to stand on the bedrock of Indian loyalty and love. The Prince is a born nobleman. Power and position such as those he has, have no intoxicating effect on him. That is not the case with officials born without them and succeeding to power in India. Many of the Indian officials exercise a power which even the Emperor of India does not even dream of exercising. How can we ever expect genuine sympathy from them? It is true that there will be abundant and genuine response to real sympathy. If the British people evince an earnest desire and make efforts to promote the well-being and to further the best interests of all classes, they will command a full measure of trust and confidence in the official classes. We are glad that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has come to realise the truth of this. Mr. Morley in proposing "Our British Empire" made a speech which is full of wisdom and practical good sense. He pays a high tribute of praise to the sentiment expressed by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales about the wider elements of sympathy which stand in need of being extended by the official classes to the princes and people of India. Mr. Morley says that he is bound to say that from his own tolerably short experience of the Indian Government wider elements of sympathy are as indispensable for the maintenance of British power in India as justice and clemency. He looks upon the exercise of sympathy to be a supreme duty to be persistently performed. Mr. Morley ardently welcomes the eloquent language which fell from His Royal Highness. He believes that it will have the effect all over India of doing much to unite the Government and the governed. He thinks that sympathy is a bond of strong union, a bond that cannot be snapped away very easily. Mr. Morley goes a little further and says that the key to good government in India and to the steadfast and successful working of the machine must depend upon a good and right understanding between His Majesty's Government at Whitehall and the agents of that Government at Simla. He adds that the excellent and helpful accord between the Secretary of State and the Governor-General of India have never been more complete than that which reigned between him and the present Governor-General of India. We are in entire accord with Mr. Morley as regards the absolute need of good understanding. He insists upon not only a good understanding but also a right one between England and of India. Right understanding must be an understanding which is based upon justice and fairplay. An understanding favourable to the Government and unfavourable to the governed can never be a right understanding either for the Government or for the people. If any understanding is calculated to do good to the Government it is also calculated to do good to the people. The interests of both the Government and the people are, or at any rate must be, identical. If they are not so, the interests of one or the other must suffer and if it does so, the interests of both must likewise suffer. If Mr. Morley keeps this view in mind and works with a resolute purpose to promote the interests of the Indians before looking for the interests of England, the problem of Indian administration will have been completely solved by him.

9TH JUNE 1906.

United India and Native States.—The Lahore Tribune is not very sure whether the Kashmir Durbar did not overstep the limit when it spent something like six lakhs on the entertainment to Their Royal Highnesses. The bulk of the money might well have been devoted to some charitable object with which the name of the Prince of Wales could have been connected.
